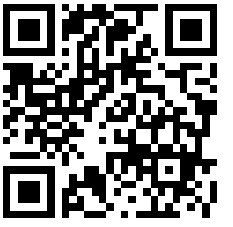
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com



603356740Y

Google

Gen. 2705 L. 81/6

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

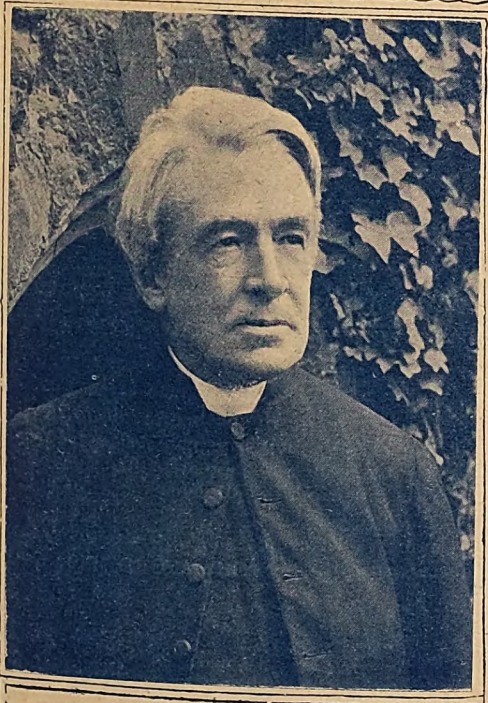
Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

FOR HOME AND SUNDAY READING.

VOL. 6. OCTOBER, 1901. No. 1.

PRICE SIXPENCE.



A GREAT CHURCHMAN.

Photo by A. H. Fry, Brighton.

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.

"The Standard of Highest Purity."—The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

Invaluable for Nursing Mothers, Invalids, and all those requiring a palatable and easily digested Tonic of high recuperative powers.

Brewed by Messrs. BEAMISH & CRAWFORD, Ltd., Cork, from the finest Malt and Hops. Guaranteed by them to be Absolutely Pure.

We have received innumerable testimonials from the highest Medical authorities from all parts of the United Kingdom, but refrain from publishing their names as a matter of courtesy to the writers, it being against the etiquette of the profession to do so.

An EMINENT DOCTOR says:—

"I can strongly recommend BEAMISH'S STOUT. I have prescribed it for many of my patients with excellent results."

Laboratory, 24, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.
March 4th, 1901.

A careful analysis has been made of this sample of Beamish's Stout, as a result of which I am able to state that it is an excellent one. It is good in flavour, high in extractive matters, rich in albuminoids, yet contains only a very moderate amount of alcohol, and is very low in acidity. Although I understand the sample which I have received has been in bottle for two years, no active fermentation is taking place is the only Stout which will not introduce into the system unfermented yeast cells, and consequently it can be taken by the most delicate without fear of indigestion.

LAURENCE BRIANT, F.C.S., F.R.M.S.

BEAMISH'S STOUT

Delivered free to any address in the United Kingdom in Cases containing 3 dozen reputed pints, Price 18/- per case. Wholesale Agents to whom all communications should be addressed—

GENDALL & CO., 34, Norfolk St., Strand, London, W.C.

Agents Wanted Everywhere.

BODLEIAN 10 1903 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

"NEGO" FIRELIGHTERS

Are a scientifically prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. ONE OF THESE FIRELIGHTERS IS QUITE SUFFICIENT TO BOIL A KETTLE IN A FEW MINUTES.

Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d.; or twenty packets will be sent post free on receipt of 5s. P.O.

A Sample packet of "NEGO" Firelighters will be sent post free on receipt of 3 penny stamps.

Sole Wholesale Agents for the United Kingdom GENDALL & CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, W.C.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

HALL'S WINE

THE MARVELLOUS RESTORATIVE.

It is marvellous because it is so rapid in restoring after the most serious illnesses, and because of its wonderful sustaining power, which, combined with its curative properties, makes it the most popular preparation for invalids.

HALL'S WINE is extremely palatable, being undistinguishable from port wine, is economical because a little goes a long way, is not disappointing because nothing is claimed for it that has not been amply proved during the last ten years it has been in use.

IT CURES—

NEURALGIA. SLEEPLESSNESS.
MENTAL and PHYSICAL FATIGUE.
NERVOUS IRRITABILITY. ANÆMIA.

Is the most satisfactory Pick-me-Up in the World.

It RELIEVES the distressing symptoms of Bronchitis and Whooping Cough almost immediately.

Recommended by "The Lancet," "The British Medical Journal," "The Hospital," and the Medical Profession.

Try a bottle NOW, you will be delighted with it.

Sold by Licensed Grocers, Chemists, and Wine Merchants.
3/- and 1/9 per bottle.

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

A DAINTY ROBE.

The tea-gown of to-day is so elaborate that if it were only cut a little lower, and shorn of its sleeves, it would almost be a ball-gown, so dainty is its appearance, and so exquisite is its every detail. A very lovely model, of which a sketch is given, showed a yoke-piece and upper sleeves of very finely-tucked white chiffon, the tuckings set quite closely together, and mounted on a firm white lining. The whole of this tucking was outlined with a string-coloured guipure appliqué to the chiffon. Below this quite a simple muslin was gathered. The muslin was what is known as organdi, or French muslin, and was delicately arranged with trails of pink roses. The skirt was very voluminous, for muslin, remember, is thin, and requires a goodly quantity to make any show. The whole was arranged in Empire fashion, the figure not being defined in any way, and a good deal of fulness being placed round both back and front. A full cascade of deep string-coloured lace fell down the centre of the front and round the foot hem of this charming gown, while the sleeve was finished off with a string-coloured appliqué to match the yoke. Full frills of the same lace adorned the elbow sleeves, and a small V-shape was cut away at the neck. A big bow of the palest blue and the palest pink ribbons was tied at the bend of the figure, and a more simple or delightful garment can scarcely be imagined.

WOMEN'S WORK ABROAD.

Clerks' work, which in this country attracts so many women, falls also to the share of many women on the Continent. Everyone has seen the women at the ticket offices of railway stations in Germany. In some of the picture galleries of central Europe it is quite common for women to be engaged as custodians of the visitors' sticks and umbrellas, though in England men are more usually selected for such duties. Much more honorable posts than these are the custodianships of museums. In the Swiss National Museum of Zurich, which is celebrated for its almost unique collection of relics from the old lake dwellings, one of the custodians of the galleries is a woman.

Knowledge is proud that she knows so much. Wisdom is humble that she knows no more.

Digitized by Google

Hovis

(Trade Mark.)

"As good as it is nice."

Most Family Bakers make it daily.

Agents' Addresses are supplied on application. Hovis Ltd., Macclesfield.

METROPOLITAN CREAM

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS FOR BOOTS AND SHOES

W. CLARK, 528, Oxford St., London, W.
(Near the Marble Arch).

TO ASTHMA SUFFERERS

INSTANT RELIEF is gained in all cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, CROUP, and WHOOPING COUGH by the use of

POTTER'S DATURA ASTHMA CURE

Sold by all Chemists an 1 Herbalists, in Tins at 1s. each Free Sample sent on receipt of Post Card to POTTER AND CLARKE, Artillery Lane, London, E.

TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

Messrs. H. DAWSON & Co.,

34, NORFOLK ST., STRAND. LONDON, W.C.

The Handiest SHAKESPEARE in the World

MESSRS. GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., will shortly publish a new POCKET EDITION of the COMPLETE PLAYS and POEMS of SHAKESPEARE in three volumes, with GLOSSARY, printed in large, clear type on extremely thin but thoroughly opaque paper with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title page to each volume, from drawings by E. J. Sullivan, printed on Japanese Vellum.

The size of these volumes is 6¾ by 3⅜, and each volume, though containing 900 pages, will measure no more than ⅝-in. in thickness. For a pocket edition it has been thought best to add no notes or comments of any kind beyond a simple glossary at the end of the third volume. The Binding of these volumes will be a limp Lambskin, with special design by H. Granville Fell, and specially designed end-papers. The volumes may be bought separately, the price being 3s. 6d. net.

Also in preparation The Complete Poems of John Milton, and the Complete Poems and Songs of Robert Burns, each in one volume. Cloth 2/6 net; Lambskin 3/- net.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL EDITION OF THE CLASSICS.

Ready] THE CAXTON SERIES.—ILLUSTRATED REPRINTS OF FAMOUS BOOKS. [Shortly.

Printed in large, clear type on antique wove paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece, and from Ten to Fourteen Illustrations by well-known artists in black and white. Small Foolscap 8vo, 6½ by 4⅛, Cloth limp, Gilt tops, Designed End-papers, 2s. 6d. net; Limp Leather, 3s. net.

I.—UNDINE, & ASLAUGA'S KNIGHT. By LA MOTTE FOUQUÉ. With Illustrations by HAROLD NELSON.

II. and III.—THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS FROM THIS WORLD TO THAT WHICH IS TO COME. By JOHN BUNYAN. With Illustrations by E. J. SULLIVAN. Two vols.

IV.—IN MEMORIAM. By ALFRED LORD TENNYSON. With Illustrations by A. GARTH JONES.

V.—THE SERIOUS POEMS OF THOMAS HOOD. With Illustrations by H. GRANVILLE FELL.

VI.—A BOOK OF ROMANTIC BALLADS. Compiled from various sources ranging from the Thirteenth Century to the Present Day. With Illustrations by REGINALD SAVAGE.

VII. and VIII.—THE SKETCH-BOOK. By WASHINGTON IRVING. With Illustrations by E. J. SULLIVAN. Two vols.

TWO NEW BOOKS OF FAIRY TALES.

QUEEN MAB'S FAIRY BOOK. An Original Collection of Tales from the Literatures of England, France, Germany, and Spain. With many Illustrations by well-known Artists. Square 8vo, 7¾ by 5¾. 6s. [Ready Shortly.

A REAL QUEEN'S FAIRY TALES. By CARMEN SYLVA (The Queen of Roumania). With 20 Full-page Illustrations by well-known Artists. Square 8vo, 7¾ by 5¾. 6s. [Ready Shortly.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., 7—12, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A LITERARY WOMAN.

Miss Ella Hepworth Dixon is a journalist who has travelled a good deal. She has been in Russia and in Italy, in Northern Africa and in Scandinavia, in Denmark and in the Balearic Islands, in Malta and in Corfu, in the United States and Canada, in Sweden and in Sicily. She is much interested in the higher education of women—for she declares she never received any herself—and is a member of the council of the Women's Institute in Victoria Street. During the worst stages of the South African War, Miss Dixon did a résumé of the movements in the field for two weekly papers, and her work in the magazines and newspapers attracts attention abroad.

We should do all our work in a hopeful spirit, and cast our burdens behind us; not pile them up in front of us as we travel through life.

To be "good-natured" in the true sense of that much misused phrase, is to have goodness, kindliness and love rooted deep in our very being, and suffusing the whole character with its light and warmth.

QUEEN ALEXANDRA'S DOGS.

Queen Alexandra's love of dogs is not limited to any one particular breed, for at the Sandringham kennels there is a great variety of doggie pets. The Basset hound, both rough and smooth-haired, has always held a place in the affections of both the King and Queen, whilst of Blenheim spaniels, Japanese and toy bull-dogs there are several choice specimens. Other foreign varieties of the canine breed are also to be seen, one of the most interesting, perhaps, being "Jacko," the sledge hound, which accompanied the Jackson-Harmsworth expedition in 1894 to the Far North.

THRIFT THAT BRINGS BEGGARY.

Life's real loss is life unlived. The strength we pay out for a principle enriches us, though the cause may seem a failure. The strength we save through cowardice or selfishness impoverishes us. The love that is given, though it be not half returned, builds up the heart, while the love that is withheld shrivels it. Prudence may be an enemy of power, and thrift bring beggary behind it. "There is that withholdeth and tendeth to poverty."

Buyers and Sellers.

Our business is to introduce buyers to sellers.

We have been engaged in doing this successfully for many years. Our friends admit that the results of our efforts on their behalf have been a large accession of buyers for their goods. They say, in short, that they are better off to-day than they were when first they made our acquaintance.

We should like you to be in their position. If you have an article of merit that people want, we should be glad to discuss with you our system of creating a demand for it by means of advertising, &c. It saves our clients' time, worry, and money.

The advertiser has a greater opportunity of selling his goods than a non-advertiser.

H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Gregorian Church and Chapel Organs

"A special word to the Church with limited funds having Cathedral-organ desires."

I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that the Gregorian is in all respects the most perfect instrument of its kind extant.

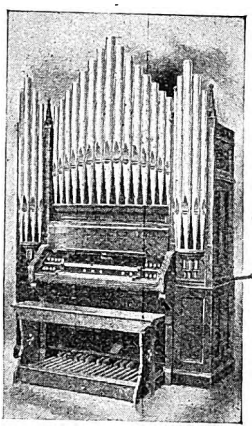
Each stop possesses a distinct individuality of its own, yet, when used in combination with others, they all blend most satisfactorily. The intonation is uniformly good, and the wind is distributed in a manner to insure prompt and perfect "speech" throughout the entire compass of the keyboards under all circumstances—a result never before accomplished in this connection.

The quality and tone is exquisitely pure, and so closely resembles that produced by "flue" pipes as to frequently deceive even the educated ear of an expert; and for this reason the Gregorian is an adequate substitute for a small pipe-organ. This attribute does not, however, detract from its value as a household solo instrument.

Faithfully yours,
FREDERIC ARCHER, Organist.

The Gregorian

system of organ-building enables us to build in compact form and at small cost organs which are veritable reproductions of the cathedral organ. Write us for Catalogue and any information desired regarding the instruments. Even should the outlook for an organ fund not be encouraging, if you need a new organ, write us. Nearly 4,000 Gregorian Organs now in use.



STYLE 22.

The Orchestrelle Company, 225 Regent Street, London, W.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW NOVELS, &c.

A SOWER OF WHEAT. By HAROLD BINDLOSS, Author of "Ainslie's Ju-ju," Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 6s.

TERENCE. By B. M. CROKER. Cheaper Edition, with Six Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE TRIUMPH OF HILARY BLACHLAND. By BERTRAM MITFORD, Author of "The Gun-runner." Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE LADY OF LYNN. By WALTER BESANT. With 12 Illustrations by G. DEMAIN-HAMMOND. Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"It marks a return to Sir Walter's most fruitful period."—Daily Mail.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS WOMAN. By MAX O'RELL, Author of "John Bull and his Island," &c. FOURTH EDITION. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

DESPAIR'S LAST JOURNEY. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "The Church of Humanity," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE PURPLE CLOUD. By M. P. SHIEL, Author of "The Lord of the Sea," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 6s.

A FIGHT TO A FINISH. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "Joan, the Curate," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE LOVER'S PROGRESS. Told by Himself, and "Dedicated to all who Love." Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE CANKERWORM: being Episodes of a Woman's Life. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN, Author of "The New Mistress," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 6s.

MAX THORNTON. By ERNEST GLANVILLE. With 8 Illustrations by J. S. CROMPTON, R.I. A NEW EDITION. Large crown 8vo. cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

A BLIND MARRIAGE, &c. By GEORGE R. SIMS. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

A VERSAILLES CHRISTMAS-TIDE. By MARY STUART BOYD. With 53 Illustrations by A. S. BOYD. Fcp. 4to. cloth gilt, 6s.

Post 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 2s. net per volume; leather, gilt edges, with marker, 3s. net. per volume.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. By CHARLES READE.

"IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND." By CHARLES READE.

FAMILIAR STUDIES OF MEN & BOOKS. By R. L. STEVENSON.

IN MEMORIAM: Verses for Every Day in the Year. Selected and Arranged by LUCY RIDLEY. Small 8vo. cloth, red edges, 2s. 6d. net; leather, burnished edges, 3s. 6d. net.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF ROBERT BUCHANAN. Two vols. crown 8vo. buckram, gilt top, with Portrait in each volume, 12s.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A SMART BODICE.

Charming indeed as the colours are which are shown in the various London shops, yet many, many folks are still keeping to black and white, and one of the smartest arrangements for a pretty bodice is that of a French model, fashioned upon black and white lines as follows:—The skirt is a black-faced cloth, arranged for autumn wear, not too long, yet cut with a flounce rather full and swirling, and trimmed at the heading with a vandyked arrangement of black velvet. The bodice is in two parts—an under and an upper part. The under part is composed entirely of string-coloured piece lace, while the upper part is of black velvet, strapped across the front with bands of same and caught down with tiny buttons of Parisian paste. The sleeves are also of the velvet, but cut in quite a novel shape. The sleeve itself is fairly tight-fitting, but points in vandykes at the elbow to show a bulging of the string-coloured lace which forms the under-bodice. The little sleeve is then finished with a tiny point over the hand, and three small paste buttons are supplied; so that at the wrist itself the sleeve itself fits as tight as a skin. The whole costume is as simple as possible, yet exceedingly smart, and I would suggest that my readers can copy it in a whole host of differing colourings. For instance, a violet skirt arranged in the same way, with a bodice of violet velvet would look charming; while again a fairly rough frieze in pale grey would look very well arranged in this style, and in such instance I would suggest the bodice being carried out in black velvet and lace, and not in grey velvet, to match the skirt. The hat to wear therewith is fairly large, and can be of black or grey velvet, adorned with black feathers, and a big white or grey gull, set exactly in the centre of the front.

If you consider that you are both a rational and a moral being, your moral condition will repress the pride of your reason, and your reason will fortify you in your moral condition.

There is only one stimulant that never fails, and yet never intoxicates—duty. Duty puts a blue sky over every man—up in his heart, maybe, into which the skylark, happiness, always goes singing.

THE . .
Autumn Fashion Number
. . OF . .
MYRA'S JOURNAL CONTAINS Over 100 Designs of Autumn Fashions FROM LONDON, PARIS & VIENNA.

Tailor-Made Costumes, Tailor-Made Skirt, Lessons in Dressmaking. Hairdressing. Underclothing. Children's Dresses.

NOVELTIES OF THE SEASON.

Health and Personal Attention. Palmistry. Interesting Serial Story. Furnishing.

TWO CUT-OUT PATTERNS, TAILOR COAT AND SKIRT.

Coloured Fashion Plate (Six Figures),
A BUDGET OF FASHIONS. PRICE THREEPENCE.

BEETON & Co., Ltd., 10 and 11, Fetter Lane, E.C.

Fascinating Flowers!
To make...
A PERFECT PICTURE IN YOUR GARDEN,
to last for years,
NOW IS THE TIME TO PLANT
Kelway's
Lovely New Paeonies

The Fashionable Flower; in an almost endless variety of lovely tints, and, in many cases, with the fragrance of the Tea Rose; Kelway & Son's celebrated improved kinds certificated by the Royal Horticultural Society. Strong country grown plants for flowering next and many succeeding seasons in the hardy perennial border or bed, or in shrubberies, drives, grass, park or woodland. The cut flowers are gloriously decorative.

Collection C .. .. 30/- per dozen.
" D (extra fine kinds).. 42/- "

Carriage paid for cheque with order to those mentioning "Temple Magazine."

130 Gold and Silver Medals.
London, Paris, Chicago, etc.

KELWAY & SON, The Royal Horticulturists,
LANGPORT, SOMERSET.

Digitized by Google

The Home Beautiful.

Furniture and Metal Work require constant attention, if the beauty of the home is not to be sacrificed. The "GLOBE" METAL POLISH will effectively attend to the Metal Work in the house, as it imparts a lasting brilliance, which is unobtainable by any other means.

The "GLOBE" FURNITURE POLISH is equally effective in its own sphere of usefulness; applied in accordance with the directions which accompany each box, there is nothing so effective for cleaning and renovating furniture

THESE POLISHES ARE OBTAINABLE AT ALL GROCERS, STORES, &c.

If there is any difficulty in obtaining them, write to us and we will see that you are supplied.

RAIMES & Co., Ltd., Stockton-on-Tees, & Bow, London, E.

Digitized by Google

WALKING GOWN.

The sketch shews a walking gown in green cashmere. The under-skirt and trimming on the bodice are of soft silk the same shade, patterned with black. Bodice and over-skirt edged with black satin ribbon. The yoke and collar are of the cashmere tucked.

The only daughter of the German Emperor, little Princess Victoria Louise of Prussia, is nine years of age, and has much of the Empress's placid grace and the Emperor's vitality. She is adored by her parents, and was the pet of the Empress Frederick. The Princess is a very merry child, and is regarded by the Kaiser as a mascotte, for there is an old saying that when a seventh son is born to a Hohenzollern ill-luck will befall the House. The seventh child of the Emperor luckily proved to be a daughter.

A DAINTY BODICE.

The girl who leaves home from Saturday to Monday may own quite a nice-looking black skirt, that will do at a stretch for both day and evening wear; yet she must perforce have something that will look extra smart and dainty when the evening comes, and for this she must have a different bodice to that which she has worn during the day, or, at any rate, one with a different appearance. For such occasions there is nothing so useful as a handsome bodice with a V-shaped front, that can be entirely removed and one of the best ways of obtaining such a bodice is that of arranging the upper and outer part of handsome lace, with the little V-shaped under-front and collar of tucked chiffon or muslin. The sleeves can either be of plain muslin, made clear to show the arm through, and finished with a deep cuff of the lace, or they can be made entirely of lace in the pretty bell-shaped fashion, with an under-sleeve of chiffon below. Under such circumstances the under-sleeves can be quickly removed, and so too can the little V-shaped front with the collar—thus the evening dress is ready all complete. To smarten such a lace bodice one could add straps of black velvet, carried from the waist up to the bend of the figure, and finished there with a tiny bow of the same. A broad black satin waistband in corselet shape would make a dainty finish.

HIDDEN HEROISM.

One hears of the great works of mankind, the marvels wrought by the hand and brain of men, the heroism of some of the women workers, our nurses, our platform speakers; and all of them in turn enjoy the reward of their own work, and have the satisfaction of hearing their name proclaimed as having achieved wonders; but the true heroism, the real nobility of soul, is never heard of; it is generally found in shabby homes with large families of varied tempers. There is no triumphant trumpeting of the self-sacrifices wrought daily, of ready words held back, of tears brushed hastily aside, of plaintive murmurings, whispered prayers, and heavy sobs of sorrow and pain. No one brings forth the hero or heroine of that sphere. Yet in truth this silent courage, this bravery, far exceeds in real value the heroism of the battlefield; because in the one there is always a certain amount of publicity and a chance of the world's reward and distinction; while with the other there is nothing but the presence of a beautiful faith that it is all for the best, not working for the praise of man, but of God.

Digitized by Google

The Smith Premier Typewriter

The embodiment of strength & simplicity

Send for Art Catalogue post free

Head Office
14 Gracechurch Street
London EC

A Splendid 6d. Magazine for 3d.

READY 9th OCTOBER.

3d. THE 3d.

Lady's World.

CONTENTS FOR OCTOBER:

GRAND NEW SERIAL STORY
By Mrs. C. N. WILLIAMSON.

COMPLETE STORIES by FLORENCE HOPE and G. B. BURGIN.
MOUNT ST. MICHAEL, THE HOME OF LORD ST. LEVAN (RICHLY ILLUSTRATED).
MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.—SPECIAL ARTICLE.
FASHIONS.—Dainty Gowns, Coats, Blouses, Underwear, Millinery, Practical Dressmaking.
FANCY WORK.—Beautifully Illustrated.
HAIRDRESSING FOR OCTOBER.
THE BUSY HOUR, for Matron and Maid.
SOCIETY.—With the most Interesting Portraits.
DRAMA.—Up-to-date, with the newest Portraits.
HOUSE BEAUTIFUL, GOOD HOUSEKEEPING, COOKERY AND HEALTH.

GIVEN AWAY!

Paper Pattern OF THIS NEW AUTUMN COAT is presented with each copy.

ORDER AT ONCE.

Price, 3d. (By Post, 5½d.)

A SPLENDID NUMBER!

"The Lady's World,"
6, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

WORLD TRAVEL

Organised by

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., F.R.G.S.,
W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,
AND CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

CRUISE

on the Magnificent Ocean Yacht "ARGONAUT."

Tonnage 3,254, H.P. 4,000. Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

Sailing as follows to* THE MEDITERRANEAN:—

December 23rd—From Marseilles to Palermo, Jaffa (for Jerusalem), Alexandria (for Cairo), Malta and back to Marseilles. A Twenty-five days' Cruise for 27 Guineas and upwards.

This Cruise is under the auspices of the Co-operative Cruising Co., Ltd.

£10 10s., £11 11s., £13 13s., and £14 14s. TOURS to ROME. With Optional Extensions to Naples, Assisi, Perugia, Florence, Venice, and the Riviera.

£12 12s. TOURS to FLORENCE and VENICE.

£10 10s. Winter Skating and Tobogganing Parties to CHAMONIX and GRINDELWALD.

A WORLD'S TOUR for 200 Guineas.

Full Particulars from the Secretary—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W.

Have you tried* Osman Turkish Towels?

HIGHEST AWARD: "Grand Prix," Paris Exhibition, 1900, Two other Medals, and 15 Awards.

HIGHEST QUALITY!
PRICE MODERATE!!
WEAR GUARANTEED!!!

The "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWELS are made in small sizes for Face Towels and in larger sizes for the Bathroom, with knotted fringe or hem-stitched ends. Once you have used "OSMAN" Towels you will buy no others. The wear is guaranteed by the manufacturers.

BARLOW AND JONES, LIMITED.
MANCHESTER.

SOLD BY ALL THE PRINCIPAL DRAPERS AND HOUSE FURNISHERS THROUGHOUT THE EMPIRE.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR OCTOBER, 1901.

			PAGE
I.	"Maiden Meditation"		Frontispiece
II.	At Work at Eighty and Ninety. Illustrated.	Reginald Turner	1
III.	Dr. Horton and His Work at Hampstead: A Sketch and an Interview Illustrated.	A. Frederic White	7
IV.	A Reformatory and Workhouse on the Waves. Illustrated.	Thekla Bowser	11
V.	Glenora's Marriage. Story	Justin M'Carthy, M.P.	18
VI.	On the Yorkshire Moors. Illustrated	Leonard Graham	24
VII.	Women Factory Workers	Clementina Black	29
VIII.	The Tenant of Grove Cottage. Serial Story. Chapters I.-VI. Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Adam Lilburn	31
IX.	Conduct the Test of Religion	Rev. John Watson, D.D.	48
X.	In the Public Eye Illustrated.	The Onlooker	51
XI.	Wealth and Its Responsibilities	Rev. Silas K. Hocking	59
XII.	Violet Eyes. A Fairy Tale. Illustrated.	Marion Reid	61
XIII.	A Public Proposal. Story	W. Pett Ridge	65
XIV.	A Free Shelter for Homeless Men Illustrated.	Arthur Welby	70
XV.	His Heart's Desire. Story	Katharine S. Macquoid	73
XVI.	Gainsborough and His Birthplace Illustrated.	E. Browning Triscott	78
XVII.	The Bag Under the Thatch: A Black Country Story	Mrs. Coulson Kernahan	83
XVIII.	Common Sense for Mothers and Nurses	Dr. Julia Holmes Smith	90
XIX.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	92

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

The only
GOLD MEDAL
Awarded for Milk-Chocolate at the Paris Exhibition, 1900, was gained by PETER'S
MILK-CHOCOLATE,
THE ORIGINAL AND BEST.
6d. Tablets and 6d. and 1s. Croquettes. Sold Everywhere.
Sole Agents (trade only), S. J. MACKENZIE & CO., LTD., Wellclose Square, London.

COOLS AND REFRESHES THE SKIN.
"BEETHAM'S Reg^d Larola"
After exposure to the Sun or Wind. Removes and prevents all HEAT, SUNBURN, TAN, IRRITATION, etc., and Keeps the Skin Soft, Smooth, and White.
during the Heat of Summer. Its effect will delight you! Bottles 6d., 1s., 2s. 6d. of all chemists.
Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT WORLD OF LONDON.

A NEW BOOK OF THE PEOPLE, AND THE LIFE OF THE WORLD'S GREATEST CAPITAL.

Messrs. CASSELL & COMPANY will publish on October 23rd, the First Part, Price 7d. net, of Living London:

ITS WORK AND ITS PLAY, ITS HUMOUR AND ITS PATHOS, ITS SIGHTS AND ITS SCENES.

Edited by GEORGE R. SIMS.

With many hundreds of Illustrations from Photographs expressly taken for this work, and Drawings by leading artists of the day. In Fortnightly Parts, 7d. net. A large Rembrandt Photogravure Presentation Plate, "A Halt in Piccadilly," by GORDON BROWNE, R.I., R.B.A., will be presented with Part I.

"In 'Living London,'" says Mr. G. R. Sims in his Prologue, "all forms and phases of London Life, from the highest to the lowest, will be brought before us. For us the gates of the palace and the prison will fly open, and the West and the East will alike deliver up their mysteries. We shall see the people at their work and at their play; we shall mingle with the coroneted crowd at the Court of the King; we shall stand among the tattered outcasts who wait for admission at the workhouse gates; we shall stroll through the great world of London as it wakes to life with the dawn; we shall wander through its highways and its byways at the darkest hour of night. When the pulse of the City beats quickest, and the streets and the parks are thronged, we shall see life in the twentieth century Babylon in a hundred aspects."

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD., LONDON, AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

THE FINEST ART PUBLICATION OF THE CENTURY.

Part I., Price 7d. net, ready October 9th, of

The Nation's Pictures

A SELECTION FROM THE FINEST MODERN PAINTINGS IN THE PUBLIC GALLERIES OF GREAT BRITAIN.

BEAUTIFULLY REPRODUCED IN COLOURS.

Each Part will contain Four Mounted Coloured Plates, with descriptive text, printed on separate tissues. Part II. will be published October 30, and Fortnightly thereafter.

In "The Nation's Pictures" will be reproduced in colour by the latest and most perfect process of chromo photography, the most famous pictures in the great art galleries of the country. Messrs. Cassell & Company have been engaged for many months past in preparing a work in which the treasures of all our national galleries, both in London and the provinces, will be adequately represented. No such work has ever before been offered to the public; whilst no less novel than the design of the work is the manner in which it will be executed. The great advance in recent years in the processes of colour-printing has alone made it possible to produce this magnificent work at such a price as to place it within the general reach.

 Orders for the above are now received by all Booksellers and at the Bookstalls. Prospectuses on application to the Publishers,

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD., LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

The Temple Magazine.

VOLUME VI.

October, 1901, to December, 1902.

1902.

London: 6a, Tudor Street, Blackfriars, E.C.

Digitized by Google

INDEX TO VOLUME VI.

A.

	PAGE
Aerial Navigation Possible? Is, by John Alexander	879
Africa by Africans, For,	651
Ancient Idols Worshipped by the Jews	925
Arm of Flesh, by Beth Bannester, B.A.	595
Audrey's Promise	705
Aunt Sophy, by Sheila Allison	386
Awful Results of the Martinique Explosion on Great Britain, by Beth Bannester, B.A.	909

B.

BAIRNS, For the, by the Rev. Reid Howatt—
Crutch and Kindness League	375, 469, 563
How I Fill In My Spare Time	373
My Fairy Tale	466
When I Grow Up	562
Benefactors of the Race: Lord Lister, Miss Florence Nightingale, Dr. Samuel Smiles, General Booth, Lord Avebury, Rev. Benj. Waugh, by Reginald Turner	392
Bible Beams	1060
Bible Society's Reply to Criticism	1387
Bishop's Stortford College	782
Book, My First: Some Well-known Writers on their Beginnings in Authorship	424
Bread Making, American, by H. S. Archer	1250
British Chautauqua, The,	821
British and Foreign Bible Society, Management Of,	1273
Briton, A True,	722
Cancer Curse, The,	949
Chateau, The Ruined,	1319
Cheshunt College: Past and Present, by the Editor	980
City Forgotten, A, by John Foster Fraser	431
City of Darkest Night, From the: The Story of a Work of Mercy, by A. Wellesley Ireton	439
City of Refuge, A, by Rev. J. E. Shephard, F.G.S.	771
Clifford, John, D.D., A Sketch and an Interview, by Chas. Spence	329
Confession, The, by A. Conan Doyle	365
Conquest of the Air, The, by Onlooker	816
Conventicle, At a,	633
Coronation Embroideries	851
Costly Experiment, A,	757
Costumes of the Holy Land	1115
Country Anniversary, A,	647
Crown and After, To the,	884
Cumbered with Much Service, by Seebie Aitch	573
Cynic's Repentance, A,	968
Czar's Simple Life, The,	1297

D.

Dawg Sly, That, by S. Baring Gould	288
Dickens's London, by Sidney E. Jackson	345
Dogs in Harness, by Chas. Horner	368

E.

	PAGE
Editorial Announcements	1194

F.

Fast Motion, The Fascination of	1329
Fashions are Set, How,	1310
Fellow, A Charming, by Mrs. J. H. Riddell	476
Fire Fighting and Life Saving at Home, by Alex. Henderson	433

G.

Germans Took London, How the, by T. W. Offin	751, 913, 972, 1061
Gospel Has Civilised the Red Man, How the,	1148
Guest, The Paid, by Adeline Sergeant	398
Gargoyle, The,	1383
Gibson, Rev. Monro, on the Education Bill	1369

H.

Heirs of Rossmoyne, by Marian Isabel Hurrell	986
Her Choice	1073
Hope for the Deaf	1047
Home for the Hopeless, A: The Royal Hospital for Incurables, by Robert Vincent	335
How She Won Her Husband	1052

I.

IN THE PUBLIC EYE:
Adey, Rev. W. T.	813
Bailey, Miss Nancy	525
Bannester, Miss Beth, B.A.	1096
Barnes, Miss Emily	295
Barraclough, Rev. J. E., M.A.	672
Baylis, Mr. Barnard	1094
Bell, Dr. Alexander Graham	519
Bradburn, Rev. Mr.	1094
Bradburn, Miss	1094
Carlile, Rev. H. H., M.A.	643
Chamberlain, Right Hon. Joseph	1371
Coote, Mr. W. A.	1281
Cooke, "Jack"	1282
Cory, Mr. and Mrs.	1373
Dimsdale, Lady	457
Frances, Miss Frances	456
Garcia, Rev. G. H. R., B.A.	922
Green, Mr. T. Bowden	673
Halkett, Miss Craigie	454
Hargreaves, Rev. James E.	455
Herbert, Rev. Charles	1096
Hill, Mr. Ninian	297
H.M. The King	921
H.M. The Queen	921
Hopetoun, The Earl of	1280
Howard, Ebenezer	1375
Howie, Rev. Dr.	670
Hughes, Rev. Hugh Price	1374
Hyne, Mr. J. Cutcliffe	518
Kendon, Rev. J. J.	1170
Kensit, Mr. John	1278
Kernahan, Mr. Coulson	299
Kinnaird, Hon. Emily	296

Digitized by Google

PAGE

Large, Miss A. E. ... 646
Laurier, Sir Wilfrid ... 1171
Lawes, Rev. W. G., D.D. ... 645
Magill, Miss ... 670
Malvery, Miss Olive Christian ... 524
Mar, Miss Helen ... 526
Mason, Miss Charlotte ... 294
Mayo, Mr. Arthur ... 670
McCall, Dr. Annie ... 1008
McNabb, Mr. ... 1094
Merritt, Rev. Stephen ... 1170
Minto, The Earl of ... 1279
Mirlees, Mrs. ... 523
Mond, Dr. Ludwig ... 520
More, Rev. John ... 459
Morgan, Mr. Pierpont ... 1278
Murphy, Miss Stormont ... 457
Neville, Ralph, K.C. ... 1375
Overtoun, Lord ... 523
Paton, Dr. J. G. ... 646
Paton, Mr. J. L., M.A. ... 814
Peary, Lieutenant ... 1372
Peirano, Mrs. ... 520
Pope, Miss Rosalie ... 295
Ranfurly, Lord, G.C.M.G. ... 1280
Ross, Mr. John ... 922
Samuel, Marcus, Sir ... 1372
Seddon, The Right Hon. Richard ... 1279
Shepherd, Rev. J. F., M.A. ... 672
Simpson, Rev. A. B. ... 1169
Simpson, Mr. J. G. H. S. ... 1170
Smith, Gipsy ... 1282
Squire, Mr. Ernest ... 815
Stephen, Mr. John ... 521
Stephens, Rev. J. R. M. ... 672
Stephens, Mrs. ... 672
Stewart, Mother ... 1093
Thomas, Miss Clayton ... 522
Thorneycroft, Miss Helen ... 298
Tillard, Miss ... 1007
Tomey, Mr. ... 1094
Trimen, Mrs. Roland ... 458
Walker, Rev. Dr. ... 527
Webb, Mr. Percy ... 815
Ideals, Unrealised, by Rev. Silas K. Hocking ... 421
Initial Velocity, The, ... 730
"I Forbid the Banns!" ... 952

J.

Julius and Juliet: Or a Cabinet Crisis ... 1003

K.

King of Spain, The Young, by John Bell ... 283
King's Trustees, The, by C.M.P. ... 1235
Kurkus, Among the, by Rev. Eric Lewis ... 1176

L.

Land of Many Waters, The, Finland, the Country of Legendary Charm, by Edgcumbe Staley
Literary Autographs, A page of, ... 301
Literary Jottings, by J. Cuthbert Haddon 339, 405, 558
Little Matchmaker, A, by Beth Bannester, B.A. 1010
Little Royal Lady of Long Ago, A, by Dorothy D. 829
Lost Revenge, A, ... 797
Love, The Conqueror, by C. N. Barham, 1077, 1135
London, How Rats Saved ... 1343

M.

Man of Moods, A, by K. Murray Eliot ... 542
Martinique, the Island of Destruction ... 818

PAGE

May Meeting Dinners, by Frank Harris ... 663
Mean Means, On, by A Tin Worker ... 774
Mechanics of Religious Work ... 637
Mighty Penny, That, ... 810
Millionaires, The Diversions of Some, ... 1349
Minister, What Led Me to Become a: Eminent Divines on their call to preach the Gospel ... 485
Miserable Mistake, A, by Grace Dukes ... 678
Modern Esdras, A, by Wolfe Street ... 605, 725
Modern Chemist, The ... 896
Mont Pelée, Eruption of, by Ellery S. Scott ... 1225
Morgan, Rev. G. Campbell, Interview with ... 1184
Most Beautiful Island in the World, by Rev. Ernest Walters ... 1163
Mothers and Nurses: Common Sense for, Proper Nutrition of Infant Children, by Dr. Julia Holmes Smith ... 370
Mr. Weston's Grandchild, by Lady Violet Greville ... 351

N.

Needle's Eye, The, by Florence Kingsley 787, 897, 955, 1039, 1151, 1257, 1358
Newgate, The End of, ... 1206
Not Fiction ... 966

O.

Offices, Curious, Held by Women in the Past, by Charlotte Carmichael Stopes ... 528
Old Moorish Homes ... 1015
Old Stories Re-told ... 1027

P.

Payment of Debt, In ... 1097
Peculiar People, A, ... 601
People's Friend, The, Or the Adventures of Carlton Hawes, by Chas. Herbert 565, 655, 775, 856
Perilous Predicament, A, by Travice Reay ... 1245
Peterson's Generosity ... 944
Photographs of Jesus Christ ... 863
Pictures, Some Great, and their Painters, by C. Sheridan Jones ... 377
Poet, A Born: A Skit ... 703
Protestant Reformation Society, The, ... 739
Provincial but Prosperous: Haverhill, by Onlooker ... 811

Q.

Quarrelsome Neighbour, A ... 698
Queer Ways, by Queer Sider ... 642

R.

RANDOM RAMBLES:
Bahamas, The ... 1187
Buddhist Priests ... 1102
Catacombs of Rome, The ... 1186
City of Samaria ... 1187
Pioneer Log Church, Alaska ... 1104
Raisin Farm, South California ... 1102
Russia's Peasant Homes ... 1101
Sacred Bathing Place, S. India ... 1101
Wonders of the Yellowstone ... 1188
Venezuela ... 1189
Realising our Colonies: Canada ... 723
Redskins of To-day, The, by Roy Carmichael ... 893
Remarkable Dream, A, ... 1170
Remarkable Offer, A, ... 572
Reviving the Dead ... 835
Revolution in Arcady, The, by Rev. Augustus Jessop, D.D. ... 461

Digitized by Google

	PAGE
Rhodes, Cecil, Chat Concerning, by the Editor	676
Roses of Death	1283
Royalty Working for the Poor, by Mrs. Hirst Alexander	361
Rothmore Bank, The Run on the,	1305
S.
Sacred Shroud of Turin	745
Salvation Army Officer, The, by W. Bramwell Booth	549
Scotch Express, The, by Mrs. Walford	308
"Seeing by Touch"	1375
Smuggling Yarns Retold	1105, 1195, 1289
Sobering of Jim Russell, The	667
Social Life in France, by Mrs. Crawford	357
Step in the Dark, A, by Helen Hardin	611
Story of Armenia	1057
Strange Disappearance of Lance Martin, by Clara Mulholland	445
Sunday Schools, Some Famous, by Geo. A. Wade	514
Sunshine Society Grew, How the,	701
Surface Current, A, by Beth Bannester, B.A.	733
T.
Tenant of Grove Cottage, The, by Adam Lilburn	313, 407, 503
Three Little Pitchers	1190
Tradition of the Simplon, by Max Pemberton	533
Training of Teachers, The	1030
Tram, An Electric, Without Rails	674
Trip to Tarifa, A, by Elizabeth Higgin	823
Two Faded Hearts	839
Two Room Economy, by Realist	631
U.
Unappreciated	621
V.
Verestchagin in the Philippines, by Isabel McDougall	1240
Via Southampton, by Gertrude Violet McFadden	627
Visit to the Parisian Zoo, A	1220
W.
Warwick, Lady and her Work for Women, by Wilfrid Mark Webb	471
Watch Chain, Mystery of the, by Grace Lathom	491
When the Mind Abdicates, by The Onlooker	649
When Night had Come	804
Where the Sunbeams Lay: A Parable	704
White Lady of the Zenana, The, by Miss H. Bourchier, M.D. (Illustrated by Fitzgerald) 579, 685, 759, 865, 929, 1017, 1119,	1212
Why Life is Worth Living, by Rev. J. Hirst Hollowell	560
Women Students of Oxford, by Kent Carr	537
Work, on Doing a Good Day's, by Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.	343
World Famous Preacher, A,	1071
Worthy Successor to a Great Inheritance: A Sketch of the Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, by Rev. Maurice Snelgrove	498
Worship, Curious Places of,	1131
Writ Sarcastic: How We Heard the Candidate, by Wolfe Street	807

POETRY.

Angels, Two	811
Bird with the Broken Wing, The	1092
Children Whom Jesus Blest	1014
Come Unto Me, by Nina	1092
Finished in Worlds Beyond, by Thos. J. B. Casey	423
Grief and Joy, by Julia Gordon	453
Guest, An Uninvited	1092
Happy Dream, The, by Samuel Peck	420
Heavenly Music	444
Jester's Prayer, The, Selected	967
Light on the Deep, The, by J. O. Swift	300
Moment, The	1092
Moonlight, In the	1092
Similitude, A, by J.C.	1230

FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Belfry, In the	720
Broken Pitcher, The	376
Bunyan, John	564
Countess of Warwick	470
Deep Sea Fishing	834
Falls of Niagara	626
Hyenas' Feast, The	737
Innocence	878
King of the Desert, The	684
Mandoline, My	282
Master's Daughter, My	717
Outward Bound	1130
Rustic Scene, A	971
Sacred Shroud, The	744
Spoils of the Sea	342
"The Stag at Eve had Drunk His Fill"	948
Swoop of the Enemy, The	943
Talmage, The Rev. T. De Witt, D.D.	654
Two Angels	801

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"MAIDEN MEDITATION."

Photograph by Lafayette, Dublin.

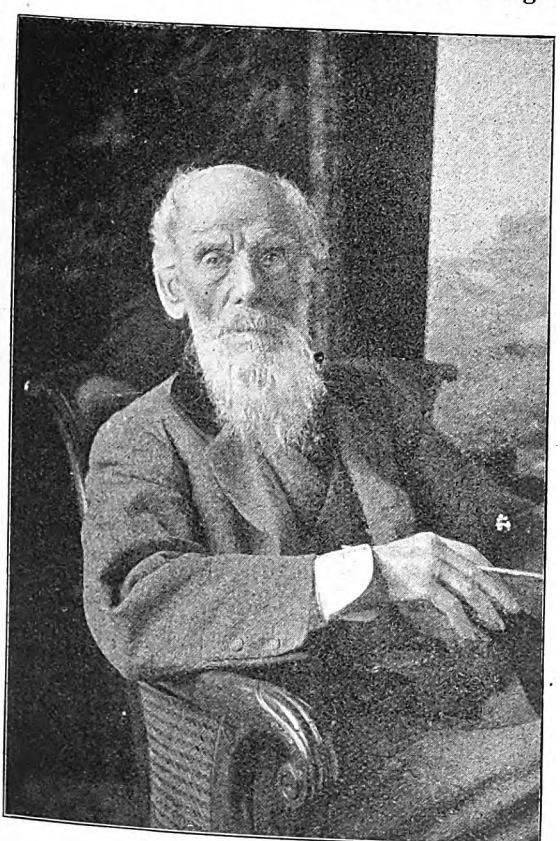
Digitized by Google

AT WORK AT EIGHTY AND NINETY.

By REGINALD TURNER.

THERE are some men whose powers of work remain until the coming of death. For them there is no period of retirement, and therefore, practically speaking, no old age. At seventy they are in their prime, ten years later finds them still at their posts, and when the inevitable comes it is generally at a single stride. At the present time there are a number of grand old men who stand out like veritable Nestors, each one furnishing a splendid example and guide to younger men in the same callings. Not one of them is less than eighty, but each still pursues his life's work with tireless energy and the same high purpose that inspired him in his younger days.

The dawn of the twentieth century still sees Sidney Cooper hard at work at his easel, an example and source of inspiration to young artists. Within two years of being a centenarian, only the other day he journeyed to town from his Canterbury home to receive a high honour from his King, than whom no man in England has a greater appreciation of his work. It is not absolutely necessary that the Victorian Order should be bestowed personally by the Sovereign, but King Edward specially requested the attendance of the celebrated painter, as he wished to give the decoration with his own hands. What a wonderful link with a great past the old man is. He was the intimate of all the chief artists of the Victorian Era — Turner, Constable, Wilkie, Landseer, Frith —



MR. SIDNEY COOPER, R.A.,
Who still exhibits at the Academy at the age of ninety-eight.
Photo by Elliott & Fry, 55, Baker Street, W.

Digitized by Google

and of these all but Frith have gone. It seems nothing short of miraculous that this all but centenarian should still exhibit pictures which, in the opinion

THE REV. DR. NEWMAN HALL,
The Nestor of Nonconformity.

of reliable critics, evince technique that puts to shame the works of younger men. For seventy years Mr. Cooper has never missed a place in the Academy, and still he paints on with a heart unbroken by Time and the loss of friends. What keeps him up? In great part, no doubt, his absolute devotion to his art, for whose sake he has throughout his long life made continual self-sacrifice, painting out of doors in all weathers, in tropical heat, or sometimes with the thermometer at twenty degrees below zero. He has always looked for his inspiration direct to Nature, and to such fidelity is to be largely attributed his success. He has little sympathy with the modern school of so-called impressionists. He thinks that they depart from Nature as much as they can, and he sees no surfaces in Nature that require interpretation with canvasses loaded with blotches of paint.

He once said, "I attribute my long life to God's providence and mercy, for I consider myself a monument of His mercy, and also to a certain extent to my own industry and to my system of always living temperately, and always out of London." Again, in describing the routine of his daily life, he says:—"I paint four or five hours a day and my sight remains so strong that I work much without glasses. I breakfast at eight o'clock, then have my Bible, and lunch and paint till three o'clock. Then I have my Bible again, dine at six o'clock, and go to bed at ten. I have a full dependence on the providence of God, full faith in the atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ, and I have a tranquil and peaceful mind."

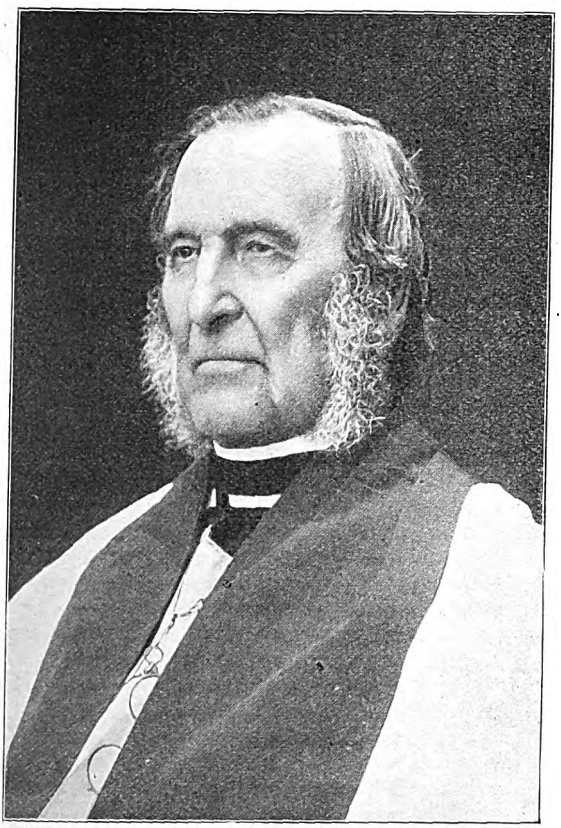
Though for some years now the Nestor of Nonconformity, the Rev. Newman Hall, has held no regular charge, it must not be inferred that he has given up active work. At the advanced age of eighty-five, his voice may still be heard in many a pulpit of his own denomination. And it is a voice that echoes as distinctly in every part of a large building as that of a robust man in the prime of life. He says himself that he still feels as a young man. He is not only a wonderful walker and mountain climber for his age, but he can put to the blush men of half his years. His marvellous vitality is due to a good constitution and a well-spent life, and those words of advice which he gave to young men some years ago he has himself followed, and is a living witness of their efficacy: "A noble, virtuous, and industrious young

THE BARONESS BURDETT-COUTTS,
Who has given away over a million in Charity.
Photo by Elliott & Fry, 55, Baker Street, W.

Digitized by Google

manhood," he said, "is likely to be followed by a successful maturity, and a happy and honoured age."

One of his first acts as a young minister was to refund to the training college the whole of the cost of his board for the four years of his sojourn there, and this he regarded, not in the light of an act of generosity, but as one of simple honesty and justice. It would be well if other ministers who are in the position to do so would follow his example. His extraordinarily rapid progress enabled him to do this. When he entered upon his first pastoral duties at Hull, he found the church in low water financially and in the matter of attendance. But a few months of his personality and preaching changed all that. Empty benches were filled and a large debt liquidated, and the minister's stipend went up accordingly.



DR. TEMPLE, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.
Photo by Russell & Sons, 17, Baker Street, W.

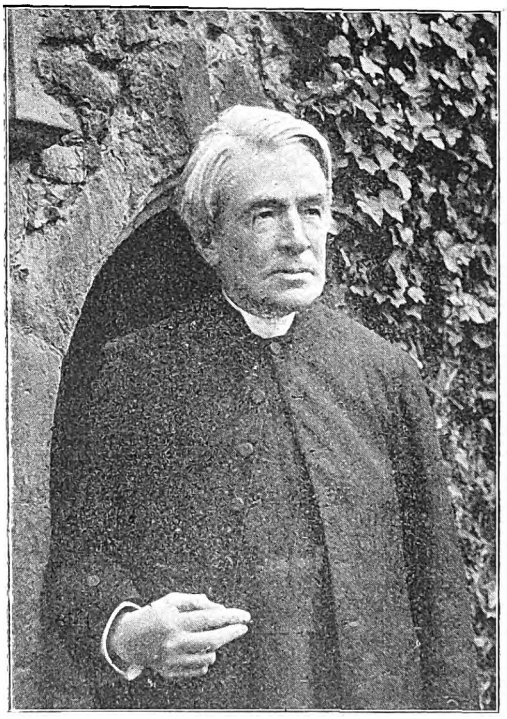
Dr. Newman Hall has brought comfort to thousands by his writings as well as by his sermons. His famous tract, "Come to Jesus," has been printed in fifty languages, and more than four million copies have been circulated. It made his name famous throughout the American civil war. The soldiers used to read it on the battlefield, while waiting to be called into action.

Dr. Newman Hall will require no monument to his memory while the splendid church in Westminster Bridge Road remains. Right back in 1854, he commenced his thirty-eight years' ministry at the old Surrey Chapel, made famous by Rowland Hill.

He attracted large congregations for many years, until a flaw in the trust deed put an end to the continuance of the building as a place of worship. The people responded nobly to their pastor's appeal, with the result that the magnificent structure, Christ Church, was built at a cost of £60,000, the whole amount being paid off within four years. Dr. Newman Hall retired from Christ Church in 1892, finding a most worthy successor in the Rev. F. B. Meyer. He continues to be a source of inspiration and encouragement to younger workers, and in reply to a request by the writer of this article, he sends this message: "I earnestly say to them, in all your Christian work let the glory of Christ be your aim. Think more of His smile of approval than of all possible praise from men. Try to win hearts and servants for Him, and thus be sure that your work cannot be in vain; whether or not approved and rewarded during your life here it is already rewarded by His approval, and His acceptance 'well done, faithful servant.'"

We now turn to a great and noble woman, of whom the King, when Prince of Wales, once said, "Next to my own mother, she is the most remarkable woman in England." Few will care to dispute this dictum, or deny that the Baroness

Digitized by Google



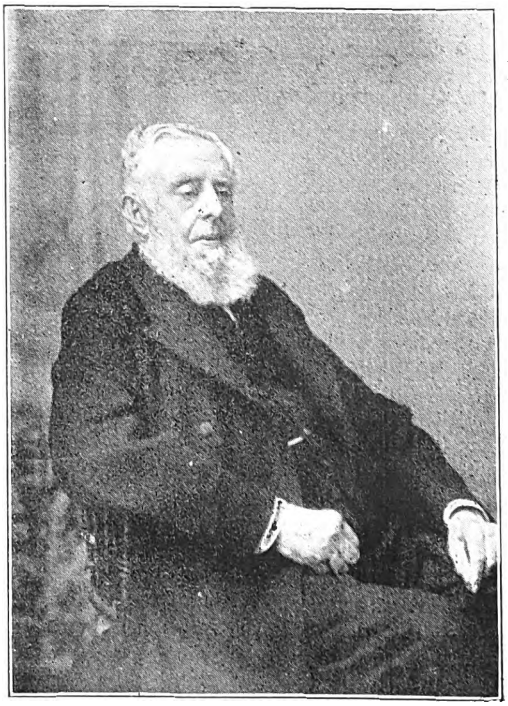
DEAN HOLE,
One of our most famous Preachers, who spent forty-four years in an obscure Country Parish.
Photo by A. H. Fry, East Street, Brighton.

Burdett-Coutts is as good as she is clever. Although eighty-seven years of age she still takes a share in the control of a great banking business, and it requires a wise head, to say nothing of a philanthropic heart, to distribute over a million pounds in charities as she has done. Throughout her long life she has endeared herself to all classes, and no act of the late Queen was more popular than when she conferred a peerage upon Miss Coutts, a very rare honour indeed for a woman to receive.

To this day the costermongers look upon her as one of their best friends, for did she not come to their rescue, putting them on a firm financial basis with a money club from which they could obtain loans for the purchase of barrows, repayment to be made at the rate of a shilling a week, the very amount demanded of them by money-makers for hire alone? No one will ever know all that this one woman has done for suffering humanity. And when the costers' trade was threatened she again came forward as their champion, and with her own Counsel fought their case and won it.

But perhaps, above all, it is the cause of her own sex that she holds most dear. How to help and save that unhappy class of women who, from various causes have lapsed from the right path, has always been one of the most difficult problems for the philanthropist. To the accomplishment of this end the Baroness first directed her efforts, and she received valuable assistance from Charles Dickens in the prosecution of the work. A home was established at Shepherd's Bush, and those who could be induced to enter were well provided for, taught useful work, and ultimately afforded opportunities for emigration. Throughout the cholera epidemic, and in the terrible winter of 1861, she relieved the suffering people by the expenditure of large sums and by personal supervision of the distribution of the necessaries purchased. She has been and still is an example to those who have riches, for, good herself, she has been the cause of good in others.

By those who do not know him very well, the Archbishop of Canterbury is regarded as a somewhat austere man. That he is a born leader of men goes without saying, and that the possessor of



THE REV. THE EARL OF DEVON.
The Earl has just ce'ebrated his ninetieth birthday, but has no thoughts of retiring.

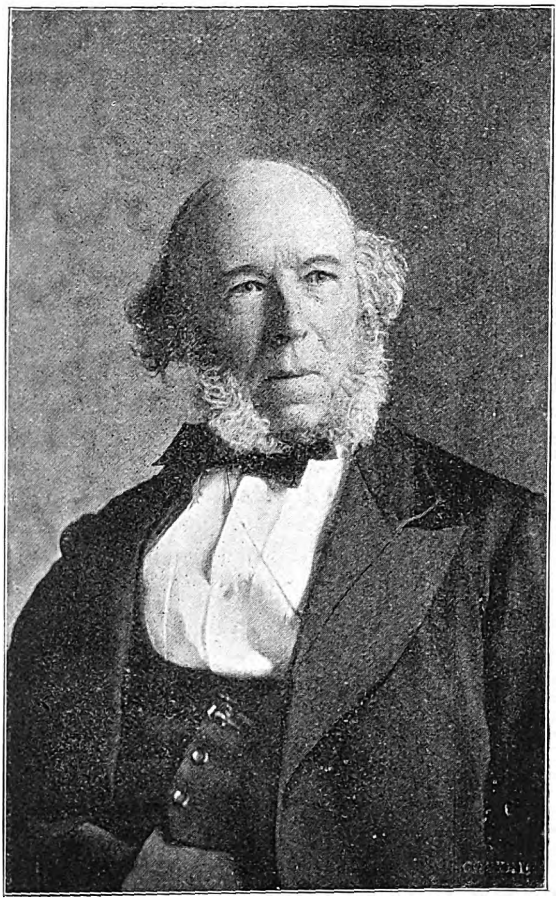
Digitized by Google

such qualities must be a strict ruler is equally true. At Rugby he was looked upon almost as a second Arnold, and if feared was respected. The epigram invented by some school-boy genius in tribulation that "if Temple is a beast he is a just beast," is one that will long live in the traditions of the school.

But Dr. Temple has performed many kindly acts, and is beloved most by those who know him best. He certainly never demands of others what he cannot perform himself. He has never been a man given to self-indulgence. He is no stickler for class distinctions, and is not ashamed to be seen riding in a third class carriage. He is a generous giver, and nothing delights him more than to extend his hospitality to brothers of the cloth. He was a life-long friend of the late Archbishop Benson, and was overwhelmed at the news of his death. Dr. Temple did a noble act on attaining his Archbishopric by taking upon himself the cost of repairing the Palace, a matter of some thousands of pounds, which in the ordinary course would have fallen on the Benson family.

The Archbishop owes not a little of his wonderful vitality and power of work to a particularly happy marriage. No one could be better fitted to be the wife of an Archbishop than Mrs. Temple. Her influence in society has always been great; and, like her husband she is a tremendous worker.

Huxley and Tyndal, Carlyle and Ruskin have gone, but there yet remains with us Herbert Spencer, the man who, in his great work, which has taken thirty-six years to accomplish, has digested the results of modern science and given them to the world in a system of philosophy.



MR. HERBERT SPENCER,
Who has digested the results of modern Science into a System of Philosophy.
Photo by Elliott & Fry, 55, Baker Street, W.

Herbert Spencer's personality is unique. He is philosopher and scientist rolled into one; and he has done what no other man has attempted. Right back in 1857 he penned the first sheet of the MS. of his magnum opus. He was then forty-five, but the word finis has yet to be written by an old man of more than eighty.

Though one of the very oldest, Dean Hole is still one of the most charming and interesting personalities in the church of England. His fame as a preacher is great on both sides of the Atlantic. His has been a most remarkable career. Of brilliant parts, for no less than forty-four years he ministered first as curate then as vicar in an obscure parish of Nottingham, the place of his birth; then, at a bound, he was transplanted by Lord Salisbury to Rochester. During his forty years ministry in his native parish he had plenty of leisure, and used some of it to become an expert rose-grower, and for years past has been considered one of the chief authorities in the country on the subject. Many men of his great gifts would have become stunted and dwarfed in such confined surroundings, but it was no so with the Dean. He possesses a buoyant disposition, and would make himself happy under almost any circumstances. He is undoubtedly one of the finest preachers the Church of England has had, possessing a wonderful power of arousing and holding the interest of all kinds of audiences.

Digitized by Google

The Earl of Devon, though more than ninety years old, is still in harness as rector of Powderham, near Exeter. He is a very fine type of country clergyman, who looks after his flock like a real shepherd, and is greatly beloved. He attracts good congregations, as he has always done, for his discourses are invariably sound and practical, containing counsel applicable to the daily life of his parishioners, and no one can be in so good a position as he to advise them. He devotes his mornings to writing and any business that may require attention; the afternoon he generally spends in his garden. He is Prebendary of Exeter Cathedral, and never fails to take the service in his turn.

REGINALD TURNER.

LOVE, THE COMFORTER.

If those we love be true
  What matter if the days seem long?
Though your task is hard to do,
  Within your heart will burst a song—
If those you love be true!

What matter if the day be bleak?
  No sunbeams pierce the black cloud through?
Joy to your inmost soul will speak—
  If those you love be true!

What if the world says things unkind,
  And what it knows to be false of you?
Much happiness you still can find—
  If those you love be true!

What if Dame Fortune, with a frown,
  Seems still your footsteps to pursue?
Success your toil at last will crown—
  If those you love be true!

What matter then what comes or goes?
  If life be long, or days be few?
Life's pleasures far outrun life's woes—
  If those we love be true!

James Morton.

Digitized by Google

DR. HORTON AND HIS WORK AT HAMPSTEAD.

A SKETCH AND AN INTERVIEW.

By A. FREDERIC WHITE.

"I DON'T like interviews," said Dr. Horton, with humorous resignation, "but I submit to them in the cause of Truth."

"How is that?" queried the interviewer?

"Well, you see if one doesn't give the facts some of you journalistic gentlemen have a tendency to draw on your imaginations to supply the deficiency, and so we bow to the inevitable."

With this little preface we began to talk of the wonderful work which has been carried on for twenty-one years under Dr. Horton's pastorate at the Lyndhurst Road Church, which celebrates its "coming of age" this month.

When Dr. Horton came from Oxford to Hampstead at the earnest request of certain friends who were interested in the then struggling work in this populous suburb, his congregation consisted of only fifty-eight people, who gathered for worship in a little iron chapel. To-day, after twenty-one years, the Church, with its Cricklewood branch, has a membership of 1,300, and its mission work at Kentish Town comes in contact with two to three thousand people. It is a most widely diversified work, and is conducted entirely by the people at Lyndhurst Road.

Dr. Horton paid an eloquent tribute to the devotion of his followers: "What strikes me most," he said, "in reviewing these past twenty-one years, is the extraordinary generosity and goodness of the Church. It is a wonderful instance of what comes from the Free Church principle. If you look back upon the work my people have done in these past years, you will see what I mean. They built this church at Lyndhurst Road at a cost of £20,000, then they put up a mission building at Kentish Town, which involved an expenditure of £6,000, and afterwards they built the schoolroom at Cricklewood. They are now proceeding to found a church there to celebrate this 21st anniversary, and have subscribed about £3,000 towards its erection. Again, almost entirely through their efforts, a church has been established at Harlesden, and in all these years I have never known them to fail. Whatever demand is made in the name of the Kingdom of God, they always seem to rise to it. The organisers of the Twentieth Century Fund proposed that our Church should subscribe £5,000. Some people thought it too much to ask, but, without any special appeals, they made it up to £7,500."

"I presume, Dr. Horton, that the congregation is a very wealthy one?"

"No," he replied, "it is not that they are wealthy, that is not the secret of it. People who don't seem to have any special means have a delight in giving to the cause of Christ. Every year they give to the Foreign Mission Funds about £1,200 or £1,300. They are intensely interested in foreign mission work, and several members of the congregation have given up their lives to it, and become missionaries in heathen lands. What Lyndhurst Road Church is every church might be if only they would adopt the New Testament idea of the Church, and try to carry it out in practice."

In these few words Dr. Horton summed up the most apparent results of those many years of ceaseless labour and cheerful self-sacrifice on the part of minister and people. And now we will take a glance at the career of the leader—the man whose brilliant preaching and ripe scholarship have made the Lyndhurst Road pulpit one of the most famous throughout the denomination.

Digitized by Google

Robert Forman Horton was born in London on September 18th, 1855, his father being the minister of the Tunbridge Congregational Chapel, situated in the Euston Road.

When Robert was only two years old his father accepted an appointment at Reading, and to this place belong his earliest recollections. A few years later the family removed to Wolverhampton.

When he was fifteen years old he was sent to Shrewsbury Grammar School, which had a high reputation for the thoroughness of its classical training.

Strange to say he especially distinguished himself during his stay at this school in mathematics, although his subsequent successes at Oxford were all on the classical side.

After being at Shrewsbury for three years he won an open scholarship, and at the age of eighteen removed to New College, Oxford. It was a time of great intellectual activity at the University, and such men as Dr. Jowett, Canons Liddon and King, and Professor T. H. Green, were the great lights of the time. His Hebrew instructor was the renowned Hebrew scholar, Canon Driver.

For fellow-students Dr. Horton had Lord Milner, about whom everybody at the time prophesied that he would do something great, and the Right Hon. St. John Brodrick.

A more liberal spirit towards Dissenters was just then beginning to be manifested, the University Reform Act had been passed and the old tests for Nonconformists abolished. But the very freedom with which Dissenters were enabled to enter into the life of the University, and with which they were received by their Anglican brethren constituted a source of danger to Nonconformity itself, for it was not easy for a man to preserve his Dissenting principles in an institution where the whole trend of thought was in an opposite direction.

Several young Nonconformists who entered the University at that time have since become prominent Churchmen and heads of Colleges.

Dr. Horton, however, stood staunch and true in his attachment to the faith in which he had been brought up, and with the ardour and thoroughness of youth, he even outstripped the received opinion in his own body with regard to the ministerial office. He objected to the title of "Reverend," and to ministers wearing any special garb to distinguish them from laymen.

His career at the University was highly distinguished. He took a first class in classics at the intermediate and final arts examinations, and thus won what are par excellence the honours of the University. He was elected to a fellowship at New College, and continued to reside there as college lecturer. His ambition was to be called to the Bar, but he still pursued his theological studies, though without any idea of entering the Ministry.

It was a tour to Switzerland that was destined to change the whole current of the life of the brilliant scholar. This was undertaken in the company of Mr. Micklem, the inseparable companion of his undergraduate days, who has since made a distinguished name for himself at the Bar. The party was joined by Mr. Cecil Curwen, an intimate friend of Mr. Micklem, but whose acquaintance Dr. Horton now made for the first time.

Mr. Curwen was deeply interested in the work – and a very uphill work it was—carried on by the Congregationalists at Hampstead, and this frequently formed the subject of his conversation with Dr. Horton, between whom and himself a warm friendship had sprung up.

When the tour came to an end he gave Dr. Horton a pressing invitation to visit him at his father's house, and so it came about that the young Oxford tutor made the acquaintance of the people with whom he was afterwards to undertake his life's work. He preached several times in the little iron chapel at Willoughby Road, and eventually he agreed to take the services for a year, but could not be prevailed on to promise to remain with them for a longer period, as he thought that his true sphere of usefulness was at Oxford. This was in 1880, and at the end of the year he returned to the University, but kept in touch with the work, and frequently occupied the pulpit during his vacations.

When, in 1884, in the face of considerable difficulties and after much self-denial,

Digitized by Google

the beautiful church at Lyndhurst Road was at last opened, a memorial, signed by every member of the congregation and including among the signatories Mr. Asquith, was sent to Dr. Horton praying him to be their minister. He could no longer fail to recognise a clear call of duty, and without further hesitation left the University for good and commenced his pastorate at Hampstead.

Photograph by DR. R. F. HORTON, M.A., Russell & Sons.

Who celebrates his ministerial majority at Lyndhurst Road Church this October.

Though his hair is tinged with grey, Dr. Horton has all the appearance of a young man, and his tall, active figure bespeaks an aptitude for amusements of an athletic type. He is, in fact, an ardent lover of such manly sports as swimming and rowing, but the imperative calls of his work do not allow him much time to indulge in these favourite pastimes. He may, however, be often seen on the wheel when the day's work is done or when on a visit to one of his flock. He was one of the crew of his college boat when it began to ascend the river and among his extensive collection of treasures and curios is the identical oar with which he rowed some memorable races.

Digitized by Google

The intellectual strength of the man is clearly revealed in his countenance. A broad high forehead, a keen penetrating eye, denoting the acumen of the scholar and critic, and a quickness of movement and speech, which tells of the man of action, are all his, for, though essentially a scholar and a man of the highest culture and refinement, his energies are by no means confined to the study, or his hold over the hearts of his people would not be what it is.

After reviewing the work at Lyndhurst Road I asked Dr. Horton what he thought the greatest danger to be apprehended in our Church life to-day.

"If you take the Church as a whole," replied Dr. Horton, "I should say undoubtedly that it lies in the Sacerdotal movement, which, I believe, is practically a corruption of Christianity. That seems to me the great peril. But if you confine yourself to the Free Churches, the danger that I see lies in the sensationalism, the tendency to appeal to the people by amusing them and arousing their curiosity rather than on the ground of the truth of the Gospel. This is a danger which I think we all have to struggle against. It is so very easy to get a large number of people together if you will only adopt this sensational method, which is apparently attended by success equally startling, while if you proceed on the line of real heart-searching Christian work the progress is very unsensational. I dread this sensational element; it is quite contrary to the natural spirit and genius of the Free Churches.

"Preachers are tempted to preach popular sermons instead of those which are good for the people to hear, and they are induced to do it because if a minister fails to attract his people there is a tendency in the church to look upon him as a failure, and the peculiar position of the Nonconformist Church which rests entirely upon its own basis, especially lays us open to this danger."

"Will you now tell me something about your books?"

"My first book," replied Dr. Horton, "was written on the question of Inspiration in the Bible and Revelation, and this was followed by another which was a reprint of my Yale lecture in America entitled "Verbum Dei," which dealt with the vexed question of the Higher Criticism. The book was looked upon as heterodox at the time, and I had to undergo a kind of ostracism for years. People left me, and were alienated because I had spoken plainly on this subject, but I had this compensation that it made the loyalty of my people all the more striking.

"My most widely read book was 'The Teaching of Jesus,' and another which has had a very great circulation is on the Roman Catholic controversy. It was circulated by the thousand, and involved me in a harassing controversy with the Romanists, who assailed me and misrepresented me on every point they could, and abused my work here.

"My object was to show what a peril it would be for us if the Roman Church should ever get the upper hand again in England. That very day which sees the Imperial Church of Rome with its claims to universal, temporal, as well as spiritual power, established in this country, will sound the knell of England's prosperity."

"Do you not think the Ritualists are leading us over to Rome?"

"No," replied Dr. Horton, "much as I dissent from their doctrines and pretensions, I do not think that that is their object. Undoubtedly they would like to see what they called an universal 'Catholic' Church established, but I do not think that they will ever acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope."

"Has Ritualism any influence over the Nonconformist section of the country?"

"No, it has had no effect whatever upon Nonconformist opinion and ordinances, but the greater attractiveness of the Church Service, both Evangelical as well as Ritualist, has won over by its charm many individual Dissenters. And then the Church possesses many good, earnest and faithful men whose influence and preaching, there is no doubt, have drawn into the Church of England an immense number of Nonconformists during the last ten years."

A. FREDERIC WHITE.

Digitized by Google

A REFORMATORY AND WORK-HOUSE ON THE WAVES.

By THEKLA BOWSER.

SCARCELY can a greater contrast in environment be imagined than that which a boy, born and bred in the slums of some great city, experiences when he is sent to one of the training ships moored in the Thames. From the sordid surroundings, the heavy atmosphere, the evil associates of a district given over to poverty and crime, he is suddenly transported to the breezy decks of a big ship, where he is well fed, well clothed, and guided into the paths of morality and usefulness.

Perhaps some of my readers may be inclined to quibble at the suggestion of "guidance," and think it would be better named "coercion." But it is a mistake to imagine that the boys are thrashed into obedience and taught honesty by the aid of brutality. Despite discipline being strict and attention to rule severely demanded, kindness is the first property of that discipline, and it is only when, to misquote, a boy "will be driven and not led," that austere measures are resorted to.

"For the Cornwall, Miss?" queried a bright faced lad, as my friend and I reached the landing stage at Purfleet, and we were forthwith conducted to the boat awaiting us. Brilliant sunshine, calm water, and a crew who pulled together with a perfection of stroke, made the passage to the old, picturesque man-of-war all too short. As we stepped on board, we were greeted by Rear-Admiral Morrell, by whose kind permission we were allowed to see over the ship.

In one of the prettiest and quaintest of drawing-rooms we had the privilege of a long chat with the admiral and his daughter, and I am sure that if it were possible every word of that conversation would interest my readers. The reminiscences, the life stories, the pathetic tales of boys plucked from terrible surroundings, the histories of lads who have grown to be men, and who bless the old ship for the start in life which she gave them—all these were told with that touch of fervour which can never be attained save by self-sacrifice and devotion.

Our talk was broken by the arrival of a new boy, and the admiral very kindly allowed us to hear him question the youngster. The Cornwall only receives boys who have been convicted of crime; these are sent to the ship for five years to "reform." But when you look round upon the boys' eager faces, it is hard to believe that they have all committed an offence against the law, and the true Christian spirit is shown in the attitude of the admiral, who believes that it is mischief rather than wickedness, and, in many cases, the natural cravings of hunger, which lead the boys to act so that they get sentenced to this floating reformatory.

Picture a tiny cabin, at the desk in the centre of which sits the admiral, and in front of him, cowering before the detective who brought him, is the dirty urchin. But behind the mask of "fright" I fancied a light spread over the lad's face at the first words spoken in kindly accents by the man at whose mercy he will be for the next five years. Every question is a home thrust, but there is sympathy in the voice as it counsels the lad first to ask God's forgiveness and his mother's and then to start with a clean sheet. An uncomfortable lump persists in rising in the throat of the visitor, and the tears almost brim over in the eyes of the ragamuffin.

Digitized by Google

Making the round of the ship was a delightful affair. First we saw the boys at mess, eating their huge portions with an appetite that many a millionaire would envy. At the approach of the admiral or Miss Morrell the boys would be instantly on their feet with their caps in their hands, and they would stand thus until we had passed or the order to "sit" had been given. Their behaviour is perfect, obedience to commands evidently having become a habit with them.

After seeing them at their various employments—such as mending their clothes and boots and sail-making—we visited the sick bay, where we found three or four boys, certainly looking ill but very happy, and this was not to be wondered at when one saw the individual kindness that is shown the invalids. Boys of all kinds have, I fancy, a special place in the hearts of the admiral and Miss Morrell, but for one of them to be on the sick list is to immediately make him an object of care. There is an excellent library on board from which the boys can borrow books, and this reminds me that if any readers have books to give away nowhere could they be more appreciated than on board the Cornwall.

During the long winter evenings, all kinds of games are encouraged, but the difficulty is to get an adequate supply for the two hundred and fifty odd boys who are eager to use them. Games and old magazines are gratefully welcomed as gifts, for the ship's funds do not run to these luxuries. The good work done here is accomplished so quietly that we are apt to overlook the immense benefit that accrues to the nation from the training given. Instead of making criminals of the little fellows who have done some trifling wrong, they are given a chance which the vast majority grasp at eagerly, earning an early leave from the ship—not an altogether pleasurable reward, the boys will tell you—and doing well in the world. Many of the old boys have not only served at the front in South Africa, but one was recommended for the V.C., and again and again they have won the Royal Humane Society's medal for plucky actions at home.

REAR-ADMIRAL MORRELL,
Captain-Superintendent of the Reformatory Ship Cornwall.

Anyone who is at all acquainted with shipping can see that the Cornwall is a genuine old fighter. She was built in 1813 for the Royal Navy and bore the name of the Wellesley. After a varied career, in 1859 she was lent by the Admiralty for the purposes of a reformatory ship. The allowances of the Government and the County Council are still insufficient, so that subscriptions from individuals materially help the work of making these ragged boys into healthy members of society.

When the lads leave they are put to some sort of employment. The Navy, unhappily, will have nothing to do with them, but the merchant service recognises the excellent, practical training which they have had and welcomes them with open arms. The army drafts away a large number and the remainder go to different trades, but it is seldom indeed that the admiral's heart is wrung by the news that one of his boys has again trodden the downward path. Honour, honesty, and Christianity are inculcated into the boys, and the absolute trust that they know is reposed in them wakes up every better feeling in them, and it would be difficult to find the boy who would willingly disappoint the admiral or Miss Morrell. The late Mrs. Morrell did a marvellous work amongst the lads, seeing the characteristics of each with a keen perception that went far in making them trust her implicitly. People who know little about the Cornwall seem to think that she is nothing more or less than a prison, and until one has visited her, it is impossible to fully realise the value of the work which is being done aboard her.

Digitized by Google

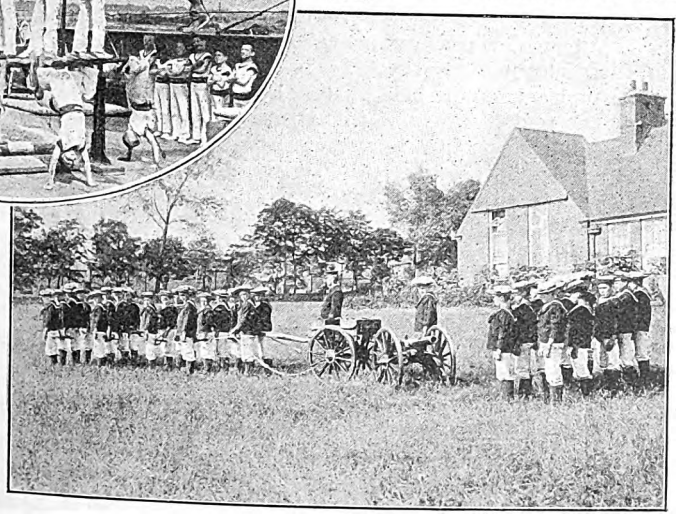
DRILL ASHORE BY THE "CORNWALL" BOYS.

A brisk wind was blowing as we were pulled alongside the fine old ship Exmouth by a crew of merry-faced, sturdy-limbed boys. She lies just off Grays, with her bowsprit pointing Londonwards, and is very interesting, not only because of her present use, but from the fact that she is a man-o'-war which has seen active service in years gone by.

Captain Bourchier, R.N., who is captain-superintendent, kindly received us, and, after hearing some of the details of the work that is being carried forward on board, we went a round of the ship under the guidance of the chief officer. The Exmouth was estab-

GYMNASTIC EXERCISES.
BOYS WHO REFUSE TO GO TO SCHOOL ARE SENT TO THE "SHAFTESBURY" BY THE SCHOOL BOARD.



THE FIELD GUN CREW.

Digitized by Google

lished in 1876 for the purpose of training for the sea service boys who are chargeable to Metropolitan parishes and unions. Some of the boys pass through a workhouse in order to be sent to the ship, but this frequently does not mean that they have been there as poor boys for any length of time. Six hundred is the full complement of the ship, and a brighter looking crowd of lads it would be difficult to find.

On the day of our visit a number of new boys were drawn up in line for the inspection of the captain. In reply to the questions put, they all answered that they had been doing "house" work or "minding the baby." One big boy admitted readily that he was in the Second Standard, and three or four of them seemed proud of the fact that they had only reached the Third Standard. That state of affairs will soon be altered, for the boys on board the training ship have to work well in school hours, and it is probably due to these being balanced by half-time spent at learning "seamanship" that they do not find their tasks so irksome there as they did in the ordinary school.

The Exmouth has two decks proper, below these being the deck where the boys sleep in hammocks as well as on the other two decks. Then deeper down still is the band-room and provision stores—once occupied by great boilers and engines. The band is a very strong point on board, many of the lads becoming so proficient that they obtain good positions in the Navy bands. Next we visited the tailor's shop, where the boys are taught to mend their clothes. Everything is very complete on board, there being a delightful model of the rocket life-saving apparatus, of the rigging of their brigantine, Steadfast, and of the ship's full rigging. During the summer months the Steadfast is sent out on short cruises, so that the boys may put their knowledge of seamanship to practical purpose.

As to the general smartness of the Exmouth boys, one has only to see the drill to be instantly convinced of it. From our vantage point on the poop, we had a fine view of the great deck, cleared for operations, and framed by hundreds of boys who had taken up all kinds of queer positions along the bulwarks, to see their comrades perform. After an alarm of fire—at which every boy sprang to his post at hose, pump or bucket—had been given, there was the roll-call of the various companies, who responded to the bugle by lifting hands. Then dumb-bell exercise was gone through, the actions being all the more effective, by reason of the bells being painted red, white and blue. Rifle, cutlass and Indian club drill followed, and a small company of boys gave a clever display of calisthenics and gymnastics. Not a single word of command was issued for the "change" from one exercise to another in each class, the whole of the orders being rapped out by the big drum. Sharp, short strokes, or long, thunderous peals were evoked by the youthful drummer, resulting in the instant obedience of the boys at drill.

But by far the most interesting part of the drill was the gun practice. Two guns were run forward by teams of lads, who, at the word of command, "dismounted" and "remounted" them with marvellous rapidity. There was the sharp word, and almost before one could breathe the boys were calmly seated on various bits of the gun spread apart on the deck. It was all accomplished with such precision that "haste" would seem to be an unknown quantity, and the rigidity of the boys when seated, each in his own particular spot—on wheel or muzzle—said much for the discipline of the training they had undergone. The "retreat with gear" was admirably managed also, the boys racing along the deck with every useful attachment, leaving only the bare gun and carriage for an imaginary enemy. "Storm the poop" was an order that caused great excitement, the boys rushing up the ladders with enthusiasm, only to be met at the top by the band boys, who tried to fight them back. Last of all, there was the march past the saluting point and the final disbandment.

It is no wonder that the boys do well in the Navy when they leave the ship, for there is nothing left unlearned—from scaling the rigging to the very top of the mainmast to the management of a small boat. The boys are not forced to go up the rigging, but they soon wish to emulate their comrades, and, after the initial effort quickly become accustomed to the swaying rope ladders, and will sit "aloft" with the utmost composure.

Every boy on board is sent either into the Navy, Army or the merchant service at the end of his training, unless he is physically unfit. One voyage, at least, they are bound to go, Captain Bourchier arranging for each one individually, and the majority of them have learned to like a seafaring life too well to leave it when they might.

Digitized by Google

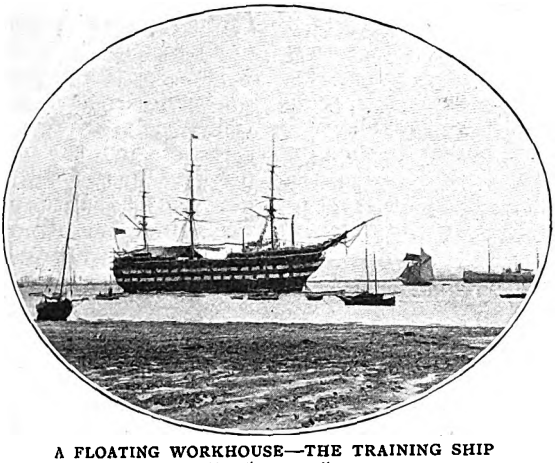
There is a certain amount of liberty given to the boys, which the captain says is never abused. They are allowed to go to London alone to see their friends, and they constantly go into Grays and the neighbourhood, but the absconder is unknown. Old boys come back to the ship and thank the captain for the years they spent aboard her, and not a few send contributions out of their hard-earned savings "for the boys who have no friends."



A FLOATING WORKHOUSE—THE TRAINING SHIP "EXMOUTH."

Not many hundred yards away from the Exmouth is moored the Shaftesbury training ship, which is under the control of the School Board. It is here that the boys are sent who refuse to go to school, who play truant and who would rather sleep under arches than go home. Here again, there is the terrible fact that many of the "homes" are not fit to be called such; the parents are worse than the boys, and it is a very good thing for them when the police take them up and a magistrate sends them to the ship.

The Shaftesbury had been in dock for some weeks when we went over her, and even then the repainting was not complete. Whilst in dock, the boys were all camped out on a big field in Grays, and they evidently enjoyed the holiday very much.

"Sea-pie" was just being served to the boys for their dinner as we arrived. It is a kind of meat pie which smelt very savoury, and is a favourite dish on board. The boys take it in turn to act as cooks, under the direction of one adult, so that when they leave the ship they can turn their hand to almost every domestic duty. Sewing, of course, has to be learnt, and wool work is a popular recreation for odd times. We were shown some really pretty frames made of different coloured wools enclosing tiny pictures of some of our Army and Navy men. The boys are generally very deft with their fingers, and one of the lessons, that is looked upon almost as play, is the making of little jugs, cups and trays, from bits of painted cardboard, the arrangement of the colours often showing the boys to have a good deal of artistic taste. The head schoolmaster has five assistants, and it is wonderful how they make the lessons interesting enough to attract the attention of even the dullest boys. Many of them can scarcely read and write when they enter the ship, and judging from some "trial" dictation that I saw, it must be a difficulty to teach these "young ideas to spell." The full

REFORMATORY BOYS ENGAGED IN SAIL-MAKING.

Digitized by Google

complement of the ship is four hundred boys, but there are generally a few vacancies.

It is a notable fact that many of the boys are clever with their pencils, some of the geometrical and freehand drawings done by them displaying a considerable amount of skill.

We had been admiring the boy's wool work, and many of them had crowded round to show the different things they had made, when the head schoolmaster called for the three nearest boys to come into his sanctum. When we had followed, at his invitation, he said that he thought we should be interested in hearing the reasons why these lads had been sent to the Shaftesbury.

The first boy, bright-eyed and honest-faced, told us that he had "slept out" for a night under some arches, and a "copper" had taken him up. The next one was shifty, and would not look at you squarely. He explained blandly that it was really another boy who had done the mischief and that he was not doing anything wrong, but he had been "taken" for all that. The schoolmaster looked incredulous as he remarked that apparently the boy had been sent to the ship without cause! The last boy had a nice face, rosy cheeks and clear eyes that met your gaze willingly.

"And why were you sent here?" he was asked.

"For gambling," was the prompt reply. "I was playing in the streets, and a 'copper' saw us, and happened to pitch on me."

Thus, by this haphazard examination, we were given an idea of the petty crimes which lead a boy to the Shaftesbury—petty, the first time of committal, because they are done without malice prepense, but which, allowed to take root, will vitiate the whole nature of the man. We could wish that more boys were found out and sent to these ships, for the training gained there gives them a background upon which to graft a decent and successful future. The majority of the boys go into the Navy when their time on board the Shaftesbury is finished, but a large number also go into the Army, and a few choose to follow trades. But whatever they decide for they are put to before leaving the ship, and are under supervision, so that Captain Scriven can follow out their careers. Many of the boys are refused by the Navy because they lack the necessary chest measurement, height or even two front teeth. The latter seems absurd — an opinion evidently shared by the mercantile service, which very sensibly takes them, whether their teeth are complete or not, so long as they bear good characters.

GUN DRILL ON BOARD THE "EXMOUTH."

Digitized by Google

As we passed along the main deck we saw a big brass tablet, and, on reading its inscription, discovered that it had been erected to the memory of an officer who sacrificed his life last year in a futile attempt to save a boy's life. How the lad came to fall overboard does not seem to be exactly known, but the officer, in spite of being a man past the prime of life, plunged over: the boy flung his arms round his would-be rescuer's neck, and they went down together. It was an event that deeply saddened the inmates of the Shaftesbury, but it gives a glimpse of the link that exists between the officers and boys.

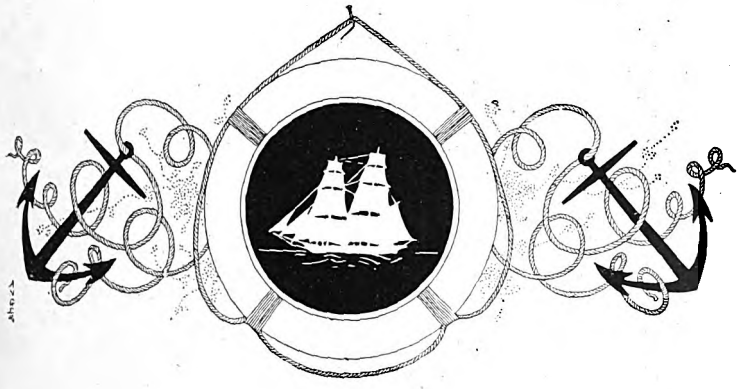
Every boy is taught to swim, but during the cold weather this sport is impossible, with the consequence that those entering the ship in the winter have to wait for the spring's advent before becoming aquatic experts.

The military band of the Shaftesbury is an excellent one, and from it many a boy has migrated to the bands of the Army. This, of course, is an excellent opening, at which the boys aim with enthusiasm.

On Sundays a service is held on the deck, as on all the training ships. The religious instruction is given on the lines of the School Board, but a priest or layman holds a little service apart, for the boys who profess Roman Catholicism.

The Shaftesbury is an old P. and O. boat, but it has been altered almost unrecognisably, save in that portion which contains the captain's apartments. Here we noticed that the pretty rooms looked more as if they were ashore than afloat. I wish I could tell you all the stories that Mrs. Scriven gave us of the boys who had left the ship and had made their way in the world. And even the bad boys she gently made allowance for, by saying that they had "never had a chance before." That is the treatment which brings out whatever good there may be in a lad's character, and we cannot be too grateful that the captain-superintendents of training ships seem to be able to keep their hearts tender, whilst dealing out disciplinary punishment, without which the training would be useless. How many boys have lived to bless the years spent upon these ships can never be gauged, but a shrewd guess can be made when one sees the smart figures on board, and compares them with the boys who are running about the streets of our cities. One is apt to wonder whether the parents know their boy when they see him for the first time after the change, for the metamorphosis is complete.

THEKLA BOWSER.



Digitized by Google

GLENORA'S MARRIAGE.

By JUSTIN M'CARTHY, M.P.

Author of "The Dictator," "A Dead Letter," etc.

GLENORA sat at her knitting. Glenora was always knitting—in the intervals of her many and frequent duties. Hers was a pretty name—soft in sound and vaguely romantic in form. Glenora Lee was her full name. She was a very pretty and shapely girl, who had the especial and rare charm of graceful movement. She came to her feet lightly when she had to attend to her customers, and it was a pleasing sight to see her as she moved about the big and crowded shop.

Miss Glenora was principal assistant in a shop which sold everything in the way of stationery, newspapers, paper-weights, paper-cutters, pen-knives and knick-knacks of various kinds, as well as all manner of shilling and two-shilling novels. Also she had the principal charge of a lending library; and, what stamped her with chiefest dignity and importance, she had the effective charge of the local post-office, which was established in a formal corner of the shop. The owner of the shop and the recognised and official post-mistress was an elderly widow lady, Mrs. Whitehurst; and the actual manager of the whole concern was young Reginald Whitehurst, the widow's only son. Reginald Whitehurst was a handsome, well-made young fellow of some twenty-five years. He had had a good education, was gifted with all the manners of a born gentleman, and rode to hounds with the neighbouring hunt. There was a report about the Whitehursts which stood them in good stead—a generally accepted tradition that they came of a fine old family which had gone down in the world, and that for this reason the widow had been obliged to start a shop and accept the office of local post-mistress. But she had been in the business since her son was a boy at school. Now, in a small community the next best thing to being of a good family is to have it generally reported and believed that at one time you did belong to such a privileged order. In London, of course it would not matter in the least. Nobody would care a straw about the birth and parentage of a district post-mistress and her son so long as the telegrams were properly sent out, and the letters delivered, and the stamps sold over the counter without unreasonable incivility.

The town in which the Whitehursts lived was a seaside place—on the south-eastern coast. It was mainly composed of one long street, and a few villa residences facing the sea.

The place had great charms for those who discovered it. It had very few pretentious visitors, and 'Arry never came near it. 'Arry would have found it dreadfully dull, if he ever had come near it, and certainly if he had once been there he would never have revisited it, and he would have warned all his friends against ever setting foot in so joyless and meaningless a place.

If Glenora was the Diana or Hebe of the Marine Parade, Mrs. Whitehurst was the solemn and watchful Juno. Mrs. Whitehurst sat in a little office which was perched upon an eminence all given up to itself, and which was mounted by a somewhat steep flight of steps unguarded by any balustrade. Enthroned up there Mrs. Whitehurst might have suggested the idea of some peculiarly valuable book mounted on the highest step of a library. It was not so high, however, but that Mrs. Whitehurst could make her voice easily heard all over the shop—or rather shops, for there really were two shops joined in one. The one over which Mrs. Whitehurst directly presided was that which contained the post-office, and enshrined also Glenora Lee and two or three other girls who assisted her. The division farther away from Mrs. Whitehurst was managed by her son, with a young man and two young women to help him. Naturally Reginald Whitehurst often had to cross the floor to consult Glenora, and Glenora sometimes, but less often, had to cross the floor to consult Reginald.

Digitized by Google

All this was noticed with some interest by Mr. Stellman Rivers before he had paid many visits to the shops and the post-office. There was a vague, awe-inspiring impression about Mr. Stellman Rivers throughout the whole little seaside community. The general belief was that he was a sort of great man from London, but nobody had the least idea at first of what his greatness consisted in. It was well-known soon that he was a King's Counsel, and a Member of Parliament; for did not all his letters, of which he got bushels every day, bear emblazoned on them the initials which testify to the possession of such distinctions? Mr. Rivers had taken a villa residence for a few weeks, and had some servants down with him, but otherwise lived alone. He was a stoutly-built, bluff-looking man of from forty-five to fifty.

Mrs. Whitehurst had taken the pains one day to descend from her pinnacle when she saw one of his servants in the shop, and to get into conversation with the man, and from him she extracted the fact that Mr. Stellman Rivers was a widower, and had no children. Thereupon a hope lighted up in Mrs. Whitehurst's widowed heart.

What hope? The hope that she might herself become the second Mrs. Stellman Rivers? Oh, no—Mrs. Whitehurst was not nearly such a fool as that. Mrs. Whitehurst was broad awake to the fact that she was fifty-five, and she knew that when wealthy widowers of forty-five to fifty look out for wives they may marry poverty, but they certainly will marry youth and beauty, or they will let marriage alone. But Mrs. Whitehurst had no daughter. What, then, was she hoping for? Mr. Rivers talked a great deal to Glenora. He was rather taken with the girl—with her prettiness, with her movements, and with her audacious attempts to cajole or coerce him into buying things which he could not possibly want. She looked at him with dark appealing eyes, while she thus tried to palm off upon him some trumpery knick-knack at four times its London price. He was highly amused by her sweet pertinacity. There was nothing flippant, or vulgar, or flirtatious about it—it was only sweet overbearing woman-like appeal.

"Look here, my good girl," he once put it to her, "don't you know that even if I wanted this pencil case—which I don't—I could get it in London for a quarter of the money you ask for it?"

"I am sure you could," Glenora answered, blandly, "but, then, buying it in London would not be buying it here. Besides we don't have gentlemen like you down here often, and when such gentlemen do come they ought to give us the benefit of their presence."

"But I should soon be the poorest of the poor if I bought everything that everybody tried to sell me."

"It's not a case of everybody," she said, promptly. "I hope I am not everybody." And again her looks appealed.

"Well, I suppose I must take it," he declared, good-humouredly.

"Oh, you must take it. You will want it as a remembrance of us when you go back to London."

"But don't you think I shall remember you—for your own sake?"

"You might forget, without the pencil-case to remind you."

"So the woman might be forgotten if one hadn't the pencil-case to remind him of her?"

"I am told that is so—in London."

"Then give me the pencil-case. How much?"

She stuck remorselessly to her audacious price, and he paid it with an amused smile. Mrs. Whitehurst had heard the dialogue and noted the close of the transaction, and she was very civil to Miss Lee for the whole of that afternoon—an unusual matter with her.

Mrs. Whitehurst often descended from her throne to waylay Mr. Rivers and get into talk with him when the shops were not full. On Reginald's side of the house all manner of tickets were sold for the theatre, for concerts, for charitable bazaars and such like. Mr. Rivers was looking up some tickets there one day when Mrs. Whitehurst swooped upon him.

Digitized by Google

"I think you must have known some of my family in London, Mr. Rivers," she said with a dignified smile.

"It is very likely, Mrs. Whitehurst; I have known a great many people."

"My father was a barrister in very high practice, I am told; my uncle was a great physician—Dr. Grand— my maiden name was Grand."

"I have certainly heard the name before," Mr. Rivers answered politely, and also truthfully.

"Oh, you would be sure to have known him," Mrs. Whitehurst declared.

Now this was not a good shot. A man of forty-five to fifty may not be over sensitive about his age, but he certainly does not want to be set down as any older than he actually is. Mr. Rivers did not quite see why he should be supposed to have known Mrs. Whitehurst's uncle, seeing that Mrs. Whitehurst's age considerably exceeded his own.

"I did not expect at one time to be living down here and keeping a shop," she said with a sigh.

"It's a very nice shop," Rivers observed encouragingly, "and your son is a handsome young fellow."

"I had hoped for a different career for him, Mr. Rivers," and there came a deeper sigh. "He is worthy of something better.

"I wish I had such a son," Rivers said with feeling.

Just then Reginald was near the post-office, and they could hear him asking some question of Miss Lee. That part of the shop was empty of outsiders at the moment. Rivers distinctly heard the word "Glenora," followed hastily by Glenora's words, "Oh!—hush!"

"Why should he hush, Miss Lee?" Mrs. Whitehurst exclaimed, hastily crossing the floor and confronting the poor girl. "Why hush? If my son chooses to demean himself by calling you by your Christian name what is there to conceal about the matter? Do you fancy that he wants it to be a secret between you and him, I want to know?"

"Oh, mother, do please stop," the young man remonstrated with an angry face. Mr. Rivers liked him all the better for the anger.

"I wish you would remember who you are, Reginald, and not be too familiar with the shop girls. It does not do you any good, and it is not likely to do them any good."

"Mother," the young man said sternly, "that sort of talk won't do any of us any good."

Meanwhile the face of Glenora flushed, and her eyes filled with tears.

"Perhaps, Miss Lee," Mrs. Whitehurst said sarcastically, "you would be good enough now to attend to the post-office—or we shall have letters in the papers about us, and complaints to the Post-master-General."

The girl betook herself quietly to the post-office, where at the time there was no mortal clamouring for anything. Mr. Rivers felt sure that a little love-drama was unfolding itself under his eyes. He waited and bought tickets, and looked over the books in the circulating library. Presently there came two applicants at the post-office—a little girl and a man in moleskins. Each made the same demand: "Penny stamp, miss, if you please."

Rivers felt curiously interested in the sort of life which buys only one penny stamp at a time—the life to which the writing of one letter is the event of a week at least—the life which finds it utterly unnecessary to buy more than one stamp at a time, which has no idea of making any provision of stamps. For the moment this thought took away his attention a little from the supposed love-drama and its development. He passed out of the shop.

Every evening after dinner it was Mr. Rivers's habit to walk on the seaside of the Marine Parade to listen to the noise of the waves breaking on the pebbles of the beach, and to watch the alternate glare and gloom of the revolving light which flashed and vanished over the waters. There were few promenaders at such a time, and he usually had the Marine Parade all to himself. This night, however, he saw a pair—a man and a woman—pacing slowly up and down, deep apparently in whispered talk. He kept in the shadow, but as they passed him—their faces turned to each other—he could not help recognising them. They were young Whitehurst and Glenora. He had never seen them walking there at such an hour before. "Come," he thought to himself, "this is the first result of the angry mother's interference this afternoon. Thus is many a love-drama developed—even forced into development." He did not want to be recognised by either of the pair, and, when they had passed on a little way, he quietly went to his home.

Digitized by Google

Next day he visited the shop again, and he got a chance of speaking to Miss Glenora. She was bright and chatty as usual, and she wanted him to buy things just as before. But he thought her good spirits were a little forced. When he got his chance of talking to her he came to the point with the courage of a man of forty-five to fifty, a King's Counsel, and a Member of Parliament.

"Yours is a pretty name," he said—"Glenora, Glenora"—as if he were trying the sound of it over to himself. "Are you Irish or Scotch?"

"My mother was Irish," the girl said gently; "my father was English."

"Where are your people?"

"Dead!" Never perhaps was the simple, terrible monosyllable spoken with more pathetic effect.

There was a pause, and then Rivers began again, sustained by his kindly purpose. He had really taken a great liking to the girl, and he thought he read truthfulness in her Irish eyes.

"Do you like being here?"

"I have to be here—I have to make a living. Mrs. Whitehurst is very kind to me—generally."

"Should you like to get to London? I know lots of influential women in London who might be able to find you a better place somewhere. Shall I try?"

"Oh, no, sir," she said, very hurriedly, "you are very kind—but I don't want to leave this place." The tears came into her eyes.

"Why are your eyes wet?"

"Because—eh, well, because you are so kind and good."

"Well—if ever you should feel inclined to find a place in London, will you let me know?"

"Indeed I will."

Then the dialogue was over and Rivers left the shop. Mrs. Whitehurst had watched him and Glenora very carefully. She could not hear a word that was said, but she knew that there was a confidential conversation going on, and she drew her own conclusions and was mightily pleased. She was especially kind to Glenora all that evening and night.

Mrs. Whitehurst was forming—indeed, had formed for some time back—a theory about Glenora. She thought the girl was a self-seeking flirt, who was trying her best to allure Reginald Whitehurst into marriage. But just now Mrs. Whitehurst's theory was that Glenora was trying her base crafts on Mr. Rivers as a man likely to be a far better match. Therefore she was delighted to see the evidence of interest in Glenora which Mr. Rivers was beginning to show. Mrs. Whitehurst was certainly a very moral and proper woman as conventional propriety goes, but she could not help saying to her secret heart: "I don't believe he'll marry her—not likely—but he may take her out of this, and out of Reggie's way anyhow."

Mr. Rivers, on the other hand, was forming a theory about Reginald Whitehurst. It was not unlikely that the young man had some of the family self-conceit which the mother exhibited so frankly. In that case was it probable that he really meant to marry the shop-girl? Was he not, perhaps, playing too thoughtlessly with poor Glenora's affections? Was not Glenora in some danger? "Couch we awhile, and mark," he said to himself, in the words of Hamlet. So he lingered on the Marine Parade that night, and again he saw the pair of lovers. And the following night he watched again and saw the same thing. This latest time he sat the performance out, if we may use such an expression. In other words, he kept his obscure place until the lovers had parted. Reginald saw the girl to her home, which was a good way down the Marine Parade. Rivers already knew that Glenora did not live under Mrs. Whitehurst's roof, but that she lodged in a small house kept by a woman whose husband and sons were boatmen and fishers. One of the young men, gossip at that end of the Parade gave out, was helplessly "mashed" on the pretty Glenora. Having seen her safely to her door, Reginald came back and lounged along the Parade smoking a cigar—and then he leaned on the wall and looked out to sea, after the immemorial fashion of the lover.

Then Rivers left his obscurity, came up to the young man, and had bidden him a good evening before Reginald, absorbed in his own thoughts, had time to turn his head round. The young man's face did not exhibit actual delight at the unexpected meeting. But he civilly returned the greeting, and was evidently preparing to move on.

Digitized by Google

"Stay a moment," the elder man said, laying his hand gently on Reginald's arm. "I want to say a word or two."

"Certainly, Mr. Rivers; if you will."

"Very well, I will. Now, please, don't think me impertinent or obtrusive. I am nothing of the kind by nature—generally folded up into my own shell—but I take a friendly interest in you, and in Miss Lee."

There was moonlight enough to show that Reginald's face was flushing at the words, and that he hardly knew what to say. Mr. Rivers hastened to prevent his saying anything at the moment.

"Look here," he said gently, "my dear boy, I am twice your age at least, and I have been in love, and I have been in trouble. But now, about this young woman? Is it quite fair to her?"

"Mr. Rivers," Reginald said angrily, "I really don't know by what sort of right——"

"No sort of right whatever, my boy; I am concerned about this girl, and I wish her well. But I have no right to speak to you about her; and if you tell me so, and tell me to mind my own business, I shall trouble you no more with any interference of mine. But, is it well to reject at once a friendly advance, or to think that a friendly advance is an unfriendly one? Come now—think it over."

The young man looked frankly into Rivers's face.

"Mr. Rivers," he said, "I am sure you mean well—I am sure you speak as a friend to her and to me."

"Come, that's all right," Rivers cheerily murmured. "Yes, I mean to be as much of a friend as ever I can. You see, I couldn't help observing what went on in the shop the other day, and I know that your mother does not like this girl—Miss Lee."

"Oh, Mr. Rivers," the young man said despondently, "my mother has been the best of mothers to me—she has been only too good to me and too fond of me—only she will have such ideas about our family, and what our social position was, and all the rest of it. I don't know what on earth our position was, or what our family was, or anything at all about it. So long as I can remember, we were always keeping these shops and selling notepaper and envelopes—and what else had we to do?—and we were very happy. The girl—Glenora—is just as good as we are, and we were very happy keeping our shops; and the dear old mother gave me a good education, and I don't know why she takes these ideas into her head. And I love Glenora, and I'd give my life for her—and for my mother, too—and why can't she be happy and let us be happy too—and—well, there it is!" and the young man began to break down.

Stellman Rivers was what would be called a thoroughly good sort, and he was immensely touched.

"Honestly then," he said, "you have made up your mind to marry the girl? You are quite clear about that?"

"I'd marry her," Reginald declared, "if I had to give up everything for her—everything in all the world! Why, Mr. Rivers, I am in love with her—with all my heart and with all my soul. I'd run away and marry her, only she won't—she won't—she won't have me unless my mother gives her consent."

"But how will you prevail upon your mother?"

"Oh, I don't know, but she'll have to give her consent in time. We must wait. It wouldn't be a very difficult thing to get her to consent. Look here, Mr. Rivers, I know my poor mother's one weakness—and," he added somewhat bitterly, "I firmly believe that if anyone in what is called good society were once to ask Glenora to tea, my mother would think she was getting an acquisition to her family, and would urge me to marry the girl at once. I do—I know she would." And the voice of the young man—after all, he was very young—began to break down again.

The eyes of Mr. Rivers sparkled with sympathy and faith.

"And if you did marry," he asked, "what would you do then?"

"Do then? Why settle down here and keep the shops and be happy," Reginald promptly answered, "and make my mother happy, too."

"Give me your hand," Rivers exclaimed, stretching out his hand, which the young man eagerly clasped and warmly pressed. The grasp of sympathy and of friendship quite overmastered Reginald. He had no expectation of anything more than friendship, but that was enough. He had never talked over his love-story before to anyone but Glenora herself.

"You are a man and a brother," Rivers said in a low deep voice. "And, now look here, will you come home with me, and we'll have a cigar, and we'll talk matters over? I have an idea—we'll make it into a plot, don't you see?"

Digitized by Google

"I am afraid I don't see."

"You shall see. Listen, I have a sister—Lady Middlemaine—wife of one of our judges, you know, and she's a good soul and full of sympathy and romance and tenderness and all that's lovely in a woman, and she'll pull us through with this—see if she doesn't! Well, of course, you can't see quite clearly just yet—and neither can I—but I have an idea. Come along to my place and we'll enter into a conspiracy."

They went along together to Rivers's villa, and that night a conspiracy was entered into which was quietly made known to Glenora in the morning, and Glenora entered, too, into the conspiracy, her eyes filling with hope and gratitude and joy.

Then an astonishing report spread over the town. "Have you heard the news, dear?" one lady asked of another. "Oh, yes—it's quite true, I am told. You know Glenora, the girl who minds the post-office in Mrs. Whitehurst's shop? Well, she has come out to be a friend of Mr. Stellman Rivers, the great lawyer and M.P., who has been staying down here, and she is going up to London on a visit to his sister, Lady Middlemaine, wife of one of the judges, so I am told. Oh, it's every word true, I can assure you."

So much of truth there was in the report that in a few days Mr. Rivers in his carriage stopped at Mrs. Whitehurst's door, and took away Glenora and her luggage, and Mrs. Whitehurst and Reginald, and drove to the railway station. Thence Mr. Rivers and Glenora went up to London. There was an enthusiasm of farewell on the platform, and then Mrs. Whitehurst and her son drove back to their home. The pair kept silent for awhile, and then Mrs. Whitehurst broke out suddenly:

"Reggie, I always thought there was something in that girl that marked her as above her position—just like ourselves, dear. Didn't you ever notice that, Reggie?"

"I thought her a very charming girl, mother."

"Charming—yes—but that isn't the point. Didn't she strike you as being above a position here in a shop?"

"I don't see why anybody should be too good for a shop," Reggie made answer somewhat doggedly.

"Stuff and nonsense, dear. Of course we have to keep a shop, but I do say that we are too good for it and so is she."

"Well, I don't deny that."

"How odd you are! I don't think you played your cards well in that case, Reggie! I am sure you might have got that girl to marry you if you had asked her, and then we should all have been invited to town to see Mr. Rivers and Lady Middlemaine. Fancy getting back to our old position again, shop or no shop! Well, it's only another chance lost. One has to put up with such things in life."

"But is the chance lost?" Reggie asked quietly.

"Oh, of course it's lost," Mrs. Whitehurst replied impatiently. How can you talk so, Reggie! So like a man! Why, when that pretty girl gets up to town and is taken about by Lady Middlemaine, she'll have her head turned by flattery and attentions in a week! She'll no more think of marrying you than she would think of marrying Freddy, the boatman, the son of the woman she's been lodging with! Oh, don't you forget it!"

"She'll marry me, mother, for all that—and don't you forget it!"

"How do you know?"

"Because she told me so."

"When—when?"

"This morning—I asked her, and she said yes."

"Yes, yes! And Mr. Rivers, what would he say?"

"We are to be married from Lady Middlemaine's house, dear mother, and you are to be at the wedding."

"Oh, you dear, good boy! Now I am so happy!"

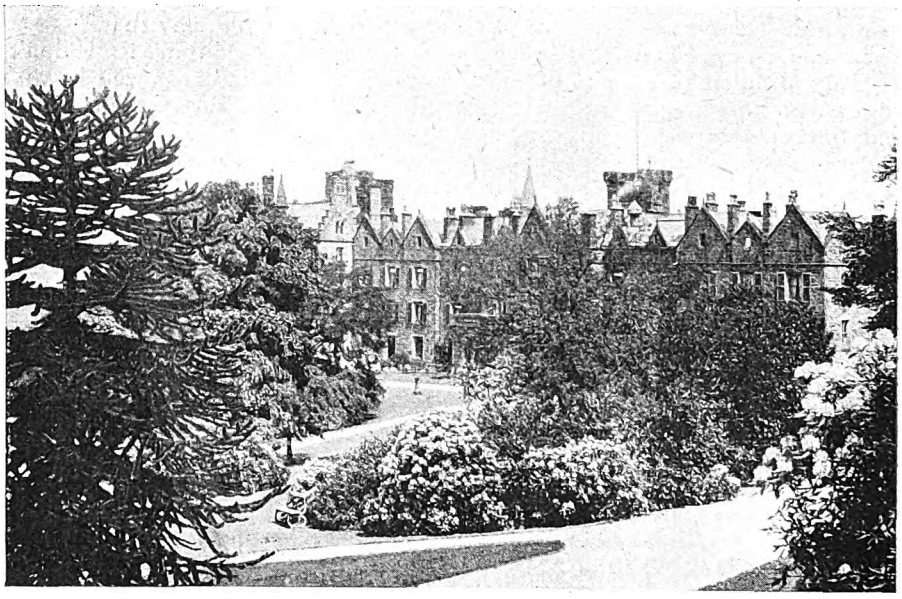
Reginald and Glenora were married from Lady Middlemaine's house, and Mrs. Whitehurst, of course, was a resplendent figure at the wedding. Mrs. Whitehurst and the young married pair were invited up to town for a few days in the coming season. But Reginald and Glenora returned to the seaside after their honeymoon trip and kept shop all the same. Mr. Rivers hired the villa again for another season, and brought down the Judge and Lady Middlemaine, and took out Mrs. Whitehurst with them for many a drive. Mrs. Whitehurst is very fond of Glenora, and firmly believes that Reginald has restored the fortune of the family.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google



THE PALACE OF THE MOORS.

ON THE YORKSHIRE MOORS.

By LEONARD GRAHAM.

FOR the lover of nature, the jaded seeker after health, and the painter and poet who have wrought her wild legends into picture and song, Yorkshire has for each a charm that is all her own.

This is the land of moor and mountain, of rocky dales cradling the rushing torrent, and of happy valleys watered by smoothly flowing streams, where the Wizard Indolence might rear his enchanted castle. Here on the lonely moor comes the exulting sense of freedom amidst scenes of beauty untamed by the hand of man; here is solitude that wraps you round, and a solemn stillness in which the cares of this workaday world may well be laid to rest.

Over the great expanse of the wild heath comes sweeping the life-giving breeze, fresh and free like that which plays upon the ocean's surface, imparting health to the cheek and vigour to the limbs, and making it a glorious thing to be alive.

Let us stand awhile on the summit of Rombald's Moor, towering 1,300 feet above the sea, and view the magnificent panorama which stretches away to the horizon, an horizon not bounded by the confines of one county, though that be the largest in England, but allowing glimpses into far Lancashire.

In the great county itself, Bradford to the south is plainly in view, and Leeds to the south-east, while Harewood House and Castle and the stately Minster of York are on the east, and, in the far north, Whernside and Ingleborough—the first conspicuous with its long summit and the latter with its flat top.

All between these far landmarks Nature spreads out her varied wonders. Here are bold bluffs and rolling hills clad with purple heather and yellow gorse, whose hues contrast with the sombre reds and browns of barren cliff-sides; here are wide-spreading plains, in parts bare and wind-swept, and again, where the hills afford a shelter, a mass of moving colour as the breeze gently fans the wilderness of flowers.

Digitized by Google

But if we would seek relief from sterner scenes we must descend from the heights, and a turn perhaps will bring us to some secluded spot where a hillside stream or waterfall comes tumbling through a lovely glen, making a paradise of green mosses and bright flowers.

Within a few miles of this spot is one of the loveliest vales which Yorkshire or, indeed, England can boast. This is the celebrated Valley of the Wharfe, sung by Wordsworth in his beautiful rendering of the old legend, "The White Doe of Rylstone," and haunted with memories of one of England's greatest painters, Turner.

The river is embosomed in deep woods, and in its crystal surface are mirrored venerable ruins that stand like sentinels of the past—the stately pile of "Bolton's Mouldering Priory," and the grey dismantled battlements of Barden Tower, the ancient seat of the Cliffords. The stream goes by with a gentle murmur, singing its song of other days, and the grey walls of the old Abbey glisten in the sunbeams which vainly seek to gild the ravages of time.

Hither, in times past, on each Sabbath day flocked the country people dressed in their best attire, hastening along "the banks of crystal Wharfe," and down the moorlands to the ancient Abbey, whose bells rang out a joyous peal; and hither the poet tells us, came the mysterious doe—"white she was as a lily of June, and beauteous as the silver moon"—just as the sweet strains of the first hymn had died away in silence.

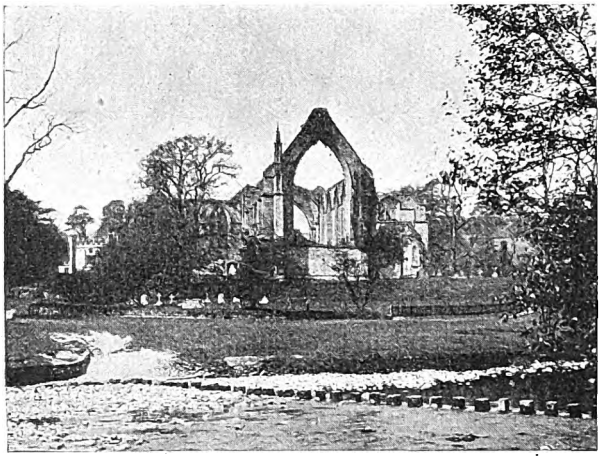
When soft! the dusky trees between
And down the path through the open green
Where is no living thing to be seen,
And through yon gateway where is found
Beneath the arch with ivy bound
Free entrance to the churchyard ground;
And right across the verdant sod
Towards the very house of God;
Comes gliding in with lovely gleam,
Comes gliding in serene and slow,
Soft and silent as a dream,
A solitary doe.

Then, while the voice of prayer and praise fills the little "rural chapel" and echoes through the ruined arches of the crumbling Abbey, she flits by massive columns and round the tombs of old Crusader Knights, loving the dim shadows, and peering with mild curiosity into the darkest crannies, and the dank and mouldering vaults.

Then, as the people throng from church, she makes her way to her accustomed resting-place on a grassy mound in the old churchyard, and well the village congregation know that when from these sacred precincts the last straggler shall have departed the lovely and mysterious creature will have vanished too.

THE FAMOUS STRID, WHERE THE WHARFE BECOMES ENGULFED.

Digitized by Google



"BOLTON'S MOULDERING PRIORY."

Ah! the stories which these superstitious country folks tell about her, knowing not whether her presence bodes good or ill.

She is, they say, no earthly being, but whether a visitant from the upper or lower world, some fiend to mock at their prayer, or some holy saint come to mourn over the departed glories of the sacred Abbey, they cannot guess. And yet her tale, which the poet so touchingly tells, is simple enough.

In the days of good Queen Bess, when the last of the ill-starred Nortons met his fate, because his father and brethren had fought to restore the ancient faith of the land—though he himself had neither part nor lot in their treason—he was laid to rest under the shadow of the old Abbey, whose splendours his rash parent had so longed to restore.

Hither would come his weeping, desolate sister, "the consecrated Emily," last of that once fair family of nine brave sons and one beautiful daughter, to mourn at her brother's grave. With her, the faithful companion of her grief, was the milk-white doe, who, never absent from the maiden's side, wandered with her through the shadowed aisles while prayer and praise ascended, and shared her bed on the lonely grave when the service was over.

But the time came when, unable to support her grief any longer, the maiden pined and died, and the lovely doe each Sabbath day would still revisit the scenes made dear to her by association and

Haunting the spot with lonely cheer,
Which her dear mistress once held dear,
Loves most what Emily loved most
The enclosure of the churchyard ground,
Here wanders like a gliding ghost,
And every Sabbath here is found.

Let the old legends go, and this calm vale of contentment will still present us associations as pleasing as those of the far past, for they are connected with one of the greatest names in modern art.

After his first visit here, Turner, so his biographer tells us, ever afterwards entertained the "most intense affection for the place and its neighbourhood, and for the River Wharfe, which flows through the sweet meadow in the vale, and makes a beautiful curve round the sides of the Abbey itself."

Besides the marvellous beauty of the scene, the river had another attraction for the painter. Turner was an enthusiastic angler, and the Wharfe affords capital sport to the followers of Old Izaak. Here, rod in hand, and seated on the grassy bank, he would divest his mind entirely of the cares of his work and

A MOORLAND LODGE AT BEN RHYDDING.

Digitized by Google

resign himself to the pleasures of his favourite pastime.

From this happy valley the artist, when the mood was upon him, loved to ascend the course of the river till he came to the fount of the infant stream in the wild bleak hills that frown above Barden Tower.

'Tis a solitary spot, but full of barren grandeur which expands the soul, and which the eyes of the great painter loved to drink in.

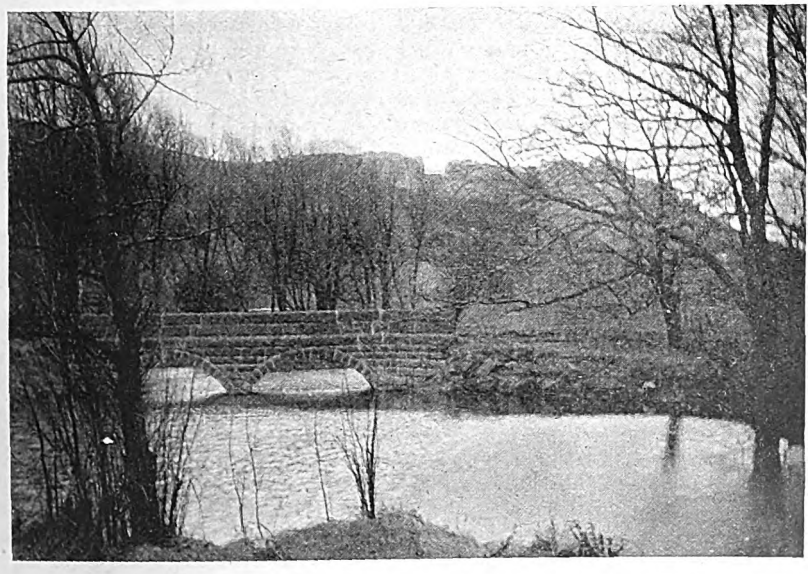
BEN RHYDDING, THE FIRST "HYDRO" ESTABLISHED IN ENGLAND.

Two miles from Bolton Abbey is the famous Strid, where the stream becomes engulfed in a deep cavity in its rocky bed and issuing forth again foams along on its impetuous course. Huge boulders, grown over with green moss, form its banks; and on either side frown the dark woods whose interlaced branches and luxuriant foliage recall to mind the dense forests of primeval Britain.

Penetrating into the heart of the woods the music of a waterfall breaks pleasantly on the ear, and brushing away the branches we look down upon a rocky basin, into which, with many a leap and dash from rock to rock descends a cloud of snowy foam spreading itself out in seething whiteness on the stony bottom; then chattering to the stones as it pursues its onward way it gradually subsides into silence, and becomes a placid sheet of crystal water scarcely flecked by a ripple.

The sides of the basin are covered by wild shrubs and bushes, whose twisted roots cling to the stony soil and weave a fantastic network of green wood over the sombre rock.

Supposing the traveller has not already



A PLACID LAKE AT THE FOOT OF THE MOORS.

Digitized by Google

made it his headquarters, he must not forget to visit Ben Rhydding, famous for its hydropathic establishment, the first ever founded in this country.

Surrounded by eighty acres of beautiful grounds, planted with rare trees and shrubs and communicating with the broad uplands, the mansion itself is of the most palatial proportions. It is built in the Scottish baronial style on high ground and commands a noble prospect of about one hundred miles of pastoral country. The house is situated about midway between the moors and the placid Wharfe. Its position is beautifully sheltered, and a short walk through the grounds where they rise to meet the uplands enables the visitor to enjoy the splendid sweep of the moorland air. The best way to reach Ben-Rhydding is by the Midland Railway viâ Leeds or Bradford.

The places of interest and beauty in this enchanted county are almost endless.

At Almscliff, twelve miles from Ben Rhydding, there is a group of Druidical rocks, from the summit of which a fine view is obtained of the Wharfe, and Skipton Castle is also well worth a visit.

Harrogate is within a short railway journey. Some miles farther on are Brimham Rocks, huge and fantastic, and named from their curious shapes—Cannon, Mushroom, Baboon's Head, Snake's Head, Pulpit and Wishing Gate, and lastly, over the wild extent of Rombald's Moor, are scattered many interesting remains of ancient times, among which are the British Camp, Roman Wall, and Druidical Circle. I do not hesitate to say that the Brimham Rocks surpass anything of the kind in England, not even excepting Stonehenge.

LEONARD GRAHAM.

HER VOICE.

Only to hear her voice again,
Its sweet tones soft and low!
It charmed me when I heard it then
A little while ago,
And still I feel it o'er me steal—
It will not let me go.

'Tis but the echo of her song,
The shadow of the sound
Of that dear voice for which I long
That follows me around,
Yet find it well in that sweet spell
To know my heart is bound.

Only to hear her voice again,
Beside me fondly near,
In tones of tenderness as when
She held my love as dear.
When joys have left the heart bereft
How precious they appear!

My heart is now a harp held mute
Till her voice touch the strings;
If to her ear response be clear
True harmony it brings,
For, as she will, the harp is still,
Or on in joyance sings.

Geo. Birdseye.

Digitized by Google

WOMEN FACTORY WORKERS.

By CLEMENTINA BLACK.

NO woman really knows the life of workers in a factory unless she has herself been such a worker; but having had the opportunity for years, and especially since the formation, in October, 1889, of the Women's Trade Union Association, of knowing personally some hundreds of factory-workers, chiefly belonging to the East End of London, I hope that my few notes may be of some value to many who never come into actual and vital contact with the class in whose interest I write. The factory-worker—probably everywhere, certainly in East London—has two great enemies, ignorance and isolation, and these two put her at the mercy of unscrupulous employers, who, alas, are many. A large proportion of employers (to speak sadly and advisedly) consider but one point in regard to women-workers, namely, how to give them the least that may be given in wages, in working conditions, and even in honest dealing. Of course there are exceptions—men who are not only just and considerate, but generous, to their workers; and these are handicapped in the competitive race by their moral scruples. It should never be forgotton that the securing of better conditions for all workers is to the interest no less of the fair-dealing employer than of the workers themselves—a point sometimes apt to escape the bystander.

The pay of women factory-workers is distressingly low. Roughly—very roughly—it may be said to range in East London from 5s. to 15s. a week. In a few trades the average runs higher, and in most occupations a small sprinkling of "first" hands will receive from 15s. to 20s. I once knew one young woman—not being a forewoman—in the best paid of East End factory trades, who declared that she had earned 30s. On the other hand, the majority of those whom I myself know, earn 10s. to 12s., while scores earn from 6s. to 8s. Now, to live really healthily—to pay for a wholesome dwelling at a London rent, to provide ample food and clothing, and lay by any real provision for sickness or old age—can hardly be managed on less than £1 a week; and the immensely high percentage of pauperism among women cannot appear surprising to those who know the rates at which they are paid. Moreover, these wages are in many instances systematically docked by illegal deductions and by various arrangements which, though not definitely illegal, are obviously inequitable and sometimes dishonest. The provisions of the law and the methods of getting it executed are practically unknown to most women-workers. Infractions of the Factory Act are by no means uncommon; the Truck Act is evaded, probably only to a small degree, and the Employers' Liability Act to a considerable extent; and all these infractions of the law are, in effect, diminutions of wage.

Nor is this poor wage in any sense an assured one. Rare indeed is the worker who can command what she herself would call a "constancy." In most trades, work is slack for shorter or longer periods. Besides this uncertainty, depending upon fluctuations of demand, and affecting all to some extent, there is a further uncertainty depending on the caprice of employers, managers and foremen. More than a week's notice is very unusual, and instant dismissal, without reason assigned, is common.

As to general conditions, many factories would be very dangerous in case of fire, the stairways being often little more than steep ladders, while the practice (which should surely be punishable) of locking workers in, is by no means unusual. Sanitary conditions are also often very bad, and ventilation in summer and heating in winter often deficient. One case came before my notice of a large and prosperous firm employing women at sewing-machines in a factory absolutely without any means of warming. Petty tyranny, favouritism, and various forms of bullying on the part of the foremen and forewomen are largely prevalent.

Digitized by Google

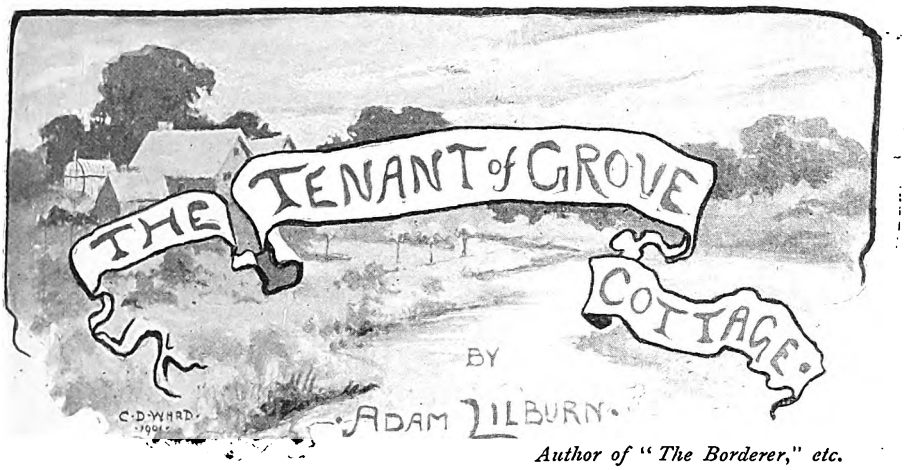
Now, what are the remedies for these evils? In order to answer that question, we must decide to what these evils are due. The low wages may, in some instances, be owing to an actual selling price so low that there is really no margin for a rise. This is, I am inclined to believe, the case in regard to the cheapest description of ready-made shirts. Such cases might be met if women's labour were highly organised, instead of being as it is, virtually unorganised, by a refusal to enter the branch of work while badly paid. Then, if the product were really needed by the public, the price would rise; and if it were not needed, it would simply cease to be manufactured. But there are many instances in which a margin undoubtedly exists, allowing for better pay without increase of selling price. Where, for example, two manufacturers, A. and B., compete in the same market, A paying a shilling a week more to every worker than B., there is an obvious economic possibility of raising the wage paid by B. to the level of that paid by A. Differences of this sort exist in all trades where labour is not organised, and are conspicuous in the worse-paid women's industries. An extreme instance was shown when a strike register of names and wages revealed a difference of over 20 per cent. in the piecework rates paid to two sets of workers doing similar, and sometimes actually identical, work, in different departments of the same factory. Neither party was aware of the difference, which appeared to be mainly due to the forewoman in one of the "rooms," who resisted reductions on behalf of her hands, and to whom they, in their turn, were so much attached that her dismissal would probably have made trouble.

The ignorance of workers concerning the general rate of prices makes them unable to judge whether they are being worse paid than others; they do not know when wages in their trade are rising throughout the country, and when they are falling. Wages have been systematically reduced, for instance—with no coincident decrease of business—in a certain London factory, while steadily rising in the same industry elsewhere. The kind of knowledge needed on these points can only be obtained through combination and organisation—that is through trade unions. But the mere possession of knowledge does not alone suffice. Any one woman might, conceivably, be fully informed as to all the conditions of trade, yet she would not, by individual action, be able to raise her own wages, however much they might be below existing rates. Only united action can secure the advance—in other words, again, only a trade union can secure it. A trade union, too, can concentrate information as to the law on all points affecting its members, and is a powerful instrument of public appeal. The one thing of which the unjust employer stands in dread is public opinion. He shuns a court of law, even when he knows that the verdict must be on his side. These workers themselves are, inevitably, ignorant, but they are very far indeed from being stupid. Nothing is more remarkable and more encouraging than the sturdy good sense and practical business ability to be found among quite poor factory-workers. Their loyalty to each other is conspicuous. It is a frequent practice for some six or more to pay a certain sum weekly, each taking her turn to receive all the payments, and each in turn purchasing hat, boots, or whatever article may be the object of the collection. I have never heard of any girl or woman failing to pay her due share.

There is no delusion more ill-founded than the impression that the factory-workers' condition is a bad one because they are not capable socially and mentally of anything better. They have as a class excellent feeling, plenty of intelligence, and an admirable sense of fair-play. They need above all other things help in self-organisation. The material of which reasonable and resolute trade unionists are made is there; but there are few women among the better off and better educated who are willing to undertake the unexciting regular work of distributing bills, calling meetings, talking to women by ones and twos, explaining, showing how to manage little business details, and keeping up all the while an unflagging interest and hopefulness. There is no credit—none of the glory of patronage—to be gained in this work; nothing but the satisfaction of giving real help and of receiving in return the genuine friendship of women who are often quite as interesting and full of character as any to be met in other social grades.

CLEMENTINA BLACK.

Digitized by Google



Author of "The Borderer," etc.

Illustrated by CHAS. D. WARD.

CHAPTER I.

A LOVER OF NATURE.

EVERY blade of grass shimmered with dew, and around each branch and twig of the hedgerow were woven those exquisite but fragile gossamers which mark the decay of summer. The owner of Grove Cottage—a pretty rural abode situated upon one of the lesser tributaries of the Thames—stepped out into his garden and paused a moment in order to inhale the aromatic fragrance given out by grass and leaf and flower, upon that autumn morning.

The gentleman was evidently a lover of nature, for he peered, in an interested fashion, through his coloured spectacles, at near and distant objects.

He seemed to love them all, from the chrysanthemums, just touched by the first frost, to the humble daisy that reared its insignificant head upon the lawn. So far from resenting the intrusion of the latter he picked it almost tenderly and placed it in his buttonhole.

Yet there was nothing specially sentimental in his appearance. He was merely—to a casual observer—a stout, middle-aged gentleman, who had evidently retained a love of beauty up to an age when the prose of life has generally obliterated its poetry. Perhaps, however, it was only now that he found leisure to cultivate tastes pushed aside by the manifold interests and pursuits of earlier days.

However this might be, at any rate he walked softly so that the birds, and frogs, and such small deer might not be affrighted by his approach; while as he walked he whistled so melodiously that the sound might easily have passed for some wood-note wild.

Twice he made the circuit of the garden, once he peeped into the greenhouse that sheltered his pet auriculas; looked up at the sky where a dull, red sun had as yet failed to pierce the mists, then paused before a small wicket-gate that led into a quiet lane.

"It's a trifle early for a stroll," he murmured. "Perhaps I'd better water my auriculas first."

As he stood hesitating, gate in hand, a small, slight, girlish figure came running down the garden path.

"Ah, now, if that isn't too bad, Uncle Dan!" cried the newcomer, with a merry laugh. "Didn't I say last night that I meant to be up first? Yet you steal a march on me as usual. But that's always the way. My poor resolutions are seldom fulfilled; and, you know, you are provoking in your quiet way. Never mind, you'll have to put up with my company to the village. That's your punishment, you naughty man!"

Digitized by Google

The gentleman beamed upon her in a way that suggested no great aversion to this penance.

She was an exceedingly pretty little creature. Her quick, shy, yet eager glances were like those of some small, untamed bird, and, when she smiled, a dimple in her right cheek added a piquant touch to her beauty.

"Come," she cried in her impetuous way, "why don't you proceed? It's really too cold to stand here longer. But, perhaps—— Don't you really want me?"

"You pretty spoilt child," returned the gentleman. "I suppose you'd be dreadfully offended if I were to refuse your company? But, seriously, Nora, your shoes are too thin, and there's a heavy dew on the grass. Mother would be angry if I allowed her favourite to contract a chill."

Nora pouted. "Nonsense! What do you know about girls' shoes, you dear, ignorant old bachelor? The soles are as thick as thick. Just look! And I'm not going back, so there!"

Like the pretty spoilt child he called her she thrust a hand within his arm and attempted to pull him onward. It was quite evident that this good-natured gentleman usually gave in to her, for she appeared surprised at his resistance.

"What will granny say when she comes down?" he inquired. "Your absence may render her uneasy."

She shook her head. "She's not up yet, and she knows I wanted to come out. I told her as I came downstairs. So that's for your objections! You won't get rid of me."

"Well, well, a wilful girl's ill to guide."

But it was with evident reluctance he moved forward even with the compelling hand upon his arm.

These two people were on the best and easiest of terms. They had many tastes in common. The girl was as eager as the man to observe the varying aspects of nature; but was, in comparison with him, nowhere in keenness of perception and minuteness of observation. Every few steps they took he paused in order to point out some fresh beauty—the exquisite gradations of tint on some trailing bramble spray burgeoned by the frost, or the quivering rainbow tangled in some gossamer web.

"Why, it's quite an education in natural history to take one's walks abroad with you," exclaimed the girl, enthusiastically, "for you teach one how to see. Eyes and no eyes, eh? I believe those tinted glasses of yours are only worn because you wish to disguise too keen a vision."

"There's many a true word spoken in jest, Nora," returned the gentleman; "or, perhaps, I have ugly eyes and wish to conceal them."

"Well, they're good for something, at any rate. Though I always loved nature, still I didn't—— Girls have such a lot of silly things to think about."

The man smiled. "Girls ought to finish their sentences at least."

"Yes, I know! But I want to say everything at once, so I forget. Never mind, it's just your little Nora's way."

The winding lane along which they were walking narrowed at this point and became dark and gloomy from the overshadowing trees. The frosts of October had not been sufficiently severe as yet to do much damage to the foliage, although the road was strewn with red and sodden leaves. Twilight reigned beneath the overhanging branches, and Nora clung more closely to her companion's arm.

"How I do hate this bit of road," she exclaimed. "It always gives me the creeps when I have to brave it alone. Very silly? Yes, but there's a sort of atmosphere about it. I have strange fancies. What do you think I do? Shut my eyes and run! Once I came slap against a gate. There's the identical gate in front—leads into a field——" Here she stopped suddenly and gazed curiously ahead. "Why, there's something there now, lying close to it. Can you make out what it is?"

He followed the direction of her gaze. "I'm not quite certain, but it looks like a hat," he replied, slowly. "But yonder comes Jack Ditton with our morning's supply of milk. Cook would storm if she saw how he swings the can. He'll reach the mysterious object before we do, and he's safe to give us the benefit of his discovery."

The boy alluded to came briskly onward, conscious of a tardy delivery and cook's sharp tongue. But his steps and whistle both terminated abruptly opposite the field gate. His rosy cheeks paled and his round eyes grew rounder. The milk-can clattered with the trembling of his arm. It was with obvious delight that he hailed the advance of the other two. He ran to meet them open-mouthed.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"I say, Mr. Pattinson, please sir, there's summat wrong! I seen a gent's top hat a-lyin' by yon gate, an' there's some blood, too, a reg'lar pool!"

Nora was trembling now. The gentleman stopped as though in doubt. "I don't suppose there's much the matter, Nora, for Jack's got notions from reading penny dreadfuls, and scents a mystery where none exists. But if you're at all nervous, perhaps you'd better return home. Probably some drunken rustic has strayed into Dredman's-lane and stumbled against a tree in the dark."

"'Taint that sort o' hat," interposed the milk-boy, sulkily. "It's a shiny 'un, same as them City toffs wear."

The girl's hand tightened on her companion's arm. "I must go on. How could I return in suspense? Let me come."

Mr. Pattinson offered no further remonstrance. The milk-boy crept up in their rear. When they reached the place he picked up the hat and held it out triumphantly. The other two were looking down at something more crimson than the decaying leaves or the fungi that grew on the damp tree roots. There was no pool—as the boy had declared,—but there were undoubtedly a few scattered drops of blood on the dewy grass.

"Jack Ditton's right for once," declared Mr. Pattinson. "That hat never belonged to a rustic."

Nora's roving, frightened eyes detected more. Raising a trembling hand she pointed to a dark object within the field.

"Look! Look! What's that within the gate? Oh, I know it's something dreadful! I dare not go any further, and yet I'm forced to——"

They went on together, she still clinging and Jack Ditton following. Then, alas! her fears were justified. Close to the hedge, as though it had been dragged thither, lay the lifeless body of an elderly gentleman, bareheaded, his white hair drenched with dew, and his widely opened eyes staring vacantly, and with an horrid fixity, up to the sky.

CHAPTER II.

"THAT POOR GREY HEAD!"

The three people who made this terrible discovery stood as though rooted to the spot, scarce venturing to breathe. In a moment the beauty of the autumn morning was blotted out as by a sudden fog. The lane seemed now in truth a fitting place and scene for a tragedy.

At length Mr. Pattinson summoned sufficient resolution to approach the recumbent figure. Kneeling down he placed his hand upon its breast, but failed to detect any indication of life.

He shook his head as he rose to his feet. Then he glanced pitifully at the girl who stood there white and trembling, but who discovered, nevertheless, a self-control that was admirable as rare.

"This is indeed a melancholy business," he said, in a low voice; "and I would to God the sight had been spared you, Nora, for I fear that the poor gentleman—whoever he may be—is dead."

Nora's lip quivered, but she made a sensible suggestion.

"Jack Ditton had better run for the doctor."

"Why, of course! Run, Jack, for all you're worth, and bid Dr. Hawthorn make all possible haste. And, here, wait a minute! After that go on to the police-station and tell Pawson to bring the ambulance. What a fortunate thing it is we've just got one."

It seemed hours to Nora before the doctor arrived, although fear, and that curious delight people find in bearing evil tidings, lent wings to the usually leaden feet of Jack Ditton. Nora never forgot the misery of those lagging moments. To be forced to stand there inactive was in itself a purgatory to the impulsive young creature. But added to this was the strange fascination of horror which drew her reluctant gaze to that still, dreadful form at her feet. It seemed wrong to speak while those dead lips were closed for ever. Ordinary topics of conversation were inappropriate as in a church.

Suddenly, however, the tension was relaxed by the occurrence of a simple incident. Some small bird, most probably a robin, alighted upon a tall rose spray that swayed from the hedge just over the girl's head and commenced to sing. She gave a shuddering sigh and blessed it in her heart.

Digitized by Google

"The darling bird," she murmured, under her breath. "Isn't it sweet of it? It is singing his requiem."

Then came a rush of hasty footsteps, and the young doctor arrived on the scene, a crowd of gaping rustics following in his wake.

"Good morning, Miss Shelley," he said, raising his hat. "This is a strange story of Jack Ditton's. Ah!" as he caught sight of the recumbent figure, "It's too true then."

Following Mr. Pattinson's example, he knelt down, but his quick, professional eye instantly detected the impossibility of any aid being given. He touched the corpse here and there lightly; then, with a rapid and deft movement, raised it so that he obtained a view of its back. From the position he had assumed, bending over the dead man, no one else observed his action. He replaced the figure as quietly as he had raised it.

"Ah! I thought so," he said, seriously. "This is a bad business, Mr. Pattinson."

"Has the poor fellow succumbed to a fit?" asked the gentleman addressed, in a correspondingly grave voice.

The doctor rose to his feet.

"No, indeed! I wish it was nothing worse than that, even though it had proved fatal! But the affair is much more serious. That man died no natural death. He has been murdered."

Although some suspicion of this must have lurked in the minds of the bystanders, there was yet something awful in this calm declaration of an ugly fact. Nora drew back, trembling in every limb. But she would not give way; and when her guardian placed his arm about her for a support, she thrust it aside with passionate vehemence.

"Don't!" she cried. "You needn't be afraid! I'm not going to faint. I'm too angry. The cowards! What cowards they must have been to kill an old man! O God! It's too pitiful. That poor grey head! Who could have been so heartless as to bring it low?"

Her little hands were clenched, and her eyes flashed with indignation. Mr. Pattinson looked curiously at her. He must have dreaded the after-effects of the nervous strain, for when he spoke again his tone was altered.

"Come, Nora!" he exclaimed, somewhat abruptly. "This is no place for a girl like you. You must obey me and go home at once."

She scarcely seemed to hear. "That poor, grey head!" she kept on murmuring. "Oh, how I wonder to whom it is dear? I wonder who will mourn its downfall?"

"Come, come! You must not go on so. I tell you this is no place for women. I shall have to go to the village and make a statement of the circumstances of the discovery. But if neither of us appears at the breakfast-table, you know, mother will be imagining all sorts of things."

He took her arm, and turned her in the direction of Grove Cottage.

"Be a good girl, and do as I bid you. See! Yonder they come with the ambulance, and the fewer people there are about now, the better."

She proceeded a few steps, then paused again irresolutely.

"Oh, what must I tell granny? It's all so dreadful! I don't know what to say to her."

"Tell her nothing at all, if you're afraid. I'll give her the requisite information myself, and that soon, or the servants are sure to blurt it out in the crudest fashion when the news reaches the kitchen. We must save her all we can. Come, Nora, pull yourself together. You're not usually so flabby."

The rough words acted like a spur. She drew herself erect.

"Usually? There's nothing usual about this, thank Heaven! It's more like some cruel nightmare. But I'll do my best. Poor, dear old granny! Yet I half-envy her the blindness she bemoans. That dead face will haunt me for ever!"

He watched her out of sight, and noted, with gratification, that she walked steadily.

"One has to be masterful with Nora sometimes," he said to himself, with a slight smile. "Girls are kittle cattle to deal with. I was afraid she'd make a scene. But, after all, she's young, and young things soon forget."

He turned again to the group. Under Dr. Hawthorn's directions, they had raised the body and placed it on the ambulance, covering it reverently. The village policeman—a rather stolid-looking man—stood at Mr. Pattinson's elbow. He was superintending rather than doing any work, for there were plenty of willing hands without his.

Digitized by Google

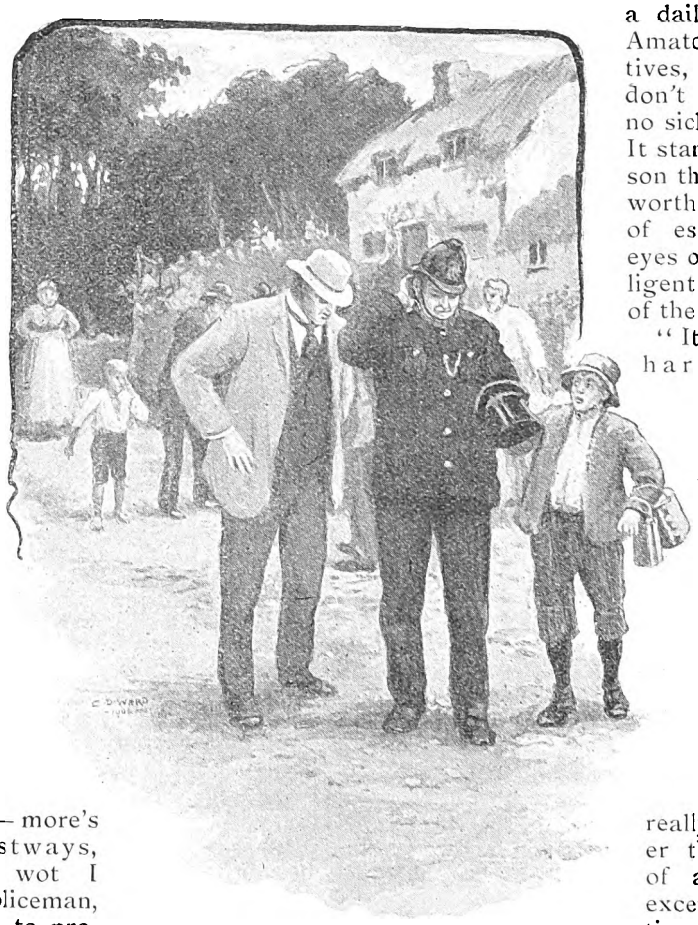
"This is a sad affair, Pawson," said Mr. Pattinson. "One scarcely anticipates a tragedy of this sort occurring in one of our quiet lanes."

Pawson looked doubtful. "Well, I don't know as I'm prepared to say much in favour of Dredman's Lane, Mr. Pattinson," he returned; "though it doesn't do to believe all one hears. People are that ignorant, you wouldn't believe! But as for the country in general, why, I've bin here or hereabouts for ten year come November, an' never had no such affair as this on my hands—for that nasty biz'ness at the bungalow was before my time—and rows at the public don't count, nor even the wandering lunatic I once took in charge for offering to knock down everyone he met."

"Then you've no previous experience to guide you?"

"No, indeed—more's the pity! Leastways, that isn't quite wot I mean," said the policeman, rubbing his head to produce ideas. "But it's like this, you know, sir: people expect such a lot from us poor chaps nowadays. It's all along o' them writin' gents wot's on the noospapers an' magazines. They keep on a-hammerin' it in, with their clever amatoor detectives, who foller up such pore, silly-lookin' clues an' discover crimes that baffle the force, until the public looks down on us like anything, an' calls us wooden-headed becos' we don't pretend to see through brick walls!"



THE CONSTABLE RATHER SHEEPISHLY TOOK THE HAT FROM THE BOY.

By this time the procession was ready to start for the village, and Mr. Pattinson and the policeman walked in advance.

"You don't approve of amateur detectives, then?" asked the gentleman, who, even at such a serious time, could not refrain from pursuing a subject that afforded pleasure to his quaint humour.

"Why, no; 'tain't likely, sir! Live an' let live, say I. 'Ow'd they like it if I wos to begin an' write leadin' articles for a daily paper? Amatoor detectives, is it? I don't b'leeve in no sich persons. It stands to reason that no clue worth speakin' of escapes the eyes of an intelligent member of the force!"

"It's rather hard lines," remarked Mr. Pattinson, kindly. "Really, it seems to me that, considering what risks you have to run in the interests of justice—which are really far greater than those of a soldier except in wartime—we civilians don't half appreciate your valuable services." Pawson's manly chest expanded. He had always found Mr. Pattinson a pleasant gentleman to deal with in all parochial and local matters; but this display of sympathy rendered him at once both proud and happy.

"You wouldn't b'leeve the impudence one has to put up with, sir," he said, pathetically. "Everybody fancies they can give a policeman advice. An', I s'pose, we'll have a smart young chap down from Scotland Yard d'rectly, all primed an' ready to teach me everythin' I know already. But, p'raps, I'll be beforehand with him this time! I've got an idea in my head that may lead to something. But I'm not a-goin' to give it away; so you'll excuse me if I say nothin' about it yet awhile."

Digitized by Google

He strode on in silence for a few minutes; then Jack Ditton, the milk-boy, overtook him, and tugged at his coat-sleeve. Jack still carried his jingling can, but had besides something else in his hand, which he guarded carefully.

This object had escaped the eyes of Pawson—perhaps because his brain, exhausting itself in the production of one idea, had refused to do further work—and yet it was of considerable importance. It was, in short, the shiny silk hat which had first attracted the attention of Nora.

"I say, Pawson, look here!" cried the boy, in breathless eagerness. "Y' oughter look at this hat! P'raps it'll help yer to find out who he is? There's a nyme written inside. I can read it quite plyne, though there's a bit rubbed out."

Mr. Pattinson's eyes twinkled behind his coloured spectacles, as the constable, rather sheepishly, took the hat from the boy. But the amusement quickly gave place to a more serious expression. Pawson turned the hat round as though half afraid of the information it might afford. By this, they had emerged from the shady lane into the sunny village street, and the light there being strong, the name written in the hat showed more plainly. It was "J. Carlton." The address, however, was not so distinct; it was "—— Lane, E.C." Enough, however, for purposes of identification, Mr. Pattinson opined.

There was a curious appeal in the constable's face that nearly upset Mr. Pattinson's gravity.

"You won't say nothin' about this at the inkwest, sir, will you? I know it looks bad, after wot I've bin a-sayin' about the force; but wot with bein' a bit upset, an' havin' my head full of a idea that may lead to somethin', I confess I did overlook that there hat." Mr. Pattinson's lips twitched, but he resolutely repressed the inclination to smile.

"No, indeed! You may rely on my discretion, Pawson. Anybody might have passed a hat without noticing it particularly. And I've always found you reliable and capable. I've not forgotten the way you discovered the thief who carried off my prize auriculas last year. It would be most ungrateful if I were to—how do you say it, Jack?—give you away. All the same, I think I would like to reward Jack for his preternatural sharpness. I wonder if he's read the adventures of the world-renowned Sherlock Holmes?"

Jack grinned and nodded. "Not all on them, I haven't; on'y a few! A littery gent as was a stayin' at mother's last summer had them, an' I borrowed them—when he was out—but he went away before I finished."

"Well, well, who knows whether in time Jack may not rival those identical amateur detectives for whom you nourish so supreme a contempt, Pawson? Come here, Jack. Here's a shilling for you. Don't spend it in pernicious penny dreadfuls. It's much better to borrow your literature from your mother's lodgers—especially without their leave."

The boy looked up at him, suspicious of an irony all foreign to his rustic experience.

"I never know wot ye mean, sir," he said. I b'leeve it's poking fun at me you are, often when ye're givin' me advice. But I don't care. I found the hat, right enough!"

"To be sure! Am I not giving you a shilling for your acuteness? But don't boast of it. It's only foolish boys who think themselves clever!"

The procession arrived at its destination, and the crowd of rustics dispersed, since the doors had to be closed while the necessary depositions were taken, and the doctor made his examination.

The murdered man was a fine specimen of humanity—tall, well-formed, and muscular, considering his years, which might have bordered on sixty. He must have been exceedingly handsome, although there was an expression of anxiety and worry stamped on his face that even the smoothing fingers of death had failed to obliterate; little creases between the eyes and about the lips that told of some great and incessant strain, some ailment, mental rather than physical.

His death was due to a stab which had been given from behind, had penetrated the heart, and proved fatal instantly.

Digitized by Google

"The assassin must have possessed considerable knowledge of anatomy," remarked Dr. Hawthorn, as he drew the knife out of the wound, "for an inch higher or lower would have made all the difference. The knife must have been driven downwards in a slanting direction from just beneath the left shoulder-blade, and passed between the ribs."

"If a chap had been at the butcherin' a bit, it would help him in a biz'ness of the sort?" asked the constable, edging close to the young doctor and speaking in a whisper. The doctor shook his head.

"No, I can't say it would. Men and oxen are not quite the same, you know. But, of course, it would give him a certain dexterity with the weapon. A butcher would be more likely to strike quickly and surely than a ploughman, for example."

Pawson's dull eye kindled. "If I didn't guess as much," he muttered to himself. "Now, I think I have it! But I'll lay low, and say nothin' to nobody till I make certain."

Meantime the doctor had placed the knife he was holding upon the table, and the others went up and looked at it curiously. Suddenly one of them gave a cry of horror. This was Mr. Pattinson, who had just made a terrible discovery—a discovery that turned him pale, and paralysed his tongue so that he could do nothing but point to the fatal weapon.

CHAPTER III.

NORA'S EARLY LIFE.

Nora Shelley, Mr. Pattinson's ward, had been left an orphan quite young, and passed her early life in a dull old house in Chelsea with her father's sister—a melancholy spinster who read medical books and imagined herself in turn the possessor of every disease that flesh is heir to, and whose only distraction consisted in a daily visit from her doctor. It is probable that the latter was perfectly well aware that more than half Miss Shelley's ailments were the result of a misdirected imagination and a lack of wholesome employment; but, being poor and struggling, he decided that, after all, hers was a hobby which harmed no one, except, perhaps, poor little Nora, whose young life was shadowed by awful premonitions of illness and death. In time, however, the girl got accustomed to these, and contrived to maintain under them a cheerful and stoical demeanour. Her aunt thought her unsympathetic, but was, fortunately, too entirely self-engrossed to demand much attention. So long as the girl did not trouble her she found no fault, so they fitted into one another's tastes fairly well.

The life would have been intolerably dull and monotonous to most young girls, for Miss Shelley went into no society and had no friends; but, fortunately for herself, Nora was born with a gift for amusing herself and with a great interest in her fellow-creatures besides. Humanity presented to her an ever fascinating and varied study, even though she could only survey it from the point of view of an outsider. But her lonely wanderings continually gave her glimpses into the little comedies and dramas of life; though, for a time at least, she escaped more than a passing view of its deeper tragedies.

It was a strange life for a young girl, strange and lonely in the extreme. She had no companion in her wanderings, and continued her study of human nature in crowded streets and fashionable thoroughfares, finding it a sufficiently engrossing one to render her oblivious of the fact that her blossom time was at hand—that she was planted in a walled-in, moss-grown garden, where no one walked to admire the beauty of the flowers or inhale their fragrance.

The adventures that befell her were of the ordinary matter-of-fact type, although sometimes they verged upon the dangerous. Only one remained in her memory, because of a flavour of romance that seemed to elevate it above the others. This adventure was of so unusual a character that, although several years elapsed before anything connected with it again reached her, she had a strong impression of its importance and a presentiment that it would have some direct influence upon her future life.

Some girls, left to themselves in such a manner, might have degenerated, grown coarse and vulgar, or even bitter and cynical, seeing the misery of the world.

Not so Nora Shelley. Her mind had a bright, polished surface, from which all impurity instantly faded as a breath fades from a mirror. Her character developed rapidly. At nineteen she was quite a woman. Perhaps she was a trifle too self-reliant to be acceptable to some masculine tastes, but there was nothing strong-minded or unwomanly about her. Hers was rather the waywardness of some pretty, spoilt child. When she was twenty-one a great change took place in her life. Her aunt, after imagining herself the victim of every likely and unlikely disease, succumbed quite unexpectedly to that modern scourge which seems to attack rich and poor alike and to baffle the skill of the most learned physicians. A chill contracted during one of our bitter east winds developed into influenza, settled on her lungs, and proved fatal in less than a week.

Digitized by Google

The dying woman had absolutely no friends in the great city. She had always declared herself too ill to entertain or to go into society; and society, being a matter of exchange and barter, had dropped her. When her solicitor—whom she summoned in haste when the fever left her prostrate and moribund—asked for intructions about her will she seemed quite at a loss.

At first she could recall no one whom she trusted sufficiently to appoint as her executor. Nevertheless the man of law, who fully expected to act in that capacity, was surprised at the last.

Long ago Sarah Westmere had been her mother's faithful servant in the old west-country home. Since then the wheel of fortune had turned. Sarah Westmere married, became a widow, and the mother of a son who succeeded in making a fortune in the City; and now Sarah Pattinson was the mistress of a pretty suburban home, and happy in the possession of a devoted son; even though fate had dealt her one severe blow by depriving her of her sight.

Miss Shelley had been once to see her old dependant and had listened while the praises of Daniel Pattinson were sung for an hour or so. She had not chanced to meet him; but were not the words of his mother sufficiently convincing? Daniel Pattinson remained in the lady's memory as a type of all that is honourable and benevolent, a man of simple tastes and refined feelings, one of nature's gentlemen.

So when Mr. Denley (of the firm of Denley and Higgins, of Lincoln's Inn) asked who she wished to appoint executor to her estate, she at once named Daniel Pattinson. So good a son must needs prove an honest and proper guardian to her niece.

Nora scarcely ventured to love her aunt, for Miss Shelley had never encouraged any show of affection. The poor lady had grown old "through frigid use of life," and the girl was sorry she could not feel sorrier when her only relative died.

Then Mr. Pattinson was summoned and took his ward home at once to his pretty cottage and his sweet, blind old mother. It was a delightful change for the girl. And to the inmates of Grove Cottage she seemed to bring with her exactly the charm required for the completion of their happiness—that subtle inexpressible spirit of youth which is one with the flowers, the birds, the fresh dews of morning, the balmy breezes of evening.

The fortune left to her by her aunt was considerable, and allowed for the indulgence of any whim. But the girl's tastes were extremely simple. She bought a bicycle certainly, but did not, after the modern fashion, ride it continually, but reserved leisure for other pursuits. She read, and sewed, and walked, and gardened, besides reorganizing the household in such matters as Mrs. Pattinson's infirmity had allowed to fall in neglect.

And to the dear old lady her presence was a source of fresh happiness. Mrs. Pattinson ceased to regret the fact that her son had been so devoted to her as to overlook his obvious duty of marrying and providing her with grandchildren.

Upon the morning of the tragedy we have described, the girl's heart was heavy as she entered the sunny breakfast-room where Mrs. Pattinson awaited her with some anxiety. The mistress of Grove Cottage was a sweet-looking old woman considerably over eighty years of age. Time had dealt kindly with her. A wonderful simplicity of mind was stamped upon her homely face, almost obliterating the effects of wrinkles and white hairs, so that the effect she produced was more that of a child than of an old person. Her expression had that touch of pathos inseparable from loss of vision; but, as a matter of fact, she was one of the happiest of mortals; probably because she was so full of loving kindness and of faith in all humanity. Her son she simply adored. He was to her the best and cleverest of men, and he repaid her affection by a love and care that never wearied.

If, as occasionally happened, people ventured to condole with him upon having on his hands a parent so afflicted and helpless, he would stare at them in genuine astonishment. For her he had schemed and worked, and life without her seemed an impossibility. He was quoted in the neighbourhood as a perfect example of filial devotion.

Digitized by Google

All sorts of romantic stories were afloat concerning him. He was reputed to be enormously wealthy, although he kept but a modest establishment, and employed a jobbing gardener; but this seeming economy might be the result of a dislike of ostentation. Presumably he might have married well. But certainly this would have been a mistake. A lady—and was it likely a man of such refined tastes would have married any other?—might have looked down upon his simple, countrified old mother, and relegated her to the background.

For Sarah Pattinson's humble origin was apparent to the most casual observer, though a certain simplicity saved her from the least taint of vulgarity. Even the vicar's wife, who as the youngest (and plainest) daughter of an impecunious Irish nobleman held her head a trifle too high to please the majority of her husband's parishioners, declared that Mr. Pattinson might well be proud of such a mother, and declined to laugh when Miss Scorer, her friend and toady, who had a talent for mimicry, imitated the blind woman's west-country accent to a nicety and said: "Sit 'ee down," or "Do 'ee, now," in Mrs. Pattinson's very voice.

The blind woman greeted Nora with delight. She had grown apprehensive, and fancied all kinds of unpleasant causes to account for the absence of her son and the young girl.

"What has kept 'ee, dearie?" she asked, "an' Daniel too, my Daniel?"

The girl moved about the room attending to the various offices of the breakfast-table, trembling and unnerved, yet retaining sufficient self-control to avoid awkwardness.

"Mr. Pattinson has gone to the village, but he'll be here directly."

There was evidently an unusual ring in the tone of her voice, for the other seemed to be vaguely alarmed.

"What's wrong with 'ee, Nora? You generally chirp as merry as a bird in the mornings."

Nora made an effort to regain her usual gay manner.

"Am I never to be allowed to indulge in the blues like other people? Why should I be always gay? Changes are lightsome, you know, granny. But, since you don't like it, I won't be grave. I'll be as silly as you please. Come, dear, you must want your breakfast badly. Uncle Dan said we were not to wait for him. What shall I give you? There's a nice piece of boiled ham, some potted beef, and some boiled eggs."

"Is the ham from the old place, Nora?"

The old place was the west-country village where Sarah Pattinson's early life had been passed. Everything from there seemed to taste better than what was bought in the village.

"Yes; it's the one Uncle Dan ordered last week! And it does look so good—quite a picture!"

"Does it, now? Why, then, I'll have a little. Eh, deary me, when I think of the fine pigs I used to rear there in the old days, it makes me quite sad. I don't hold with the way they feed them hereabouts, Nora. They give them too much swill, not enough meal and milk. It don't make good firm flesh, that don't. And there's a deal in the curing, too. Meal and milk sweetens the flavour, and curing does all the rest."

"Well, this seems all right," returned the girl, with a touch of impatience, for her nerves were strained to the uttermost; "but cook has given me such a wretched knife that I can't cut it decently. I wonder why she hasn't put out the same I used yesterday. It was delightfully sharp. I think I'll ring and ask for it."

CHAPTER IV.

A TERRIBLE DISCOVERY.

Nora had her hand on the bell when another was placed over it, and, looking up, she saw Mr. Pattinson standing beside her with a warning expression on his face.

"Don't trouble, Nora," he said, quietly; "I can do the carving very well without that knife," and, drawing the ham towards him, he proceeded to cut several thin slices very rapidly. "It's merely a matter of strength and skill, my child."

"But, you know, I can carve quite well. It's really too bad to put it on my awkwardness—if you'd only allowed me to have that other knife."

Digitized by Google

He shook his head at her. "How much ham do you intend to eat? I've surely cut sufficient for our small family?"

She saw that for some hidden reason he did not wish her to pursue the subject, so she made a feint of eating what was on her plate. But she had no appetite, and merely played with the food before her. The blind woman appeared conscious of something unusual in the atmosphere, and kept turning her sightless eyes from one to the other, as though mutely questioning each in turn. And every now and then she sighed deeply. It was at such moments as these that she rebelled against the affliction usually accepted so patiently.

But immediately her son noticed her uneasiness, he set to work to dispel it. He was as gay as one of the birds that twittered and swung in the garlands of Virginia creeper wreathing the windows.

Nora marvelled at his calmness. He chatted readily on indifferent topics, ate an excellent breakfast, dallying with it as though he wished to linger in the delightful home atmosphere.

But when at length he rose, he gave Nora a sign that he wished for her presence outside the room.

NORA STARTED AND GAZED WONDERINGLY AT HIM.

After a few moments she followed him to the foot of the garden, where a seat had been placed in a position that overlooked the sluggish stream.

"I was pleased to find that you had told her nothing," was his first remark. "I was afraid you might not be able to keep silence. You are generally so frank and impulsive!"

"No; I've told her nothing. She is weaker than she is ready to admit. I thought it advisable to wait until after she had broken her fast. Old people require consideration. And I am a coward. Indeed, I dare not——"

"Quite right," he returned, patting her on the shoulder; "you're a sensible girl, Nora. I did well to rely on your discretion. But she must be told, and soon. That excitable Susan is certain to burst in upon her like a thunderbolt as soon as the news reaches the kitchen. I must, therefore, be beforehand with her."

"Mr. Pattinson, you are simply wonderful!" exclaimed the girl, with enthusiasm. "How could you sit there so quietly, and talk about the music in church, and the curate's holiday fund, and all the other little trivial local topics, while in the background of your mind there must always have been that—that awful face staring up to the sky! But, there! I suppose it's being a silly girl! One's nerves are badly constructed."

He smiled and patted her shoulder again. "No need for you to disparage your self-control. You did your duty nobly. Besides, the philosophic calm of age would sit badly upon your golden youth. Heaven forbid you lose the charm of freshness and enthusiasm one hour before your time! Stay here and drink in this exquisite air, and allow your nerves to recover tone. Nature is the only true healer. Even here, in this little corner of the earth, there is sufficient beauty to soothe and comfort you, if you will only yield yourself to the genial influence."

Digitized by Google

He waved his hand around as he rose to fulfil his unpleasant task. But, instead of proceeding briskly, he paused after a few paces and looked back, as in doubt.

Instead of going straight to the house, he went in the direction of his largest greenhouse, where his prize auriculas were placed. He walked down between the rows of plants, looking carefully after their welfare. To a casual observer they looked uninteresting at that period of the year, their time of blossoming being as yet far off; but they demanded a great deal of their owner's attention, and he treated them as petted children that required to be coaxed and humoured into good behaviour.

But at the end of the row he stopped.

"Ought I to tell her?" he murmured. "It seems cruel to follow that first shock with another almost as great. And she will feel it so deeply, poor little girl! It will bring the hateful business so near to her, even if it does not jeopardise the safety of those she cares for. Dear me! I never thought girls would be more difficult to take care of than auriculas, and yet they are—infinitely more tender and fragile! What a brute she will think me when I speak out, after telling her to make the most of her golden youth, and to drink in health and happiness from this glorious morning.

"Ah! but I must tell her the truth," he continued, "for if I spare her, common gossip will not! The village will ring with the strange intelligence, and the servants are sure to hear it. I may, however, be able to spare mother the pain of such a knowledge. If I can but enlist Nora's sympathy, I think that might be managed. I don't imagine there'll be much trouble with the authorities. I wonder whom Pawson has in his mind? It was evident that he fancied himself on the verge of a discovery. Poor Pawson! He's not a brilliant member of the force, but, I suppose, he's a good average specimen. I think it quite possible that a moderately clever criminal might contrive to escape, even with the vigilant eye of Pawson to evade. I wonder whom he has his eye on, all the same."

When he returned to Nora, he found the girl sitting in a listless attitude, gazing across the water to where the chimneys of a dwelling showed amongst the trees. She glanced up in surprise.

"Nora," he said, gently, "there's still something you ought to know, but I'm half afraid to tell it you. If I had my own way, the path you have to pursue should be strewn with nothing harder than rose-leaves——"

"Rose-leaves fade and grow unpleasant after a time, Uncle Dan," returned the girl; "and you mustn't think because I—— You make me ashamed of my weakness. But I'm not really weak. Try me and see. Still, I hope it's nothing bad—not really bad. I hate to think the world so full of cruelty."

"Oh, it's a mere detail of the tragedy you've already come in contact with," he answered, slowly; "but it's very unpleasant, and may have disagreeable consequences. Don't make any further inquiries about that old carving-knife. Let the subject drop. For it would upset mother dreadfully were she to hear the truth."

Nora started, and gazed wonderingly at him.

"The knife? That old carving-knife? Why, what has it to do with—— Tell me quickly! Where is that knife?"

"Where it is by now, I can't exactly say. But only an hour ago it was tightly riveted between the ribs of a dead man. Nora, it is quite true! The murder we discovered in Dredman's Lane was committed by that self-same knife!"

CHAPTER V.

THE FIGURE AT THE BUNGALOW.

To say that this statement, uttered in a quiet, commonplace manner, and without apparent emotion, produced the most horrifying and bewildering effect upon Nora, was but to state the case mildly. She fell back gasping, and it was some time before she recovered herself sufficiently to make any remark. When she did, her tone was low and solemn.

"But how could it be? The knife was never out of the house."

"There you are wrong. I took it out of the house myself."

"You! You took it out of the house? But why?—and into whose hands did you deliver it?"

Digitized by Google

"Not voluntarily to anyone's. Nevertheless—and the thought is frightful—I must have been the unconscious means of supplying the murderer with the weapon required for the foul deed!"

"Good Heavens! Tell me quickly what you mean. My brain is whirling."

"The matter is quite simple. I took it from the breakfast-table to do something to the creeper that hung too low across the breakfast-room window. The wreathed garlands were so pretty in themselves that I had delayed pruning operations until quite suddenly I realised that the view was obstructed, and the sunlight blocked out. This, my ordinary pruning knife, which, as you know, I always carry in the pocket of my garden coat," and he produced a large, clumsy-looking knife, "has lost its sharpness and requires grinding. It tore and jagged, rather than cut the creeper, and I hate to bungle anything, so I looked about for a handier tool, and discovered it in the old carving-knife. Susan had placed it on a tray close to the window when removing the breakfast things, and had apparently forgotten it. I remember noticing how thin and sharp it was. It answered my purpose admirably, and after pruning the Virginia creeper with it, I remembered that there was a branch of the old willow yonder that encroached upon and destroyed the symmetry of my privet hedge. I brought the knife to this very spot"—here the girl started and shuddered—"and then, something else claiming my attention, laid it down upon the seat and straightway forgot all about it."

Nora leaped to her feet with a fearful glance, first at the wooden seat, then at the gap in the hedge, where the willow branches had been cut away. It was a horrible idea that through that identical gap close beside her, the murderer must have crawled when his wicked eyes discovered the means of carrying out his deadly crime. Mr. Pattinson followed the direction of her gaze.

"Yes. It's an awful reflection to me, that my carelessness has contributed to the facility with which the murderer did it, and that our peaceful little paradise should have been invaded by the spirit of crime. Now you know the worst, and will be able to guard the dear old mother from too great a shock. I feel that the knowledge is safe with you. You are no silly, hysterical girl! Now I must be off to her myself! Doubtless Jack Ditton has arrived ere this with that much delayed morning's milk, and posed as a hero in the kitchen—or, perhaps, what Pawson calls an 'ammytoor detective,' spite of my lecture and shilling. And Susan's love of the sensational will drive her to the parlour with the intelligence that Grove Cottage is closely connected with the murder."

The girl looked after him, wondering greatly at his self-control. He thought of everything.

Then her eyes reverted to that hateful gap in the hedge. Ultimately she walked up the garden path to the wicket gate, and passed out into Dredman's Lane. She then retraced her steps on the other side of the hedge, until she reached the bank of the stream. Here she paused and looked carefully around. Willows and alders grew luxuriantly upon the bank, forming quite a thicket. She seldom came this way, for it merely led to the gloomy habitation called Dredman's Bungalow, about which so many unpleasant stories were current. Perhaps this was why she did not remember previously noticing a rough sort of path amongst the bushes that passed the foot of the garden of Grove Cottage.

It was evidently little frequented, for brambles and low growing willow branches rendered it all but impassable. So far as she knew, it led to nowhere in particular. Yet, strangely enough, it was along this very path the murderer must have been travelling upon the previous day when he had stolen the fatal weapon.

It was all a mystery. From whence had he come, and with what evil intent? And for what mysterious purpose had the victim entered the bosky depths of Dredman's Lane? No one ever did so except visitors to the Cottage, or the rural postman, who occasionally took a short cut across the fields behind the Bungalow to a neighbouring hamlet of a morning. Not at any other time of day, for the evil reputation of the place prevented this from becoming a popular thoroughfare. There certainly seemed no particular reason why anyone should venture there at all—still less after nightfall.

Nora was not particularly superstitious, so she did not hesitate about crossing the footbridge and walking onward.

A few yards further the road took an abrupt turn and brought her within sight of the dwelling shunned by the country folk. It had the reputation of being haunted. The lane ended abruptly at the garden entrance, and behind the house were fields and open country only.

Digitized by Google

Nora stood still, thinking deeply. The day before she had given sixpence to a wretched tramp who had begged of her in the lane. She felt half afraid of the wolfish, hunted look in his eyes, though she took care not to show this, and had lectured him instead. But as she ended her lecture with the gift he seemed grateful, and slouched off, thanking her in a low, grumbling tone.

Now, as she recalled his eyes, the fear returned. Those eyes belonged to some sullen, cowardly beast of prey. Not a lion or tiger, but some cowardly beast that tracks, and lurks, and bides its time to strike its victim.

Had she tracked the murder mystery to its source?

To all appearance, the Bungalow was unoccupied. It looked damp, weed-grown, rotten, mildewed. No one would rent it or even occupy it as caretakers, rent free. Rumour credited it with the possession of sundry ghostly tenants, ever on guard and ready to resent any augmentation of their numbers. Only the merest sketch of its grim history had reached the ears of Nora, and in her bright, slightly matter-of-fact fearlessness, it made but a slight impression. It was rather a natural instinct for light and cheerful views which had prevented her going that way before.

What a place it was! A regular nightmare of a house. The eaves were drawn down over the small sunken windows like scowling brows over sunken eyes, and then, as though sufficient sunlight had not been excluded, a trellised verandah trailed round one side, ivy climbed the roof and strangled the chimneys, the window panes were broken, and boards had been nailed across the sashes in their place; the garden was a riotous mass of weeds and flowers reverting, from want of care, to their wild state. Altogther there was something sinister and uncanny about Dredman's Bungalow. Its appearance was in itself sufficient to justify its evil reputation.

One could easily imagine it a fit abode for some lurking wretch to hide in during the day, and hatch mad, bloodthirsty schemes against humanity, which he would steal forth at night to execute.

Suddenly she started and peered into the recess of the neglected garden.

What was that? Was it but the creation of her fervid imagination or the realisation of her evil dream? There, more like a black shadow than a human being, gliding close to the wall, and finally disappearing in the dark verandah, was just such a figure as her mind had been conjuring up—a human beast of prey returning to its evil lair.

CHAPTER VI.

PAWSON ON THE TRACK.

The self-esteem of Constable Pawson had experienced a considerable shock, when a gaping rustic of fourteen had been beforehand with him in the matter of an important discovery.

It took him some time to get over this. And there was another annoying thing about this affair. This was that a gentleman, upon whose respect he placed considerable value, must have been inwardly condemning his want of sharpness, even while outwardly sympathising with him. This idea rankled in his breast.

If it had been anyone but Jack Ditton! Jack Ditton, whose ears he had so often cuffed for sending forth shrill, ear-piercing whistles of a night, or for throwing stones at stray cats. Yet, behold, the youngster had the supreme impudence to prove himself more efficient in the discovery of important evidence than a hitherto eminently satisfactory member of the force. And Mr. Pattinson? There was certainly a tinge of irony in his remarks. "Who knows what Jack Ditton may develop into? Perhaps in time he may blossom forth into one of those same wonderful amateur detectives you dislike so much."

The thought of Mr. Pattinson's contempt was intolerable. Why, that gentleman was a power in the village, hand in glove with the vicar and the doctor in all charitable schemes, a subscriber to all local charities and amusements, Chairman of Parish Council and Burial Board, honorary secretary to the Literary Society and the Naturalist's Field Club, to say nothing of the Flower Show Committee, of which he formed three parts, and gave most of the prizes out of his own pocket.

The policeman did not for a moment dread that the gentleman would give him away. Mr. Pattinson was emphatically a man to inspire trust in those below him. He might laugh in his sleeve at the stupidity of the local guardian of the peace, but assuredly he was too kind to allow of his sense of humour damaging anyone's position.

Digitized by Google

It was Jack Ditton who would be most likely to prove garrulous. Jack would be less or more than boy if he refrained from bragging of his own cleverness. Well, Pawson knew how to deal with Jack. If that youth boasted it would be the worse for him. He must be taught to respect the dignity of the law, and of those who represented it.

All these trifling but annoying reflections had the immediate effect of considerably sharpening the village constable's wits. That smart young detective who was safe to arrive soon from Scotland Yard should find that he had no fool for a co-worker. Pawson clung to his own idea, and proceeded to work it out in his own slow, deliberate fashion.

So soon as the necessary business of the doctor's examination and the taking of the depositions of the discoverers of the body was completed, Pawson went to Dredman's Lane and over the ground himself in a careful and conscientious manner worthy of all praise. But he found little there to reward his search. The long, half-withered autumn grass was pressed close to the ground from the gate to the spot where the murdered man was discovered. The body had evidently been dragged thither from the lane, where the murder had been committed. Even in the lane there was very little trace of blood. The doctor declared the stab to have been the work of someone acquainted with anatomy. The knife had been driven down in a slanting direction from just below the left shoulder-blade, passing between the ribs, and penetrating the heart. Death must have been instantaneous. And the wound had bled inwardly, so it was quite possible for no trace of the dreadful deed to have been left upon the hands or clothes of the murderer.

Pawson turned away disappointed. Evidently there had been no struggle. The blow had been delivered from behind; probably to an unsuspecting man who had no time for any self-defence. The policeman gained no clue from the scene of the murder. His eye roved around in anxious wonderment. It followed the white line of road that disappeared amongst the trees, and suddenly its vacuity was enlivened by a spark of intelligence.

Why had he not thought of it before? It was as obvious as the nose upon his face. And that nobody could overlook.

The lane led to the stream. Across the stream was Dredman's Bungalow. Who lived there? Nobody. It had long since been abandoned to the ghosts and the spiders. The reputation it bore prevented the approach of an ignorant and superstitious population. Pawson said this to himself with a sort of contempt, entirely ignoring the fact that he did not care to venture there himself after nightfall.

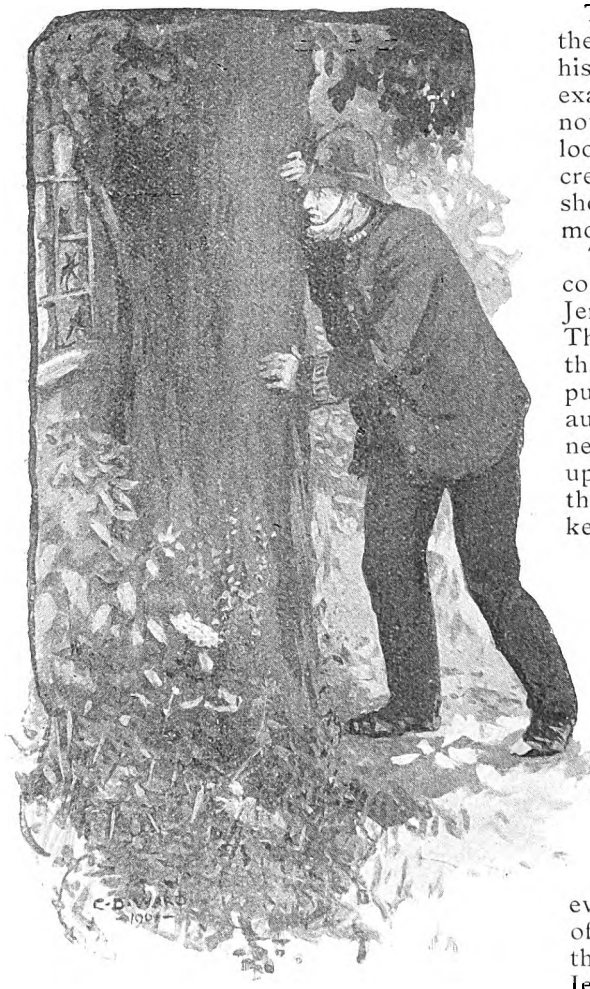
But now? Well, now the dignity of office must hedge him round, and the hope of being beforehand with that smart young man from Scotland Yard lend him courage. For where could a criminal find a more secure refuge than that afforded by the haunted Bungalow? And had he not just such a criminal in his mind's eye?

There was one poor, wretched, skulking, hunted creature who was Constable Pawson's bête noir, one from whom his vigilance was never withdrawn for long.

Really he believed this idea to be quite an inspiration! He would do it all himself, too. Thomsett, his fellow in office, happened to be absent on leave that day, and the onus of the affair rested on Pawson. Well, he would not shirk it. It was a chance to establish a reputation for sharpness and wisdom. He was haunted by an unpleasant remembrance of one particular case, when both Thomsett and he had been baffled by a mystery which the superior young man from Scotland Yard had instantly proceeded to elucidate, after declaring, in a singularly objectionable fashion, his contempt for the discoverers of mares' nests.

Never mind! There were still cases where a person acquainted with all that had occurred in the village during the past ten years might be more useful than a stranger. It was all very well for that young man, coming fresh to a locality, to ferret out mares' nests, and to snub intelligent men who never shirked disagreeable work where duty required, but there was something here in this Dredman's Lane business that no stranger would be likely to guess.

Digitized by Google



THE POLICEMAN'S EYES FELL UPON SOMETHING THAT MADE HIM INCLINED TO GIVE VENT TO A WHOOP.

He might not have discovered a clue, but he was firmly convinced that he had done more, he had got upon the track of the only person in the neighbourhood at all likely to commit a murder for the sake of gain.

But here a sudden check came to his thoughts. When the examination of the body took place an hour ago, watch and chain—gold, and apparently of considerable value—were found upon it. Was it likely, then, that one who had committed the crime for the sake of gain would have neglected these? Pawson drew a deep breath. The theory he had elaborated with so much cudgelling of brain threatened to prove false. He stood still for a few minutes lost in thought. Then he breathed again.

The gentleman's watch and chain were there, but where was his purse? Not in his pockets certainly, for Pawson had examined them himself, and had found nothing to reward his search save a few loose coppers. Now, it was quite incredible that a gentleman of position should be in the country without either money or purse.

The man whose guilt was a foregone conclusion in the mind of Pawson was Jerry Gobey, the village ne'er-do-well. The policeman had a shrewd suspicion that Jerry, who had just done time for purloining some of Mr. Pattinson's prize auriculas, was again at large, and in the neighbourhood. He had been convicted upon Pawson's evidence, and so by all the laws of common sense ought to have kept out of Pawson's way.

But Jerry Gobey, though cunning, appeared to have a peculiar aptitude for doing just what he ought not to have done for his own sake, namely, running up against the village constable, who was his sworn enemy. The lads in the neighbourhood were wont to declare that Jerry was only half-baked. He had been unlucky from a boy, but whether the bad luck was the result of bad conduct or of the hard dealings of fate appeared problematical. At any rate, though everything was against him in the home of his birth, and he had no friend left in the place since the death of his mother, Jerry Gobey invariably returned to his old haunts during the unfrequent intervals when he was released from the hand of the law.

So in the present instance Jerry had been seen stealing about the village after dark, and in Pawson's estimation Jerry Gobey was evidently the man who had committed the crime in Dredman's Lane. And what so probable as that Jerry Gobey had secreted himself for the purpose in the ill-omened bungalow across the stream?

The constable held his head a trifle higher than usual as he marched over the little wooden bridge and approached the old garden entrance of the Bungalow. Surveying the premises from the front, he decided that, in point of having such an artful wretch to deal with, it was advisable to put aside for the nonce the dignity of office and meet craft with craft. In place, therefore, of demanding an entrance in the name of the law, he decided to reconnoitre before entering.

Digitized by Google

In pursuance of this design he climbed the gate of a field behind the Bungalow, and approached it in the rear. The shrubbery, planted by the defunct Dredman—a recluse who objected to be overlooked even by the sun—was dense, and had grown in wild luxuriance close up to the doors. It was, therefore, quite easy for the policeman to approach within a few yards of the back windows without being observed. Pawson's bulk and lack of youthful agility was against him, but fortune favoured him in this instance, for there seemed no one on the watch at the moment of his approach.

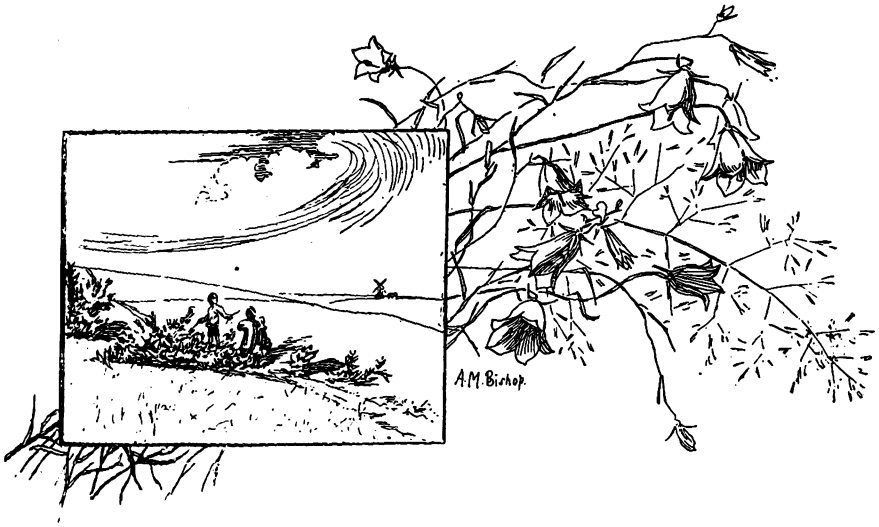
In front of the kitchen window grew a great yew tree, which afforded sufficient cover even for Pawson's huge frame. He cowered behind this, and peered within the room. For a few minutes he saw little or nothing, as the place was exceeding dark; but soon, his eyes growing accustomed to the dimness, he found confirmation of his surmise with regard to the Bungalow being inhabited, for upon a table close by the window was spread the remains of a meal—a loaf of bread, a piece of cheese, and a jug, probably containing beer. Pawson chuckled. He had run his fox to earth. Jerry Gobey was a slippery customer, but in all probability he was, at this moment, not far distant. He would naturally reckon on the slowness of pursuit usual to such affairs; but for once he would prove to be mistaken.

Here, quite suddenly, the policeman's eyes fell upon something that made him inclined to give vent to a whoop of triumph.

What was that dark object lying half-concealed beneath a plate?

A purse! A dark leather purse, with silver clasps. Without doubt the purse of the murdered man.

(To be continued.)



Digitized by Google

Conduct the Test of Religion.

By the REV. JOHN WATSON, D.D.
(Ian Maclaren).

IT is of vast importance to have a sound standard by which we can test religion, either in ourselves or in our fellow men, since we are called upon daily to judge ourselves, and are often compelled to estimate our neighbour. There are only two standards which are worth consideration, and only two which are in general use. It is open to contend that the only complete and final test is not a man's life but his heart, and that the decisive question, therefore, is not what he does but what he believes, and that any other is superficial and misleading. And this contention has no small show of reason. And it is open to contend that the one reasonable and satisfactory test is not a man's heart but his life, not what he believes but what he does, and that the opposite must be impossible and unjust. And again, there is much show of reason. Conduct, says one person: does it matter anything what a man believes? Faith, says the second, for works yield no moral complexion apart from faith. Conduct or creed is the question in brief, and one ought to settle which in one's mind, and give effect to the decision without reserve.

Nothing can be more exasperating than to depreciate faith in the interest of works, as if faith and works were opposite poles. Our slightest deed is a crystallised thought, and has been faith in the brain long before it became an action. Everything happens within the soul first, and afterwards takes shape in the life. Faith is, indeed, the sap of religion, and no influence has ever produced such rich and abundant fruit. Without doubt, faith has created the most dominant lives of human history, the lives which tell on every generation, from Abraham to St. Paul. Because the Hebrew prophets believed in God with the marrow of their bones they lifted up their voices for righteousness, and waited for God as those who watch for the morning. Because the Christian Apostles believed that Jesus had conquered sin on His Cross they crucified self and denied this present world. It is from their sense of the Divine mercy that the finest Christians draw to-day their consecration to the service of God and man. Undermine faith, and you cut the sinews of effort and forbid the possibility of holiness. One may indeed say that the surest method of producing conduct is to practise faith, for if any soul is grafted as a branch in Christ, it is safe to prophesy grapes.

There is, however, one serious disadvantage in taking faith as a standard of judgment. Apart from conduct, we have no means of testing faith, and all faith is not saving. There is the faith which Jesus demanded and magnified, of which He said: "He that believeth is not condemned, but he that believeth not is condemned already"; and this was never with Jesus a merely intellectual act; it was an act of the will, and had a moral colour. Why did not the Pharisees believe? Because they could not and they would not. Because they were proud, self-righteous, hypocritical. Why could the Apostles and holy women believe? Because they were honest, humble, teachable, kindly. Faith in this case was a consequence of conduct, and became in turn its root. It was the affinity of an earnest person for Christ, and this very affinity was a pledge of conduct. But every virtue is subject to degeneration, and the degeneration of faith has always been a snare and a curse. Degenerate faith abandons the heart, and confines itself to the intellect; it passes the living Christ, and unites itself with dogmas; it substitutes traditions and customs for obedience and sacrifice. This faith has no ethical value whatever, and is not in touch with reality; it proves nothing.

The first duty of a prophet is to bring his people face to face with reality, and therefore he begins not with faith, but with righteousness. As, for instance, Moses. He found his nation in Egypt, living in the midst of a highly-developed civilisation and an elaborate theology, which had both a doctrine of personal immortality and a doctrine of the Trinity. Why did Moses carry with him the civilisation of the Egyptians, and use it for the good of his nation, and at the same time utterly ignore the most spiritual and advanced elements in their theology? Was it not because the Egyptian faith was divorced from conduct; the sublime theory had to be taken along with Potiphar's wife? Before a man speculates about the future life he had better learn how to live here, and before he attempts to settle the nature of God he must keep God's law written in his heart. Moses wiped the slate clean, and took his people out to Sinai and taught them the Ten Words. God and righteousness, this was what their austere Prophet engraved on the children of Israel, and so it has come to pass that, taking them all in all, the Jews are the most moral nation on the face of the earth. Moses did elementary work; and if there be a day when heady evangelists, intoxicated by the liberty of the Gospel, do not enforce the Commandments, and politicians forget to build their policy by the measure of the Law, and writers from the sty of Epicurus try to get behind them, and a Bohemian culture flouts them openly, then it is time to forget everything else, and lay afresh the foundations of Righteousness.

Digitized by Google

Or take the indictment of Isaiah in the first chapter of his prophecy. It is an abstract of his habitual teaching; very likely it is a fragment of one of his public orations. He was living in a day of sickening unreality, when obedience had evaporated into forms and faith into ritual. With mordant, unrelenting sarcasm, Isaiah casts the wickedness and the worship into contrast: the people laden with iniquity who spread forth their hands before God, the seed of evil-doers who made many prayers—as if God cared for burnt offerings of rams and the fat of fed beasts. The people knew the will of God, but preferred to do their own, and then to compass God with vain observances. No, declares Isaiah, you cannot trifle with the Eternal Law and play hide and seek with conscience, whatever priests may say, or you yourselves may wish to believe. God is not mocked by your lip-service and clever make-believes. God is not unrighteous, blessing you if you happen to pray, while you also happen to be wilful sinners. The Law cannot be twisted or perverted this way or that; it stands rigid and inflexible. If the people be righteous, then verily they shall eat the good of the land; if the people be unrighteous, then, Jew or no Jew, religion or no religion, they shall be devoured by the sword. This shall be because it must be; as Isaiah has it, the Voice of the Lord has spoken it.

None before or since, neither Moses nor Isaiah, has preached moral reality so pungently and unreservedly as Our Lord. Jesus found Himself in an atmosphere reeking with hypocrisy, and in a society which was an organised sham. The Pharisees had brought artificial religion to perfection, and were past masters in moral theatricals. Our Master stood aghast at this imposture parading itself in the name of the Highest, and His soul was stirred with fierce indignation. He plucked the mask off the actors' faces, and branded them with indelible shame; who made long prayers at the corners of the streets, and devoured widows' houses; who blew a trumpet before they gave alms, and denied support to their own parents; who tithed anise, mint and cumin, and violated judgment, mercy, and faith; who reduced the Sabbath to an absurdity with their pedantic regulations, and nailed the Son of God to the Cross. Was there ever such a farce, was there ever such an exposure? No doubt the publicans would criticise the Pharisees savagely, and declare that they were no better than themselves — only greater hypocrites; but that was special pleading. It was Jesus Who tore this painted show of religion without morals to rags, and told men plainly that unless their righteousness exceeded the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees they could not enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

Jesus' words ought to be laid to heart by us who are living in the ebb tide of the evangelical revival. As long as faith was triumphant in the land, and the ancient passion for Christ held the soul, it hardly needed to preach morality. He who loves not dogmas, nor rites, but the living Lord, will not fail to take up His Cross. The full tide cuts a channel for itself, and fills it to the brim with rushing, buoyant, wholesome water. Where the tide recedes it is apt to leave stagnant pools, which in time breed corruption. The brave old words of godliness remain, but the virtue has gone out of them. We hear much talk about "the Cross," but is it the Cross on which self is crucified? Many voices cry "Lord, Lord," but is there the old friendship with the risen Lord? We have divided religion into faith and life, and it is the former only we count Christianity. We habitually call a man a Christian because he holds the Deity of Our Lord, and yet we would not believe what he said, and would make no bargain with him unless it was in black and white. We hesitate to call another a Christian because his doctrines are not ours, but we know that he is the soul of charity, integrity, purity, and truth. If it be wrong to fix a label to an article, declaring it to be what it is not, is it not far worse to fix false labels to character, so that one who keeps Christ's law is denied the name of Christian, and one who does not keep that law receives the name? Is not this wilful abuse of words and the very degradation of conscience? A Christian is a person who is like Christ, and a person who is unlike Christ is not a Christian. Palter with this plain rule, and the end will be to create a hotbed wherein a crop of hypocrites, both of word and deed, will be raised, which will prove a scandal to religion and a stumbling-block to the world. Black is black and white is white, while the world lasts and afterwards. This is what St. John intended when he wrote: "Let no man deceive you; he that doeth righteousness is righteous," what St. James declared through the length of an epistle, and Jesus Himself laid down once for all: "By their fruits ye shall know them."

Digitized by Google

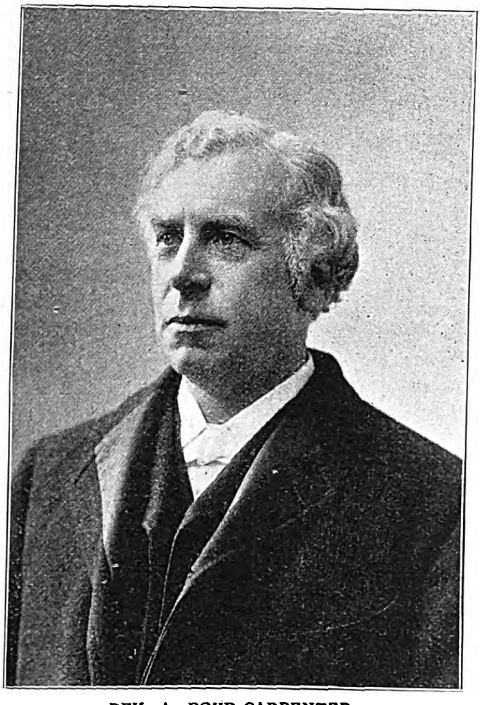
JOHN WATSON.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

THE REVEREND ARCHIBALD BOYD-CARPENTER, the younger brother of the Bishop of Ripon, was born in 1844. Having graduated at Cambridge (St. Catherine's College) he held successive curacies at Lee, in Kent, and at Deptford; after which he was for thirteen years vicar of St. James's, Kingston-on-Hull. For another period of thirteen years he has held the important position of rector of St. George's, Bloomsbury, and has recently resigned that benefice in order to become rector of St. Olave's, Hart-street. In 1886 he was a select preacher to the University of Oxford; in 1889, to the University of Cambridge; while he was Golden Lecturer in 1895. For the last four years he was a Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the late Queen, and is now an Honorary Chaplain to the King.



REV. A. BOYD-CARPENTER,
One of the Church's most Eloquent Preachers, and Brother of the Bishop of Ripon.
Photo by Turner & Dinkwater, Hull.

His views are "broad," but he is a good Churchman. His charity is comprehensive. Probably the fact that he is not wedded to any particular phase of religious orthodoxy may account for his non-preferment at a time when party fights are stubborn.

The natural eloquence of Mr. Carpenter is astounding. He never refers to a note. And yet his discourses are well-arranged with sequence and precision. His oratory is torrential; it carries you away. But he never descends to clap-trap. He is modest to a fault, and never speaks when he can possibly avoid speaking.

Tennyson is his favourite study. His lectures on the "Idylls of the King" are well-nigh perfect, whether from a literary or from a human standpoint. The pity of it is that they have not been reduced to print, but no mere paper could reproduce his wonderful histrionic ability, his versatility, his enthusiasm. In a word, he is a born actor—without the actor's insincerity.

Digitized by Google

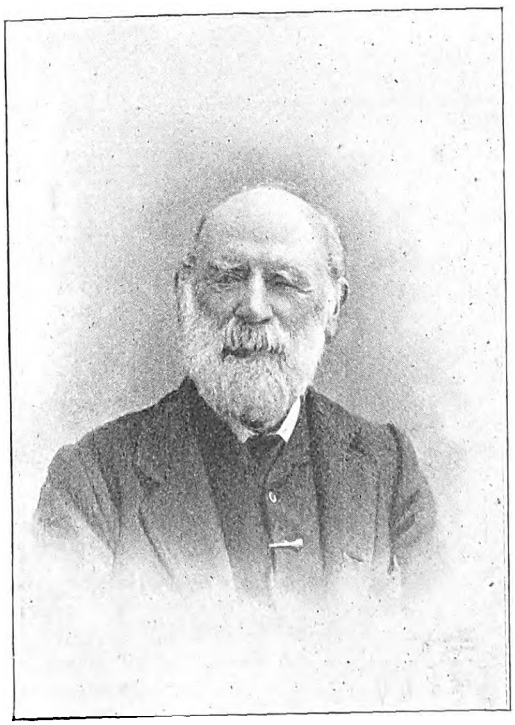
Humanity is his field of operations. His sympathy is Catholic, in the true sense of the word. To his friends (and they are many) he is a charming and merry companion. His sense of humour is worthy of his Hibernian origin. Children adore him. He is an admirable raconteur, and fond of athletics. As President of the Debating Society which bears his name, he is content merely to preside; but his genial presence always ensures success.

To hear him preach is to gain a deeper insight into the truths of the Eternal; to listen to his lectures is to recall the period of Demosthenes. What he preaches, that he practises. Facta atque verba is his working motto.

THERE has lately been a great deal of correspondence in some of the daily papers respecting Mr. Albert Midlane, the author of "There's a Friend for Little Children," and numerous other very familiar hymns for children. Mr. Midlane, who has an ironmongery business in the little Isle of Wight town of Newport, has fallen upon somewhat evil days. His strength is not what it was, and he has had a struggle to keep things going. Through the generosity of many of his friends, or those who feel themselves to be such through familiarity with his beautiful hymns, some subscriptions have been set on foot, and his pecuniary embarrassments will be relieved.



MR. ALBERT MIDLANE,
Author of "There's a Friend for Little Children."
Photo by Quinton, Newport, Isle of Wight.

Mr. Midlane's writings have not proved remunerative, or perhaps it would be more correct to say that they were written in such a spirit of religious devotion and with so little regard for self-enrichment that the commercial aspect was entirely lost sight of. Mr. Midlane is the youngest of a very large family, his father having died previous to his birth. His mother took the greatest pleasure in reading his earlier efforts in hymnology, published under the signature of "Little Albert"; these were written at the age of six, and before young Midlane was out of his teens his hymns were already known and sung; "God Bless our Sunday-school" was, I think, one of the first of these.

For seventy-six years Mr. Midlane has been connected with the Sunday-school, and it is his favourite boast that what he is, the Sunday-school and his dearly-loved mother made him. He says "it was a sweet experience when I first heard my own hymns sung at an anniversary service." It was his delight in those days to contribute to most of the religious periodicals; and the famous hymn, "There's a Friend for Little Children," was written in the February of 1859 with no thought of its being used as a song; it was really incorporated in a magazine article entitled, "Good News for the Little Ones," and almost immediately copied into "The Good News Hymn-Book," and into various other compilations, and acknowledged to be Mr. Midlane's. The author received many letters telling him of the usefulness of his simple but charming hymn. The crowning effort of his life, however, was the "Bright Blue Sky Hymn-Book," for Sunday-school and other meetings, containing over 300 hymns. The veteran hymnologist often talks to visitors to his home—Forest Villa, Newport—of his past life; he has interesting reminiscences of many great men and women, and he is never happier than when talking over his long life and his noble work in the cause of religion. Besides his hymns, Mr. Midlane is the author of several works poetical and otherwise on Carisbrooke Castle, and of many other leaflets and pamphlets concerning the Isle of Wight.

Digitized by Google

THERE is perhaps a tendency to exaggerate the performances of children, but there can be no doubt that little Miss Sybil Keymer, the nine year old violinist, is a bonâ fide prodigy. Her playing of the two last movements of Mendelssohn's beautiful concerto for violin and orchestra at a concert given by the pupils of the Hampstead Conservatoire a few weeks ago, elicited warm praise from the musical critics, led by the Daily Mail. Though she plays on a tiny instrument only half the size of an ordinary violin, she succeeded in producing a volume of sound and richness of tone which is attained by few adult players, and which delighted the audience. Her execution is finished, and she thoroughly enters into the spirit of the music, rendering it with fine expression.

MISS SYBIL KEYMER,
The Wonderful Child Violinist.

Miss Keymer is the pupil of Professor Wilhelmj, who is very proud of her remarkable performance. She is a little fair-haired, blue-eyed girl, quite a child in her simplicity and freedom from self-consciousness, but a thorough artist as soon as she becomes absorbed in her playing.

IT was in Palestine that Miss Finn received her first lessons in charitable work, her father being the British Consul in Jerusalem, and she helped, even at that early stage, in the work of relief of starving people in which her father and mother were actively engaged. After some years of quiet and unobtrusive work in London amongst the poor of various classes, an opportunity presented itself for her to undertake a work in which she was specially interested, namely, the relief of those who had seen better days—ladies and gentlemen who had lost their means and were in distress—a class for which little was done. In the great Jubilee year of 1897 it occurred to Colonel and Mrs. Knollys and Captain Rolleston to form an Association for the relief of distressed gentlefolks, and Miss Finn was invited to become a member of the committee, she eventually acting for three years as its hon. secretary.

This Association, formed under the patronage of H.R.H. Princess Christian, with a powerful and influential committee, is now in its fifth year of valuable work, and the patronage of H.M. the Queen, who takes a real and practical interest in its welfare, has been secured. The funds have steadily—if slowly—grown from £700 in its first year to £1,600 in the present balance-sheet, and there are sixty-four ladies an d gentlemen receiving weekly grants ranging from 2s. 6d. to 12s. 6d. a week. There is no distinction of creed or limit of age, gentle birth and distress being the only qualifications necessary for relief, and this is given as promptly as possible, with no resort to the voting system, which always causes such cruel delay. A Victoria Military Pension of £30 has just been awarded to a military officer, aged sixty-seven, who had served in the Indian Mutiny and Crimean War, an efficient and zealous officer, not eligible for any war fund, with a delicate wife, and both quite destitute. A naval pension is soon to be founded. Miss Finn is constantly employed seeing applicants, arranging for their relief, and carrying on the incessant correspondence and work of the Association. There are no office expenses, no liabilities and no debts, Miss Finn kindly allowing all committee meetings and office work to be done at her house, where also applicants are interviewed, thus lessening the painful necessity for public exposure of delicate private matters, which makes much of so-called charity so disagreeable to those of refined tastes.

Digitized by Google

MR. ANGUS KENNEDY,
Editor of the Times Weekly Edition, and an Active Christian Worker.
Photo by Russell & Sons, Baker Street, W.

THE name of Kennedy is one to conjure with in East London. For thirty-six years the late Dr. John Kennedy was the honoured Pastor of the historic Stepney Meeting, and now his talented son—Mr. Howard Angus Kennedy—is carrying on a social and Christian work which has completely won the hearts of the people.

Mr. H. A. Kennedy by profession is a journalist, and for ten years he has held the responsible position of editor of the weekly edition of the Times. He will not be forty years of age until December next, yet he has had a singularly varied experience. He has travelled in the West Indies, Canada, and California and as "special correspondent" he has been very successful.

He returned to England in 1891, and in the autumn of that year he began a series of Pleasant Sunday Afternoons at his father's church, which have gained a wide reputation. Locally they are regarded with special favour, the attendance of men is always large, and the audiences have occasionally reached the limit of accommodation, viz. 1,300.

Mr Kennedy has had the hearty co-operation of many distinguished men and women. The speakers have included the late Sir Walter Besant, who graphically described the life of working men in Old London; Countess Kearney, the Rev. J. Tolefree Parr and the Rev. J. S. Barrass, also Canon Barnett and the Rev. R. C. Fillingham. Here also one Sunday Lord Coleridge held a great audience for an hour under the spell of an eloquent eulogy on his departed friend Mr. Gladstone—though the ordinary length of the address is only twenty minutes.

Among others who have taken part in Mr. Kennedy's work are the Duke of Devonshire, Earl Carrington, Lord Monkswell, Mr. Haldane, Mr. Hazell, and Sir Stafford Northcote.

The members of Mr. Kennedy's Union are chiefly artisans, with an infusion of labourers, shopkeepers and clerks. They are largely men who were not in the habit of going to church before, but their religious instinct at the Stepney Meeting House is drawn out and developed. The meetings always open with devotional exercises. Many of the addresses too are practically sermons, although the speakers avoid sermonic phrases.

Digitized by Google

BY her clever writings, Miss C. O'Conor Eccles has made a name and place for herself in the world of letters, but this is not the only distinction she can claim. Coming of one of the five ancient families of Ireland, and proud of her descent, she has done much to forward the interests of her fellow-countrymen. She recently undertook the prodigious task of speaking in almost every town of the Emerald Isle, having been appointed lecturer by the Department of Agriculture for Ireland. Great audiences have gathered to hear this lady's very witty and yet technically-accurate lectures, which were made all the more interesting by lime-light pictures, from photographs which she had collected during her extensive travels abroad. With a rare personal charm, she invests her subject with a vivacity and realism which precludes the possibility of there being a dull moment, either in her lectures or her writings.

Those who have read "The Rejuvenation of Miss Semaphore" will be eager to get the new novel which Miss O'Conor Eccles is now bringing out, for it is even more laughable than its predecessor. But this clever Irishwoman, like most of her race, is nothing if not versatile, this being proved by the deep thought displayed in the articles which appear in the leading papers under her name, and the volume of Irish stories which is shortly to be published will throw many shafts of light on a side of Irish life hitherto untouched. These stories have been written with a more serious object than the mere entertainment of a large circle of readers; Miss O'Conor Eccles hopes they will do a lasting good in bringing before us the conditions and life of the Irish peasantry.

MISS O'CONOR ECCLES,
Lecturer to the Irish Department of Agriculture.

SISTER MAUD WILKINSON,
Who served at Bloemfontein when the Enteric Scourge was at its height.

THE scene at Marlborough House when His Majesty the King, accompanied by the beloved Queen Alexandra, distributed the war medals to nearly one hundred of those devoted women who have been nursing the sick and wounded in South Africa, will not readily be forgotten by those privileged to witness it, and, least of all, by the nurses themselves.

Amongst those who have done splendid service was Sister Maud Wilkinson, who is a native of Brighton, and a member of an old Sussex family. She was trained at the Sussex County Hospital, and the two badges worn in her photograph are: the badge of the Army Nursing Service Reserve, a round silver one, and that of the Royal British Nurses' Association, a small bronze medal.

Digitized by Google

Sister Wilkinson left England in the early part of 1900 in the s.s. Avoca, and on arrival at the Cape had orders to go on to East London, where, with nineteen other Sisters, she disembarked, and went up country to Bloemfontein.

She was three nights and days in the train, being delayed many hours at Bethulie owing to the bridge there having been destroyed, and there was only a temporary one, which was not strong enough to bear any weight, so that everything in the way of stores, etc., had to be unloaded and reloaded on the other side of the bridge.

On Sister Wilkinson's arrival at Bloemfontein (where she remained five months), she was engaged most of the time in nursing enteric cases. The work was very heavy, and typhoid raged then in all its horrors, and the stretcher-bearers could scarcely bring the cases in fast enough, though they worked day and night. In many of the buildings patients were lying on stretchers on the floors, and in many cases beds were put up on verandahs to accommodate the numbers. Sister Wilkinson speaks very highly of the work done by the orderlies. She says they were splendid men, ready and willing, though of course many of them were totally untrained for work of the sort, but it was wonderful to see how they could handle a patient after a little training from one of the Sisters.

One thing with which she was particularly impressed was the way in which the provisions for the patients were supplied. She was never once short of necessaries. Of course, luxuries were out of the question at such times, but even these found their way occasionally into camp for her patients. The Red Cross Society for providing stores was much appreciated. After five months in Bloemfontein she applied for trooping duties, and was sent to the Base to await a troopship. She returned to England on board H.M.S. Kildonan Castle, having some 1,400 men on board.

MR. R. COPE MORGAN,
Founder and Editor of The Christian.
Photo by Debenham & Gould, Bournemouth.

ONE of the most influential of religious and philanthropic workers is Mr. R. C. Morgan, the well-known editor of The Christian, a paper which has done much to lead Nonconformist opinion.

Mr. Morgan was the son of a printer and stationer in Abergavenny and served his apprenticeship in his father's business.

He was, however, far too ambitious to be content with setting up in type the ideas of others, and soon began to try his hand at journalism by contributing articles to various country papers.

He came to London in 1849, but next year received the offer of a responsible position as printer's overseer at Bath.

Five years later he was again in London, and became publisher's assistant to a firm in Paternoster Row. In 1859, he brought out a paper on his own account, under the name of The Revival. The first few numbers did not have a large circulation, but the paper had struck a true note, and as time went on received hearty support.

It was not bound to any particular body, but used its influence on behalf of Christian work common to all denominations; the Moody and Sankey revivals and institutions like the London City Mission, the Ragged School Union, the Y.M.C.A., and Dr. Barnardo's Homes, which owe their support to Christians generally.

Digitized by Google

In 1870, after the revival movement had accomplished its great work of renewing the religious life of the country, the name of the paper was changed to The Christian.

Charitable works of all kinds owe much to its wide influence and stirring appeals. Its readers remit every year something like £15,000, which the paper distributes to the institutions named by the donors, and during the thirty years of its existence it has received and distributed over £300,000.

Mr. Morgan, though he now leaves much of the routine work to others, still directs the policy of his successful journal, which has been for many years a bulwark of Evangelical Christianity.

THE REV. AUGUSTUS ROBERT BUCKLAND, M.A., stands in the front rank of the "preachers of to-day." He has held his present appointment as morning preacher at the Foundling Hospital since 1890, when he was elected to succeed the versatile, if somewhat erratic, Dr. Momerie. No one can attend service in the beautiful chapel of the Hospital, in Guildford-street, without being impressed by the unusually large proportion of men in the congregation.

The higher professions are always well represented. Men distinguished in literature, or in science, or in art, are amongst the most frequent comers. Mr. Edward Terry, Mr. Ben Greet, and other celebrities of the stage may often be seen there, and, when he is in London, the Earl of Rosebery occasionally looks in.

But, varied in its tastes and feelings as the vast congregation may be—and the chapel is always full, and often very crowded—Mr. Buckland has a message for all. In style and matter he is alike original. He always has something fresh to say, and he says it freshly and piquantly. A man of brilliant attainments, the speciality of his preaching is that it appeals to the intellect as well as to the heart. A deep thinker, he discusses problems of the day with a breadth of view and a sweet reasonableness that carry conviction to men of culture and refinement.

REV. A. R. BUCKLAND,
Morning Preacher at the Foundling Hospital.

It is his custom to preach from some part of the service of the day—the Psalms or the Lessons, or the Epistle, or the Gospel—and he often startles his hearers by taking some quaint text which, to the ordinary mind, seems to be barren of meaning. But in a very little while he not only gives fresh life to the text, but he clothes it in apparel so rich that a wealth of teaching springs into view and the hearer is made to feel how profitable for present-day conduct even the most seemingly unimportant text of Scripture may be.

Yet Mr. Buckland is no friend to a fanciful exegesis. He has too robust a mind for that; his teaching is essentially practical, and is applied to the "common round" of daily duties.

He preaches without the aid of manuscript, but his sermons bear trace of the most careful preparation. He never wearies his hearers; twenty minutes is the average length of his sermons, and they contain more solid material than is sometimes to be found in half-a-dozen discourses of much longer duration. He is a fluent and rapid speaker; he has a pleasant voice, and is a past-master in the use of the King's English. His tastes are distinctly literary, and his sermons are often rich in quotations from the best English authors. He is well-known in the world of letters, and in his leisure hours—which are not many—he can give a very good account of himself on a golf course. He was ordained in 1880, and for the first few years of his ministerial life he worked hard in the slums of East London under the late Bishop Billing.

Digitized by Google

MADAME EDITH HANDS,
A Noted Singer, who is ever willing to lend her talent for promoting Christian work.

BEYOND being known as the possessor of a fine voice, Madame Edith Hands has made the best kind of name for herself, by being always ready to lend her gift of song to the forwarding of good works. When only four years old she gave signs of musical talent, which was at once cultivated. About this time her parents removed from Windsor to Brighton, and it was at the School of Music there that she studied for many years, winning a scholarship of £60 for general knowledge, when but twelve years of age.

Later on, at the Royal Academy of Music, Miss Hands gained both the Parepa Rosa scholarship and the Sainton Dolby prize, out of a large number of competitors. Her voice is a pure, rich contralto, which, by reason of its exquisite sympathy, is never heard to better advantage than in sacred or pathetic music. Sims Reeves once said that he had never heard Tosti's wonderful "Good-bye" rendered with so much artistic taste as by Miss Hands.

At her own church in Highbury this lady is constantly rendering valuable help, being loved as much for her bright personality as for the music she gives so cordially, and this, in spite of having her time much occupied by provincial and town engagements, to say nothing of the home duties of which she is very fond. At the last great Festival of the Congregational Choir Union, held in the Crystal Palace, Madame Hands sang Liddle's "Abide with me," with a sweetness that brought the tears to the eyes of many in the audience.

THE ONLOOKER.

Digitized by Google

Wealth and its Responsibilities.

By the REV. SILAS K. HOCKING.

IT has been said that no man can grow wealthy by his own unaided labour, it being quite impossible for anyone to put forth in his lifetime an amount of energy sufficient of itself to bring him riches.

I think we have only to look at the matter carefully to be convinced that this conclusion is a right one. Men do grow rich, but in no case, perhaps, has a man ever grown rich simply through the result of his own personal industry. There are generally three ways by which wealth is acquired. The first is by appropriating a portion of the wealth created by other people—that is, by exploiting labour. The majority of the rich people of the world have grown rich by this process. If a man by his own labour can earn a pound a week, and no more, he will not grow rich; but if he can employ 1,000 men or 2,000 men and take a small profit out of each, then riches will roll in upon him very rapidly and with very little effort on his own part.

Then a man may grow rich by appropriating the wealth created by nature—that is, he may exploit the natural resources of the world. Or he may, in the third place, exploit society—that is, he may by speculation appropriate the wealth created by the growth and movement of population. This is constantly done, on the Stock Exchange and elsewhere. It may be said that it requires a great deal of genius to do any of these things, which is no doubt quite true, but in none of these cases can it be said in the truest sense of the word that the man grows rich by his own personal industry. Whether he exploits labour, or the resources of nature, or society at large, whatever the amount of genius he may display in doing these things, in the strict sense of the word his wealth is not the result of his own unaided effort.

I am not saying for a moment that a man may not be justified in doing any, or all, of these things. Indeed, it is only by such combination that the greatest achievements are carried out. If every man were his own master, doing just the work that he wanted to do, and doing it just in his own way, very little of importance would be accomplished in the world; no single individual would start to build a railway, or develop a mine, or build a ship. It is only when some master mind, that has a faculty for organisation, can bring the forces of labour into union and harmony that great results are achieved. Each individual soldier may do his part, but it is not by isolated action that victory is won, but by united effort; by the strength and movement of the whole army being directed towards the accomplishment of some particular end.

Now, the attainment of wealth merely as an end in itself can never be a very laudable ambition. If a man simply exploits labour for his own personal gain, without any thought of conferring a benefit on the community, or serving in any way his own generation; without any reference to the well-being of the race as a whole, or the future development of commerce, or trade, which may result in the prosperity of the whole nation; then, however rich he may grow, there is nothing praiseworthy in his action. That men frequently pursue wealth as an end in itself, or as a means to the gratification of some personal ambition or desire, there can be no doubt. We are by nature selfish; it is human nature to think first of ourselves; but frequently we stop there, and give no thought to other people. It may be said that a man must think of himself before he can think of other people, that unless he first secures his own position he cannot befriend those around him. But there is a good deal of fallacy in such reasoning.

It is possible to think of the greatest good of the greatest number as the first end of life, and yet be our own best friend, for if we benefit the whole we shall of necessity benefit ourselves. It may be true that if a man labours simply for himself, yet in the prosecution of his own ambition finds work for other people, he to that extent does good and unwittingly becomes a benefactor. But the moral value of an act lies in the motive which is behind it. No man can reach to any point of moral grandeur, no man can attain to the highest level of citizenship, much less of manhood, who exploits the forces of nature, or the movements of society, or the labour of others, merely for his own personal gratification or ambition. It may be that, in the operations and forces of nature and commerce, other people will be indirectly benefited by his exploitation of these things; but he himself can receive no moral benefit. He may add to his material resources, but he cannot add an inch to his moral stature.

Digitized by Google

It is not by taking thought for self that we grow morally and spiritually; it is by losing our life that we find it; it is by forgetting ourselves that we realise the highest good and the truest pleasure. He who merely thinks about his own happiness is never happy, for we are really most happy when we are not thinking of ourselves at all, but when we are thinking how we may best labour for the happiness of other people. It is a very pleasing sign of the times that some of our greatest employers of labour are thinking as much of the well-being of those whom they employ as they do of their own personal aggrandisement; indeed, many men who have acquired sufficient wealth still run their huge factories, and bear all the burden of a vast industry, for the sake of keeping in employment those who have helped to make their wealth.

SILAS K. HOCKING.

OLD LACE.

Fold upon fold,
Yellow as gold,
Woven by delicate fingers of old,
Here in its place
Grandmother's lace
Lies like a dream of her maidenhood's grace.

Fragrance of rose
Out of it flows,
Leaves of the past that its meshes enclose;
Sweets of old days,
Lavender sprays,
All that a maid in her treasure-chest lays.

Fair as her head,
Thread over thread,
Sleeps the old lace that she wore when she wed.
Beautiful day!—
But fold it away,
Grandmother's lace, and the rose, and the spray.

James Buckham.

Digitized by Google

Violet Eyes.

A FAIRY TALE.

By MARION REID.

AS Annette and Roland were playing one day by the well which bubbled from a great rock close to the Castle, they saw a little lame girl come down to draw water. Her pitcher was large and very heavy, and the poor child seemed to have great difficulty in lifting it.

"Let us help you," cried Annette, springing to her feet; "we'll carry the pitcher up the steep bank for you, and then you will be on the level ground."

The little girl thanked the children prettily, looking at them out of a pair of lovely dark eyes.

"I shall call her Violet Eyes," cried Annette, as, having assisted her, they watched the little girl over the brow of the hill carrying her water-pot bravely.

Thus it came about that Violet Eyes and the children became great friends. Annette and Roland helped her every day with her water drawing, and they began to look forward to these daily meetings with the greatest pleasure. As for Violet Eyes, she was perfectly devoted to the children, and in return for their kindness told them the most delightful stories.

This went on for some time, when there came a day of great excitement for the children. Their soldier father returned suddenly from the war when no one was expecting him, and all was bustle and rejoicing.

The war was at an end, and everyone hoped that days of peace and happiness were about to begin. Alas! no sooner was the foreign foe subdued, than from all parts of the country came tales of the dreadful doings of bands of robbers, who, hiding by day in caves and forests, came out at night to rob and kill. The King sent a message to the children's father to take a band of trusty followers and clear the country of these brigands. Everyone said for so great a soldier this would be an easy task. But it was none so easy after all, and it was many a weary month before the work was done.

One day a messenger from the General arrived in haste, bearing a letter which said, "I have captured the better part of the Black Band together with the brother of the Captain, but the Chief, Ralph, has escaped. Be sure you do not let the children out of your sight, as he has sworn to be revenged on me in the most horrible manner."

When the children's mother read these words she was thrown into a state of great agitation.

"The children are in the woods," she cried, "run, run at once and bring them in." And everyone set off in hot haste to do the lady's bidding. But though they searched the wood from end to end the children were nowhere to be found.

I must tell you what had happened. They had been sitting some time by the spring hoping to meet their friend Violet Eyes, when they were startled by seeing a very strange-looking old woman coming towards them. As soon as they caught sight of her she turned and hastened up the hill again. She carried on her arm a large basket full of all sorts of glittering toys, and what was most extraordinary was that every now and then she would take up a toy, look at it carefully, and then throw it away.

"Well, I declare," cried Roland, "did you ever see anything so strange? Let us go after her and see what these things are like."

Annette was a little afraid at first, but the old lady took no notice of them, and curiosity got the better of discretion. They went on and on, picking up the toys the old woman threw away, and became so excited wondering what would come next, that they did not notice how far from home they were wandering. Suddenly there was a wild whoop, a clattering of horses' feet, an agonised cry from Roland, and Annette, in terror and amazement, saw her little brother being carried away in the midst of a band of fierce-looking horsemen. Roland shrieked wildly for help, and poor Annette ran and ran, calling distractedly on him till she realised she was all alone, and the horsemen had disappeared from sight. She dropped upon the ground unable to run another step and shaken with sobs, the most desolate little maid in the world.

Digitized by Google

As she lay thus, giving way to despair, she was startled to feel a hand on her shoulder and to hear a voice saying, "Dear, dear Annette, why do you weep, why are you out on this wild moor by yourself?"

Annette looked up timidly, brushing the tears from her eyes, and there was the little lame girl! At once she began to pour out the history of her dreadful troubles. Violet Eyes listened attentively, and when Annette had ended her story, said, "I know these men, and I know where they are carrying your brother."

"Tell me where it is," cried Annette excitedly, "and my mother will send a hundred soldiers to rescue him."

"That would not do, I am afraid," said Violet Eyes; "they are such cruel men, they would kill poor Roland before the soldiers could reach him."

Annette was in an agony, "Kill poor Roland!" Her lips could hardly form the cruel words.

Violet Eyes began to search in a wallet she carried on her back. "I have something here," she said, "that might help you." And she drew out a small packet wrapped in some dried leaves. Annette looked at her in impatient wonder. One after the other she removed the wrappings, and at last displayed in the palm of her hand two pale green seeds—nothing more.

"You are very cruel to make fun of me like that," sobbed Annette. "I thought you were a kind girl."

"Listen to me." Violet Eyes was quite serious. "These seeds that you think so useless are really the greatest treasures I possess; if you eat one of them you at once become invisible, and remain so for five hours."

"But how will that help Roland?" gasped Annette.

"Let us walk on," said Violet Eyes, "and I will explain." They hastened on, and the little lame girl told Annette what she must do.

After they had walked for about an hour they reached a very rugged piece of country, with roughly piled rocks in front, and a range of lofty mountains beyond. "Alas, alas!" sighed Annette, straining her eyes towards the horizon, "there is nothing to be seen, and it is getting dreadfully dark."

"Though you can see nothing," replied Violet Eyes, "the cave I have been telling you about is just over there; I am going to show you how to get into it; you must be very brave for Roland's sake."

"I will," said Annette, clenching her teeth. The little girls began to walk very carefully, Violet Eyes showing her friend how to dodge behind rocks and bushes. At last they came to the entrance of the cave, which was so cleverly concealed that unless Violet Eyes had shown her the opening, Annette would have thought she was looking at a solid rock. The time was now come when the magic seed must be eaten. Annette swallowed it bravely. You may think how strange it felt when she could no longer see her own hand held before her face. The seed had done its work thoroughly. Violet Eyes repeated all her instructions, and Annette plunged valiantly into the darkness of the cave. She went on and on, feeling her way carefully, for she must make no noise. A glimmering light began to appear before her, outlining an archway in the rocks, over which hung a great mat of dried grass. She pushed it aside gently, and behold she was in the centre of the brigands' stronghold. She felt as if they must all turn round and stare at her, but no, she was unseen, and there opposite was the wooden ladder that led to the upper cave where Roland must be. How it creaked as she climbed it, but the brigands were evidently used to creaks. The passage she was now entering was very low and dark. She crept on till another low opening was before her, and now she heard the sound of stifled sobs. It was Roland, poor darling, weeping all by himself. How glad she was of the darkness, for she could throw her arms round his neck, and whisper, "It is Annette, Roland," before he had time to cry out or be frightened at her invisibleness.

Digitized by Google

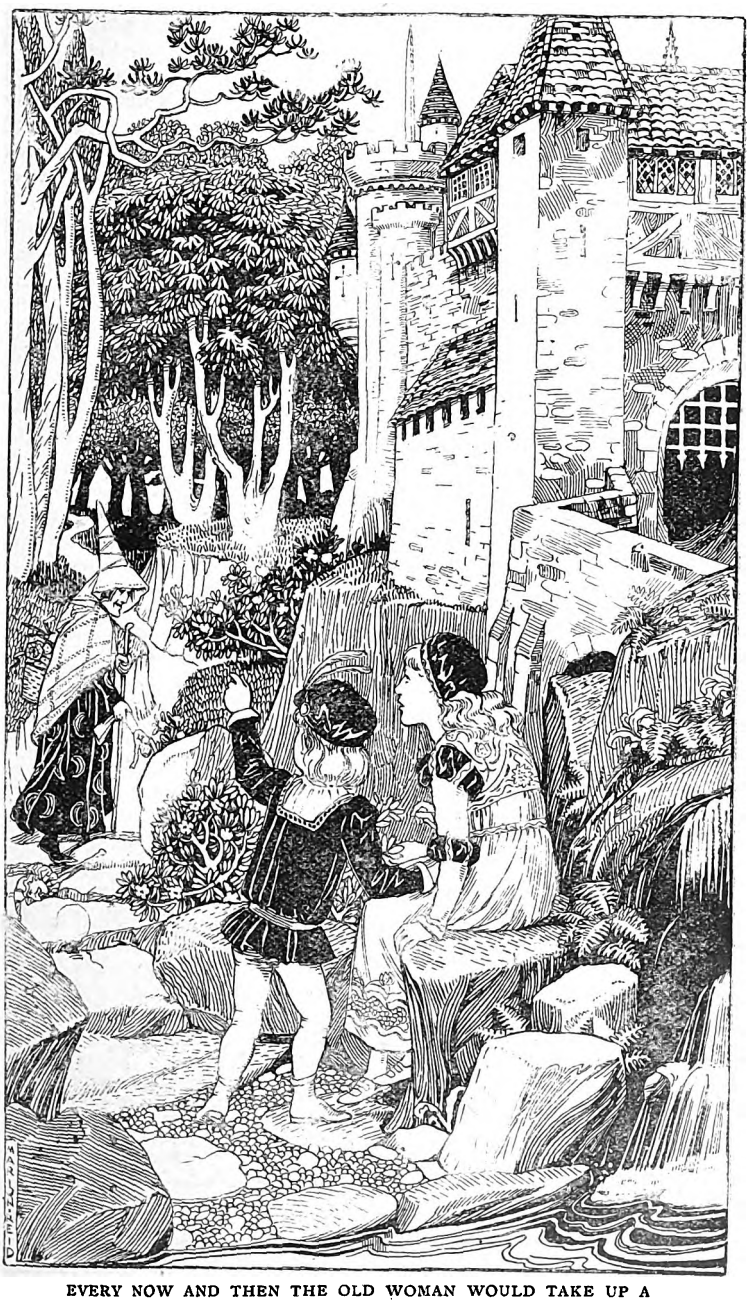
Then she told him the story of how Violet Eyes had found her, and lastly about the wonderful seeds. Roland was amazed, and strained his eyes in the darkness to find out if he really could not see Annette. She, however, begged him to lose no time wondering, but to begin at once and eat the other seed. Alas! as Annette was endeavouring to extract the precious germ from its wrapper, it slipped from her fingers and rolled away into the darkness. At first they searched hopefully, feeling every inch of the cold rocky floor; but, seek as they would, they found nothing. It was an agonising time.

"If we had but a light," moaned Roland.

"I will go down and get a twig from the fire," said Annette. But she forgot that though she was invisible a burning twig was not. A young brigand caught sight of this moving mysterious light, and such a commotion arose that she had to drop the brand and slip back to Roland.

"We must wait till they are all asleep, and try again," she said anxiously, and Roland agreed that they must wait.

How they listened, and how long the time seemed! You must remember, too, that the effect of the seed was only to last five hours, and they had no means of knowing how the time went. At last



EVERY NOW AND THEN THE OLD WOMAN WOULD TAKE UP A TOY . . . AND THEN THROW IT AWAY.

Digitized by Google

Annette heard a sound that cheered her; it was snoring. Oh joy, the brigands were asleep! Down she went again, the wood fire was fortunately still burning, she crept to it, picked up a burning stick, and with this lighted the end of an old tallow candle she found lying on the ground. This time she regained Roland's prison without mishap. No sooner did the candle light up the floor of the cave, than there lay the seed before them, securely wedged in a crack.

Now all was well, Roland ate the seed, and in a few minutes was invisible like his sister. He went first down the ladder, Annette, carrying the candle in her hand, followed. In her haste she had forgotten about it. Just as they reached the grass screen over the cave mouth, the same brigand who had noticed the light before opened his eyes. He was thrown into a wild state of alarm. "There are magic lights about to-night," he cried hoarsely. In a minute all his comrades were awake, demanding what was the matter. As he pointed towards the doorway they all made a rush thither, and had not Annette hurriedly thrown down the candle and drawn Roland and herself against the wall, they would have inevitably have been caught. As it was, the brigands could see nothing, and, angrily accusing their disturber of dreaming, they returned to the cave.

Outside Annette and Roland could see no sign of Violet Eyes, but they knew the way home, and set off thither as fast as they could, feeling wonderfully safe in their invisible state. The funny thing was that before they reached home Annette had come into sight again, but little Roland was nowhere to be seen. His sister had much difficulty in persuading her parents that what they heard and felt was really their little son.

When the General, who had in the meantime arrived home, understood the story, he called a strong band of soldiers and set out to catch the robbers. Annette, to her everlasting pride, went with him to show the way.

The brigands were all caught and brought to justice, so the land was once more free and safe. Often did the children wish they could meet the little lame girl, Violet Eyes, to thank her for all she had done for them, but, strange to say, she never again came to fill her pitcher at the Castle fountain.

Digitized by Google

A PUBLIC PROPOSAL.

By W. PETT RIDGE.

"BEGIN to wish now," said Miss Rickers, wistfully, "that we'd decided on Southend."

The three girls stood at the bow window of the Sea View Boarding House and looked out with depression on their countenances. The house, unlike some sea-side establishments, justified its title; the present grievance of the three short girls from London being that whilst you could view the sea, you could view little else. Just now that a shower pelted down making the window-panes cry, there was not a person to be seen on what the quiet little Sussex town called the Imperial Parade. The three girls had only arrived the previous night and already they knew every shop by heart; already they had overhauled the library of Sea View, which consisted of "Ben Hur," and "After Ophir," and a few other volumes. They were fellow-clerks in a large office in Queen Victoria Street; Miss Minns, who was the eldest of the three (being, indeed, nearly nineteen) having read in a society paper that those who have gone through the storm and stress of a London season should spend a holiday in some quiet retreat, had taken the management of affairs into her own hands, with the result that she had now to meet veiled reproaches from the other two. A distracted contents bill was blown up the Parade bearing the announcement, among others, "Return of an African Explorer." The contents bill clung to the iron gate of Sea View, seeming desirous of making a stay there, but the wind would not hear of this, and, forcing it to release its hold, blew it on again towards the market.

"I enjoyed myself one year," said Miss Baines, the third girl, "at Margate."

"Southend's a place where there's always something going on," remarked Miss Rickers, breathing on the window-pane and drawing there the face of a young man with a moustache.

"Margate jetty," said Miss Baines, "is as lively as lively."

"Parts of Southend are quiet," said Miss Rickers, taking up her part in the duet, "but you've only got to get down where the niggers are playing——"

"Look here, you two," interrupted Miss Minns, with authority, "we're here now and we shall have to put up with it. After all, a quiet holiday will do us all good, and if it only leaves off raining——"

"I don't believe," said Miss Rickers, tragically, "that there's a fellow in the place."

The proprietress opened the door of the drawing-room. In her arms she brought a small baby in a white frock and a large white flopping sun hat, his small face sun-browned where the large hat had failed to protect. The baby opened his eyes very widely on seeing as many as three young women and then looked up at the proprietress for an explanation of this extraordinarily agreeable encounter.

"I've brought our baby," said the matronly proprietress, in a breathless way, "for you ladies to look at; at least, he's not our baby, of course, he belongs to Miss Welby, only that it's not her baby but her poor sister's."

"She's a dear ickle, ickle baby dirl," said the three young women in unison, wagging their pretty heads at the infant with great delight. The infant frowned.

"No, she isn't," said the proprietress, "he's a boy."

This fact only added to the interest of the three young ladies from London. Each wanted to nurse him, and there seemed a likelihood of the return of acerbity because of this, until the proprietress suggested that each should take two minutes, which was accordingly done, and Miss Minns took the tiny boy in her arms whilst the other two timed her by their watches.

Digitized by Google

"You haven't met Miss Welby yet," chattered the proprietress, genially, "but you shall. She's a tall, 'andsome lady who keeps herself very retired, and she's simply devoted 'eart, body and soul to this sister's child. I see him, the artful young rascal, a-winking at me."

"Is the mother dead?" asked the girl who was dancing the delighted baby.

"Dead," replied the proprietress, "and buried."

A telegraph boy came along the Parade and the baby was held up to watch his approach. The three girls, taking advantage of the baby's ignorance of official matters, assured him that the uniformed lad was the Postmaster-General; but the baby sneered slightly as intimation that he was not to be imposed upon by the extravagant statements of mere women. The telegraph boy came up the steps of Sea View; half a minute later the servant brought in a telegram.

"Another visitor!" cried the proprietress, triumphantly, as she read it. "And a gentleman, too, this time."

"What's his name?" asked Miss Rickers, looking up from the small infant. The infant kicked her arm with a woollen-socked foot as warning to Miss Rickers that she was not to take an interest in two men at the same time.

"John something," replied the proprietress, "L-a-n-g—." The door opened and a tall young woman in mourning entered the room. "Miss Welby," called the proprietress, "your eyes are younger than mine. What do you make of this name?"

The tall young woman, coming forward quietly, took the thin sheet of paper.

"John Langholme," she read, steadily. But her hand trembled, and the flimsy slip fluttered to the ground.

"I knew it was something," said the proprietress, recovering it. "He's a perfect stranger to me, but he's coming here to-day, and it'll make the other 'ouses pretty jealous when they see I've got five and a dear baby whilst they're empty. But I'm forgetting to introduce you ladies."

The three short girls bowed, and Miss Rickers gave up the plunging, suddenly excited baby to its aunt. She took the boy with a very pretty air of guardianship, the boy cooing to her in an argumentative way as she talked to him and told him that he was a dreadful young scamp to give so much trouble to the three ladies.

"Are you all new to this place, I wonder?" she asked. "You will find it very quiet."

"They were just complaining of that," said Miss Minns as the proprietress went out of the room, "when your little nephew appeared, and he's brightened us all up."

The infant looked acutely at his aunt.

"I always thought," said Miss Welby, pinching the young man's cheeks, "that I disliked children, but since I have had to take charge of this boy I find that I was altogether wrong."

"Must have been a great trial to you when your sister died," remarked Miss Baines.

"There were trials before that," she answered, simply.

"And you've lived here since?"

She nodded, and the three young women standing around compassionately looked at the open-eyed boy.

"I should love to undress him," burst out Miss Rickers, suddenly, "and help you put him to bye-bye."

"You shall," said Miss Welby.

The baby affected to be overcome with confusion at this, burying his head in the white blouse of his young aunt. Outside the rain left off, and the sun appeared to dry up the sandy shore in that instantaneous way that it has at the seaside. A few people came out of the houses and dotted the front; the three standing in the bow window chattered brightly about themselves and their work in Queen Victoria Street, having by this time thoroughly recovered their usual good spirits.

"You must let me act as guide," said the tall young woman. "To-morrow we'll get away along to the west and picnic if you like."

"It'll be jolly," said Miss Minns. Miss Minns, as manager, felt particularly glad at the brightened aspect of affairs. "Perhaps we might ask this Mr. Langholme to come with us."

"Is it necessary?" the other asked quickly.

"Well," said Miss Minns, "we'll see what he's like first."

"I do hope he's young," remarked Miss Rickers.

Digitized by Google

"And good-looking," said Miss Baines, adjusting the fringe on her forehead.

"There was a Mr. Langholme who went out to Africa and did great things there. Do you think it's possible, Miss Welby, that it's the same?"

"I think," she said, bending over the baby, "that it is quite possible."

Indeed, when the new visitor arrived that evening at Sea View, just in time for dinner, this anticipation proved to be correct. John Langholme, introduced and seated between two of the short girls, confessed modestly that he was the John Langholme, that he had been to Africa; had, indeed, only arrived in England the previous day. He had a book to write about his travels, and it had occurred to him—here he glanced across the table—it had occurred to him that he might as well do it at a quiet, sea-side place, the quieter the better. He was a brown-faced, broad-shouldered man, with a closely-clipped beard and a pleasant manner of deference towards the young women seated at the table. Miss Welby sat opposite to him, and did not at first join in the conversation; for this there was the less necessity, seeing that the three short girls all seemed inclined to speak to Mr. Langholme at the same time. The proprietress at the head of the table, beaming with a gratification beyond measurement, ordered that the blinds should not be drawn—this that other proprietresses might be stricken with envy.

"Miss Welby," said the proprietress, "let me temp' you with a little more of this jelly. No? You're not making 'alf a meal this evening. If I were you I should go out for a run on the Perade, it'll freshen you up."

"If Miss Welby will allow me," began the man from Africa, without looking at her.

"We will all go out," replied Miss Welby, addressing the three girls.

"That'll be lovely," declared Miss Minns, with enthusiasm. "I simply dote on the moonlight."

"Is there a band?" asked Miss Rickers.

"Well," replied the proprietress, hesitatingly, "there's a harmonium."

"At Southend now, Mr. Langholme," said Miss Rickers, "there's music and I don't know what all."

"Margate's the place for music," urged Miss Baines. "If you're fond of travelling, Mr. Langholme, you ought to go to Margate by boat."

"I venture to predict," he said genially, "that with fine weather we shall be able to enjoy our stay here. Miss Welby, you will help, won't you?"

"She goes out very little," interposed the proprietress, as Miss Welby hesitated a moment before replying. "This little baby nephew of hers won't bear her out of his sight when he's awake."

"Your sister's child?" he asked, sharply. "Is she not here to take care of it?"

"How can she," asked the proprietress, replying to this, "when she's been gone from this world these two months? Dear, patient, young thing she was, too, and the very last night she said to me, she said——"

The young woman, her eyes full of tears, rose hastily. Langholme hurried to open the door for her.

"I beg your pardon," he said, very earnestly. "I am sorry."

It seemed to the three short ladies that Mr. Langholme scarce kept up to the standard of cheerfulness with which he had started. Miss Welby did not make one of the party, and the three short girls chattered to their escort as they walked up and down the parade, telling him all the jokes about other girls in their office, and giving him their criticisms on popular novelists. Langholme was still courteous, but thoughtful; he listened to Miss Minns's observations with a slightly abstracted air, as one whose mind was on another subject.

The three girls on the return to their room, discussed him between themselves frankly. Miss Rickers declared that he was just her ideal of what a gentleman should be; and whilst she wished for her part that she were, say, a foot taller, still you often saw tall men with short wives, and precise equality in height was by no means indispensable to perfect happiness. Miss Minns, more critical, said, give her a livelier disposition. Miss Baines remarked apprehensively that a husband who was always popping off to Africa was not what she called a husband; and that if she were concerned in such a case, she should feel inclined to put her foot down once for all. But all of them were fluttered by the interest given to their holiday by the arrival of the celebrated Mr. Langholme.

Digitized by Google

Interest there was. Mr. Langholme wrote every morning in a room which the proprietress, with sparkling inventiveness, instantly christened the library; hours when Miss Welby was conducting the small baby in his high perambulator, surrounded and flattered by an entourage made up of the three short girls from London. Other babies on the Parade looked enviously at Miss Welby's nephew; but for the limitations of free speech imposed upon them by their extreme youth, there is no doubt that indignation meetings of infants would have been held.

Then in the afternoon Langholme would arrange some trip or some adventurous sail; journeys which were always planned to include Miss Welby, but never did include Miss Welby, because she was ever sending an excuse at the last moment. The three girls no longer discussed Mr. Langholme amongst themselves. Reserve came when his name was mentioned, and Miss Minns one evening, feeling it unwise to leave everything until the last moment, wrote out a carefully-worded notice, commencing Langholme—Minns, suitable for insertion on page one of the daily journals.

A great thunderstorm came on the evening before the close of the London girls' holiday. The proprietress was exultant over the storm, as though it were something that she had provided for her boarders at great expense; and having laid mirrors flat on dressing-tables, she stood at the bay window with the three young women explaining the progress of the mad, vivid, tumultuous scene without, in the manner of a pyrotechnist. Mr. Langholme had gone to the station to meet a parcel of reference books from town, and along the rain-swept Parade they saw him presently, to their great concern, striding in the direction of Sea View. A flash of lightning ("Look," said the landlady, "wasn't that a brilliant one?") seemed to go athwart him. The three girls gasped affrightedly, and held each other's hands.

"Why didn't he wait at the station until it was over?" whispered Miss Minns.

"He'll be wet through and through," declared Miss Baines.

"He's the kind of man," said Miss Rickers, definitely, "that wants someone to look after him."

Out on the sea the bright flashes of lightning came now and again across the dark background, the rolling and rumbling of thunder deadened for a time all other sounds in the house. It seemed once in an interval that the small baby upstairs was wailing, but Miss Welby being with him, the proprietress, vain of the spectacle without, would not allow any of her three boarders to leave the bay window. The drenched figure of Langholme came near, and this also induced them to stay.

"Where is she?" he almost shouted, as the door opened and he entered the hall.

"You'll 'ave to change, sir," said the proprietress. "You 'aven't got a dry stitch on you."

"Tell me at once," he cried, "where is Margaret?"

"Mr. Langholme, sir," answered the proprietress, with mild surprise, "I don't know a party of the name. Why didn't you take your macintosh?"

"Miss Welby!" he said, excitedly, "Is she upstairs? If so, go to her at once. A thunderstorm always unnerves her."

"How d' you know, sir?" asked the proprietress, going to the foot of the stairs. The three girls, who had been listening, flew up in advance of her.

"Bring her into the drawing-room," he ordered, insistently. "Close the shutters, draw the curtains, and light the lamps. I will see her there as soon as I have changed."

The three girls found Miss Welby in a fainting fit across her bed; the small baby, screaming himself hoarse in a tearless manner, with endeavour to arouse the household. When she had revived, the baby, exhausted by his hard work, went immediately to sleep in his bassinette, and the girls helped her very gently downstairs. In the drawing-room Langholme paced up and down with an agitated manner.

"Margaret," he said, going forward, "let me help. I knew the thunderstorm would distress you."

"John!" she whispered. The three girls stared at each other.

"I think," said Langholme, as he assisted her to the couch, "I think, Margaret, we ought to tell these good young ladies that we are not the strangers to each other that they may well have assumed us to be."

"I will tell them," she said, laying a hand on his arm.

Digitized by Google

"Let me do so. Miss Minns, you are commander-in-chief, aren't you?"

"In a sense," replied Miss Minns, cautiously, "yes."

"Let me tell you then, Miss Minns, that once in the very happiest time of my life I was fortunate enough to be engaged to the most charming girl in the world."

Her hand touched his arm, this time reprovingly.

"The most charming girl in the world. Because I wanted to travel, and because she declined to leave her married sister, married to a worthless scamp who had deserted her, we quarrelled."

"I thought," she said, in a low voice, "that perhaps all husbands were alike."

"My dear Margaret," he said cheerfully, "they are all different. And," he turned again to Miss Minns, "we determined never to speak to each other again. Perhaps you know what lovers' quarrels are?"

"We have never really been engaged," confessed Miss Minns, "not one of us."

"You will know," said Langholme, "and then you will have sympathy for us. During all the time that I was in Africa I never forgot the dear girl, and when I returned to England I came to her at once. What I am going to say now I have wanted to say before, but she has given me no opportunity. I want her," his voice broke slightly, "to let me help her to look after the little chap upstairs."

"I think," she said, stroking his wrist affectionately, "that I must make one condition."

"Only one, dear?"

"I shall want bridesmaids," she said, "and I have no relatives now. I think I shall want three."

"Miss Welby," cried Miss Minns, falling on one knee and kissing her, "you don't mean, you can't mean that you are going to ask three short girls like us to be——"

"Unless you all consent," said Miss Welby, decidedly, "I shall not become Mrs. Langholme."

The three girls glanced at each other delightedly. Miss Rickers and Miss Baines nodded to their leader to reply on their behalf.

"Oh," said Miss Minns, kissing her again, "you'll be Mrs. Langholme all right."

[THE END.]

MIDNIGHT.

The moon crept over the mountain edge
  And made a path of light;
The cloud swept over my hoping heart
  And made of it dark night.
Then of a sudden the wind arose,
  Like a giant out of the sea,
Playing and tossing the feathery film,
  Showering light o'er me.
Ah, the sweet peace that follows pain,
  The silent, sacred rest!
Soul of my soul, thine incense I breathe,
  Dreaming the night is blest.

Mary Forney Thunder.

Digitized by Google

A Free Shelter for Homeless Men.

By ARTHUR WELBY.

IT is between four and five in the afternoon, and down Ratcliff way —where a general air of poverty and meanness pervades the stifling streets, with their gaunt, smoke-grimed houses, their ragged urchins disporting in the gutter, and their tide of hard-working and workless humanity—a little band of men, shabby and dispirited even for Ratcliff, are beginning to collect in the Horseferry Branch Road.

They stand in front of a lofty building, attractive by reason of its bright and cleanly appearance—qualities which are not native to Ratcliff—and bearing on its front in bold letters "Medland Hall."

When six o'clock arrives, the doors open, and three or four hundred fortunate ones enter the friendly portal, while the others turn sadly away to seek a night's lodging under some dark archway, or on the seats of the Embankment, where the stern summons to "move on" soon drives them from even this cold resting-place.

Medland Hall is a shelter for homeless men, the only free shelter in London open all the year round, and its patrons, though destitute of all the good things of this life, are no idle loafers for whom the Casual Ward is ample provision, but working men penniless and out of employment, to whom just a helping hand means much.

Many a man has been saved from utter despair by a little timely assistance—the night's lodging and the simple but satisfying meal of bread and butter which was given to him at the Hall.

Admission is by tickets, which are issued, free of cost, to any applicants who can give a satisfactory account of themselves, each ticket entitling a man to a bunk for six nights, provided that there is one vacant, and even if he comes too late to secure a berth the first night, he may be more fortunate on the following evening.

About half-past five, one of the attendants walks alongside the ranks and gives the order for all men with admission tickets to come to the front.

Accommodation is found for these first, and afterwards, if there is any room, the other cases are dealt with in order.

When all the beds have been allotted, the doors are shut and a notice "Full" is posted outside, and the disappointed ones file slowly, but not empty, away, for each has received a liberal allowance of food.

Before following the successful applicants into the Hall, we will take a glance at the history and progress of the work, which is carried on as a part of the philanthropic work of the London Congregational Union.

Medland Hall, formerly known as the Queen Street Meeting House, was opened as a free shelter for the first time on Sunday, January 5th, 1891.

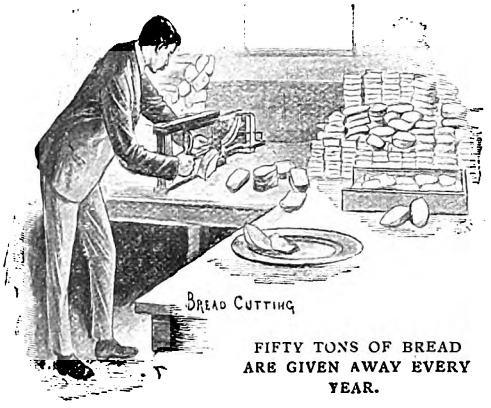
Only fifty-one inmates were accommodated the first night; but the number increased rapidly as the existence of the shelter became known.

Six months after it was opened, the hall was destroyed by fire, but a temporary shelter was provided, and by the early part of the next year the work was again transferred to a new building on the old site. Galleries were built to provide extra sleeping accommodation, and at one time as many as 683 persons were taken in. But the Majesty of the Law, which makes no adequate provision for the homeless poor, had to be vindicated, and a summons for overcrowding was issued, although there were not more in the Hall than could be comfortably housed.

An order was accordingly made against the Medland Hall authorities, though the presiding magistrate expressed his great sympathy with the work, and personally contributed to its support.

After that, only 300 were admitted nightly, but an extension of the premises

Digitized by Google



FIFTY TONS OF BREAD ARE GIVEN AWAY EVERY YEAR.

has since allowed of this number being increased.

Every man on entering receives half a pound of bread and butter, and what is scarcely less appreciated, a good supply of hot water, of which there are 160 gallons ready when the doors open, and this is added to at the rate of sixty-five gallons a minute.

Upstairs there is a hair cutting and shaving department, where many of the new comers are glad to repair, and indulge in a comfort to which they have long been strangers.

Everything is done to make the poor fellows as comfortable as possible, and rules are conspicuous by their absence. No galling restrictions remind the men that they are being housed and fed on charity; they are allowed to smoke and read and chat among themselves as freely as if they were enjoying the privileges of a club.

Those who have been able to purchase a little tea, or to even obtain some tea-leaves, soon have a steaming can of tea brewing.

The kindness and good-fellowship of the poor among themselves is proverbial, and it is seldom that any one of these men sits down to his tea without asking a less fortunate comrade to join him.

At seven o'clock a whistle is blown and an attendant, mounting into the gallery, announces the names of those for whom letters have been received.

Every facility is given to the inmates to write to their friends, stamps and stationery being provided for the purpose.

At nine o'clock all lights are lowered, and the men retire to rest, the attendant making his rounds three times during the night to see that everything is all right and that the temperature of the rooms is maintained at about 60 deg. F.

During the winter evenings concerts are frequently arranged, and over 200 instrumentalists and vocalists have given their services on behalf of this deserving charity in the course of a year.

The question may be asked what is the need for a shelter when the taxpayer provides a refuge in the casual ward. The answer is that the workhouse not only makes a man a pauper but keeps him so, and, apart from the horror with which all respectable men regard it, their reluctance is based on quite other than sentimental grounds. As long as a man seeks shelter in the casual ward it is practically impossible for him to obtain employment. In return for his night's lodging he has to do a day's hard labour at stone breaking or oakum picking, and is not released until nine o'clock on the third day. It is here where the crying injustice comes in, because unless the unskilled labourer can look for his work long before this hour, he stands no chance of obtaining it.

At Medland Hall a very different system prevails. No matter at what time a man wishes to rise he can go to bed without any fear of oversleeping himself, as the attendant will call him at any hour that he names. Many go out as early as one and two o'clock, especially those who work in the docks, when it is absolutely necessary that they should be on the spot a long time before the gates open, as the earliest to arrive are the ones to be selected.

Many of the inmates of Medland Hall only require shelter for a single night, and the average for the year is only twelve nights per man. Some of them have just been discharged from hospital after recovery from a serious accident, and have been vainly seeking for work; others, sailors mostly, are spending a single night in London before sailing away to some remote quarter of the globe on the following day, while others again have just obtained situations but have not the means to live till their first week's money is due.

A large number of those who use the shelter are men past middle life; men who have been skilful workmen in their time, but for whom, though in many cases the quality of their work may have little deteriorated, the world seems to have no place.

Digitized by Google

One of the greatest difficulties which those who have come down in the world experience is in the shabbiness of their clothes. The authorities at the Hall not only offer every facility in the way of repairing boots and worn garments, but give away annually over 1,400 articles of clothing.

One man who was staying at the Hall had received a recommendation to an employer from a friend of the latter's, but the poor fellow looked so dejected and his clothes were so dilapidated, that the gentleman, though disposed to help him by giving him a post as time-keeper at 25s. per week, could not think of employing such a shabby individual about his place. The Hall, however, came to the rescue, and provided him with a complete outfit—hat, boots, jacket, vest, trousers, collar, tie, and shirt, and on calling again he was at once engaged. During the first week of his employment he was provided with food and shelter at the Hall.

Skilled workmen are often unable to obtain work because their tools are in pawn. The manager of the Hall frequently redeems the pledges on the condition that the men will refund the money out of their earnings, a trust which is seldom abused. Not only are the weak and ailing looked after and tenderly cared for in the sick ward, but surgical appliances, wooden legs and wooden arms have been presented to those needing them, and with the aid of these artificial limbs, many a poor cripple has been enabled to earn a living for himself, which would have been otherwise impossible.

The amount of bread which is given away annually is fifty tons; last year there were over 160,000 admissions to the shelter, this representing between 14 and 15,000 different men whom the Hall benefited; 26,000 odd were turned away for the lack of room, and probably if the accommodation of the Hall were doubled there would still be as great a number seeking vainly for admission, as, when late comers see a large crowd waiting outside the doors, they think there is no chance for them and go away.

And what is the cost of this splendid work among the homeless men of London? It works out at less than 1½d. per head per night, and this trifling sum will give a man a comfortable bed and a sufficiency of food.

It is an appalling fact that there are more homeless men in London than homeless dogs, and coroners' inquests constantly reveal cases of death from starvation. And let this fact be borne in mind, it is not the worthless vagrant who is the victim, for to him the resource of stealing is always open, and even if unsuccessful and detected, he is at least provided with food and shelter at the expense of the nation, and far better cared for than that greatest of criminals the unfortunate pauper.

That honest men should be allowed to die of sheer want in our streets is a national scandal, and until our Poor Laws are put on a better footing, it is an imperative duty that liberal support should be given to such institutions as Medland Hall, which, though they have accomplished splendid work, have been only able to touch on the fringe of a great problem.

ARTHUR WELBY.

Digitized by Google

His Heart's Desire.

By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID.

I.

MESSIRE ODO RIGAULT, Lord Archbishop of Rouen in the days of King Louis the Ninth, one day set forth, with a sumptuous train, to visit his suffragan, the Bishop of Evreux. Odo was splendidly mounted; the sunshine glittered on the superb dresses and rich caparisons of his followers, as their horses caracoled along the highway that ran beside the foot of Mont St. Cathérine, for they had left Rouen by its western gate.

There could be no doubt that Messire Odo Rigault was the richest personage in the fair province of Normandy; no one else had such revenues; no one else owned so many rich estates, so many lucrative dairy-farms, so many mills and fishponds; the wines in his vast cellars were renowned for their excellence. There seemed, in fact, no end to his wealth; and yet as he rode along beside the lovely Seine, surrounded by his gorgeous suite, Messire the Lord Archbishop sighed heavily, and his face looked full of care.

Each time the cortège came in sight of one of the numerous fortresses of the Norman barons of that period, the prelate's face lengthened, he sighed yet more heavily, and his chin dropped lower on his chest.

"Yes," he thought, "they all have their impregnable strongholds, each one of them can defy me, while I do not even possess a castle; I have only a few houses, which could not hold out against the attack of an army of women. What is the use of my wealth? It may be taken from me any day! I cannot secure it in a fortress which could withstand a siege of the English barbarians, or the attacks of my own robber knights and nobles."

It was a fact that the Archbishop did not possess a single stronghold; he had more than once seen a castle which he fancied would serve his purpose, but even though he had offered a large price for it, the owner invariably refused to sell it to him. Odo had become so absorbed in these moody meditations that he had not observed the gathering clouds. Suddenly a forked flash of blue lightning shot across his path; a deafening clap of thunder followed, and then came torrents of rain.

The Archbishop's seneschal, Louis de Canteleu, rode up to him.

"My lord must seek shelter," he said; "it is impossible that he can ride on to Evreux in the teeth of this storm; see how the clouds have gathered round us. Ah! what is that?"

As he spoke another vivid flash showed a castle with lofty towers on the brow of the hill beneath which they rode.

The seneschal pointed to it. "See there, your highness; shall I not ride up to yonder castle and ask for shelter in my lord's name?"

"No," the Archbishop said firmly; "it is better to suffer a wetting than to ask the churlish hospitality of a tyrant noble, who will probably refuse us admittance. Let us hasten on to Evreux."

The seneschal looked round at the scowling faces of the attendants; the men were already wet to the skin. He looked up again searchingly at the castle on the height, and his face suddenly cleared.

"Messire may set his mind at rest," the seneschal said, with great reverence. "I did not think we had come so far on our way. This, my lord, is the famous castle of Gaillon, and it belongs to the King. It has been ever a royal fortress."

The Archbishop looked interested. "Is it truly Gaillon?" he said. "I have long wished to see this famous fortress; we will go there."

Digitized by Google

The attendants were greatly cheered by this order, and the seneschal hastened on, and the cavalcade followed so speedily that, before he expected, the prelate found himself arrived at the castle gates.

Suddenly the Archbishop felt greatly troubled; he was impatient to see this strong castle; yet something whispered him that it would be wise to keep away from Gaillon.

The ancient building was a dark, sombre fortress, erected for strength rather than for show; its exterior was grim and unattractive.

The Governor of Gaillon received the Archbishop of Rouen with all fitting reverence, and expressed his satisfaction that so distinguished a guest should honour the castle with his presence. Blazing fires were quickly kindled in the chief rooms, and an excellent supper was soon placed before the prelate; while his attendants feasted merrily below with the garrison, and dried their soaked clothing.

But, good as the supper was, the Archbishop had little stomach for it; he was seized with so intense a longing to become the Castellan of Gaillon that when he lay down his desire kept sleep from his eyes.

In the morning he asked to be shown over the fortress; he examined the fortifications, and declared himself delighted with their strength; he was delighted, too, with the castle's position on the brow of a hill, which made it on that side impregnable.

It was a cool, grey morning after the storm, and in the soft light Odo looked down on the grey Seine, bordered by silver-leaved willows, and the charming country beyond it. In the distance were the massive towers of King Richard's "Saucy Castle," the famous Château Gaillard, now a French stronghold.

As the Archbishop went through the royal apartments of Gaillon, he saw that though they had once been richly furnished they looked deserted, they smelt close and musty; the tapestries on the walls were faded and moth-eaten, the gilding was everywhere tarnished; everything was going to decay.

"Does the King often come here?" Odo asked the Governor. "Does not Queen Blanche sometimes visit the castle?"

"No, my lord," the Governor answered. "The Queen has never been to Gaillon; his Majesty the King came here just before he embarked on the last crusade, but he only remained one night at Gaillon; since then the royal bedchamber has been locked up."

Odo looked covetously around him; he told himself this castle of Gaillon was exactly what he wished for—his very heart's desire. He had never seen a fortress which so entirely fulfilled his requirements – and placed, too, in the best part of his fair province of Normandy. If the King never came to Gaillon, of what use could the fortress be to him?

He took leave of the Governor; but when he quitted the castle he carried a heavy heart away with him to Evreux; he wished he had never entered the fortress of Gaillon.

II.

One day a royal messenger came spurring at full speed to the palace of Archbishop Odo. He had brought a message from the King: it was a summons to attend King Louis in Paris with as little delay as possible.

Archbishop Odo loved the good King, and he lost no time in presenting himself before him. Louis the Ninth received him with much reverence and affection, and kneeling before him, he asked his blessing. He then commanded all present to withdraw, as he desired to be left alone with the prelate.

"Messire," said the King, "you well know that the ardent wish of my life has been to deliver the sepulchre of our blessed Lord from the hands of the unbelievers; I desire even now to embark on a fresh crusade against the infidels. Alas! how can I do it? I have spent my all; I have emptied the treasury, I have pledged my plate and jewels, I have no means left of raising money. You, my Lord Archbishop, are, I believe, rich in this world's goods. I am told that you possess a store of golden crowns. Will you help the good work? Will you grant me a loan from your treasures? If you will spare me some of them, and thus help the cause, I promise to give you in return anything you desire."

The Archbishop's ears tingled with excitement; he could hardly believe his good fortune.

"Sire," he answered, "I only desire one thing in the whole world, and you can give it me; give me the castle of Gaillon, sire, and in return take all that belongs to me."

Digitized by Google

Now, the Archbishop was considered to be a calm and self-possessed prelate; the King was therefore greatly surprised by the excited manner in which he made this request. He smiled kindly as he answered:

"No, no, holy father; I will not deal so hardly with you; I am not a robber. I will ask you to give me the exact number of crowns I require, and the castle of Gaillon shall henceforward be an appanage of the Archbishops of Rouen."

The Archbishop felt almost beside himself with joy; he threw himself on his knees, and thanked the King with tears streaming down his withered cheeks.

Louis raised him, and bade him be seated; then, turning to him with a smile, "I also have a wish. Does it not seem to you, my Lord Archbishop, that it will surely bring God's blessing on our bargain if you consent to go with me on pilgrimage to the Holy Land?"

At these words Messire Odo Rigault turned very pale; he also looked, in fact, as if he were like to faint.

"Alas! I am too old, my liege. Consider, I beseech you, the fatigue of such a journey?"

"You will not refuse me, my lord, for Christ's sake?" the King said.

The Archbishop sighed heavily. Of what use was the monarch's gift, he asked himself, if, before he took possession of the castle he so greatly coveted, he must undertake this fatiguing and dangerous journey—a journey from which so many of the crusaders had not returned? There was the danger of shipwreck; the risk of being slain or made captive by the Saracens; to say nothing of unpleasant food and hard lodging. It was, however, impossible to refuse the King, who had so generously bestowed on him the coveted castle.

"Sire," he answered, "your wish is my law. I will accompany your Majesty; may a double blessing rest on our joint efforts against the infidels."

"That is well spoken," said the saintly King, "Your presence in our host, my lord, will infallibly bring a blessing with it."

. . . .

Very soon after this interview King Louis and Archbishop Odo set forth on their journey to the Holy Land; but alas! they both failed to reach it. The fleet sailed to Tunis, where they found the plague raging, and where, as everyone knows, good King Louis died. His successor, Philip the Third, considered it was more prudent to return to France with the troops the plague had spared.

Odo Rigault had loved King Louis, and had greatly admired his many virtues, yet he found himself rejoicing in the prospect of a far speedier return to France than had seemed possible when he left its shores. At last, he told himself, he should take possession of his castle, the coveted Gaillon; the very chamber which had formerly been kept sacred to the King's use would now be his.

He embarked on board the vessel devoted to him and to his suite, but "man proposes;" soon there arose a formidable obstacle between Odo Rigault and his heart's desire.

One night at sea he was awakened by the roar of a frightful tempest; all around him was noise and confusion; the cries of the mariners were almost drowned by the fierce shrieking of the wind, as it rent into fragments the hastily-reefed sails and snapped the stout masts as though they had been dry tree branches; the waves swept over the decks, carrying with them men, spars and rigging, and all that they could whirl away in their furious onslaught.

Odo was not wanting in courage, and he soon gained the deck. Snatching at a rope, he lashed himself to the capstan, and then looked around him. Day was breaking with pale blue lines of light, and he saw that the waves rose higher than the ship, and threatened to carry her down with them into the deep troughs below. The gale did not slacken its fury for an instant; it lashed the waves till they rose still higher. Odo looked round for the rest of the fleet; he could not distinguish a single ship in this frightful turmoil of wind and water. It seemed to him that shipwreck was at hand. He made out the captain in the uncertain light, and hailed him.

"Is there hope, skipper?" he cried. "Can you save the ship?"

Before the answer reached him he caught sight of land; a white point with a grey line of coast seemed almost close; but as he made this discovery the ship groaned and shivered from stem to stern, as it struck violently on a rock ; in a few minutes it went to pieces.

Digitized by Google

For a moment the Archbishop did not know what happened ; then he found himself in the foaming sea, clinging to a fragment of mast and rigging. It seemed to him that he floated thus for hours. Almost all his companions and the sailors had perished, but Odo seemed to bear a charmed life. His strength failed at last, and his mind became confused. He awoke to find that he had been picked up by a fisher boat, which presently landed him on the coast near Petit-port, in the Bessin.

This being the diocese of one of Odo's suffragans, the Bishop of Bayeux, the Archbishop met with much hospitality and reverence from the clergy, who entreated him to remain among them till he had entirely recovered from the fatigue and exposure to which he had been subjected.

The Bishop sent him a pressing invitation to stay with him in Bayeux, but Odo would not be persuaded. He sent to Rouen for all that he required ; his clothing and the insignia of his office had perished in the shipwreck. When his messengers returned, he set forth on his journey.

He could smile now that he was once more on the road to Rouen ; he thought only of the arrangements he must make on his arrival in the capital city for a grand investiture of Gaillon. He intended to take possession of the castle with the most elaborate pomp and ceremony.

III.

It was a lovely morning in early spring. The sun shone brightly on the magnificent procession as it passed out of the western gate of Rouen. First came a large body of well-equipped men-at-arms ; then heralds, pursuivants, and banner-bearers ; the royal banner of France, snowy white except where it was pied with golden fleur-de-lis, came in the centre, followed by the banners of the city of Rouen, those of the Archbishop of Rouen, and after these the banners of the six suffragan dioceses—the Bishoprics of Evreux, of Lisieux, of Bayeux and Avranches, of Séez, and of Coutances. After these came a large body of clergy, the Chapter of the city of Rouen ; deputations representing all the abbeys, convents and communities of the province, with crosses and banners, among which the banner of the Abbot of Jumièges was conspicuous. Then came the Archbishop himself, riding a splendid white charger, and wearing his mitre and pallium. On either side of him rode three of his richly-robed suffragans.

The Archbishop looked radiant ; he conversed affably with his episcopal companions.

"Pardon me, my lord, when I say that you show wonderful energy," said the Bishop of Bayeux, who was said to have hopes of becoming Odo's successor. "Most of us would have required a long rest after the arduous fatigues and sufferings you have undergone, first in your journey to Tunis, and then in the misfortune of your return. The shipwreck in itself must have been terribly exhausting ; yet it seems as if you cannot have taken any adequate rest, for this grand spectacle could not have been quickly conceived and carried out."

The Archbishop bent his head.

"You do me too much honour, my lord of Bayeux ; when you see Gaillon, our lamented Sovereign's magnificent gift to the See of Rouen, you will, I think, say that it is a worthy acquisition, and should be as worthily taken possession of."

The Bishop of Bayeux laughed in his sleeve.

"Foolish old braggart!" he whispered to his neighbour of Coutances. "He is as vainglorious about the matter as he has shown himself covetous ; everyone knows that he pined after the possession of Gaillon as a lovesick girl for her sweetheart."

Meantime the grand procession moved slowly on to Gaillon ; the sunlight glinted on the coats of mail, on the banners, fringes, and embroideries, and on the brilliant caparisons of the horses. It was strange that now, at the acme of gratified desire, amid the murmurs of applause that now and again reached his ears, the Archbishop's heart became heavy. By the time that the procession halted before the gates of Gaillon, all the gay hopes and self-congratulation with which he had set forth had left him.

Waiting for his arrival outside the castle gates was the assemblage of barons he had invited to witness his triumphal entry ; there is no saying in what spirit the said barons had come forth to meet him, but they had certainly looked surprised when they found a strong body of men-at-arms, more numerous than their own followers, drawn up before the castle gates.

Digitized by Google

The barons showed an absence of bravery in their attire and the trappings of their horses; they looked as grim as Gaillon itself did.

When Odo saw their sullen faces, his spirits rose again.

This was what he had hoped for—a foretaste of the subjection in which he meant to hold his rebellious lieges—for every man among them was in some way subjected to his authority.

Odo bent to his saddlebow in courteous greeting as he welcomed the assemblage to "our castle of Gaillon."

The trumpets sounded a flourish, and the people fell back right and left, forming a living lane before the Archbishop. He rode in through the gateway, and realised that at last he was the owner of the fortress.

As he passed in, a loud shout came from the assemblage, and this was echoed by the crowd of well-dressed serving-men standing in the courtyard.

The Archbishop had not once entered the castle since his first visit; he had contented himself with issuing commands to his chamberlain, a cleric of great taste and enterprise. The apartments were to be sumptuously furnished, and to this end no expense was to be spared. When he had dismounted and entered the banqueting hall, the sight that greeted him filled him with delight and pride, and effectually chased away any return of misgivings.

The once dismantled walls were hung with rich blue and green tapestry, and at the upper end of the table, intended for the castellan and his more distinguished guests, were handsomely carved oaken chairs instead of the rough settles at the lower end of the board. The Archbishop's chair, moreover, was blazoned in gold and blue and scarlet with the archiepiscopal arms.

The Archbishop turned and said a few words of thanks to his chamberlain. His satisfaction was complete when an irrepressible burst of applause broke from his immediate followers at the sight of the transformed hall, where scarcely a year before they had seen utter discomfort.

Then the chamberlain proceeded to place the guests in order of precedence round the heavily-laden tables, whereon meats and pasties, boar's head and barbecued fish, with poultry of all kinds, jostled one another with their abundance. The chaplain said a lengthy Latin grace, at the end of which was chanted a Latin verse. Then the trumpets again sounded, and there entered a splendid peacock, borne by the seneschal himself.

This royal dish was carried entirely round both sides of the table, amid renewed bursts of applause from the guests, and was then placed on the board before the giver of the feast. Odo's cellars in the archiepiscopal palace of Rouen had not been spared, and wine flowed like water down the throats of the guests. His health was drunk amid an uproar of praise.

"Long life to the Castellan of Gaillon!" was on every tongue.

It was long before Odo wearied of his triumph; but at last he rose from table and left his guests to continue their orgies. His suffragans followed, and soon took their departure; so did most of the others.

By nightfall all but the Archbishop's special following had quitted the castle.

. . . . .

Meantime Odo had visited every room in the fortress, with increasing pride and satisfaction. The chamberlain had done his work well, he would tell him so to-morrow. To-night, when he had laid aside his cumbrous robes, he commanded to be shown to his bedchamber, the room in which had slept St. Louis, the King.

It was a gloomy-looking chamber, in spite of the care bestowed on renovating it; but Odo had commanded that it should be left as much as possible as it had been when occupied by the King.

There was a fire on the hearth, and candles burnt in the sconces, flaring smokily as blasts of wind found their way in from the clumsily-fastened casements. The Archbishop's heart beat fast with exultation; he was impatient to find himself in the royal bed. He bade his attendants extinguish the candles and depart. He hurried over his devotions and lay down—the desire of his heart was appeased.

"At last," he said, "I am Castellan of Gaillon."

A deep, hollow voice answered him:

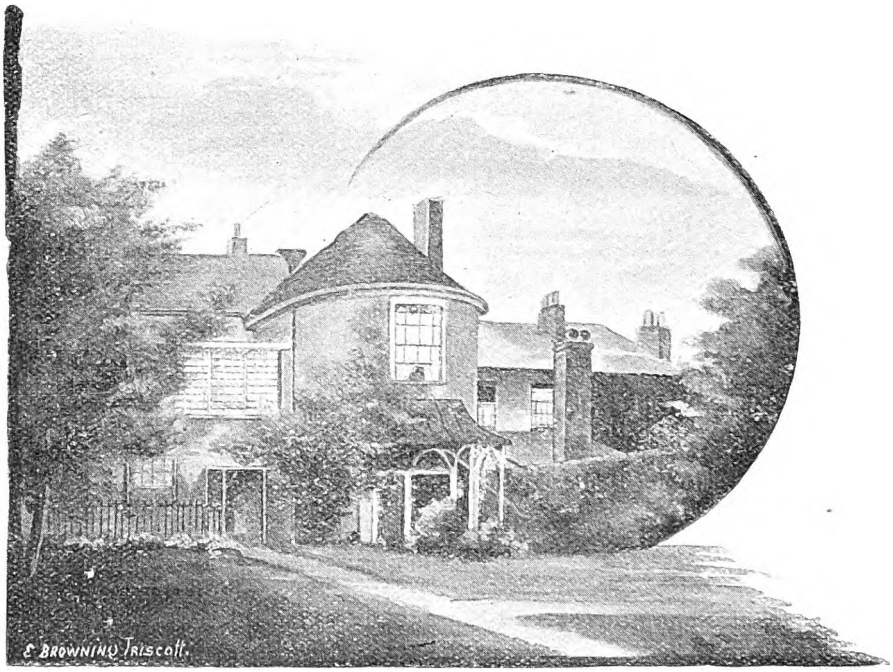
"It is I who am the Castellan of Gaillon."

. . . . . .

Next morning Odo Rigault, the Lord Archbishop of Rouen and Castellan of Gaillon, was found dead in his bed.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google



GAINSBOROUGH'S BIRTHPLACE AT SUDBURY, SUFFOLK.

Gainsborough and His Birthplace.

By E. BROWNING TRISCOTT.

THE little East Anglian town of Sudbury, built on the banks of the winding Stour, has the honour of being the birthplace of two eminent men: Simon Theobald, who rose to be Archbishop of Canterbury in times as remote as the thirteenth century; and Gainsborough, the famous painter. The drowsy, venerable town is essentially a place with a past. Its glories, importance, and the heyday of its life, are all of yesterday. Like a hoary-headed veteran, full of years and tired with the labour of life, it is content to spend its autumn in reminiscent musings on its more vigorous past. Looking out on the golden cornfields, the tree-clad slopes, the green meadows dotted with grazing cattle, the silent, weedy river (on which an occasional boat or barge may be seen) it is difficult, if not impossible, to realise that this now peaceful spot was once the scene of wildest strife and struggle. Here, a thousand or more years ago, the Danes and English met in fierce conflict. The neighbourhood of Sudbury, indeed, was the chief battle-ground of the wild, invading hordes who utilised a convenient river to advance their pirate forces, silently and stealthily, into the very heart of England. To-day, scarcely a trace of those fierce times remains: only a few innocent-looking, moated mounds here and there witness with voiceless eloquence to the clash and clang of those other times.

So much for the past. At the present day the once-important Sudbury is merely a quiet little market town: only sixty miles distant indeed, from all the seething turmoil of London, but as seemingly remote from the wild whirl of metropolitan existence as if it were situated in another world. Piping times of peace, and, in later years, agricultural depression, have slowly but surely dimmed the venerable township's earlier glories, and to-day there remain only a few quiet streets, some old houses, a few factories, and a weekly market that once did a great trade in corn, to witness pathetically to what has been.

Digitized by Google

An interesting page in Sudbury's history is the career of Thomas Gainsborough, the famous landscape and portrait painter. He was born in the year 1728, in a picturesque old house in the (then) somewhat dismally-named "Sepulchre" Street. This street took its name from a chapel, said to have been founded by William, Earl of Gloucester, in the twelfth century, and was dedicated, as were many ancient foundations, in honour of the Holy Sepulchre. This chapel has now disappeared, and the street in which it stood has of late years been re-named in honour of the artist. The house, in which nearly two centuries ago the renowned painter first saw the light, still stands; and a picture of it forms one of our illustrations. The large window, immediately over the verandah, is said to be that of the room in which the famous painter was born.

The father of our artist appears to have been a well-to-do Nonconformist of some repute in the town, a manufacturer of woollen clothing, and the holder of a curious, uncheerful monopoly in some especial kind of shroud. He married a Miss Burroughs, sister of the then Vicar of St. Gregory's. In this ancient church, I may state in passing, is still to be seen the decapitated head of Sudbury's other eminent native—Simon Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Chancellor in the reign of Richard II. The skull is covered with dried, parchment-like skin, and is toothless—a peculiarity resulting from the unfaithful avarice of a former caretaker, who is said to have sold the Archbishop's

"PORTRAIT OF A LADY," BY GAINSBOROUGH.

Digitized by Google

"RUSTIC CHILDREN," BY GAINSBOROUGH.

teeth to curious visitors. Simon Theobald met his death at the hands of Wat Tyler's followers in the peasant revolt of 1381, and his head was exposed on London Bridge for six days. The grim caprice of Fortune presently substituted Wat Tyler's own head for that of the murdered Archbishop, and the latter was conveyed to Sudbury, where it remains to the present day.

The above-mentioned Vicar of St. Gregory's was also Master of the Grammar School, and from him young Gainsborough received some fragments of an education. In accordance with the traditions of clerical households and clerical stock, Mrs. Gainsborough presented her husband with a large family—five sons and four daughters—of whom Thomas was the seventh child. His mother is said to have excelled in flower-painting, and it is presumably from her that her famous son inherited his artistic tastes.

The future portrait painter commenced drawing at a very early age. At ten years old a biographer reports him as having made "some progress in sketching," and at the ripe age of twelve he is spoken of as "a confirmed painter." At school he appears to have chiefly occupied himself in adorning the margins and covers of his own and schoolfellows' books with sketches and caricatures. In this congenial, if not particularly educational occupation, he was encouraged and assisted by his fellow-scholars, who, in return for the amusement thus afforded them, performed for the young caricaturist his neglected school tasks, thus leaving the budding artist leisure wherein to exercise himself in his especial pursuits.

The story of Gainsborough's first portrait is a curious one. At the back of the house in Sepulchre Street extends a large orchard, and amongst the fruit and other kinds of trees with which it is stocked, young Gainsborough spent much of his leisure in making studies for landscape. Early one August morning, when so occupied, he observed a man looking over the orchard fence—his eyes bent longingly on the ripe, luscious fruit of an adjacent pear-tree. Not observing the young artist (who was hidden from view in some kind of a summer-house) this man presently proceeded to scale the fence and to climb the too-tempting tree. On Gainsborough's emerging from his retreat, the trespasser hastily decamped. The painter had, however, meanwhile obtained a rapid sketch of the intruder's face—which drawing proved such an excellent likeness as to easily lead to the man's recognition. "On being sent for," says Fulcher (Gainsborough's fellow-townsman and biographer), "and taxed with felonious intent, he stoutly denied it, till the boy produced the portrait and showed him how he looked when about to break the eighth commandment."

Digitized by Google

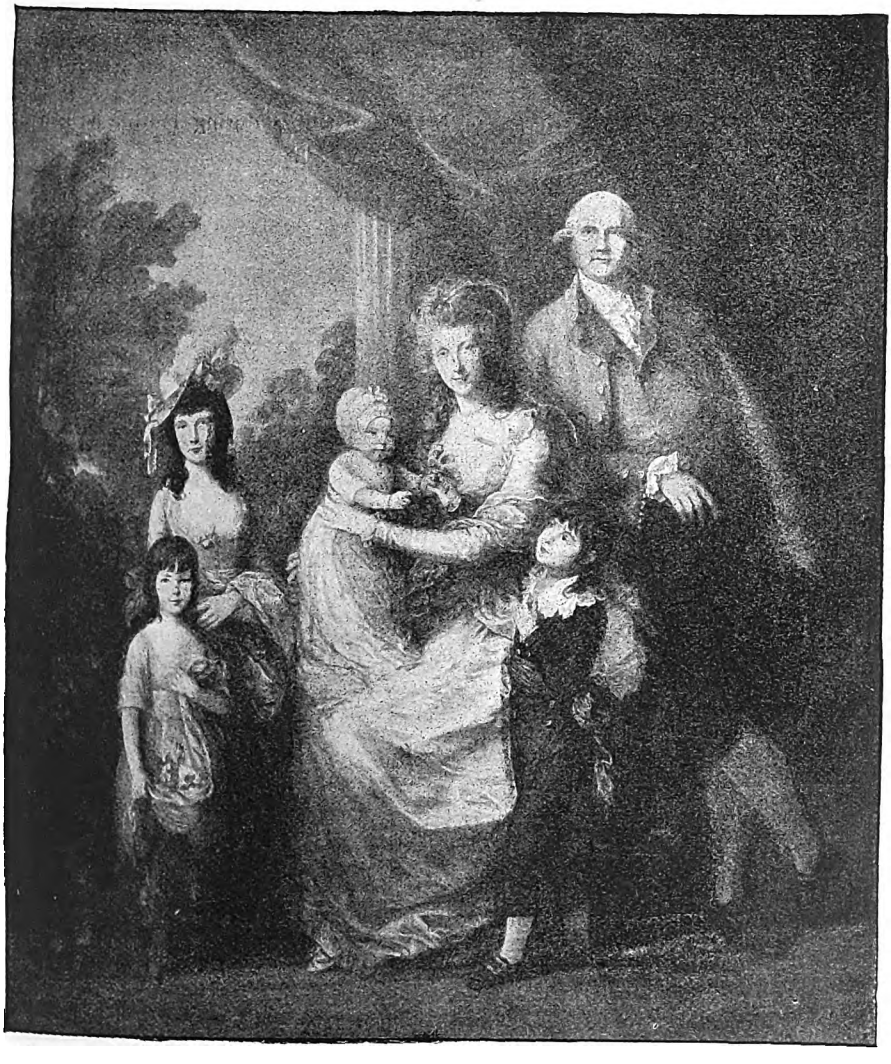
At the age of fifteen, Gainsborough was sent to London, and he studied first with Gravelot, an engraver, and later with an artist named Hayman—then an historical painter of some repute. These years spent in London form an unsatisfactory era in Gainsborough's career. In them he learnt little of Art, and much of the undesirable in Life. He also found it extremely difficult to support himself. Most wisely, as the event proved, he decided to turn his back on London and its ways, and to once more seek the quietude and peace of his birthplace.

When only nineteen, Gainsborough married a young girl named Margaret Burr, she being one year more youthful than himself. This lady, about whose parentage there appears to be some mystery, is said to have been extremely pretty; she, moreover, possessed the substantial charm of a life annuity of £200. This sum placed the young couple in comfortable circumstances—first in Friar's Street, Sudbury, where Gainsborough established a studio; and later at Ipswich, whither the painter, in search of wider patronage than he was able to obtain in his native town, presently removed.



"MR. J. BAILLIE, HIS WIFE AND CHILDREN," BY GAINSBOROUGH.

Digitized by Google

In Ipswich he remained for about thirteen years, making the while great strides in his art, and procuring for himself and family, if not riches, at least a competence. The city of Bath, with its then great reputation in the world of fashion, next attracted him, and thither, in the year 1760, he removed.

Gainsborough's next and last migration was back to London. Nearly three decades had elapsed since his first visit to the Metropolis; thirty eventful years which had brought to the once-penniless unknown a great name and a great fortune. The grace and elegance of his portraits, their naturalness and delicacy, had obtained for him during his sojourn in Bath commissions from most of the fashionable celebrities of the day.

Greater success, however, was to befall him in London. His work came under the notice of George III., with the result that he received a commission from the Palace. This Royal patronage heralded the flow of a veritable flood of commissions, and, in spite of an amazing facility of execution and untiring industry, the fortunate artist was scarcely able to satisfy the demands of his patrons.

Gainsborough's works of art are very numerous. Reproductions of two well-known pictures—one the portrait of a lady and the other a family group—are among the illustrations of this article. Their characteristics are similar. In both there is the same grace and elegance, the delicacy and unlikeness to contemporary work, that obtained for the artist his great name. Gainsborough studied only from Nature, unguided and untutored, and he arrived at his goal along pathways of intuition rather than instruction: hence much originality, and unlikeness in his work to that of any of his contemporaries; characteristics which, in conjunction with the fidelity of his portraits—only modified by the right degree of flattery—set him easily on the topmost rung of the ladder of fame. The picture of rustic children, belonging I believe, to an earlier part of the artist's career, is inserted here as a specimen of Gainsborough's work outside portraiture. As will be seen, it has a certain charm, but its grace and beauty are inferior to that with which he invested some of his most successful portraits.

The story of the loss and recent finding of one of Gainsborough's most celebrated pictures, that of the Duchess of Devonshire, is so well known that I need not here more than allude to it.

Gainsborough died in 1788, in the sixty-second year of his age. On his death-bed, he sent for Sir Joshua Reynolds (from whom during his life he had had some small estrangement), and in the ear of the President, the dying artist murmured his last curious phrase: "We are all going to Heaven—and Vandyke is of the company." Gainsborough by his own wish was buried at Kew, where a tablet has been erected to his memory.

Reynolds, as is well known, always spoke of the work of his contemporary in terms of the highest admiration. In bringing this paper to a close, I cannot do better than append a brief quotation from Sir Joshua's "Academic Discourses":—

"If ever this nation should produce genius sufficient to acquire us the honourable distinction of an English School, the name of Gainsborough will be transmitted to posterity, in the history of art, among the very first of that rising name."

E. Browning Triscott.

Digitized by Google

The Bag Under the Thatch:

A BLACK COUNTRY STORY.

By MRS. COULSON KERNAHAN.

PROLOGUE.

DAN was beginning to think about dinner. Physical signs served him for a watch, or for the position of the sun, which answers that purpose for above-ground workers.

Dan's work lay far beneath the earth's surface, in solitude so profound that a change to the veritable tomb could, one would think, be scarcely perceptible.

Dan laid down his pick, and untied a handkerchief, which enveloped a basin in a fashion that formed a handle by which it might be more conveniently carried; he commenced his meal, his mind happily busy with thoughts that come faster and more clearly to the solitary underground toiler than to dwellers in the sunshine. Inward communings on many a big question led to solutions of problems, correct or not as may be, but satisfactory, at all events, to the man himself. This lonely pondering he felt to be his real life; while the garish Sundays spent above-ground with his family were to him times of exile in a strange land. He loved his family, but somehow he felt nearer to them all in the dark mine than at the bright fireside in the cottage.

Much money he had saved and laid under the thatch of the roof secretly—for he could neither read nor write, and such persons are always secretive and distrustful. This little hoard was lovingly laid by for the rainy day which might overtake his dear ones.

"Zeekial will go to work in a few years more," he pondered, thinking of a pinafored young rascal with rebel curls and unruly manners; "but he wunner rest without a mate, no more than his father did afore him, and he shanner find his father and mother a burden, and maybe he'll want a helping hand himsel'; and Dosha, her will find a mon early, with her pretty face and her taking ways, and her will be fine and surprised that her father can start her a bit."

Suddenly the lamp that Dan had fixed in a hook in the coal roof began to shudder, and went out. Then followed a rumbling sound, which drew nearer. Then came a deafening crash, and Dan threw himself flat down with some instinct of self-preservation, for he knew that above him lay tons of coal, but so lodged that he was not crushed. He passed his hands above and around the little space wherein he lay. His body nearly filled it. He realised the awful fact that he was buried alive, and began to think in a strange, calm way of others he had known who had been so buried, and wondered if this were in truth his grave. Then he prayed that he should soon be missed and searched for, and thought of the money hidden where none could find it if he should not be found. Then the consciousness of the horrible fate—that of slow starvation—that awaited him seemed to take possession of him, and the silence and solitude he had once so loved became a terror. Even the luxury of movement was denied him, or the relief of counting the passing of time. Presently a kindly unconsciousness came—to be followed only by an awful awakening.

Was it to-day or to-morrow? Was it night? and were the day workers gone up?

As unrecorded time dragged its slow length along, fuller realisation of his position came to Dan, and he broke down and wept like a child.

This despairing outburst over, the love of life reasserted itself, and he began his fierce fight against death.

Groping in the darkness for his candles, he counted them with his fingers, and then bit them into small portions. One portion he would eat at a time, making as long an interval between that and the next as the pangs of hunger would render possible.

Digitized by Google

For five mortal days Dan lay in that awful prison. He had come to his last piece of candle, and was now suffering great physical anguish, not only from hunger, but from the cramped position of his body, which he was quite unable to change. Pain alone kept him conscious. A dull despair had taken the place of wild hope and fear, and he had ceased to strain his ears for sounds which never came. The search for him had been given up—he knew it now.

He began to think of his Bible, which had always been read aloud in his cottage on Sundays, and the words came into his failing mind, and clasping his emaciated hands together, he prayed: "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!"

It was then that the sound of a pick broke upon his ear, and with a wild cry he lapsed into unconsciousness.

But this unconsciousness did not last long, and Dan awoke to a new terror. The sound of the pick had become so close. What if at the moment of salvation that instrument of freedom and life should give him his death-blow!

Now his name was being shouted by familiar voices, but Dan found himself utterly powerless to reply. The horror of the thought that his rescuers might go away threw him again into unconsciousness.

The next thing he knew was that God's sweet air was blowing upon him and God's sun dazzling his eyes.

I.

Outside the door of a thatched cottage stood a fine, handsome young man, stripped to the waist for performing his ablutions in a big stone bowl placed upon a pig-sticking bench, convenient for the purpose.

To the splashing of water there came an accompaniment of singing from within the cottage—a sweet, quavering woman's voice, which gave a touch of sadness to the gay melody:—

> The wench was gay,
> The wench was fair,
> And a laugh was in her eye,
> And the roses bloomed bright on her cheek
> When Ben he passed her by.

"Mother," called the man from outside, "just thee feel in my jacket pocket hanging in the washhouse; thee'lt find summat for tea."

And he put his head inside the cottage door, to see the effect of the opening of the parcel on one beloved face.

A woman in a neat wincey gown, with traces of beauty still lingering on her worn face, appeared from an inner room unwrapping a newspaper parcel, which she carried over to the occupant of the chimney corner, displaying the contents, and exclaiming: "Pigs' chitlin's, faither!"

The old man smiled and nodded approval at the face in the doorway.

"Zeekial always thinks of thee, dosner he, faither?" said his wife.

The old man smiled and nodded again.

Presently the "chitlin's" were hissing in a frying-pan, and Zeekial, "cleaned" and "dressed up," was sitting near his father, reading him the day's news.

This was the brightest hour of Dan Rily's day.

Ever since his accident in the mine he had but exchanged one prison for another. He had lost the use of the lower half of his body completely, and had never spoken one word since his rescue. It had been feared that he would be deaf for life, too. But his hearing had returned to him, though defectively. Fifteen years had passed since he had been cut off from all active part in life, and Zeekial was now nineteen, and had been a pit-worker for the last seven years, and Theodosia, his sister, who was a year younger, and had shown great aptitude for her needle, was now earning a small wage assisting the village dressmaker; so things were not going so badly with the little household.

But weary, arduous years had those first few been for Maria Rily after her husband's disablement, and they had left their record in lines upon the patient face. But she had not suffered as Dan had, for as he saw her each Saturday counting over her small earnings, and issuing forth to make her simple purchases, his heart ached well nigh to breaking, and great tears would roll silently down his cheeks, telling the tale his tongue refused to utter.

And when Maria, perceiving this, would steal towards him and kiss his sunken cheek with a brave smile and a cheery word, his cup of sorrow seemed full to overflowing. Oh, that he could tell her of the money that would mean so much to her, hidden so effectively, yet so close to her hand!

Digitized by Google

It was in those hard days that little Dosha, as she was always called, crept close into the father's heart. For the child meekly and silently gave up her playtime, and took upon her small shoulders what she could of the burden her mother had to bear. She washed the dishes, scrubbed and cleaned, and, this done, would seat herself on a wooden stool and mend and knit for the household, till her eyes drooped over the work, and her little rounded chin sank on to her breast.

It was not long before Dosha began to earn a trifle at the houses of rich pit-owners where her mother worked. It was probably what she saw of the better education of the children in these houses that put it into her head to attend free evening classes at a later period at the village school. But this had not been until Zeekial had begun to work in the mine.

At the period we have come to Maria needed to go out to work no more, and the hidden treasure ceased to be such a poignant pain to Dan.

The small round table was set for tea with gaudy crockery—a contribution from Zeekial, bought at Tunstall, a pottery town five miles distant—and the children were ready, together with a plate of pikelets.

"Mun us wait for Dosha?" Zeekial inquired.

"It's no good, I'm fearing," said Maria; "her's busy making mourning, and her may be late."

There had been, a few days before, one of those terrible accidents in a mine—not the one in which Zeekial worked, however—and many lives had been lost by choke-damp.

"Oh! if it's only the work as is keeping her, it don't so much matter," said Zeekial; "it's when her stays out with that Robbins as I gets agate."

"He don't seem such a bad sort of fellow, no more for that," observed the mother quietly, as she poured out the tea.

"But," flashed out Zeekial, "her's a stroke above a jagger! He's a queer chap is Robbins; he says he conner live without God's sun, and as how to work in the pit is like working in hell, and he walks along by his horse reading a poetry book all the way to the pit bank, and when he's got his load he comes back reading just the same, and all the other jaggers a-picking fun at him! If Dosha hadner gone to those evening classes her would never have met him there, and he wouldner have walked with her."

The object of these remarks was at that moment having his tea in the small upper room which he rented in a collier's cottage, for regular home he had none. His father's death from the falling of coal in the cutting where he was walking on his way to work happened on the day of Tom Robbins's birth, and his mother's frail life, proving unequal to the shock, had flickered out; and neither her eyes nor her husband's ever looked upon the bonny boy who would so much have gladdened their hearts. Hence Tom received his first impressions of life in the workhouse, and realised what failure and success meant at a very early period. Success he could study only in the abstract, however, but it was real to his mind, as was the failure he saw in all its ugly nakedness.

He elected to be a jagger because he must at least earn food and lodging, and because in the long, slow procession of jaggers he could read and improve himself, for no mental effort was required to walk at a horse's head on a straight, plain road; and his book was never out of his hand except while he loaded his cart and had it weighed.

While Tom partook of his tea he had still a book before him. It was Henry's first Latin book, and he was repeating over "Sum, fui, esse" between his hastily swallowed mouthfuls. Just behind him hung a primitive bookcase containing many treasured volumes, chiefly obtained at a second-hand shop at Newcastle, whither he journeyed most Saturdays to look at the books when he had no money to buy them. On his shelf were Milton's "Paradise Lost," Bacon's "Essays," Locke "On the Understanding," Boswell's "Johnson," Thomas à Kempis's "Imitation of Christ"—this latter, alas! in French, of which, as yet, Tom knew nothing—and Dekker's Plays, of which he knew a great deal, and which probably accounted somewhat for his great susceptibility to beauty in women.

But at this time there was but one woman in Tom's world, and she had quantities of wavy red hair, bright blue eyes, and a sweet oval face with a sprinkle of freckles upon it. She had two dimples, which were seldom seen, because they only appeared when she laughed, and she laughed rarely, though she smiled often.

Digitized by Google

As seven o'clock drew near, Tom put away his book and changed his coat, brushed his thick hair from his broad high forehead, took his hat and went out.

He was bound for the school, and the most direct road was not that which led past Dan Rily's cottage. It was that, however, which he chose; and to catch a glimpse of the light in Dan's cottage window five minutes sooner he crossed the Chapel Field, which was a desolate stretch of land, covered with worked-out mines half full of water. No chapel was there, but a heap of overgrown masonry told where one had once been. There would have been danger to the uninitiated in crossing this field in the twilight, but Tom could have found his way in the dark.

Just at the moment of climbing over the stile that led into Coalpit Lane Tom saw a slight figure dimly visible in the half light. His heart beat fast—but faster a moment later, when two voices in low conversation fell on his ear. He strained his eyes. Yes, there was the figure of a man too. He stood a moment and listened. Dosha's voice was one, and the other was, without doubt, that of Will Weaver, the pupil teacher at the school.

Tom stood still for a few moments to let them get ahead of him, and then walked slowly on, all the elation gone out of his heart, and a feeling of strong resentment against both Will Weaver and Dosha—especially against Dosha, for she, at least, knew what he meant to tell her some day when he should no longer be a jagger.

After awhile Tom quickened his steps, and was soon in sight of the light in Dan's window—but it had lost its interest for him. He strode past the cottage and on to the school.

II.

In a large room, containing rows of desks and an ugly pulpit, a grey-headed man, dressed in a shabby frock-coat, sat, most evenings, at a table with books and papers about him, and a huge pile of copper money at his elbow.

A sickly oil lamp which hung from the ceiling over his head but inadequately lit the long columns of figures he was engaged in checking. This was his usual occupation till his evening pupils arrived.

This room was used for both the boys and girls of the village to be taught in on week-days, and on Sundays it was used as a Dissenting meeting-house. The room immediately under it was the infant school.

The schoolmaster had started evening classes for the collier lads who wanted to get further education, and girls were admitted too. He made no charge for this instruction. He felt he was a sort of reformer—a pioneer of learning, and it was a great delight to him to impart knowledge.

His school was under Government, and it was only by the success of his scholars that he could get a "grant." Hence he worked very hard, with the aid of pupil teachers, to work up the raw material, in the shape of unruly children, before inspection day. This was work for bread. But the evening classes were a labour for love.

Amos Carlton was a bachelor, and his sister Harriet kept house for him. But, as she usually dropped asleep over her knitting in the early evening, Amos would have had a dull time but for his evening classes.

When Tom Robbins arrived at the school on this evening he was late, and he could hear, as he mounted the staircase leading to the upper room, the schoolmaster explaining the use of the accusative with the infinitive to his Latin class.

Tom took his seat quietly, not to interrupt Mr. Carlton, who was standing at the side of a blackboard, on which a passage of Latin was written in chalk.

Tom found himself seated next to a good-looking young woman, mistress of the infant school, and quite the most advanced student who attended the classes.

It was noticeable that Mr. Carlton generally lectured at her, and if she were absent he lectured at Tom. All the class looked upon Miss O'Grady as a miraculous being. She had been trained at Glasgow, and appeared in the village a person not at all to be understood.

Digitized by Google

She had dainty, ladylike ways, made no friends, and yet did not hesitate to take advantage of the teaching of Mr. Carlton, even though it meant the company of collier lads for a few hours every week. Of course there were elementary classes on some evenings, which she did not attend, and on those evenings something seemed lacking. Her bright Irish blue eyes, brimming over with intelligence, her clever answers to questions, and her great earnestness were very inspiring.

They missed, too, her pleasant "Good-night all," with which she always left. And their "Good-night, miss," albeit sheepish, had much of admiration in it.

After the class was over, which would be after nine o'clock, Tom remained behind to show Mr. Carlton a ballad he had written, and to obtain his criticism.

The two sat down at the schoolmaster's table, where still lay the books, papers, and bag of school-pence.

"You will sing some day, my lad," the schoolmaster commented, as he finished reading the verses.

"Sing!" exclaimed Tom—"why, I can't even sing a hymn!"

Mr. Carlton smiled.

"I mean," he said, "that some day you will write good verse; but you must study your English well. Never allow yourself to fall into dialect, even with your fellow-workmen; they are sure to laugh at you, but never mind that!"

Tom flushed with pleasure.

Then the schoolmaster went through the ballad, pointing out the faults, and encouraging the young aspirant, and finally took from a drawer in his table an old collection of sonnets and handed it to the young man, telling him to study them well.

After this he placed the bag of money in the drawer and locked it, and cleared away his books and papers, and Tom said good-night.

III.

Miss O'Grady had barely reached home that night and seated herself to partake of the supper her landlady had put ready for her, before there was a knock at her door. Her sitting-room door opened upon the street.

It was no other than Dosha Rily, with a parcel from Miss Gill, the dressmaker.

Miss O'Grady glanced at the girl's face as she stood in the lamplight, and noticed that she was very pale.

"Sit down," she said kindly; "you look tired out, you must have a cup of my hot cocoa."

Theodosia's eyes filled at these friendly words, and she took the cup from the schoolmistress's hand with a grateful smile and "Thee art very good, miss!"

"You have been overworked, I expect," went on Miss O'Grady, as she cut the string of her parcel. "This dress could have waited."

"O miss, it wasner thy dress!" Dosha hastened to explain; "that were welly done afore the mourning came in, and I dunner mind work, but I'm a bit put about to-night. I met someone coming here, and we had a few words."

It was the last thing in Dosha's mind to be communicative, but the kind Irish face seemed to draw the admission from her.

But having said this, the flood-gates were open. Dosha had always had a great admiration for this "foreigner," as any stranger was called in this out-of-the-way village. There was something magnetic about her, too.

"He wur coming from the class, and he seed me, and set agate of me, because he said I wur going with Will Weaver; and I told him I wasner tied to him, and wasner likely to be."

And with this the pretty dressmaker fell to weeping.

"Don't cry about him, foolish girl, if you don't want him to be anything to you," said the schoolmistress cheerfully.

"Nay, miss, but I didner mean it, and now he wull never have nowt to do with me," broke out Dosha passionately.

"Oh! if that is all," said Miss O'Grady consolingly, "it will all come right; but if you care for this man, you should not walk out with anyone else, should you now?"

"I didner, miss," cried Dosha indignantly. "Will Weaver wur coming my road, that wur all, and he walked alongside of me till I took my road and he hisen. He wur just talking about the classes, that wur all, sure and certain, miss. I wouldner walk out with no one but Tom Robbins."

"It is Tom Robbins, is it, Dosha?" said Miss O'Grady, with a real show of interest. "Well, Mr. Carlton says that young man will gain a position for himself some day, though he is only a jagger to-day; and, Dosha, you are wise to attend the classes and improve yourself, for his sake. Why don't you try to speak correctly, as he does? It would please him, and you do know how to talk properly, I know."

Digitized by Google

"Oh, I canner for shame, miss; if I wur away from here I would, but, miss, they all picks fun of Tom, and they would of me—and I canner do it. But I mun be going; it's late, and poor faither wunner go to bed afore I come."

When the door was closed behind her Dosha hurried along the dark road, feeling altogether more cheerful for her chat with Miss O'Grady. Presently she was conscious of footsteps following her, and in a moment more an arm was round her waist. "Dosha, dear, you didn't mean it, did you?" pleaded Tom's voice.

"Nay, Tom, I didner," came in a choked voice.

"Don't cry, my little wench," said Tom tenderly.

"I isner," said Dosha, sobbing violently.

"Look here, Dosha, I don't know what I'm aiming at but to get education as yet; but I want to get out of this and be something some day, and whatever comes to me I want to share with you. I love you so much I can't bear another man to speak to you, and when I saw you with Will Weaver——"

Here Dosha broke in with an explanation.

"I thought you were never coming out of Miss O'Grady's," said Tom when she had finished, "and that perhaps you guessed I should be waiting for you and stayed on purpose—but it's all right now, isn't it, dear?"

By this time they had reached Dan's cottage, and at the door Tom gave Dosha his first kiss.

When Dosha opened the cottage door her face still wore the blush that kiss had called forth, and it was observed by both her parents and brother—the two former with a tender anxiety, the latter with a heavy frown.

The girl closed the door and flew to her father's chair, kissing his wrinkled forehead with an unusual tenderness.

"Didst thee come home with that jagger chap?" inquired Zeekial roughly.

"And what if I did!" replied his sister defiantly. "It isner thy business."

"Then, my wench, I'll make it mine, so I've told thee! The next time I catch thee with him I'll give him a hiding as he'll not get over in a hurry."

The poor dumb father raised his wasted hand imploringly.

"Oh, dunner get agate with her," broke in the mother.

"Mother," said Zeekial firmly, "I mun look after the wench, her faither canner, and that Tom Robbins is next door to an innocent—he'll do naught of no good. He's everlasting reading rubbish instead of looking to make a man of himself, and our Dosha isn't going to be roped up to no jagger!"

As is the way with girls, Dosha began to cry, whereupon Zeekial, who hated what he termed "screiking," opened the door which closed in the stairs and departed to bed without a good-night.

When he was gone the girl dried her eyes and took off her hat in silence, while her mother, who was herself surreptitously applying the corner of her apron to her eyes, busied herself in getting supper for her daughter.

"Dunner thee mind, my wench," she said, as she placed a chair for the tired girl. "Thee hast always been a good wench, and I wouldn't stand in thy light, though I did think thee could have chose higher than a jagger."

"O mother!" cried Dosha, "he isner what Zeekial thinks. He'll do summat fine with his book learning some day; the schoolmaister said as much. Thee wait and see."

She sat down near her father, and he smiled and stroked her hair.

Presently the rain pelted down in torrents, and footsteps were heard overhead. A moment more, and Zeekial's head appeared at the door. "Give me a bowl, mother," he called; "the rain is pouring down on to my bed. I'm going to 'play' to-morrow, and I'll put a new thatch on this roof—it hasner been done since father did it."

At these words a curious excitement spread over the old man's face.

True to his word, Zeekial borrowed a ladder and set about mending the thatch next day.

A beautiful morning had followed the rain, and Mrs. Rily sat outside on the pig-bench to peel her potatoes and talk with her son. Presently he called to her:

Digitized by Google

"Mother, if here isner a bag full of summat!"

Mrs. Rily sprang to her feet.

"O Zeekial, it must be money! I always thought as faither had hid some and couldner tell us where."

"It's money right enough," said Zeekial, "and we can find it now as we've no need for it."

Tears came into the woman's eyes as her son descended the ladder, for she thought of those days of struggle when this money could have done so much for her.

Zeekial placed the bag in his mother's hand, and she rushed with it into the cottage, holding it up before her husband.

The old man held out his hand for it, and tears trickled down his furrowed cheeks—he, too, was thinking how much this money could have done for that patient, uncomplaining wife of his in those hard days when the children were small.

. . . . . .

The following evening Zeekial came home from the pit, his eyes ablaze, and, ignoring the bowl of water standing ready for him outside, sat down, black as he was, and scowled. Dosha, who had come home early on this day, cast furtive glances at him, not daring to speak. His father and mother stared at him, waiting. Something had happened.

After a few moments Zeekial broke out:

"There's a nice blâte about the village, I can tell you," he began. "That book-reading jagger is a thief!"

Dosha uttered a cry and sank down on a stool at her father's feet—the stool where she had sat and sewn as a child.

"Yea, a thief!" went on Zeekial, "and everyone is blâting about it! After evening school last night Tom Robbins stayed behind with the schoolmaister, and the schoolmaister turned a bit bad, and he asked Tom Robbins to lock up his desk for him and see him home. And the bag of school pence is stole, and Tom, he's the thief; and the schoolmaister, he's a ruined man if he can't make up that money before committee day. The schoolmaister says Tom never did take the money—but who did if he didner?"

Dosha sobbed, and her mother stared blankly from one to another. At last her eyes fastened on her husband, and she saw he was pointing to a little corner cupboard with a trembling hand.

She understood him, and took the newly-found bag of money from an old teapot and gave it to him. He dropped it into Dosha's lap.

"Ah! thee can maybe save the schoolmaister with that there money," laughed Zeekial scornfully, "but thee canner make that blackguard no thief."

At that moment the "blackguard" himself stood in the doorway, and making straight for his sweetheart, took her hands in his.

"Dosha, my girl, I was afraid this story might have reached you, and I went round to Miss Gill's, and she told me you had gone home, so I came."

"And out thee goes!" cried Zeekial savagely—"a jagger wur bad enough—but a thief——"

"Wait a bit," broke in Tom, facing his accuser, but not relinquishing Dosha's hand. "The schoolmaster found that he had put the school money into the bag he sometimes takes to school with books in it—it had never been in the desk at all that day. He did it without knowing it, not being well."

Zeekial looked at Tom for a moment, then thrust out a grimy hand.

"Thee can take Dosha," he said; "it is the only amend I con make thee."

And it was enough.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

COMMON SENSE FOR MOTHERS AND NURSES.

A SERIES OF ARTICLES

By Dr. Julia Holmes Smith.

NUMBER NINE.

How to Meet Emergencies; Sudden Illnesses.

SOME months ago, while enjoying the comfort of tea at home with my family, the bell rang furiously and a dishevelled housemaid cried: "Come, please, at once! Baby is taken so queer!"

When I arrived a cursory glance through the room revealed a dozen women of ages varying from twenty-five to fifty, and the young mother, the centre of an anxious group, holding in her arms a child in the throes of convulsions. To plunge the baby in a warm bath, 92 deg. Fahrenheit, and put cold water to its head were the work of a moment, and I said to myself: "I wonder why in the world not one of these women knew what to do!"

An attack of this sort may be the forerunner of very grave disease, and, as such, indicates a severe type of the malady. Diphtheria, scarlet fever, cerebro-spinal meningitis, even pneumonia and dysentery, are sometimes ushered in. Dentition is accompanied by convulsions, especially in children of a nervous temperament; and often from overloading the stomach a sensitive child may be thus afflicted.

The convulsion, whether arising independently or as a precursor of another disease, is usually preceded by some characteristic symptoms. The mother, if she have the habit of observing her child with care, will notice irritability, restlessness, drowsiness and a sort of staring expression of the eyes, and she wonders why John or Harry, Ruth or Jane has changed so much. The truth is, the little one simply feels uncomfortable and does not know exactly what is the matter, and the convulsion may come like a streak of lightning out of a clear sky, and may even follow a little disturbance caused by the mother's ill-temper or a nurse's hasty word. The indications are unmistakable.

There is a peculiar fixed, staring expression, a cry pitched very high and seeming to have no reason in it, the thumbs are drawn toward the palm of the hand, the toes are rigidly fixed, and consciousness is lost; the body seems rigid, breathing irregular, face at first pale, then livid and congested. This lasts what seems half a lifetime to the loving mother, but is but a minute, then all the muscles of the body alternately relax and contract, and a froth oozes from the lips. The breathing is very irregular, and occasionally the little one catches the tongue between the teeth and with the foam that exudes from the lips some little blood may come. An attack of this sort is not necessarily grave, but it should certainly cause the mother to send at the earliest possible moment for her doctor, although the best of the work can be done long before the doctor comes, and it is my privilege to suggest some of the simpler treatment which can be attended to in the meantime.

Get some hot water as quickly as possible, sprinkle a little mustard in it, and be careful the water is not too hot, for fear of accident. Remember 90 to 100 degrees Fahrenheit is about right: better begin with 90 degrees, and gradually increase. Cold cloths should be placed on the head, and this should be kept up with the bath, for about ten minutes, or until the child shows symptons of recovering consciousness; then have it gently wiped, rolled in a warm blanket, and put to bed.

It is always safe to use some little emetic like salt and water; and if the pulse seems weak, rub wrists and ankles briskly to stimulate the circulation.

Digitized by Google

In the early part of my life, I had a very grave experience with a child who was never able to eat a potato. One or two meals of baked or boiled potato would be quite sufficient to set the little fellow in convulsions. The frantic attempts of the family to save him from what seemed to them imminent death annoyed me very seriously, since the whole difficulty could have been avoided had only some care been taken in regard to the child's diet.

So much for convulsions. The next cause for anxiety is the colic. When a baby, apparently in perfect health, wakes from sleep with wild cries, the first thought of the mother is, "Surely baby is hungry," and her first impulse is to supply needed nourishment. I would most earnestly beg that no one would be so unwise as to supply food to the poor little stomach which is protesting by pain against some cause for discomfort. Baby may be thirsty; therefore, give him a drink. Baby may be cold; warm his feet and bowels. But if these simple remedies do not avail, then unbutton his clothing and look at his abdomen, and if you have a case of colic you will see a swollen and sometimes knotted condition of the intestines underneath the abdominal walls.

This knotted condition is due to the accumulation of gas, caused by imperfect digestion, and as the hand presses on the abdomen the pain is relieved. Baby naturally draws his legs up when in pain; then, because this gives him no comfort, he sticks them out again; and so kicks and throws himself about and emits short, sharp, piercing screams, and the little face indicates extreme suffering. Hands and feet may be very cold, and common-sense would suggest that an extra heat should be applied; so place the baby on its abdomen, let the toes come as near as possible to the fire, rub the back gently, placing the tips of the fingers towards the sides, kneading the abdomen from behind toward the navel.

A half-teaspoonful of hot and slightly-sweetened water will be a comfort to the little sufferer, and when the child is tired of lying on its face, turn it only toward the right side, but rarely to the left or on its back, because a person lying on the left side or on the back increases the tension of the abdomen.

Our grandmothers used catnip tea and fennel-seed tea, but the real advantages derived from these concoctions is really from the quantity of heat given internally to supplement external warmth.

The third source of anxiety and deadly terror to the mother is the sudden barking cough, which comes usually in the "wee sma'" hours of the night, and suggests some disturbance of the respiratory organs. This is a veritable bugbear, and presents itself in two forms. One mild and seldom fatal, which is usually preceded by a slight cold with hoarseness, and is caused by an accumulation which flows freely during the day from the nose, but at night stuffs up the breathing apparatus. There is some little inflammation of the larynx and the throat, and a little fever, and the child seems almost smothering, catching its breath in expiration. This mild form is called catarrhal croup, is much more frequent, and the mother or nurse can do a great deal to give the child comfort and mitigate the severity of the attack. A comfortable hot bath and a little vaseline rubbed over nose and chest, or the old-fashioned remedy of goose grease used as a lubricant of the external parts, will be very valuable. If the physician is near at hand, the mother needs no suggestion as to remedies, and may use simply the hot bath and external applications; but if by any chance she lives out of town, and the symptoms seem very grave, then an allopathic physician would administer syrup of squills or ipecac in quantities sufficient to cause vomiting, and a homeopathic physician would order aconite and spongia in alternation, or heparsulphur, given in small doses.

The second most alarming form of croup is called true, or membraneous, croup, and is due to the obstruction of the air passages by a membrane. There is little hoarseness, some fever, and a sort of depression during respiration. The real difference between these two forms can only be discovered by the most careful examination. A mother will hardly be able to differentiate between the sharp, barking cough of the simple catarrhal croup and the crowing sound, as the air comes through the narrowest passage, which tells the doctor that his case is at its inception beyond his aid.

In all cases of croup no time should be lost in sending for a doctor.

Next month I shall deal with "How to Meet Emergencies in the Case of Accidents."

Digitized by Google

Conducted by
THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.

THE CRUTCH-AND-KINDNESS LEAGUE.

Some time ago in a wearied mood I spoke of the difficulty of making bricks without straw—that is, hammering away month after month, year after year, on behalf of the poor cripples of London without helps or hints from members of the League—while at the same time I expressed the conviction that if my good-hearted friends were only aware of the difficulty they would gladly come to my help. One friend has promptly verified my prophecy. Her letter is a most touching one, with the additional advantage of fairly representing the condition of hundreds upon hundreds of the poor little "prisoners of God" in the great city. She says—

DEAR SIR,—In looking over the children's corner of the TEMPLE MAGAZINE I note your wish that members of the Crutch-and-Kindness League would give some of their experiences with their crippled charges; it may interest you to have some particulars of my own girl, Ellen A——, of ——, Canning Town. When I applied for membership I mentioned that being an adult I was willing to take an older boy or girl, so Ellen was given me, and I much regret that I did not know of the League earlier, having been a member only since April last.

Poor Ellen! hers is a sad life; twenty-one years old, unable to read or write, as she has been feeble-minded since her babyhood. She cannot do anything for herself, needs as much attention as a little child, and can only walk with someone holding her, or by dragging herself along by means of the wall. It is spinal disease that has gripped her, never to loose its hold in this life. Her mother writes me for her, and has given me a great insight into their life. They are as poor as can be, I think; Mrs. A. has been a widow four years and all she has to depend on is shirt work, and such miserably paid work it is! She gets the shirts—only rough ones—made at a shop. On each shirt she makes five button holes, sews on five buttons, and overcasts all the corners, and for this she gets one farthing—threepence per dozen shirts! If she has enough work for a week, sitting very closely, the utmost she can earn is five shillings, and out of this has 2s. weekly rent to pay for one back room, leaving only 3s. at the most for everything else for herself and Ellen.

I have read in newspapers of "sweating.' Is not this a sample of it? Imagine making 1,200 button-holes, and sewing on as many buttons, all for 5s. It is horrible. Yet she often does not earn even that amount; it was but sevenpence one week, being Bank Holiday week, when the shopkeeper had gone to Brighton for several days, and there was no work to be given out till next week. Mrs. A. says she cannot do any other work, such as charing, because she has rheumatism badly in hands and feet. Thanks to some kind friends, I have been able to help them in a small measure, but my means are so limited that I cannot do all I would. Ellen has some small pleasures now and then; a married sister, who lives near, takes her out occasionally—a ride by tram to Victoria Park if there are any coppers to spare, and sometimes they have the loan of an invalid chair from a lady. Through the kindness, too, of the Ragged School Union, Ellen is promised a day's outing, with her sister to take care of her, and is looking forward to it most eagerly.

All these particulars I have gathered by degrees, and really I am surprised how they like to hear from me, and it gives me as much pleasure to receive Mrs. A's. letters; I always enclose means to reply. Her other children are older and all married, and too poor to help her much. I know what large demands there are on the Ragged School Union's funds, but I should be so glad if a little assistance could be given to these two poor things. Mrs. A. told me a lady visitor had given them some articles of clothing a short time ago. I could tell you much more but am afraid of taking up too much of your time, only I must add that I became acquainted with the Crutch and Kindness League through a volume of the TEMPLE MAGAZINE borrowed from the Free Library here.

I am lame myself, but can get about.

Believe me,
Yours very sincerely,
"M. W. M."

In the above most graphic and pathetic letter I have suppressed names and addresses though the sympathetic writer has given them fully, her own number in the League being 5,010.

Digitized by Google

The drift of her letter brings to my mind a scene of which I was an eye-witness. My attention had been called to a girl in an almost identical state of helplessness to that of the one about whom this kindly correspondent has written. During several years I visited her, making what little alleviations in her sad lot I could. Though utterly limp and helpless, she had grown a handsome girl to look at, with abundance of fair hair, plump features, a beautiful complexion, and large, soft blue eyes. Her mother was a widow, and the two rooms were inhabited by this girl, her mother, grandmother, uncle, and aunt. The uncle was a carman with Pickford, the women folk did washing and charing, as they could. All were perfectly steady and self-respecting, though very poor. One day I was sent for to come quickly, because the grandmother was taken seriously ill. I jumped on my bicycle, and in a few minutes was in the house. What a scene! On the bed in one room was the grandmother, a big woman, laboriously breathing her last. Near the window the uncle was bending over his wife, who had fainted, while in another corner of the room, on the floor, lay the helpless girl huddled in a swoon, while her mother kept running in and out doing her best to attend to all, occasionally wiping the brow of the dying. How little most people know of the circumstances under which the crippled poor live their lives!—yet there are many kind hearts who would be only too glad to do what they could to alleviate their sufferings, and I am grateful to think that the Crutch-and-Kindness League has done something to bring together the sufferers and willing helpers.

The comparative rarity with which a cripple is seen in the streets of London may well take the reader aback as he learns that there are no less that 6,000 poor crippled children in London alone, hundreds of whom never get beyond the walls of their little room, except on sad excursions to and from the hospital. What the League aims at is to bring a little sunshine into the lot of these unhappy children in a manner within the reach of all sympathetic hearts, no matter where they are situated. It only asks that, once a month at least, each member should write a letter, or send some illustrated magazine or toy, ribbon, or such-like token of friendly interest, to the cripple child put into his or her care, with all particulars for this purpose. Anything beyond this is entirely at the member's own power or discretion—but the League does not ask for more. This kindness, it will be seen, can be done by all, young or old, rich or poor, far-off or near; accordingly the membership of the League now extends to almost every part of the world.

And oh! the joy of these poor lonesome things at the visit from the postman with a letter all to themselves, and how the thrill cheers them, by memory and anticipation, till the next letter or paper arrives! With such an opportunity laid before them the invalid and the infirm can find outlet for their sympathy and the young and strong can be trained in kindness,

All further particulars may be had for a stamp from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary, Ragged School Union, 32, John-street, Theobalds-road, London, W.C.

NEW MEMBERS FOR THE MONTH.

Miss Violet M. Walker, Harrow; Mrs. Robert Evans, Wales; Mrs. Darke, Kingston; Miss Leeson, Croydon; Mrs. Everett, New South Wales; Miss Carr, Malton; Miss Rosser, Kempston; Miss Gilpin, Yorkshire; Miss Sweet, Romford; Mrs O'Neal, Liscard; Mr. H. Barfoot, Radstock; Miss A. Miles, Hove; Miss Wallace, Barry; Miss Breitback, E. Dulwich; Miss Field, Bath; Mr. Howard Batstone, Bath; Miss Daisy Deane, Barbados; Miss Hardy, C.E. Girls, Hull; Miss Hardy, C.E. Boys, Hull; Miss M. Singleton Lewis, Wales; Mrs. Gittens, Sheffield; Miss H. M. Chadbourne, Enfield; Miss Elsie Bronard, Guernsey; Miss H. J. Scott, Herne Hill; Miss Dora Champion, Natal; Miss Alice Ashman, care of Miss Footit, Woodford Green; Miss Hettie Hutchinson, Boscombe; Miss Drue Sinclair, Windermere; Miss Mary Kathleen Topham, Kilburn; Miss Amy Barfield, Kilburn; Miss Winnie Hurrell, Walthamstow; Miss Bishop, Brixton; Mrs. Arthur C. Franklin, Natal.

PRIZE COMPETITION.

"MY PETS."

Of several contributions sent in on this theme I have space for only three—which are fair specimens, however, of all the others. A very kindly little picture this one makes :—

Parsonage Farm, Chisledon, Swindon.

We have got 1 dog and 2 cats. The dog is called Ben, and the cats Tabicia and Alleluia. Ben and Tabicia used to play together, and the dog would drag the cat about by the tail, and then he would jump on him, and pretend to bite him, when the cat would give him a rap on the nose with his paw. I used to come out every morning at the same time and out of the same door to give them some milk, and they would all 3 be there waiting for me. The other, named Alleluia, always comes with me if I climb a tree.

MARY NOELLE WALKER (Age 11¾ years).

How well this next shows the kindly feeling created by having the care of pets:—

MY DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I have not written to you before, but I thought that I should like to try the competition on "The best story about a pet." I have a lovely puss called "Tiger;" he is the most sensible cat I ever saw, and when you speak to him he always mews back as if in answer to what you have said to him. We call him Tiger because he is so big and beautifully striped all down his back and sides and legs; he weighs about eleven and a half pounds, and is about seven or eight years old. He comes up to bed at night, and sleeps there all the night till you get up in the morning, and when you go down to breakfast he comes and begs so beautifully for something to eat, that you really cannot refuse to give him anything. And when the dinner, tea, and supper bells ring he always comes in. We have moved to another house for three months and he will not stay here, at the present he is at the other house. I could say a lot more about him but I might say too much owing to shortness of space.

I remain, your sincerely,

GEORGINA MARY JOAN JACKSON (Age 11½ years).

Digitized by Google

The following is very rich and racy, and has been reckoned the best of the batch. To the writer, accordingly, the prize has been awarded. Another encouragement to my young friends not to be cast down by one or two failures, but to try, try, and try again.

OUR RABBIT.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I was very pleased and surprised to see my letter in print and seeing that there is another competition I thought I would write again. We have had a great number of pets, but the one I am going to write about is a rabbit. He was quite white, with bright pink eyes, and at first we called him Snowball, but it was too long and we generally called him Bunnie. We were all very fond of him and father made him a hutch, but he was very seldom in it. He used to run about either in the house or garden.

When he went into the garden we knew there was trouble in store, but, for all that, we let him go out. When he was out, before you could turn round, he was making a hole under the fence and making the best of his way through into the next-door garden. We have a large garden, and he used to run so quickly that he nearly always got where he wanted to. We used to have most exciting chases after him. At the bottom of our garden are the grounds of a private lunatic asylum, and one day he got into these grounds somehow (how he could, I don't know, as they are bounded by a stone wall), and we, not knowing he was there, thought he was lost, for he did not come back until a couple of days later in the arms of the gardener, who wanted to know if it was ours. We were all very pleased to see him, and he never went there again.

Sometimes he used to go two gardens off and then there was trouble. The gentleman who owned the garden had some lovely roses growing there, and our naughty rabbit used to go and spoil them and trample over the other flowers. All our neighbours knew our rabbit, and it was quite a household word. One gentleman threatened to chain it up, another to make a pie of it, and sundry other awful threats, but these did not affect our rabbit. But the greatest fun of all was catching him to put him back in his hutch. If we had friends they used to assist us until we were all tired and quite helpless with laughter. In and out of the raspberry canes, behind the lilac bushes, and my brother used to scramble in among the bushes and send him out from that secure retreat, and so sometimes he even went next door where the chase was carried on by fresh pursuers, for there was a houseful of girls and boys there, and great was the noise with laughing and tumbling over one another. When at last we did catch the truant he looked so innocent and fat, that we used to go off in fresh fits of laughter, and so sometimes he used to get away again, after all. We used to have to throw a cloth over him, for he was so slippery that we could not just catch hold of him with our hands for he would slip out of them again, and it was a most comical sight to see us frantically waving and throwing cloths and aprons, etc., about. In the winter we used to let him run about the house and he used to run up and down the stairs like a kitten. Sometimes in the night we children were frightened by hearing a funny tapping and scraping kind of noise. It was the incorrigible rabbit tapping in a peculiar way with his hind legs, for he could get into our rooms, as we always had the doors open. Another good joke was to see him fighting the cat. He used to stand, or half sit, on his hind legs, and very rapidly beat up and down with his front paws, so that the cat could not reach him and had to retreat. The cat was quite afraid of him. Sometimes he used to jump on mother's lap, just like a kitten. He was frightfully spoilt, and he used to eat everything we had, and would even drink tea and milk.

At last he got so fat that he died, and that was the end of our dear old rabbit. We have had a great number of pets, among others we have had canaries, tortoises, dogs, mice, and cats innumerable. We have two cats now, a mother and her son. The mother does not know her son, as she has been living elsewhere, and the two have dreadful fights.—Yours sincerely,

CONNIE FOOT (Aged 14).

14, Melody-road, Wandsworth, S.W.

You youngsters all see visions and dream dreams, and have quite a familiar acquaintance with fairies. Some of you, too, hope to be authors one day. Very good! I want you to try your pen now by writing me a fairy tale, not longer than 200 words, all out of your own head! Can you do it? Try! The next competition then will be :—

"MY FAIRY TALE."

Write on one side of the paper only, give name, address, and age (under 16), and send on or before the 20th of this month to Rev. J. Reid Howatt, The Crescent, The Grove, Denmark Hill, London, S.E., and I shall give a handsome book for the best story.

Digitized by Google

Medland Hall,

"A HOME for LOST & STARVING MEN."

The only Free Shelter in London open all the year round.

2,400 Free Beds provided EVERY WEEK.

Last Year's admissions for the night	148,820
Additional supplied with food ..	14,494
Number of different men helped in 1900	12,896
At Sunday Evening Services	29,324

Average cost—less than 1½d. per man per night.
Over 400 men have been settled in Canada.

A Gift of Two Guineas endows a Bed for Twelve Months.

*

Contributions welcomed by Rev. A. Mearns or Mr. E. Wilson Gates (Superintendent of the work) at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C.

The Children's Home - and Orphanage,

Chief Office—

BONNER ROAD, LONDON, N.E.

Branches—LONDON, LANCASHIRE, BIRMINGHAM, CANADA, etc.

Principal—Rev. Arthur E. GREGORY, D.D.

Vice-Principal—Rev. R. Bevan SHEPHERD, M.A.

*

1,200 children in residence.

5,000 rescued.

£60 PER DAY NEEDED FOR SUPPORT OF THE HOME.

Many are crippled, epileptic, infirm.

No Election by Subscribers.

NEED not CREED is considered in receiving cases.

*

Contributions should be sent to Rev. Arthur E. Gregory, The Children's Home, Bonner Rd., N.E.

Cheques crossed London, City and Midland.

WHAT IS THE

Crutch & Kindness League?

It is part of the RAGGED SCHOOL UNION, which was founded nearly 60 years ago by the good Earl of Shaftesbury.

The Society has a Register of over 6,000 Crippled, Maimed, and Suffering Children. This is the CRUTCH, and the KINDNESS is asked for from the readers of Temple Magazine. Money, of course, is needed for Holidays, Surgical Instruments, Apprenticeships, Mail Carts, Boots, Clothing, Beef Tea, and Dainties of all kinds. Toys and Dolls are also in great request.

The Society has many other branches of Christ-like work amongst the poor children of the London slums. The Council ask for help.

Will YOU lend a hand?

All contributions and parcels should be sent to the Secretary—

Mr. JOHN KIRK,

Ragged School Union and Shaftesbury Society,

32, John Street, Theobalds Road, LONDON, W.C.

URGENT.

To complete the Good Samaritan Work of the

'Liberator' Relief Fund.

After eight years' earnest pleading, a further £10,000, or 200,000 shillings, still urgently needed to give relief to hundreds of aged, destitute, and afflicted victims of the great "Liberator" fraud, who were taught and trained in habits of temperance and thrift by their trusted leaders, only to find themselves suddenly robbed of their life-savings, and driven to face the dreaded workhouse, in spite of all their praiseworthy endeavours to make some provision for their old age.

Ninety per cent. of these sufferers are members of some section of the Christian Church.

"Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

There are 3,014 cases on the Books of the Fund, of whom—

1,548 are Widows or Spinsters. 1,486 are over 60 years of age. 824 are over 70 years of age. 223 are over 80 years of age. Over 400 deaths through the disaster.

The Bitter Cry For Help

Is still coming to the Committee from sufferers who have bravely borne with their difficulties, till sickness or great destitution has compelled them to apply.

Cheques and P.O.'s should be made payable to the "Liberator" Relief Fund, crossed "The London City and Midland Bank," and sent to the Secretary—

REV. J. STOCKWELL WATTS,
16, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Needham's Paste

METAL POLISHING

FREE FROM GREASE ACID AND GRIT.

Over 75 years reputation as the best and most economical preparation for producing a perfect polish on Brass, Copper, Tin, Britannia-Metal, &c.&c.

Sole Manufacturers: JOSEPH PICKERING & SONS. SHEFFIELD.

SCRIVEN.

Over 70 years' Established Reputation.

NEAVE'S FOOD

"Highly Nutritious." Lancet.

FOR INFANTS & INVALIDS.

Used in the Russian Imperial Nursery.

Gold Medal awarded, Woman's Exhibition, 1900.

RHEUMATISM, LUMBAGO, BRONCHITIS, NEURALGIA, &c.

SMEDLEY'S CHILLIE PASTE

Bottles 1/1½ 1/6 2/9 Of all Chemists

GIVES INSTANT RELIEF. DOES NOT BLISTER.

The most obstinate cases of Rheumatism, Lumbago, Neuralgia, &c., are at once relieved by the outward application of SMEDLEY'S CHILLIE PASTE, together with an occasional dose of LASCELLES' PILLS.

Bottles, 1/1½ and 2/9, of all Chemists.

Sole Proprietors—HIRST, BROOKE, AND HIRST, Ltd., LEEDS.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS,

AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

BENGER'S FOOD FOR INFANTS,

INVALIDS and the AGED.

DELICIOUS, NUTRITIVE, AND DIGESTIBLE.

GOLD MEDAL,

Health Exhibition, London.

Benger's Food is not only highly nutritious, but is most easily digested, and is so delicious that it is enjoyed by the youngest Infant or the most delicate Invalid.

Benger's Food is sold in TINS by Chemists, &c., everywhere.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

FOR HOME AND SUNDAY READING.

VOL. 6. NOVEMBER, 1901. No. 2.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

WAITING FOR THE GUESTS.

Photo by Alice Hughes.

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.

"The Standard of Highest Purity."

—The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

INVALUABLE FOR NURSING MOTHERS.

A Delicious and Wholesome Tonic—Refreshing, Invigorating, and Sustaining.

EASILY DIGESTED BY THE MOST DELICATE.

Brewed by Messrs. BEAMISH & CRAWFORD, Ltd., Cork, from the Finest Malt and Hops, and Guaranteed by them to be ABSOLUTELY PURE.

An EMINENT DOCTOR says:—

"I can strongly recommend BEAMISH'S STOUT. I have prescribed it for many of my patients with excellent results."

LABORATORY, 24, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.
March 4th, 1901.

A careful analysis has been made of this sample of Beamish's Stout, as a result of which I am able to state that it is an excellent one. It is good in flavour, high in extractive matters, rich in albuminoids, yet contains only a very moderate amount of alcohol, and is very low in acidity. Although I understand the sample which I have received has been in bottle for two years, no active fermentation is taking place.

LAWRENCE BRIANT, F.C.S., F.R.M.S.

Agents Wanted Everywhere.

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

This is the only Stout which will not introduce into the system unfermented yeast cells, and consequently it can be taken by the most delicate without fear of indigestion.

Delivered carriage free to any address in the United Kingdom in Cases containing 3 dozen reputed pints, Price 18/- per case.

Wholesale Agents to whom all communications should be addressed—

GENDALL & CO., 34, Norfolk St., Strand, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 12 12 1901

Digitized by Google

"NEGO" FIRELIGHTERS

Are a scientifically prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. ONE OF THESE FIRELIGHTERS IS QUITE SUFFICIENT TO BOIL A KETTLE IN A FEW MINUTES.

Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d.; or twenty packets will be sent post free on receipt of 5s. P.O.

A Sample "NEGO" Firelighter will be sent post free on application.

Sole Wholesale Agents for the United Kingdom CENDALL & CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, W.C.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

FIT AND FASHION.

FIT.—In "Sorosis" Boots and Shoes, comfort in wearing is guaranteed by our system of fitting. Our stock contains each size and half-size from 1's to 9's, and each size is stocked in seven different widths and fittings.

FASHION.—75 different styles of "Sorosis" to select from, in every shade and shape that experience and capital can devise.

SOROSIS

TRADE MARK REGISTERED

The Great American footwear for Ladies and Children.

ALWAYS AT 15/- THE ONE PRICE.

Children's 10/6. Misses' 12/6.

SOROSIS SHOE Co., Regent House, Regent St., LONDON, W.

Catalogues post free. Please mention this Magazine.

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

A DAINTY TEA-GOWN.

There are all sorts of pretty notions in the heads of the leading dressmakers for fashioning dainty tea-gowns and tea-jackets, morning-robes and dressing-gowns for autumn and winter wear. One of the prettiest of these is carried out in a pale ivory-white cashmere. The gown, as shown in the sketch, is full and flowing, and quite loose about the bodice, yet gathered into the figure about the waistline by means of tuckings set on at regular intervals. Through these tuckings a black velvet waistband is slid, forming the trimming. This belt is made of ribbon velvet, and can be tied into a large sash knot in the centre of the back. The sleeves are cut in a very large bell, and edged with handsome steel embroidery. Above the embroidery are set lines of insertion, through which are run narrow velvet ribbons to correspond with the waistband. The neck arrangement is prettiest of all, for it is fashioned in the fichu style of soft cream-coloured mousseline de soie, it being caught round the shoulders and edged with embroidery to match that used upon the sleeves. Again, the pretty lace trimming is inserted with a narrow black baby ribbon, while this is finished with a very full rosette and tags at the bend of the figure of the same black velvet. This gown is cut in a low V-shape, but it would be quite possible to fill it in with a dainty tucked chemisette of white chiffon or muslin. Such a gown need not be lined unless extra warmth is desired.

THE QUEEN AS A NURSE.

An interesting reference is made to King Edward and his Royal Consort in the memoirs and letters of Sir James Paget which have just been published. When the King, then Prince of Wales, was attacked by typhoid in 1871, Sir James was called to a consultation on a point of surgery with the physicians in attendance, and in a letter to his wife he says: "The Princess is the sweetest nurse you ever saw. She would do everything if she were allowed, and all with the gentlest and most loving ways. And the Prince's patience and courtesy make me very ashamed of my recollections of my illnesses, and especially the last."

First, our passions are like travellers, making a brief stay, then like guests visiting us day by day, until at last they become our masters, holding us beneath their sway.

Digitized by Google

HOVIS BREAD.

TRADE MARK

"As good as it is nice."

Try it!

Agents' Addresses will be sent on application.
HOVIS LTD., MACCLESFIELD.

METROPOLITAN CREAM

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS FOR BOOTS AND SHOES

W. CLARK, 528, Oxford St., London, W.
(Near the Marble Arch.)

TO ASTHMA SUFFERERS

INSTANT RELIEF is gained in all cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, CROUP, and WHOOPING COUGH by the use of

POTTER'S DATURA ASTHMA CURE

Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists, in Tins at 1s. each
Free Sample sent on receipt of Post Card to POTTER AND CLARKE, Artillery Lane, London, E.

TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

Messrs. H. DAWSON & Co.,

34, NORFOLK ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

HALL'S WINE.

THE MARVELLOUS RESTORATIVE.

HALL'S WINE is extremely palatable, being undistinguishable from port wine, is economical because a little goes a long way, is not disappointing because nothing is claimed for it that has not been amply proved during the last ten years it has been in use.

IT CURES—

NEURALGIA. SLEEPLESSNESS. MENTAL and PHYSICAL FATIGUE.
NERVOUS IRRITABILITY. ANÆMIA.

Recommended by "The Lancet," "The British Medical Journal," "The Hospital," and the Medical Profession.

Sold by Licensed Grocers, Chemists, and Wine Merchants. 3/- and 1/9 per bottle.

A delicious, highly nutritive, and most easily digested Food, specially prepared for Infants and for those whose digestive powers are weakened by illness or age.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Chemists, etc., everywhere.

Benger's Food

FOR INFANTS, INVALIDS, AND THE AGED.

The London Medical Record says: "It is retained when all other foods are rejected. It is invaluable."

The British Medical Journal says: "Benger's Food has by its excellence established a reputation of its own."

Digitized by Google

A CHILD'S COSTUME.

There is very little change from year to year in the actual shape and cut of children's garments. It is more the materials used and the colours employed. This year the beautiful costumes of holland and drill and coloured linen seemed to have proved more fashionable than aught else, and even though the weather is cooler we are still clinging to the thin garments for top wear, and in order to defy the cold we are adopting warm underwear, before taking to the thicker clothes of wintertime. Plain long sack coats will be worn, with broad "floppy" revers, not stiffened in any way, and, indeed, so loosely made as to often fall in a graceful fold or cockle. Then, too, the big frilly hats will be continued during the autumn in silk—the kind that we have been using all the summer in muslin and cambric. Later on, too, felt crowns will be obtainable, with broad silk frills set at the extreme edge, and finished with a wired velvet or ribbon bow in the front. One of the prettiest costumes is arranged with a very short tucked bodice, into which the full skirts are closely gathered. A broad band of embroidery joins the two, and the collar is so deep as to be almost a cape, and is generally finished with a tiny silk frill to match the rest of the costume. This little dress can be carried out in velveteen, cashmere, glacé, nun's veiling, or, for more ordinary wear, fine serge or fine cloth.

OBLIGATIONS OF A SECRET.

A keeper of secrets is a bearer of troubles. When you promised one friend secrecy you did not foresee that your duty to another friend might require the utterance of that very secret. Secrets are like a nest full of complications and conflicts of duty—all ready to hatch. If a man is entrusted with money, and he finds that its administration clouds his honour, or threatens other duties, he can usually return it: but he cannot return entrusted information and be free of it. There are occasions when it is a sacred duty to receive a secret, and then to guard it, but it is not a duty to be lightly assumed, or even sought for curiosity's sake. Be as conscientious about entrusted information as about trust money, and at least as slow to receive it.

Wesley College,

= Sheffield, =

BOARDING and DAY SCHOOL.

Head Master—

REV. V. W. PEARSON, B.A.

Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratory.

Gresham's School

HOLT, NORFOLK.

Founded 1555.

Headmaster—G. W. S. HOWSON, M.A.

(late of UPPINGHAM SCHOOL.)

Three miles from the sea and close to Sheringham and Cromer. Splendid Climate. The soil is gravel on chalk. Entirely new drainage.

GOVERNOR:

The Fishmongers' Company and County and Local Representatives.

Classrooms, Laboratories, and Workshops are in course of erection, at an estimated expenditure of £40,000.

Highest Inclusive Fees, £57 per Annum.

Science and Modern Languages taught throughout the School.

Yearly leaving Exhibitions of £60 per annum for three years.

For further particulars address the Headmaster.

Digitized by Google

The Gregorian is distinctive in the exquisite quality of its tone.

Gregorian Church and Chapel Organs

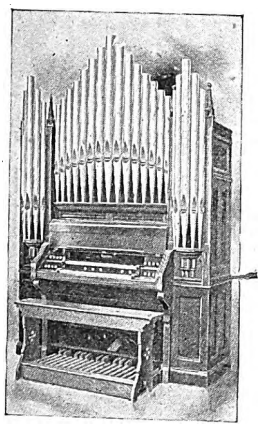
It is indorsed by leading organists, and meets the demand of critical musicians at moderate expense.
Prices, 70 to 600 Guineas.

The Gregorian's rapidly increasing popularity for Church and Chapel use is ample reason why it should be investigated by all Churches contemplating the purchase of an organ.

Its method of tone-production is radically different from all others.

Catalogue A2, giving full description, will be mailed on request.

DISTINCTIVE FEATURES.
QUALITY and POWER of tone, Variety of registration, and Price.



STYLE 22.

"These instruments will be extremely desirable for churches and halls. It is a new and original idea, for your have modified the tones of the reeds in such a way as to reproduce perfectly the tones of the pipe-organ, especially diapason and clarabella tones."—ALEXANDRE GUILMANT, Organist and Composer, Paris.

"The voicing of your instrument is noteworthy; each stop has its characteristic quality—the flute is really flute-like, and the clarinet preserves the peculiar wooden character of the original. Most remarkable is the close approach of sound to the pipe-organs, many of these not being its equal in quality and tone. Last, but not least, the light, quick action and never-varying accuracy of intonation deserve special mention."—WALTER J. DAMROSCH.

THE ORCHESTRELLE COMPANY,
225 Regent St., London, W.

Have you tried Osman Turkish Towels?

HIGHEST AWARD: "Grand Prix," Paris Exhibition, 1900, Two other Medals, and 15 Awards.

HIGHEST QUALITY!
PRICE MODERATE!!
WEAR GUARANTEED!!!

The "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWELS are made in small sizes for Face Towels and in larger sizes for the Bath-room, with knotted fringe or hem-stitched ends. Once you have used "OSMAN" Towels you will buy no others. The wear is guaranteed by the manufacturers.

BARLOW AND JONES, LIMITED,
MANCHESTER.

SOLD BY ALL THE PRINCIPAL DRAPERS AND HOUSE FURNISHERS THROUGHOUT THE EMPIRE.

Digitized by Google

.. THE ..

CHRISTMAS 'TEMPLE'

WILL BE A

Splendid Number.

Full of Seasonable STORIES and ARTICLES by . . .

THE BEST WRITERS, and profusely Illustrated by the . . .

Best Black and White Artists and Beautiful Photos.

SOME OF THE PRINCIPAL FEATURES WILL BE:

The Slipping of the Xmas Log. By Geo. Manville Fenn.
What Christmas Means to the World. By Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D.
Dickens's London. By Chas. Ray.
Girl's Love and Woman's Heart. By John Strange Winter.
The Countess of Meath and the Ministering Children's League. By Leonard Graham.
The Uninvited Guest. By Mary Angela Dickens.
The Rev. F. B. Meyer on the Evangelical Alliance.
A Xmas Eve Dream. By Ethel Glynne.
Articles on Xmas Games and Amusements.
A Drama in the Snow. By Fiona Macleod.

Long Instalment of Our Fine Serial:

"The Tenant of Grove Cottage," with Synopsis of previous Chapters.

These are only SOME of the LEADING FEATURES.

Of all Booksellers, Price 6d. as usual. Order Early.

Digitized by Google

Fascinating Flowers!

To make...

A PERFECT PICTURE IN YOUR GARDEN,

to last for years,

NOW IS THE TIME TO PLANT

Kelway's

Lovely New Paeonies

The Fashionable Flower; in an almost endless variety of lovely tints, and, in many cases, with the fragrance of the Tea Rose: Kelway & Son's celebrated improved kinds certificated by the Royal Horticultural Society. Strong country grown plants for flowering next and many succeeding seasons in the hardy perennial border or bed, or in shrubberies, drives, grass, park or woodland. The cut flowers are gloriously decorative.

Collection C .. .. 30/- per dozen.
" D (extra fine kinds).. 42/- "

Carriage paid for cheque with order to those mentioning "Temple Magazine."

130 Gold and Silver Medals.
London, Paris, Chicago, etc.

KELWAY & SON, The Royal Horticulturists,
LANGPORT, SOMERSET.

"PLAQUETLESS" SKIRT

(Protected by His Majesty's Letters Patent).

No ugly opening displaying the clothing beneath.
No unsightly button flaps and their attendant evils.
A perfect fitting, elegant skirt, suitable for Cycling, Walking, Golfing, Hockey, Tennis, etc.

In Blue Serge, 7s. 6d.

In Costume Cloth, 10s. 6d.

Postage, 6d. Extra.

Samples of material sent on receipt of stamped envelope.
Send size of waist, hips, and length of skirt with order.

MADAME FRANCIS,
21, Raleigh Road, Hornsey, London.

An example of this skirt may be seen by special arrangement at Madame Myra's Showrooms, 10 and 11, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.

"You look unusually fresh this morning, dear!"

"I really feel so, I use CLARKE'S AMMONIA in my bath."

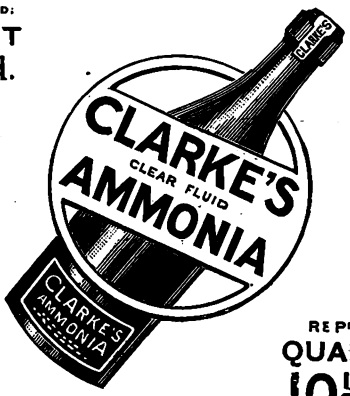
REPD: PINT 6d.



REPD. QUART 10½d.

HALF PRICE and DOUBLE STRENGTH of ordinary Household Ammonia.

RETAINS ITS STRENGTH TO THE LAST DROP.

Used in the Bath all the year round this popular Ammonia gives a delightful, refreshing feeling to the person. Its cleansing properties are manifested when used for washing china, glass, silver, clothes, etc.

It is a necessity as well as a luxury, and its low price brings it within the reach of all.

Agents Everywhere.

Large Sample Bottle Free on receipt of 3 penny stamps for postage. Address:

CLARKE'S, 360, Old Kent Rd., London, S.E.

Digitized by Google

PRICE 7/6 A BEAUTIFUL CHRISTMAS GIFT. PRICE 7/6

Volume V. OF THE Temple Magazine

NOW READY.

HANDSOMELY BOUND IN RED AND GREEN CLOTH.

Containing—

TWO SPLENDID SERIAL STORIES

By DORA LANGLOIS and Mrs. BAGOT HARTE.

Scores of Short Stories and Special Articles.

Illustrated by some 700 Beautiful Pictures.

OUR CONTRIBUTORS INCLUDE Dr. Joseph Parker, Ian Maclaren, Silas K. Hocking, George Manville Fenn, Joseph Hatton, Adeline Sergeant, Mary E. Wilkins, Clive Holland, J. A. Hammerton, Leonard Graham, Lady Violet Greville, Lady Henry Somerset, Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, Thekla Bowser, Mrs. Hirst Alexander, Hugh W. Strong, and many other well known writers.

Of all booksellers or the Publishers, Messrs. HORACE MARSHALL & SONS, Temple House, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE TRIUMPH OF HILARY BLACHLAND. By BERTRAM MITFORD, Author of "The Gun-runner."

DESPAIR'S LAST JOURNEY. By DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "Joseph's Coat."

THE PURPLE CLOUD. By M. P. SHIEL, Author of "The Yellow Danger," etc.

THE LOVER'S PROGRESS. Told by Himself, and "Dedicated to all who Love."

DUMB. By the HON. MRS. R. D. FORBES, Author of "A Gentleman."

A SOWER OF WHEAT. By HAROLD BINDLOSS, Author of "Ainslie's Ju-Ju."

THE CANKERWORM: Being Episodes of a Woman's Life. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

A FIGHT TO A FINISH. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "Joan the Curate," etc.

THE HOUSE ON THE SCAR: A Tale of South Devon. By BERTHA THOMAS.

THE WEALTH OF MALLERSTANG: An Upland Tale. By ALGERNON GISSING.

A STUMBLE BY THE WAY. By L. T. MEADE, Author of "The Voice of the Charmer," etc.

THE GRAND BABYLON HOTEL: A Fantasia on Modern Themes. By ARNOLD BENNETT.

THREE MEN OF MARK. By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "St. Mungo's City," etc.

JUDAH PYECROFT, PURITAN: A Romance of the Restoration. By HARRY LINDSAY.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY BOOKS.

CHAPENGA'S WHITE MAN. By A. WERNER.

TALES OF A DYING RACE. By ALBERT A. GRACE.

A BLIND MARRIAGE, Etc. By GEORGE R. SIMS (Dagonet).

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The Home Beautiful.

Furniture and Metal Work require constant attention, if the beauty of the home is not to be sacrificed. The "GLOBE" METAL POLISH will effectively attend to the Metal Work in the house, as it imparts a lasting brilliance, which is unobtainable by any other means.

The "GLOBE" FURNITURE POLISH is equally effective in its own sphere of usefulness; applied in accordance with the directions which accompany each box, there is nothing so effective for cleaning and renovating furniture

THESE POLISHES ARE OBTAINABLE AT ALL GROCERS, STORES, &c.

If there is any difficulty in obtaining them, write to us and we will see that you are supplied.

RAIMES & Co., Ltd., Stockton-on-Tees, & Bow, London, E.

Digitized by Google

WORLD TRAVEL

Organised by
HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., F.R.G.S.,
W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,
AND CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

CRUISE

on the Magnificent Ocean Yacht "ARGONAUT."

Tonnage 3,254, H.P. 4,000, Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

Sailing as follows to* THE MEDITERRANEAN:—

December 23rd—From Marseilles to Palermo, Jaffa (for Jerusalem), Alexandria (for Cairo), Malta and back to Marseilles. A Twenty-five days' Cruise for £28 7s. and upwards.

This Cruise is under the auspices of the Co-operative Cruising Co., Ltd.

£10 10s., £11 11s., £13 13s., and £14 14s. TOURS to ROME, viâ the Mont Cenis and St. Gothard Routes. With Optional Extensions to Naples, Assisi, Perugia, Florence, Venice, and the Riviera.

£12 12s. and £13 2s. 6d. TOURS to FLORENCE and VENICE.

£10 10s. Winter Skating and Tobogganing Parties to CHAMONIX and to GRINDELWALD.

A WORLD'S TOUR for 200 Guineas.

Full Particulars from the Secretary—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W.

The Latest Atlas is the 20th Century Citizen's

By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S.

ATLAS

It is full of New Features

It is thoroughly Up-to-date prepared from Latest Surveys with Index and Statistics

It costs only 6d. net per part complete in 26 Fortnightly Parts contains 156 Maps and Plans with 240 Pages of Index & Text

Be sure to see a Specimen Part at your Bookseller's or Newsagent's. It is published by Messrs. George Newnes, Ltd., London.

Part 1. was Published on October 1st.

It is a Three Guinea Atlas for 13s.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR NOVEMBER, 1901.

			PAGE
I.	Playmates		Frontispiece
II.	Women at the Dawn of the Twentieth Century. Illustrated.	Mrs. Hirst Alexander.	95
III	The Castle by the Sea. Story	L. T. Meade	103
IV.	W. P. Frith, R.A.: A Chat with the Veteran Artist. Illustrated.	A. Frederic White.	110
V.	Common Sense for Mothers and Nurses	Dr. Julia Holmes Smith	118
VI.	The Scottish Episcopal Mission to Fisher Folk. Illustrated.	Audrey Winter	119
VII.	The Tenant of Grove Cottage. Serial Story. Chapters VII.-X. Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Adam Lilburn	125
VIII.	Sovereigns I Have Met	Charles Lowe	139
IX.	In the Public Eye Illustrated.	The Onlooker	145
X.	The Strange Behaviour of Mr. Kaye. Story	Adeline Sergeant	151
XI.	A Photographer of Women and Children: Miss Alice Hughes and Her Artistic Work. Illustrated	Reginald Turner	159
XII.	Is Protestantism in Danger? Opinions on the Question		165
XIII.	The New Bishop of Durham: A Sketch of the Life and Work of Dr. Handley C. G. Moule. Illustrated.	Charles Spence.	170
XIV.	Old Philemona. Story	R. Murray Gilchrist	174
XV.	A Beautiful Bible Story	Rev. Mark Guy Pearse	178
XVI.	Rev. J. Stockwell Watts and the "Liberator" Relief Fund. Illustrated.	Robert Vincent.	181
XVII.	Literary Jottings	J. Cuthbert Hadden	184
XVIII.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	186

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

The only
GOLD MEDAL
Awarded for Milk-Chocolate at the Paris Exhibition, 1900, was gained by PETER'S
MILK-CHOCOLATE,
THE ORIGINAL AND BEST.
6d. Tablets and 6d. and 1s. Croquettes. Sold Everywhere.
Sole Agents (trade only), S. J. MACKENZIE & CO., LTD., Wellclose Square, London.

COOLS AND REFRESHES THE SKIN.
"BEETHAM'S"
Reg^d Larola
After exposure to the Sun or Wind. Removes and prevents all HEAT, SUNBURN, TAN, IRRITATION, etc., and Keeps the Skin Soft, Smooth, and White.
during the Heat of Summer. Its effect will delight you! Bottles 6d., 1s., 2s. 6d. of all chemists.
Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

Mr. S. BARING GOULD'S

Powerful New Story = =

ENTITLED

NEBO THE NAILER

COMMENCES IN THE

NOVEMBER PART

OF

THE QUIVER

Which forms THE FIRST PART OF A NEW VOLUME. PRICE SIXPENCE.

Amongst the Special Features of the Number may be mentioned:—

A New Serial of Scottish Life, entitled

ANOTHER MAN'S MONEY.

By DAVID LYALL.

A Special Article on South London, entitled

THE CITY OF THE OVERCROWDED.

By D. L. WOOLMER.

FOUR COMPLETE STORIES BY POPULAR WRITERS.

&c., &c., &c.

The Part is profusely illustrated, and an exquisite Rembrandt Photogravure of the celebrated picture "BETWEEN THE TIDES," by WALTER LANGLEY, R.I., forms the Frontispiece.

CASSELL & COMPANY, Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, London.

And all Booksellers.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Photograph by Alice Hughes, 52, Gower Street, W.C

PLAYMATES.

Digitized by Google

Women at the Dawn of the Twentieth Century.

By MRS. HIRST ALEXANDER.

WHAT women are to-day in this Twentieth Century is the result of the evolutionary work begun before the dawn of the Nineteenth Century, but only made strikingly manifest during the last fifty years.

Let the aims of women be ever increasingly high, as have been those of their predecessors, in progress, and the record of the century into which we have just entered will be one of such headway and uplifting of human kind—women and their co-partners, men—as the world has never yet seen.

Women are awakening everywhere to the high work lying to their hands in the near future; work that shall go to the building up of whole, healthy, pure bodies to be the temples of whole, healthy, pure souls, work that shall raise mankind to a loftier and more spiritual plane of life than the race has yet attained to, work that shall be an instrument, under God's guidance, in His own divine evolution of eternal order out of original chaos, such supreme order and sublime purpose as we yet have caught but a glimpse of—a faint streak in the dawn of that day which shall reveal the Omnipotent's transcendent intent and design towards us His creatures.

Many are the forms in which this new spirit in woman is pressing towards its ends. In matters domestic, educational, professional, industrial, philanthropical, and political, there has been of late times a great shaking among the dry bones of old custom and thought.

MRS. BEDFORD FENWICK,
Through whose efforts Nursing became a recognised Profession.
Photograph by Van der Weyde, 182, Regent Street, W.

In a short sketch of this kind it is only possible to indicate a few of the multifarious avenues of progress up which women of the present period are steadily advancing and achieving places for themselves in the world's ascent of which their grandmothers never dreamed.

In domestic science they start the twentieth century under most favourable auspices. Housekeeping schools and training schools of cookery and domestic economy are scattered all over England, while technical education in domestic science, including the care and management of children, as well as the various branches of general housewifery and sewing—in fact, everything that goes to fit girls for the duties of home life as mothers of families, as helpers at home, or for domestic service—is taught in nearly every public school in the United Kingdom; and the acceptance of domestic sciences by the Board of Education at Whitehall, and by the Technical Education Committees of country and city councils is all due to a woman, Miss Fanny Calder, of Liverpool, who devoted the last quarter of the nineteenth century to this great work—the development and application of domestic science in the homes of the people.

Digitized by Google

MISS ADA CROSSLEY.
Photo by Langfier.

The noted Australian contralto.

MISS ROSE SCOTT,
One of the leading workers for the Enfranchisement of Women in Australia.
Photo by Newman, Sydney.

MRS. AYRTON,
The only woman member of the Society of Electrical Engineers.
Photo by H. S. Mendelssohn, Pembroke Crescent, W.

The teaching of these vital and primary sciences is a new career for educated women, sufficiently remunerative to be attractive and in which hundreds are now employed. But a still greater innovation of the day is the influx of ladies into domestic service. For these and for gentlewomen trained as children's nurses there is great demand.

Mrs. Walter Ward (née Emily Lord) has made the training of the latter her special work in her Norland Institute, Pembridge Square, which she founded and has financed from the beginning. Mrs. Ward has recognised, as have other workers in the same line, that there are refined women who, though not suited for the higher education or a strictly professional life, yet, needing to earn their livelihood, can, when properly equipped, follow a vocation useful and interesting as children's nurses, in which they are immeasurably superior to the ordinary nurse.

In the Norland Institute the students go through a course of hygienic hospital and probationary training, and are made to feel that their daily life in the presence of the children must be an example to

Digitized by Google

MRS. ALEC TWEEDIE,
The first to demonstrate the possibilities of Agriculture as a career for Women.
Photo by Lombardi & Co.

their young charges during the earliest years of child-life—thus introducing into houses a high standard of moral conduct.

The public's appreciation of the Norland Institute's nurses is demonstrated by the fact that close on two thousand nurses were applied for in four years. The whole of the profits of the Institute have from the beginning been devoted by its founder to the paying off cost of furniture, etc., and to the benefit of the nurses, the money being place in the hands of trustees. Mrs. Ward is also founder of the Norland Place School, the Norland Workrooms, and is President of the Fröbel Society.

Sick nursing claims to be the pioneer, as it must always be one of the best and highest, of professions for women. It claims that the example of its nurses has undoubtedly led other women to undertake public work as Guardians of the Poor, Members of School Boards, and in other capacities in which their knowledge of domestic details has proved to be of incalculable advantage to everyone concerned. It is a production of the Victorian Era, our late beloved Queen herself, her Royal daughters, and Queen Alexandra being most powerful factors in the fostering and developing of the art of nursing and in placing its practical benefits at the service of the poor in their own homes. Mrs. Elizabeth Fry, in the third year of her late Majesty's accession, was the real pioneer of nursing in England, Miss Florence Nightingale instituting Army Nursing during the Crimean War.

To Mrs. Bedford Fenwick it was reserved to gather together and consolidate the vast body of qualified nurses into a skilled order and incorporate them by the ancient form of Royal Charter, it being the first woman's profession so recognised. It was in 1887 that Mrs. Fenwick took the initiative in this important movement, and finally through many difficulties she founded the British Nurses' Association, which issued its first register of trained nurses in 1891. Queen Victoria conferred on the Society the title of "Royal," and two years later granted to it a Royal Charter.

This enthusiastic architect of her profession has also formed an International Council of Nurses for the purpose of providing a means of communication between the nurses of all countries and of conference on all questions relating to

MRS. C. C. STOPES,
One of the pioneer workers who opened the Universities to Women.
Photo by W. & D. Downey.

Digitized by Google

their work. Her own nursing career is of the most distinguished character. Her medals and honours are innumerable and she wears the Cross (Hon. Associate) of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem. She was made Inspector of Nursing (by request of H.R.H. the Crown Princess of Greece) of the Ecole Militaire Hospital at Athens in 1897, and was awarded the Commemorative Medal and Diploma of the Greek Red Cross in 1899. Mrs. Fenwick is the Editor of the Nursing Record, and has been for many years a frequent contributor to well-known journals on themes connected with her noble profession.

The Higher Education of Women and the opening to them of the Universities is another advance in the position of women, Mrs. C. Carmichael Stopes is one of that brave body of ladies associated with the movement that led to the opening of those colleges of learning to women, becoming herself one of the earliest female students in the University classes of her native Edinburgh. Her sympathies with her sisters are intense, but as she believes that no true or permanent advancement in their condition can take place until they are enfranchised, she considers that the securing of the suffrage should be the first effort of women who think, and who desire the welfare of their sex. Finding that they are disfranchised, not because they are incapable, but because the judges in the case of Chorlton v. Lings in 1868, decided that they never had a vote and could not claim it by precedent, Mrs. Stopes set to work on the field of history, and in her "British Freewomen and their Historical Privileges" showed in opposition to the judges' opinion that they not only had possessed the right in the past but had exercised it. She is the authoress of several books of research on the sixteenth century and on Shakespeare, his contemporaries, etc.

MISS EMMA BROOKE,
A noted fiction writer, who has also devoted herself to the study of social problems.
Photo by Elliott & Fry, 55, Baker Street, W.

In Miss Emma Brooke, the novelist and essay writer, we have another instance of one whose life and character were strongly affected by the "Movement for the higher education of Women," which opened the doors of the University of Cambridge to her when she was a young girl. She was one of the eight "Pioneer Students" of Newnham College, Cambridge, and, therefore, one of the first women who tasted the delight and supreme advantage of University education within the precincts of a University town. But a second strong influence came into her life—the renewed outburst of Socialism, its modern and enlightened phase, which occurred in the eighties. Miss Brooke became a member of the Fabian Society, and was until lately on its executive. The present period finds her a noted fiction-writer, a student of economics, a member of their London school, a strong advocate of special legislation for women and a tabulator of the factory laws of European countries relating to hours of labour of women and young children. And yet she is not a champion of so called "Woman's Movements," believing, as she does, that no social problem can be treated apart from other social problems without one-sidedness and mischief, and that all alterations and ameliorations in the lot of her sex, which are necessary, are more likely to come naturally and in due course through the gradual processes that better the whole race of man. In this, of course, she is opposed to many progressive women.

But while the dawn of the new century breaks upon woman's intellect cultivated to its utmost capabilities without let or hindrance, it shows also their physical education at a high pitch of perfection—their bodies are cared for as well as their minds. The British College of Physical Education subjects its students to thorough test examinations, so that properly qualified instructors shall be sent forth to aid in the building up of well-developed healthy human frames, and the popular recreations of the day, lawn tennis, golf, hockey, skating rinks, mountain climbing, boating and bicycling all go to the splendid physical unfoldment which is so striking a feature of the all-round education of young women of the current era.

Digitized by Google

The Misses Beatrice and Evelyn Bear, principals of the Alexandra House Gymnasium and Training College for Gymnastic Teachers, Kensington Gore, are two of the leading representatives of the Art of Physical Culture in London. They are both members of the British College of Physical Education, the former being on its examining body. Besides the usual curriculum of drill, general gymnastics, and fencing, the Misses Bear pay special attention to exercises by which growth of nasal obstructions is prevented, narrow chests are expanded, and a most beneficial effect obtained over the general health. Remedial work is another important branch, Miss Bear giving recently, by request, a demonstration to members of the medical profession of her method of treating lateral curvature of the spine.

The injustice of withholding University degrees from women, as is the case with the older Universities, is evidenced in the fact that there are now 450 medical women in Great Britain, India, China, and other parts where they have settled abroad. Many hold official positions in hospitals under the County Council, School Board, and under Government. But medical science has by no means absorbed the whole of feminine scientific genius. In this year of grace, 1901, ladies are largely engaged in astronomy, bacteriology, botany, chemistry, geography, geology, mathematics, physiology, psychology, and zoology. Many are occupied as lecturers on these abstruse subjects. Mrs. Thompson (Miss Robertson, M.A., Dublin) is Assistant Examiner in Physics in the Royal University of Ireland, and there are numerous women museum curators and assistants.

But as yet there is only one lady member of the Institution of Electrical Engineers—Mrs. Ayrton. Born at Portsea, and educated at Girton, where she took honours in Mathematics, in 1884 she turned her attention to elec-

THE MISSES BEAR,
Two leading Representatives of the art of Physical Culture.
Photo by E. W. Evans, 24, Church Street, W.

MRS. HOSTER,
Who trains women as private secretaries to Members of Parliament and other responsible positions.
Photo by Warschawski, St. Leonards.

Digitized by Google

tricity, entering Finsbury College as a special student, and soon afterwards married Professor Ayrton, President of the Physical Science Section at the British Association. She has published a book embodying the results of her husband's and her own researches on the electric arc, and at the International Congress of Electricians in Paris made an important communication on the luminous intensity of the electric arc with continuous current, showing how the best results could be obtained. In conjunction with it Mrs. Ayrton exhibited a series of very beautiful experiments in the Ecole Supérieure d'Electricité. In June last this clever scientist read a paper on "The Mechanism of the Electric Arc" before the Royal Society.

In music, the rôle of Musical Bachelors counts 26 women graduates since 1892. Of Musical Doctors there are two—H. M. Queen Alexandra (Hon.), R. U. I., and Miss Annie W. Patterson, R. U. I. Ladies appear in large numbers as prize, scholarship, and exhibition winners at the various Colleges of Music.

Among the Queens of Song, a fresh variety has appeared within the last few years. The dawn of the century thickens with the new song-birds from over the seas. They are here and still they come—these daughters of the Empire—from far-off Australia, whose climate and soil seem prolific of beautiful voices of a quality full, rich, and round.

Among the first flight of these charming vocalists is Miss Ada Crossley, the renowned contralto—"Our Ada," as the Australians proudly and affectionately call her. She lives in the hearts of the people of her native land, who have testified publicly to her art, her great worth, her personal amiability and large-heartedness, and if ever she returns she is assured by them of the gladdest of welcomes. But the motherland has recognised her powers, from its late Sovereign downwards, and will not let her go. The beautiful jewels presented to Miss Crossley by Princess Henry of Battenberg on behalf of her Royal Mother are precious mementos to the young Australian of her appearances before Queen Victoria at Balmoral, but the gracious and laudatory words spoken to her by Her late Majesty (a splendid but critical listener) are till more pri'ed.

Forty years or so ago technical training for women was almost unheard of, but nous avons changé tout cela. The first adult book-keeping class for women was started in 1860, the first shorthand class in 1872 by the same pioneer society, and in 1885 the second typing office for women was established by its help. Now the day of the amateur and untrained worker is over, and far more is demanded of women secretaries and clerks than in the time when the first few positions were experimentally thrown open to them. The immense advance in education has laid the best of all foundations for the definite technical training now absolutely requisite to both women and men in order to succeed in any profession or business they may take up. Even the day of the Board School girl, who was first in the field, is fast passing away. A thorough education, with refinement, allied with the traditions of gentle breeding and a knowledge of literature and languages such as have been the possessions of the class of women who have more lately offered themselves, are opening up posts which would ever have remained closed to the semi-educated and rougher class of workers.

Among the ladies who have had the raising of their profession completely at heart and who have conscientiously striven towards their high ideals, is Mrs. Hoster, who has organised large typewriting, shorthand and translating offices in the City, where for the last seven years she has, with a competent staff of assistants, successfully devoted a large portion of her time to the training of gentlewomen for a professional career, giving particular attention to the training of secretaries for members of Parliament and others. With all is combined an all-round business education embracing commercial correspondence in foreign languages, preparation for the National Union of Typists' Examinations, etc. From her centre of the Typewriting World in Telegraph Street, Mrs. Hoster sends out qualified operators to solicitors, merchants, bankers, authors, financial houses, stock-brokers, members of the dramatic profession, &c. This clear-headed lady is an enthusiast in her profession and speaks of it as one "eminently qualified for people of education, erudition, and observation in every station of life." She is a god-daughter of Lady Battersea and to the latter's unfailing kindness and encouragement largely attributes her success.

Digitized by Google

Thanks to the increase of wisdom and the gradual stamping out of the old obstructive prejudices and narrow-minded conventionalities, there are many useful and profitable industrial occupations into which ladies can now enter without losing caste.

For the rise of Agriculture as a career for gentlewomen England is primarily indebted to Mrs. Alec Tweedie, the well-known writer and talented daughter of the late Dr. George Harley, F.R.S., of whose biography she is the authoress. The origin of Mrs. Tweedie's taking up the subject of agriculture as a calling for women was one of those curious coincidences which so often, though small in themselves, alter the whole trend of a person's life. She was at a large dinner party in Copenhagen when the health was drunk of the two ladies representing the country which has made Denmark rich.

"What do you mean?" asked Mrs. Tweedie, "I mean," replied the host, "that a quarter of a century ago Denmark was a very poor country, but since we have begun to manufacture butter and export it to England we have got richer every day, and as that export is yearly increasing by enormous leaps and bounds we are reaping a proportionate reward."

These words struck the lady as strange. She pondered over the subject, and finally decided to stay two or three days longer in Copenhagen in order to visit some of the creameries, for six years ago two hundred creameries were already in full swing, and co-operation was universal. The results of her enquiries appeared in the Fortnightly Review, where they evoked so much comment that they were finally published as a pamphlet, entitled—"Danish versus English Butter-Making," which was ultimately quoted in the House of Commons.

MISS VIOLET BROOK-HUNT,
"The Soldier's Friend."
Photograph by M. Jacolette.

MISS IRMA DREYFUS,
A French lady who is now engaged in a scheme to get Australian products introduced into France.

MRS. WALTER WARD,
Who trains ladies as Children's Nurses.
Photograph by Adolphus Tear, Bayswater.

Digitized by Google

After she suggested the taking up of agriculture by women as a profession, Lady Warwick's hostel at Reading was founded on very much the lines laid down in the pamphlet.

Mrs. Alec Tweedie is a great traveller, and has given to the world her experiences and impressions in her much-read books, "A Girl's Ride in Iceland," "A Winter Jaunt in Norway," "Through Finland in a Cart," etc. Her new book, "Mexico as I Saw It," about to be published, is said to be her most ambitious work, and is to be illustrated by innumerable water colour sketches executed by herself. She was present at the latest Aztec excavations, the most interesting ever made in Mexico, and was the guest of many of the grandees of that beautiful country. This adventurous lady is a constant writer to London magazines, and recently contributed an excellently well-informed article to the Fortnightly Review on the Tehuantepec Railway and its far-reaching possibilities on the world's commerce.

In works of philanthropy women take a foremost place. They have struck out many novel and felicitous methods of work in women's settlements, working girls and boys' clubs, girls' friendly societies, "Happy Evening Associations," and numerous other organisations.

Miss Violet Brook-Hunt began her club work almost before she was out of the schoolroom, among the men and boys of her grandfather's estate in Gloucestershire, eventually starting in Gloucester itself the Gordon Wanderers, "a self-supporting club for young artisans." Coming to London three years ago Miss Brook-Hunt found many of her "old boys" in the Guards and at once became anxious to do something for the soldiers. Early last year she went to the seat of war in South Africa and was one of those distinguished women who worked hardest for the men at the front. She organised soldiers' institutes, convalescent camps, and superintended on the very spot arrangements for the supply of proper food, comforts, and hospital appliances to the brave men fighting amid unforeseen hardships and difficulties. She moved her camp, as the armies advanced, from Nauwpoort to Bloemfontein and then to Pretoria, at which latter it is recorded that the clergyman on his rounds would be announced by the orderly in these terms: "Any desperate cases for the Chaplain in here?" whilst Miss Brook-Hunt was heralded by "Anyone in here like to see a dear blessed angel of a lady?" She has since given her experiences in her book "A Woman's Memories of the War," and also in a boys' publication entitled "The Story of Lord Roberts's Campaigns," and is also the author of several other popular volumes. Her interests are multiform, embracing university extension, political work, and emigration.

The present time sees women's enfranchisement accomplished in several important parts of the Empire. Soon, it is believed, the Commonwealth of Australia will make it universal throughout its states. In England the most intelligent and far-seeing women are working quietly, doggedly, and persistently for it, as they have done for nearly thirty years.

One of the most active operators in the cause is Miss Helen Blackburn, whose services spread almost continuously through the past twenty-five years, and whose great editorial gifts, in the Englishwoman's Review and her various well-known handbooks, have all been exercised in the uplifting and helping forward of her sex.

In King Edward's "Dominions over the Seas" Miss Rose Scott stands out as one of the greatest champions of woman's suffrage—a colossal worker, a charming platform speaker, and, at the same time, she is one of the most winning and popular personages in Sydney Society.

There is no space left to do more than glance at the evidences of women's steady advance all over the civilised world. One instance only can be cited of the growing good fellowship and sisterhood which are beginning to bind the nations together.

Miss Irma Dreyfus is a French lady who has popularised the literature of her country in Melbourne by a series of interesting lectures extending over two years.

She lately left her temporarily adopted land, where she had resided several years and learned to love its people, and is now in her native Paris engaged in a scheme to get Australian products introduced into France, to the combined advantage, as she considers, of both countries. Whether she will succeed or not remains to be proved, but all honour is due to the international goodwill of which Miss Irma Dreyfus is a New Century representative.

MARY HIRST ALEXANDER.

Digitized by Google

The Castle by the Sea.

By L. T. MEADE,

Author of "Daddy's Boy," "Wild Kitty," "The Cleverest Woman in England," "An Adventuress," "The Way of a Woman," etc.

MY aunt, Lady Denbigh, lived in an old castle on the Norfolk coast. The region which surrounded her house was most remote and desolate. It was ten miles from any town and five from the nearest railway station. There was always supposed to be a great mystery about the castle itself and about the lady who lived there. The castle was built on a great crag and hung nearly over the sea. It was very old, had a tower which was said to be haunted, and numerous rooms with small windows.

I had heard of my aunt's castle and the strange, eccentric life she lived there all my days, but I never went to see her until I was nearly twenty years of age. Lady Denbigh had been a widow for the last fifteen years, her husband, Sir Archibald Denbigh, having died about five years after their marriage. From time to time I heard my father, a very matter-of-fact, shrewd lawyer, speak of my aunt, Lady Denbigh. He told me she was a great beauty in her day, but was always more or less eccentric, and had a strong, imperious will which nothing seemed able to break.

I was nearly twenty, was a strong, hearty girl, my schooldays were over, and I did not exactly know what to make of my future life, when on a certain morning I received an invitation from Aunt Caroline to spend Christmas with her at Castle Denbigh. I could not help starting when I read the letter. I crossed the room and laid it by my father's plate. He read it, also, looked up at me, and said in his brief, somewhat stern way:

"You will go. She would not send for you if she did not specially want you. You will go and you will be kind to her. I will send you to-morrow with Mitchell."

Mitchell was my maid, and I depended a good deal on her services.

"Mitchell will stay with me, of course, while I am there?" I said.

"I do not think so. Your aunt will not permit a strange servant inside the castle, but she can take you to the gates. Now then, my dear, buy anything you want and be ready to start to-morrow morning."

The next day I started on my journey. I arrived at the nearest railway station late in the afternoon. A carriage with a pair of somewhat shaggy white horses and a very old coachman had been sent to meet me. Mitchell and I went towards the neat brougham, but the old servant who was holding the door open looked dubious when he saw the maid.

"This person cannot come to the castle," he said. "Perhaps you know that, Miss Watson?"

"Very well," I answered. "But I should like Mitchell to accompany me on my drive. You can take her back again to the railway station."

"There seems no sense in taking her all this long drive for nothing," answered the man, "and my horses are not accustomed to so much exercise. Perhaps, miss, you would say good-bye to your servant now. I believe that is your aunt's wish."

I felt a little annoyed for a moment, then I said, turning to Mitchell:

"I suppose there is no help for it, Mitchell. Good-bye. I will let you know when I am returning to town."

I shook hands with her—she had been my maid for many years—and felt a slight sinking of heart as I saw her vanish into the railway station.

The drive was a long one and the day specially cold. There was a high melancholy wind and constant sleet showers. A gale was blowing full in from the sea, and I saw the breakers, and noticed the rocky coast some time before I arrived at Castle Denbigh.

Digitized by Google

At last we drew up outside some heavy iron gates. The footman jumped down and rang the bell. I heard bars being withdrawn from within and the gates were flung open. The carriage crossed a portcullis into a square courtyard, and finally drew up outside a deep porch. This part of the house was sheltered, but I must honestly confess I never saw a more dismal or forbidding-looking abode. The bell which hung outside the front door was rusty, as if it were seldom used. The footman gave it a violent tug. Footsteps were heard shuffling along the stone hall, and a moment later the door was opened, and a man-servant in rusty livery motioned me to enter. He took me to a small room on one side of the hall, and said that I should receive attention immediately. I wondered what this could mean. I was bitterly cold, and my excitement and pleasure of the day before had all vanished.

In the course of a very few minutes a respectable, middle-aged, sweet-faced woman appeared. She said that she was Lady Denbigh's maid, that her name was Harrison, that she had instructions to do all that I required, and she now begged of me to allow her to take me at once to my room.

Cold and shivering, I followed her across the stone-flagged hall. By right there ought to have been a huge fire in the empty grate, and many bright lamps ought to have made the place cheerful. There was only one lamp, which gave the faintest light, and as I stumbled up the stairs I could scarcely see my way. When we reached the first landing Harrison turned to her left and a moment later flung open a door and introduced me to as cosy and bright-looking a bedroom as I had ever seen. The fire was blazing merrily in the grate, and a little snowy bed stood in a corner near. There were plenty of lighted candles on the dressing-table and also on the mantelpiece, and I saw through an open door another room which was also lit by a fire and was cheerful with light.

"Who sleeps there?" I asked of the maid.

"I do, miss," answered Harrison; "at least," she corrected herself, "I am to sleep in that room while you are at the castle. My mistress wishes it. She thinks you may feel a little nervous at night."

"But why should I feel nervous at night?" I asked.

"I don't suppose you will, miss, but being accustomed to London you may feel the change. We are used to this gloomy old house and don't mind it a bit, but there's no doubt when the wind is high that terrible sounds come through the keyholes. My mistress and I both thought you would like to have me near, miss, and, of course, you need not keep the door open between the two rooms unless you wish."

"I shall be delighted to have you near me," I replied, "and I certainly will keep the door open. I am most grateful. It is extremely thoughtful of you, Harrison, to have done this."

"It was my mistress's thought, not mine," said the woman. "Now shall I unpack your trunk, miss, and may I remove your hat and jacket? Tea will be brought to you here in a moment."

"But when am I to see Lady Denbigh?"

"She will see you in the banqueting hall at dinner."

"Not till then?" I cried. "She is my father's own sister, my very own aunt, and I have never seen her in the whole course of my life."

"She will meet you at dinner, miss, and in the meantime I have no doubt you will like to rest by your fire."

Harrison now took my keys and quickly and deftly unpacked my trunk. This was soon done. She then, after uttering a few commonplaces with regard to my future comfort, left the room.

"Your tea will be brought to you," she said as she was going. "My mistress dines at half-past seven, and the dinner-gong rings at seven. I will come back to you at seven, miss, to help you to dress for dinner."

I made no reply to this, and Harrison left the room, closing the door after her. I sat in my cosy chair by the fire feeling comforted and rested. In a few moments I heard a knock. I said "Come in," and another servant, old, but very pleasant-looking, entered, bearing a tray on which was the most exquisitely-chased silver tea-service I had ever seen. She drew a little table near the fire, put the tray on it, did not utter a word, and left the room.

Digitized by Google

I fell to with a will, for I was thoroughly hungry. After satisfying my young appetite I still continued to sit by the fire, wishing heartily I had a book or magazine to look through. I was almost falling into a doze when something roused me and made me very wide awake indeed. I heard a laugh in the passage outside, and there was a sound about that laugh which caused my heart to stand still and then to throb wildly. It was high and cracked, without a scrap of real merriment in it. Peal after peal sounded just outside my door, and then I heard steps going quickly down the corridor and a voice said:

"Light! light! candle-light and fire-light—good!"

Immediately afterwards the steps receded, and I heard the laughter getting fainter as whoever the individual might be hastened away.

I felt myself suddenly quite cold, and I knew that I was trembling. My first impulse was to run to my door and turn the key in the lock, my next was to go to the door of Harrison's room and see if it were open. To my surprise it was locked. I was locked in between Harrison's room and my own. Nothing could be brighter than the appearance of the two rooms, for even the furniture was modern. I tried to reason with myself that there was nothing extraordinary in the laugh and the queer words when I heard a knock at the door.

"Who is there?" I inquired.

"Me, miss," answered Harrison.

I opened the door and she came in.

"I am so very glad to see you, Harrison," I said. "Do you know that I have been terribly frightened?"

"Frightened, miss?" she answered. Her face assumed a guarded expression. It lost some of its comeliness and became reserved and almost motionless, like a face carved in stone. "What frightened you, miss?" she repeated again.

I told her about the laugh.

"Such a queer, cracked laugh," I said, "and such strange words. What queer person is in the house, Harrison?"

She did not speak at all for a moment, then she said, in a tone of assumed carelessness:

"It may have been one of the servants. We keep a great many servants at the castle, it is one of my mistress's fads. Don't think anything more about that laugh, miss. We live so much out of the world that perhaps we are not quite like the people you are accustomed to see. Shall I dress you for dinner now?"

"Please do," I answered, and as I said the words I resolved to accept Harrison's explanation and not to be frightened any more.

You will soon get accustomed to our funny ways at the castle," the old servant went on, "and there is one thing to comfort you: although we are all queer, you are as safe here as you would be in the heart of London. You may feel nervous, but you have no cause to be. Now I think miss, your toilet is quite finished, and if I may be permitted to say it, you look very sweet. I will take you to the banqueting hall where Lady Denbigh is waiting to receive you."

"I wore white and I knew that I looked pretty and girlish. I followed Harrison through the old house. It was now lit in all directions with many candles. I crossed the wide hall which still struck me as very cold, and waited for Harrison to throw open the great folding doors of the room where Lady Denbigh waited for me.

"Miss Watson, your ladyship," she said, at the pitch of a high voice, and then I slowly entered the room, which was bright with firelight and had numbers of wax candles reflecting a soft radiance everywhere.

In the centre of the room stood a tall lady. She was dressed in a bygone fashion and wore her fair hair over a pillow. Her hair was so white that I thought at first it was powdered, but I saw afterwards that this was its natural color. She had very dark eyes and her eyebrows were delicate and beautifully arched. She came slowly forward when I appeared, kissed me on each cheek and said gently:

"Welcome to Castle Denbigh, Sally."

I started when she said Sally, and looked into her face and said:

"Thank you, Aunt Caroline, I am glad to meet you at last."

"Let me examine your face," she said. She took my hand and led me where the light of many candles fell full on my face.

"Tender and young," she remarked; "a very soft face too, but I think I read firmness in those lips and courage in those eyes. I believe you will do what I want you to do. My dear Sally, I have not sent for you just for a freak or whim. I have sent for you because I want you, because I intend if possible to lay a great and heavy burden on you ; but now let us eat. Time enough to tell you what I really want to-morrow."

Digitized by Google

Two servants in livery now appeared and stood, one behind Aunt Caroline's chair and the other behind mine. Our chairs were drawn back from the table and we seated ourselves. The dinner proceeded in solemn majesty. It was not a very sumptuous repast, but it was served on lovely china, and the plate was solid and massive.

During the meal Aunt Caroline hardly talked at all. I tried to keep up a girlish chatter, which she only responded to by occasionally bending her stately neck. Her eyes had a far-away look, and I do not think she heard me.

I expected her to inquire after my father, but she did not do so. She did not ask me any questions whatsoever. At last the servants withdrew, the dessert was placed on the table, and I bent forward and took one of her jewelled hands in mine.

"Whether you like it or not, I am glad to see you," I said.

"Like it?" she answered. "Yes, I am pleased that you are glad to see me."

As she said the words I looked at her more attentively. For the first time I noticed the glassy look in her eyes, and the extreme and painful thinness of her face. It was so haggard and worn that as I looked close at her I wondered that I had ever thought her beautiful. I saw now that it was her stateliness which had impressed me, and also a fearful sort of resolution in her eyes, more to be dreaded than admired.

I rose to my feet.

"May I go to bed?" I said ; "I begin to feel very sleepy."

"Do so," she answered. "I wish you to have a good night ; I have much to talk to you about to-morrow and my time is short. Go to rest, my dear Sally. I will see you after breakfast."

"Where?" I asked. "Here?"

"No, in my boudoir. Go, I also am tired."

She waved her hand ; I was about to turn away when she suddenly drew me close to her, looked again into my eyes, and, to my astonishment, pressed a kiss between my eyebrows.

"There is courage in your face," she said. "I believe you will do what I want you to do."

I went upstairs. Harrison was waiting for me.

"You look tired, miss," she said.

"I am very sleepy," I answered.

"I am glad of that, miss. May I undress you and see you into bed?"

"You need not do that," I replied. "If you will just take down my hair and put my dress away, I shall require nothing more."

"I should like to see you into bed this first night, miss," she answered.

I made no response, I felt dreadfully tired. I had never been so downright sleepy before. Soon I was lying between the snowy sheets. I could scarcely keep my eyes open.

"Are you coming to bed soon, Harrison?" I asked.

"I will come bye-and-bye," she replied, "but I must see my mistress into bed first. You will be sound asleep long before I come. You will not be lonely, miss."

I was conscious of a drowsy wish that she would come at once, but before I had time to give it utterance I was in the land of dreams. I slept very soundly for what must have been many hours. When I awoke I found that all my sleepiness had vanished. At first I could not remember where I was. I sat up in bed. I heard a low rustling sound in the next room. It startled me for a moment, but then I remembered to my satisfaction that Harrison was sleeping there. I lay down once again on my pillow, and, with contented eyes and a delicious feeling of rest all over me, looked round the room.

It was a very bright little room papered with modern paper, and furnished in modern style. I was so glad that Aunt Caroline had put me here, and had allowed Harrison to look after me. The fire was burning brightly, there was a fire also in Harrison's room, and the flames flickered on both ceilings as I watched them from my own cosy bed. Again I heard that slight rustling. Was Harrison awake? Had she been long in bed?

I had put my watch under my pillow and I took it out now and examined the hour. It was between two and three o'clock. The house was very still. The wind which had howled on my first arrival had now subsided, and there only came a fitful moan from the sea at long intervals.

Digitized by Google

Once again I heard that queer sound.

"Harrison!" I said.

There was no answer, but the noise stopped immediately. For a time there was perfect stillness. I really cannot think when I first began to get frightened, but by slow degrees I felt that the stillness, following that faint movement in the next room, was oppressive. Was Harrison in bed, or was she sitting over her fire? Suddenly I remembered the laugh. The moment I thought of it, my heart began to beat in a quick, irregular fashion. I could not sit still any longer; I must investigate that rustling sound. Very softly I pulled down the bedclothes, put one foot out of bed, and craned my neck forward, for by so doing I could look right into Harrison's room, the door, as I have said, being wide open. Seated by the fire was a figure; the figure was bending towards the flames, the head was bent forward, the elbows rested on the knees, the hands partly covered the face.

"Harrison!" I said, in a whisper. "Harrison!" but the next moment I got quickly into bed. I lay there feeling faint and cold—cold as though I were struck by the hand of death, for the figure bending over the fire was not Harrison. It was the figure of a man—a man who must naturally have been of huge stature, but who was now bent with age or weakness or infirmity. Good Heavens! Who was the man in Harrison's room?

There is a certain queer action which fear has over the human heart. For a mad moment it overpowers, then the nerves become more or less steady. In brave people—and I hope and trust I belong to that class—such, at least, is the case. I knew that if I did not exercise self-control, if I showed any alarm, that figure would rise from its position by the fire and come towards me. I must be canny, brave, calm. My very life depended on this. Suddenly I heard a sound which caused that deathly coldness once more to sweep over me. It was a low and yet cracked laugh. The laugh came at intervals. It was very abrupt and very awful, bursting on the ear without warning, and dying to utter stillness as suddenly. This laugh came now several times, then the figure stretched itself with a mighty yawn, rose to its feet, and, raising both hands towards the ceiling, said, aloud: "Light, light; firelight—good!"

Who was this being? Was there a madman in the old house? Was it a burglar? Was it a ghost? Oh, the agony in my heart! I had an insane wish to rush to the door between the two rooms, to bang the door to and lock it; and then I saw that the key was on Harrison's side, and that I could not possibly achieve my purpose before the huge figure interrupted me. Once again I heard the laugh, and once again the words: "Light; firelight—good!" Then from where I lay in my bed I saw the figure move its position. I watched it strike a match, and then go solemnly from candle to candle lighting one after the other. I counted the candles as they were lit. There were two on the mantlepiece, two on the chest of drawers, two on an old-fashioned bureau. There were six candles in all.

Having lit them, the figure looked towards my room.

"Firelight—good!" I heard him murmur, and then he shambled slowly towards the door which divided the bedrooms. He entered my room, he looked straight at the fire, walked in its direction, and sat down near it. He had not yet seen me. He sat by my fire, resting his elbows again on his knees and pressing his hands to his face. I saw him watch the flames, and I heard him laugh and utter the words: "Firelight — good!" Then I heard him say, with a sort of childish murmur: "I want more light." And he went into the other room and brought back a lighted candle and slowly lit all my candles, two on the mantelpiece, two on the chest of drawers, two on the old bureau, and two more on the dressing-table. In this ever-increasing light I watched him with a queer fascination. My terror was so great that I wondered I did not die on the spot. Suddenly he turned his face full towards me. I saw that in figure he was terribly bent, that his hair hung white over his forehead, that his beard was unkempt and long, and his hands were much distorted. All of a sudden he saw me in my white bed. He strained his bloodshot eyes to look at me, then with the candle which he had last lit in his hand he slowly approached the bed. He did not come quickly, but he came perceptibly nearer each moment. All of a sudden I heard him utter his queer, wild laugh, and the next instant he made a mad rush towards me.

Digitized by Google

I do not remember anything more, My nerves had given out. Blessed unconsciousness had come to my relief. When I came to myself Harrison was bending over me. There was a strong smell of vinegar in the room. She was bathing my forehead and pushing back the hair from my brow.

"There, there," she said, "you are all right. Nothing has hurt you."

I gazed at her. The horrid memory of what I had endured came back to me and I burst into tears.

"I am glad you are crying," said Harrison; "and nothing happened, nothing at all."

"But who was it?" I gasped. "Who was in the room?"

"My child, I can never forgive myself," said Harrison. "But he is so cunning, more cunning than words can say. He did not hurt you, dear. I arrived in time. We won't talk of him now, you shall hear all in the morning. Now I am going to sit in a chair by your side and you must sleep."

But I could not sleep although I lay still and did not utter a sound. Towards morning Harrison herself dropped into a doze, but I lay wide awake. As soon as the first faint dawn stole in under the blind I stretched out my hand and touched Harrison.

"I must go home to-day," I said.

"Oh, no, Miss Sally," she answered.

"I must, Harrison; I have not nerve for it, for the horror of this house."

"You will see my mistress after breakfast, dearie. She will explain things."

I did not make any answer, but my mind was fully made up. I was neither strong nor brave; I was only a timid girl, and I could not stay another night in that awful house.

Harrison lit my fire and brought my breakfast and helped me to dress, and when I had eaten a very little, for I was too shaken to do more, she took my hand and led me to Aunt Caroline's boudoir. It was in the furthest wing of the old castle, and hung right over the sea. The waves were so high that morning that they almost drowned Aunt Caroline's voice as she came very slowly forward and kissed me.

"You got a fright last night, little Sally," she said, "and I am terribly grieved."

"Oh, Aunt Caroline," I answered, "I am not at all brave nor plucky. I must go away. I do not know what you want me to do, but I cannot do it."

"You want to go away," she repeated, and her poor face got so white that, in spite of the agony I had lived through, I pitied her.

"What is it?" I said.

"I will tell you," she answered. "The world thinks, even your father believes, that my husband is dead. All the world believes me to be a widow, and in truth I am a widow, and yet my husband lives. You saw him. He came into your room last night."

"That fearful maniac your husband?" I cried.

"Yes. But he was not a maniac always. He was beautiful and grand in body and mind, but his mind went, it went very slowly, and he himself knew that it was going; but he had such a horror of being locked up in an asylum that I promised him, whatever happened, that should never be the case. I told him that when he lost all self-control I would shelter him myself, and my servants would be good to him; and for eighteen years, little Sally, I have lived here acting as keeper to my own husband, and all the world thinks that he is dead. He has his own suite of apartments downstairs in the basement, and I have never known him before do what he did last night. Harrison came to me suddenly in the night, for I was taken ill, and she forgot to lock the door behind her, and so you got the terrible fright which nearly killed you."

"I am terribly sorry for you, Aunt Caroline," I said after a pause, "and, of course, I will never tell anyone what you have confided to me. But why did you bring me here? What did you want me to do?"

She was silent for a moment, then she said slowly:

"I sent for you because report told me that you were a strong girl, strong in mind as well as body, and I knew myself that, being my niece, you come of a strong race. My child, I am about to die. I shall not live many more weeks, and after my death the world will rush in here and they will find my poor husband and take him away. Even now he has lucid intervals, and he will know that he has been put into an asylum, and they will break that heart which he still, notwithstanding his madness, possesses."

Digitized by Google

"But what can I do?" I asked.

"I wanted you to make me a promise that you would come here and take my place. You would shield him as I have shielded him. It would be only for a little time, a year or two at the most, for he cannot live much longer, and Harrison and the other servants would have been faithful."

"But I cannot do it," I said, and then I sobbed and fell on my knees and took her hands and covered them with kisses. "It is not in me," I replied. "I am bitterly sorry, but it is not in me."

She did not say any more, or press me further, and that day I went home.

When I returned to my father he was much surprised, but when he questioned me I only said:

"There is a mystery, and I must not tell it to you."

From that hour, however, my heart began to ache terribly for Aunt Caroline, and day after day I reproached myself for being a coward, and hated myself so much that I lost pleasure in my ordinary occupations.

At last, when a fortnight had gone by, I woke one morning having made up my mind to go back to the castle by the sea. I would go there and tell Aunt Caroline that I would do what she wanted. I would stay there and guard her secret. Courage would be given me for the miserable work. Harrison and the other servants would help me.

I ran downstairs to breakfast. Father was holding an open letter in his hand.

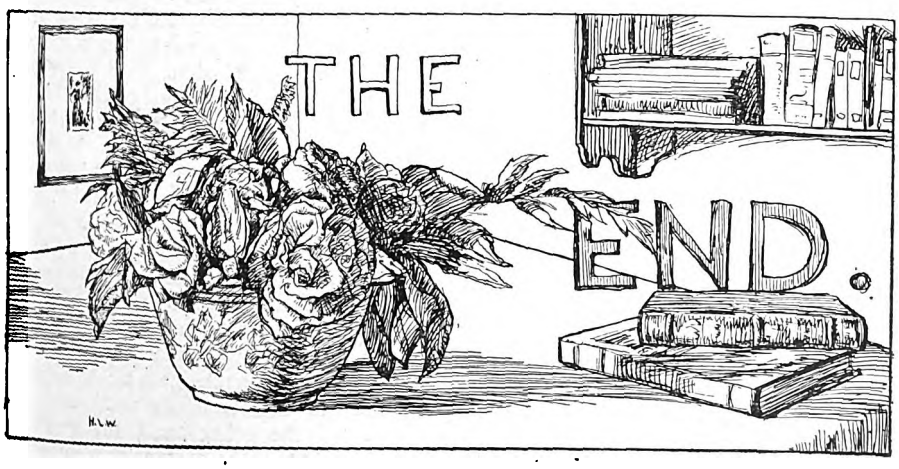
"I am going back to Castle Denbigh to-day," I said. I burst out the words quickly.

"Castle Denbigh, Sally!" replied my father, "What do you mean?"

"I ——"

"Your Aunt Caroline is dead. I have just had a letter to announce her death. I must go there, but you cannot go."

Then I rushed to my father's side and flung my arms round his neck and told him, yes, I told him poor Aunt Caroline's secret, and I begged of him, oh, so hard, not to send that poor lunatic to an asylum; and I promised, if necessary, to go and live there in order to save appearances as long as the madman lived himself. Father was very good to me and terribly astonished, but he said what I wished for was impossible. He went himself that day to the castle, and he inquired into matters and found the fearful story was true. Father was a very matter-of-fact man, and perhaps he would not have minded poor Aunt Caroline's passionate desire that her husband should not be put under ordinary restraint, but he did listen to my pleadings. He kept some keepers at the castle, and allowed the servants to stay, and while Sir Archibald lived he was taken care of. But he did not survive his wife three months. The last words he was heard to utter were: "Light, more light—good!"



I

Digitized by Google

W. P. FRITH, R.A.

A CHAT WITH THE VETERAN ARTIST.

By A. FREDERIC WHITE.

THE popular imagination has seldom been so deeply stirred by a picture as when those wonderful studies in modern life, Frith's "Derby Day" and his "Railway Station," were first exhibited. Their appeal was universal, alike to the artist and art lover, and to a far larger class, who, while little able to appreciate artistic excellence for itself, were held by the deep human interest, the tragedy, the pathos, the wonderful representation of real life and familiar scenes, presented by the hand of a master.

Mr. Frith was the first of the great painters of the Victorian age who dared in his larger works to abandon the heroics of art, and to adorn with his genius some everyday theme. Perhaps he was the only artist of the time who could afford to do so, for he had a strong leaning towards such subjects, of which he very early gave evidence. When still an art student he evinced a taste (unaccountable his master called it) for sketching all the out-of-the-way and eccentric characters whom he met on his rambles instead of devoting his whole time to the study of those classical models, which in the words of his instructor "had received the approbation of ages."

W. Powell Frith was born on January 9th, 1819, at the little Yorkshire village of Aldfield, and when the future painter was seven years old the family removed to Harrogate, where his father became the proprietor of a large rambling old inn called "The Dragon." Mr. Frith senior was a man of considerable, though uncultivated, artistic tastes, and his hobby was to collect pictures and engravings, many of which had no great merit as works of art. One evening, when young Frith was twelve years old, he was sitting idly turning over some of these treasures when his eye fell upon the figure of a dog which he thought he would like to try and copy. Mr. Frith often says that he believes his chief motive in making the attempt was to provide a reasonable excuse for being allowed to sit up a little later than usual. "But," he adds, "if I have a doubt as to what prompted me to my first work, I have none whatever as to what induced me to undertake the second. I received sixpence for the dog, with the promise of a similar reward for another effort."

After that he constantly amused himself by drawing, and the practice thus gained would have been excellent if his copies had not often been made from bad Dutch prints. But his father, a shrewd man, who had a real love for art, discerned the signs of genuine ability in these first crude attempts, and when he was fifteen years old proposed to put his son to an art school, with a view to his becoming a painter by profession.

Strange to say young Frith did not at all take to the idea. His youthful ambition was to become an auctioneer, "because it looked so easy," he afterwards confessed. But Mr. Frith, senior, was too far-seeing to allow his son's chances to be ruined by what he divined to be a mere whim, and he made a compact with the boy that if, after showing his drawings to an artist friend of his acquaintance in London, the latter decided they were worthless, he would apprentice him to Oxenham, the auctioneer, while if, on the other hand, the great man thought there were signs of talent in them, he should be immediately entered at an art school. The result was highly creditable to the discernment of Mr. Frith's friend, and some brother artists whom he consulted, and young Frith became a member of the academy of Mr. Sass, a celebrated teacher of that day.

Digitized by Google

In due time he entered the Royal Academy Schools, and passed through the usual course with great credit.

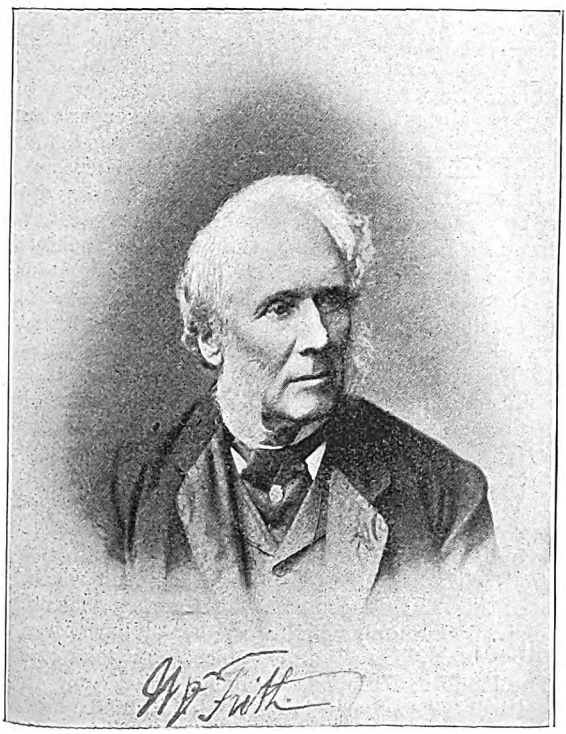
His first commission was to paint the likeness of an old gentleman who had seen some of his portrait work, and who offered him £5 for a head, life size. He accompanied his patron to his Lincolnshire home, and the result of his work being highly satisfactory, commissions flowed in upon him from the neighbouring farmers. For some time he was very busy in perpetuating the fair features of the rustic beauties in the neighbourhood, but this pleasant occupation came to an end, and he was forced to return to London, where he learned how hard it is for an unknown artist to make his way, though by dint of great perseverance he gradually began to see his way to make a living by his brush.

He exhibited his first picture at the Royal Academy at the age of twenty-one, the subject being taken from "Twelfth Night," "Malvolio, cross-gartered, appearing before Olivia." Other pictures followed, of which the subjects were selected from the pages of Shakespeare, Scott, Sterne, "The Spectator," and Goldsmith. His first decided success was a picture inspired by "The Vicar of Wakefield," which was honoured by a place on the line, and at the age of five-and-twenty his "Village Pastor," taken from the "Deserted Village," secured his election as Associate of the Royal Academy, a rare honour for so young a man.

From that time forward Mr. Frith's career was a series of almost unbroken successes, and he received his diploma of R.A. in 1853, at the age of thirty-four. One of the most famous of his earlier pictures was "The Coming of Age" of which most people have seen an engraving.

Mr. Frith had long wished to deal with a modern life subject but was prevented from attempting it by the fear that it would be doomed to failure owing to the unpicturesque character of modern dress. But a visit to Ramsgate in the summer of 1851 inspired him with a great desire to depict a scene so full of character and incident as the famous sands presented, and he was engaged upon the picture almost before he was aware of the great task to which his, at first, random sketches had committed him.

The picture, begun in the autumn of 1851, was finished by the end of 1853, and appeared in the Royal Academy Exhibition of 1854. Its popularity was so great that it drew crowds of people to the Exhibition who would not have thought of visiting it in the ordinary way, and its absolute truth and accuracy of detail, its admirable character-drawing and fine artistic treatment were acclaimed by all. The picture was bought by the Queen, and is now at Osborne. "The



MR. W. P. FRITH, R.A.,
The Great Painter of Modern Life Subjects.
Photograph by Window & Grove.

Digitized by Google

Derby Day," which was exhibited in 1858, and "The Railway Station" in 1862 were yet more decisive triumphs, and so crowned the painter's reputation that the name of W. P. Frith became a household word. No less than 21,850 people in seven weeks paid for admission to see "The Railway Station."

"The Marriage of the Prince of Wales," painted for the Queen and exhibited in 1865, won for the successful artist still further laurels; it is a splendid piece of work, a most lifelike and convincing representation of the historic scene which took place in St. George's Chapel.

Among Mr. Frith's most famous pictures of a later date were the two fine series "The Road to Ruin" and "The Race for Wealth," both of which are forcibly and dramatically conceived and, as showing the evils of gambling and mammonism, have done a great amount of good, and Mr. Frith has received many letters from clergymen and others telling him how effective they have found them in impressing their hearers with the inevitable consequences of these vices.

Mr. Frith lives in a rambling and picturesque old house in St. John's Wood. When the writer paid the veteran artist a visit a week or two ago he found him hard at work in his studio at a half-finished picture, for the painter of "The Derby Day" despite his eighty-two years, does not intend to leave all the work to younger men, and he was represented in this year's Academy by a charming picture entitled "The Intercepted Letter."

"I don't know what I should do without painting," he remarked. "I read a good deal, but I get tired of reading, and even now I spend most of my time painting. But what have you come to talk to the old man about? You want to hear something about the painting of my pictures? Well, I think we had better come and have a look at the engravings, and then I shall be better able to tell you something of their history."

The walls of the hall and right up the staircase are covered with beautiful engravings of some of Mr. Frith's most famous works, conspicuous among which were the celebrated "Derby Day" and the two series, "The Road to Ruin," and "The Race for Wealth." There were also three beautiful sketches of London street scenes entitled "Morning," "Noon," and "Night," which never came to the maturity of finished pictures, although Mr. Frith was offered £10,000 for the series. "I have often had some difficulty in making people believe that this sum was offered to me," he said, "but it is quite true. I had to abandon them because of the commission which I received from the Queen to paint the 'Marriage of the Prince of Wales.'"

Passing into an adjoining room, reproductions of the great artist's work were again in evidence on every hand. The first picture that caught my eye was "The Ramsgate Sands," and Mr. Frith told me the story of how a summer holiday spent at Ramsgate led him to attempt his first great modern life subject. "I was attracted by the great variety of character on the sands," said Mr. Frith. "There were pretty groups of ladies, reading and idling and working, and unconsciously forming themselves into very paintable positions, besides the motley host of fruitsellers, gingerbeer vendors, and beach performers, and I soon fell to sketching separate groups. Then followed a sketch in which all the separate details were combined, and so with many doubts as to the wisdom of engaging in a task of such magnitude, and at the time so novel, I became fairly embarked on the work.

"Many of my brother Academicians thought the experiment a bold one, and others little short of audacious, and some very acrid criticisms came to my ears. One R.A., hearing of the picture, then in course of progress, remarked: 'Doing the people on the sands at Ramsgate, is he? Well, thank goodness I didn't vote for him. I never could see much in his pictures, but I didn't think he would descend to such a cockney business as that. This comes of electing these young fellows too hastily.'

"I was one of the hanging Committee that year, and hung my picture in a conspicuous place, though in fear and trembling that my colleagues might not at all coincide with my estimate of its worth, and order its removal. But the only comment which I received was from the Secretary, who drily remarked: 'Well, Frith, you have given yourself a first-rate place, now take care what pictures you hang round your own or you will certainly kill it.'"

"What suggested to you the painting of 'The Derby Day'?" "I was with some friends at Hampton Court, and was walking with one of the ladies about the course when the idea suddenly struck me what a splendid picture a race-course scene would make, not the actual racing but the people who flocked to the spectacle. I mentioned it to my companion but she thought the idea was absurd, and could not possibly be carried out owing to the immense number of figures which would enter into the composition. I was doubtful about it myself, but at last I summoned up courage and made the preliminary sketch, and from that after many months of incessant work grew the finished picture.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"The scenes at the race-course in those days were very different from what they are now. Gambling booths were dotted all about the place, and thieves and swindlers of every description reaped a rich harvest from the unsuspecting gulls whom they made their prey.

"Fortune-telling gypsies, thimble-rig cheats often dressed as clergymen, showmen surrounded by little gaping crowds, vendors of favours and light refreshments, mingled among the cream of beauty and fashion, and formed a scene so motley and full of character as to offer splendid scope for an artist."

"Did you find much difficulty in procuring models?"

"My friends were very kind both in sitting for me themselves and procuring models for me, though of course the greatest difficulty was in securing suitable prototypes for the low-class figures, the innumerable army of pickpockets, gamblers, pedlars, and their dupes.

"I got into trouble with one of my lady sitters.

"She was very handsome and sat admirably, but I failed miserably in my attempts to reproduce the charm of her features, and after repeated endeavours decided to erase the figure and substitute the likeness of one of my daughters in its place.

"When my fair sitter came again I fully expected a scene and was not disappointed. She was an actress by profession, and an excellent one too, but on this occasion she surpassed herself by her intensity of passion which would certainly have brought down the house had it been displayed on the stage.

"I felt that my kind friend had ample justification for her anger, and was sincerely sorry for the annoyance which I was forced to cause her, for the imperfect likeness was right in the "eye" of the picture and would have been a serious blot in my work had I allowed it to remain, so I listened in silence and with the greatest contrition to a torrent of well-deserved abuse.

"If she had given place to something better, she said she would not have minded, but to be displaced—rubbed out for such a baby-faced chit—it was intolerable.

"At length the lady's anger cooled somewhat, and I was able to enter into explanations, and I believe that she afterwards forgave me, as she accepted a copy of the engraving.

"Another of my lady sitters, from whom I sought some little sympathy on the occurrence, explaining that if I had failed to the same extent with her portrait as I did in the case of Miss H—— I should have rubbed out the figure without hesitation, replied, 'Would you? Then I would without hesitation have put my parasol through your picture, and if Miss H—— had served you right she would have done the same.'

"'The Derby Day' occupied me for fifteen months, and appeared in the Exhibition of 1858. When Queen Victoria came to the private view with Prince Albert, she went round the Exhibition accompanied, according to custom, by the President only, and whenever she wished to speak to any of the other Academicians she would send for them. Instead of following her usual custom of viewing the pictures one after another, as they appeared in the catalogue, she went to mine first, and I received a summons to attend her Majesty.

"She was very complimentary, and Prince Albert surprised me by his deep and accurate knowledge of the principles of art. He went right through the picture with me, telling me by what process I arrived at certain results, and pointing out some faults, and making admirable suggestions. When the picture came out of the Exhibition I adopted several of them, and in every case with great benefit to the picture.

"One of the little Princes in the Royal party, after looking at the picture, exclaimed, 'Oh, mamma, I never saw so many people together before.' 'Nonsense,' replied the Queen, 'You have often seen many more.' 'But not in a picture, mamma,' said the young Prince."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Frith's famous picture attracted such crowds that the work was in serious danger from its too zealous admirers; those in front stood only a few inches away from the canvas, while the numbers behind in their eagerness to obtain a view kept on pushing them forward. A policeman was at length set to guard the picture, but it soon became evident that not one, but a posse of constables was necessary to restrain the ardour of these enthusiastic people.

The owner (Mr. Jacob Bell, who subsequently bequeathed the picture to the nation) therefore urged the authorities to protect it with a rail, but the latter were unwilling to single out any work by such a striking mark of popularity. Only once since the foundation of the Academy had such a step been necessary, and that was over thirty years before when Wilkie's "Chelsea Pensioners" was exhibited, and the envy which rankled in the breasts of his brother Academicians was so marked as to deter the Academy from rashly repeating the experiment.

However, it became so evident that the picture would be inevitably ruined that permission was granted and "The Derby Day" received a rare and well-merited honour which added to its already great reputation. I noticed a very beautiful portrait of Charles Dickens in his study, and asked Mr. Frith to tell me some of his reminiscences of the great novelist.

"It was Dickens's great friend, John Forster," replied Mr. Frith, "who called on me and asked me to undertake the portrait. He had broached the subject some years before, but Dickens had then just begun to grow a moustache which concealed his very fine and expressive mouth. We waited and waited till the fashion would change and the razor should have done its work, but nothing of the kind happened, and a beard was added to the moustache. Fearing lest whiskers should complete the work of

"A FLOWER SELLER."

From the painting by W. P. Frith, R.A.

Digitized by Google

concealment it was decided to commence the portrait at once.

"Dickens's taste in dress was very curious. When he came to my studio he was wearing a large sky blue overcoat, with bright red cuffs. I protested that I could not manage the overcoat, and Dickens, with great docility agreed to abandon this favourite article of apparel, remarking, in explanation of its gaudy appearance, that he was very fond of colour. In order to fill in the background I went to his house at Tavistock Hill, and represented him sitting in his study.

"At that time he was engaged upon the first chapter of "A Tale of Two Cities," and he used to allow me to read his MS. every morning. I often sat and watched him at his work. He seemed to have a great deal of trouble over it, and not to be at all satisfied with what he had written. He would get up and pace the room, pulling his beard and making the most distressing faces.

"I never met anyone more kind and courteous, and once I put his urbanity to a severe test. He had not long commenced his public readings from his works, and when I went to hear him I was much disappointed with the way in which he delivered Sam Weller's pungent witticisms, which seemed hardly in accordance with the true conception of the character of the immortal 'Sam.' He would drop his voice and seem almost ashamed of the smart sayings and retorts of his humble hero. With great trepidation I ventured to mention my views on this point, and Dickens, though he said not a word in reply, listened attentively, and I thought I noticed the ghost of a smile on his lips.

"I was rather relieved, for I had always heard that he was not a man to brook correction and I fully expected an explosion for my temerity, but none came, and I afterwards heard that the great author had not disdained to take my humble advice. A friend of mine whom I had warned that he would be disappointed in the rendering of Sam Weller, came to me in great indignation to know what I meant. 'For,' said he, 'those sayings came from Dickens like pistol shots.'"

With reference to the picture of the "Marriage of the Prince and Princess of Wales," Mr. Frith said "The picture was painted by command of the Queen.

"I had previously prevailed on Her Majesty to excuse me from painting the marriage scene of the Princess Royal to the Crown Prince of Prussia, being then in the midst of the 'Derby Day,' and it was impossible for me to again urge a similar plea, although I had to abandon a very valuable contract for the London street scenes in order to undertake it.

"Landseer said to me that he would not undertake the task for all the money in the world, but I was now well accustomed to large compositions, and did not hesitate on that account.

"The Queen gave me several sittings, and I always found her most kind and gracious. She would chat to me while she sat at some work as freely as if I had been a member of her family, and I began to feel so much at home in her presence that I was afraid I might forget where I was."

"Will you tell me something about the other royalties who sat for you?"

"Little Prince William, now the German Emperor, was one. He appears in the picture dressed as a little Scotch boy, but I am afraid that the likeness is not a very good one, for I found him a fine handful.

"He was accompanied by his governess, a German baroness, but we could do nothing with him. He would not keep still a moment.

"At last I hit upon a good plan, as I thought, to keep the mischievous young Prince quiet. The picture was ten feet long, and I ruled off a portion of one corner of the canvas about a foot square on which to paint a picture himself, cautioning him to keep strictly within the prescribed limits. I provided him with paints and brushes and went quietly on with my own work. All of a sudden I was startled by an exclamation of horror from the Baroness, and turning round, saw the cause of her consternation. The young Turk had been calmly wiping the wet brushes on his face, which was lined with streaks of brilliant vermilion, blue and green. The Baroness was in a great state of mind lest the Crown Princess might enter at any moment, and see her son in all his war paint. 'Oh! I will soon remove that,' I said, and taking a cloth soaked in a little turpentine was quickly removing the paint when I was stopped by a piercing scream, followed by a smart blow from the little fist of the young royalty. It was followed by kicks and howls, the latter so lusty that they threatened every moment to bring his mother into the room.

Digitized by Google

"It appears that the turpentine had found out a small scratch or cut, and no doubt made it very painful.

"The young Prince never forgave me for the ill-timed application, and was naughtier than ever when he came to see me again, so that I did not succeed in getting anything like a satisfactory likeness.

"A rather amusing incident took place in connection with the portraits of the Bishop of Oxford, 'Soapy Sam' as he was dubbed, and Lord Chancellor Westbury.

"The two were anything but good friends, having fallen out in the House of Lords upon some question long since forgotten.

"The Lord Chancellor, amongst other injurious expressions, referred to the Bishop as 'The Saponaceous Prelate,' and the Bishop retorted that if the Noble Lord had no respect for himself he begged he would respect the assembly in which he found himself.

"I knew how these men disliked each other, and I could not resist playing off a little joke against them.

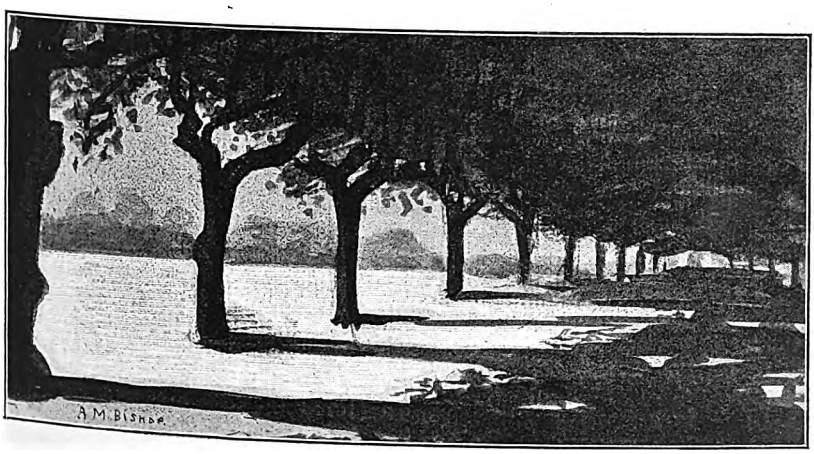
"I said casually to Lord Westbury when he came to see me, 'I have just finished the portrait of the Bishop of Oxford, the Prelate of the Garter.'

"'Ah, Sam of Oxford,' remarked his lordship, airily, 'I should like to see it.' I took him to the picture, and pointed to the likeness. 'Here is the Bishop, my lord.' 'Oh!' replied his lordship in icy tones, 'I should never have thought it possible to produce a tolerably agreeable face, and yet preserve the slightest resemblance to the Bishop of Oxford.'

"I thought to myself, 'I will just hear what the Bishop has got to say about you,' and so when the prelate came, I said to him, 'I have had a sitting with the Lord Chancellor since you have been here, and found him very pleasant and amusing' (which indeed he was, for he had a wonderful fund of anecdote). 'Indeed!' replied the Bishop, sarcastically, and went up to the picture. 'Wicked! Wicked! Wicked!' was his brief comment, after a moment's careful scrutiny.

"When the picture was finished the Queen honoured me with a visit at my house, and expressed herself satisfied with the work which appeared in the Exhibition of 1865. From its subject it was necessarily very popular, and it was found necessary to protect it with a rail."

A. FREDERIC WHITE.



Digitized by Google

COMMON SENSE FOR MOTHERS AND NURSES.

A Series of Articles by Dr. JULIA HOLMES SMITH.

No. 10.—How to Meet Emergencies: Accidents.

ONE would hardly think it necessary to discuss the subject of accidents in the nursery, but the care of the child until certainly ten years of age necessarily involves knowledge on the part of the mother or the nurse as to how to meet the possible emergencies.

A very small baby can fall from bed or cradle or chair, and except the temporary discomfort from the contact with the floor there is no bruise and no accident worth noticing to the bones; but after there has been a firmness acquired by the bony structure and a decided activity in the muscular fibre, there are bruises and broken bones, and this is the time when the mother and the nurse ought to know what to do in the meantime, and, indeed, for all time, because the successful treatment of the bruise, or the cut, or the sprain, or even the broken limb, may decide the question as to whether the boy or the girl may come into manhood or womanhood perfectly formed or half made up.

When the little one falls and sustains a bruise, some old-fashioned remedies are about as good as anything that can be suggested by the physician or the surgeon. When soft, muscular tissue comes in contact with a hard substance there is a rupture of the tiny blood vessels, and the blood oozes out in the surrounding tissues, and the result is black, green and blue discolorations which we associate with bruises. Nature immediately commences to restore all these vessels, and really no external application is of any good except to protect the part and allow Dame Nature to do her work. This is true of any wound, and the idea that such and such a thing is a healing substance is really a mistake; but naturally one is eager to do something for the little sufferer, and our grandmothers were not far wrong when upon a bruise they bound a bit of fresh beefsteak, or brown paper soaked in vinegar, or a bit of cotton saturated with diluted arnica. The swelling goes down, and there is relief to pain, and Dame Nature is helped in her work. The pressure of such an application promotes the re-absorption of the blood, and some of these applications effect a deadening of sensation to the wound.

When there has been a real cut, with profuse bleeding, plunge the part in as hot water as can be borne, and then take a bit of absolutely clean cotton or linen, place upon it a little vaseline, or lard even, and hold the edges of the wound together, and bind it as tightly as possible. Thus the office of the court-plaster or adhesive-plaster is replaced by what is certainly to be found in every farmer's family. I have known good results to be obtained from binding spiders' webs upon cuts.

It seems hardly worth while, in this connection, to speak of broken bones; but it has happened once in my experience that the child was saved from a great deal of suffering by the prompt action of his mother. He was riding in the woods one day, miles away from the house of any physician, and falling from his horse broke one of the bones of his arm. The mother coolly cut open his jacket, brought the two bits of bone together, and putting the child in the floor of the chaise, laid the arm upon the seat, thus holding it entirely straight, until she reached the surgeon's office, when it could be set.

Children are very apt to travel about on tours of investigation, and one of the various means of deciding whether or not a thing is valuable is by the taste; hence, it is not unusual for them to swallow buttons, fruit-stones, thimbles, and even a shilling has been known to pass through a child's intestines. The first thing to do is to be sure that the thing has been swallowed. Then give an ordinary cathartic, syrup of rhubarb or castor oil, with which encourage the child to eat plentifully of mashed potatoes, thick mush, or any other article of food which will fill up the intestines, and so force the obstructing article through.

Digitized by Google

Photograph by IN A CURING YARD. Norrie, Fraserburgh.

THE SCOTTISH EPISCOPAL MISSION TO FISHER FOLK.

By AUDREY WINTER.

An almost romantic interest is taken by most people in the lives of fishing folk, wherever they may be found. The reason is, no doubt, that the fisherman's life is often a hard struggle between nature and humanity. Nature in her grandest and wildest moods frequently opposes man as he attempts to breast the waves and gain the treasure of the sea for food. And then in thinking of the fishers of to-day our thoughts go back to the days of One who chose for His intimate friends the men who caught fish on the sea of Galilee. Fisher folk were chosen to be the founders of the Church, and it was by their instrumentality that many received the Christian faith. Whether we recognise it or not, this probably has something to do with the keen desire many have to know more of the fisher's life and its perils and hardships, and the very fact that some of the Apostles were humble fisher folk has invested that calling with a dignity that not many other trades or professions can possess.

The Scottish Mission whose story I am trying to tell does its interesting work amongst the men, women, and girls who live chiefly in the Western Isles, in Orkney and Shetland, and along the East coast of Scotland. Stornoway, in the island of Lewis, is the headquarters on the West coast, and there the Rev.

Digitized by Google

Photograph by OFF TO THE FISHERIES. Norrie, Fraserburgh.

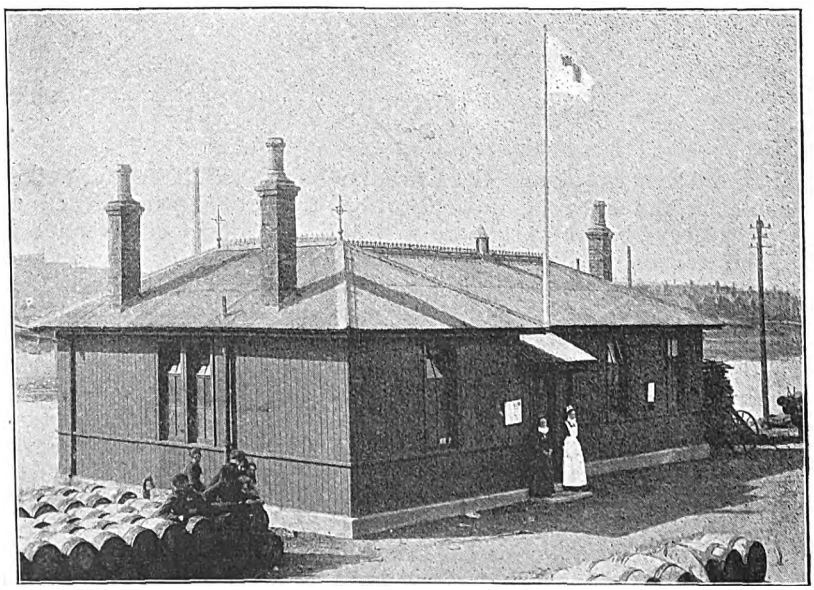
J. W. M. Wedderburn has devoted himself to the fishermen and their families, visiting the men on board their boats in the harbour, and welcoming them to the Institute where they can write their letters, read the papers and enjoy a quiet chat with one another. Mr. Wedderburn has a mission boat in which he can sail about the harbour at his convenience. During the cod-fishing season in February the capacity of the little Institute is taxed to the uttermost. Rough weather often keeps the boats in the harbour for days, and the men spend a great deal of their time on shore. A good number attend the services in church, and some of the Dutch fishermen (who go for the herring fishing in May) are delighted at being able to sing their Dutch hymns in the church after the evening service.

During the summer the work is very different from that of the winter. When May comes round the herring fishing begins. Then the fishing boats go in tremendous numbers, and the curers appear, bringing with them many girls from all parts who gut and cure and pack the fish. A large number of boats go to Barra and Castlebay, but the next important fishing is at Stromness. During the May season the boats in the Hebrides often number 600 and there are about 4,000 fishermen to look after.



THE DISPENSARY AT ABERDEEN.

The Orkney season begins about a week later than Stornoway. At Stromness is an excellent institute with a mission nurse in charge, and the clergyman visits the herring boats and trawling vessels in the harbour. Balta Sound and Lerwick are the chief fishing centres in the Shetland Isles and there are usually many hundreds of girls and boats at each port. Before the Stromness fishing is completely over, large shoals of fish begin to appear at Balta Sound, in Unst, the most northerly isle in the Shetland group. There crowds of fisher people assemble for the month of June and part of July. During the recent season there were no less than ten thousand. The girls live in wooden huts on the curers' yards and the fishermen on board their boats.

Digitized by Google

A terrible enemy to the fishers often appears in the Shetland seas. Huge shoals of dogfish devour the herring, and in so doing destroy the nets, cutting them to shreds. A whole set of nets, worth thirty or forty pounds, may be destroyed in one night, and, as no boat carries more than two sets, this damage is often a serious matter.

The Lerwick season follows close on, and by the middle of July the ports on the east coast of Scotland are hard at work. Fraserburgh, Peterhead and Aberdeen have their season simultaneously. Then later in the year, during September, October and November, the herring and the boats may be found on the English coast. Scarborough, Yarmouth,

THE FISHERMEN SUFFER MUCH FROM CUTS AND OTHER INJURIES.

REV. J. W. M. WEDDERBURN,
Head of the West Coast Mission.

Lowestoft, Grimsby and Hull follow in succession, Hull being last of all, and not ending till January. Again, in April, the fishing commences, Islay and Stornoway taking the lead.

During all these months the fishermen and girls have no settled home. The men generally live in their boats, and the girls are in lodgings in the various ports. The villages of Sutherland and Ross give their share of men and girls; numbers have their homes in the little fishing centres on the Moray Firth. Some come from Stornoway and the Western Highlands, while many girls from Berwickshire are to be found amongst the 20,000 employed in the work. Of late years, because the fishing has been so bad in Scotland, more curing has been done in the English ports. Now about 5,000 Scotch girls are to be found in the English fishing centres through the herring season.

Mr. Wedderburn follows the fishers and the fish. He visits Fraserburgh, Peterhead, and Aberdeen, and then it is time for him to be in England. At Sunderland he has found Stornoway folk, and last year at Scarborough he was amongst 300 Scotch boats. Grimsby and Yarmouth are then touched, and it is good to know that the clergy of all places are friendly to their Scotch brother and allow him to celebrate the Holy Communion and also preach to the fisher folk who may be present at other services.

Digitized by Google

Photo by Hardie, Aberdeen.
MISS CECIL DOUGLAS.

His work is naturally confined to the spiritual side of life, and he gets into touch chiefly with the men. But there is other work to be done. Both men and girls require attention, not only to their souls, but to their bodies. The men suffer terribly from salt water boils and poisoned fingers, which make it impossible for them to continue their work without some medical aid. The girls, too, suffer badly from cuts and sores caused by dressing the fish. As the men and girls are only season visitors there is, naturally, no dispensary accommodation for them in any place. So the Church in Scotland has taken the matter in hand, and it provides them with rooms in which to take recreation, and where their sore hands and bad wounds may be dressed, free of expense, by trained nurses, who give their time willingly and gladly to the tiring work of the season. And this is not all. Visits are paid by these ladies to the girls' lodgings, and

MISS ARMSTRONG,
A Trained Nurse, who follows the Fishing Boats from Port to Port as they work South.
Photo by Bennett, Worcester.

MISS DOUGLAS,
Daughter of the Bishop of Argyll, and Head of Aberdeen Branch.
Photo by MacMahon, Inverness.

Digitized by Google

in every way they try to help them, and to make them feel that they have friends who love them and take an interest in them during their long absence from home.

In truth the girls need a friend. They have no home life in these towns. They are obliged to live, eat, sleep, and do all their own work in a room which has no domestic convenience. As many as from six to twelve girls make their home in one room during the fishing season, and though they try to make their bare white-washed walls bright with coloured prints, they do not succeed in giving it a home-like appearance, for their whole furniture consists of beds and the boxes or "kists" which contain their garments and other necessaries of life. The girls welcome the lady visitor gratefully, and more often than not wish her farewell by saying "Haste ye back." They also keenly appreciate the rooms provided for them, where they can write letters, knit, sing, play games, and read papers and magazines, as well as receive treatment for any ailment they may have.

This particular part of the work was started in the diocese of Argyll some twelve years ago. The Bishop of Argyll, who takes a great interest in the lives of seafaring men, sent one of the deaconesses in his diocese to Stornoway to work amongst the girls. In about a couple of seasons, another lady worker went to Stornoway, at the request of the Bishop of Aberdeen, to gather particulars of the work with a view to doing something similar in the fishing stations in the Aberdeen diocese. The work at Fraserburgh was then started, and Sister Mary Ellen, the head, has been there each year since. She is well known amongst the curers and fisher people, and the former appreciate heartily the work she does amongst their employees.

Day after day both men and girls throng the room with hands to be dressed, and occasionally she will be asked to go on board a boat in the harbour to do some necessary dressings to a suffering fisherman. The room there is open on Sundays also. In the afternoon there is a class for the fisher children, who accompany their parents in the season, and also a Bible Class for the grown-up girls. At night, after the churches are closed, the room is open to men. That they appreciate it is evidenced by the numbers who go there, and they love to sing hymns from some well-known source. Moody and Sankey's are the favourites, and it is good to hear their fine voices rolling out some well-known tune.

THE FISHING FLEET IN FRASERBURGH HARBOUR.
Photo by Norrie, Fraserburgh.

Digitized by Google

The six important fishing stations of Stromness, Balta Sound, Lerwick, Fraserburgh, Peterhead, and Aberdeen, are all in the diocese of Aberdeen and Orkney, and the Bishop takes the keenest personal interest in the work among the fisher-people. In Shetland he has sometimes held an open-air service for them, only protected by a pile of herring barrels from a gale of wind. He is well-known at all the fishing stations, and his sympathy and encouragement are greatly valued by the mission workers.

Sometimes it happens that one lady may be able to visit several stations. During the recent summer, Miss Armstrong, a fully trained and experienced nurse, carried on the work with great success at Stromness, Balta Sound and Lerwick, leaving one port for the other at the end of the respective seasons.

Miss Treweek, who is a permanent worker among the fisher people, carries on a most valuable work amongst the people in their own homes during the winter. Her chief charges are the girls who spend a great part of the winter in mending the nets. Miss Treweek goes with them as mission nurse to Stornoway for the spring fishing, and then works for the remainder of the season at Peterhead.

The Rector of Peterhead is also an energetic worker among the fisher folk and he co-operates heartily with Miss Treweek in all the efforts she puts forth. A really beautiful Church Hall is placed at her disposal throughout the season and there she provides for the recreation of men and girls and attends to their cuts and sores.

The work at Aberdeen was started in 1893 and is under the personal supervision of Miss Douglas, daughter of the Bishop, who also acts as Honorary Secretary for the mission nurses at the other centres of work in the diocese. On the south side of the large harbour at Aberdeen and in the midst of the curing yards stands a one-storied building flying a white flag bearing a red cross. That is the dispensary on Point Law to which the men and girls go when they want friends. There is a large room, bright with pictures, tables containing books and magazines with plenty of space for letter writing too.

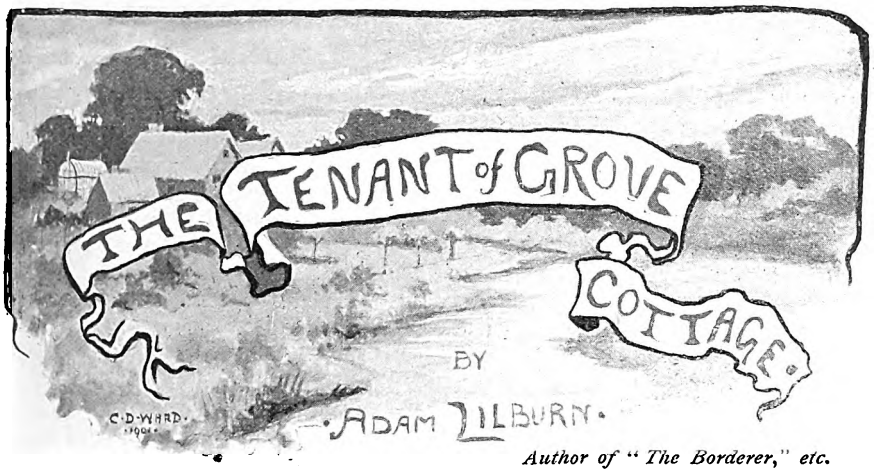
The amount of work done may be gathered from the fact that at Point Law alone during the recent eight weeks' season no less than 350 patients have been under treatment. In the earlier days of the dispensary Miss Cecil Douglas, another daughter of the Bishop, who is also a trained nurse, was one of the principal workers, assisting there for several seasons, and she now often lends a helping hand.

One pleasing feature of the mission is that the work is done voluntarily. The ladies who go year after year have nothing but their bare expenses. The labour is freely given, and, more, it is often given during the holiday time when they might be enjoying a thorough rest. But the work is exceedingly fascinating; it grows on one. The people respond so freely to the kindness shown that it is easy for the workers to look upon them as friends. No branch of the Scottish Home Mission Work is more deserving of support than this, and no work is more needed.

The growing numbers of Scotch girls in England year by year make it necessary that some such efforts should be made in the English ports. It is with pleasure that one realises that an English committee has been formed in order to do similar work amongst them when they visit the southern part of the island. Everyone must wish the effort hearty success.

AUDREY WINTER.

Digitized by Google



Author of "The Borderer," etc.

Illustrated by CHAS. D. WARD.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Nora Shelley, Mr. Pattinson's young ward, walking out with her uncle from his country cottage one day, discovers the dead body of a stranger who has been stabbed in Dredman's Lane. The knife with which he was stabbed belongs to Mr. Pattinson himself. He explains that he used it to cut his shrubs with, and left it in a place where it might easily have been stolen. Suspicion falls upon the village ne'er-do-well, Jerry Gobey, who is found in possession of the dead man's purse.

CHAPTER VII.

A PHILOSOPHER'S QUEER PETS.

WHEN Nora returned to the house she discovered its blind mistress sitting alone in the breakfast-room, in the same attitude and with almost the same placid expression upon her sweet old face as when the girl had left her an hour previously. This seemed strange, since it was certain that her son had informed her ere this of the tragic episode which had darkened the autumn sky; at least to the young and impressionable girl.

The experiences of youth are so strange and wonderful to itself that it cannot but marvel at the quiet manner in which they are accepted by age. It is to them impossible to realise that the old have grown so accustomed to the rapid changes afforded by life's kaleidoscope that they have ceased to marvel at them. "Naught may endure but mutability," the poet says, and the aged accept this statement even though they may sigh over it.

"Yes, dearie," said the old lady, in her even voice, when Nora showed surprise at her calmness. "It's very dreadful to think that there are people in the world wicked enough to kill a poor old gentleman for the sake of his purse or his watch! But, as my Dan says, it doesn't make the crime any the more dreadful that it's taken place at our very door instead of in Whitechapel."

A touch of impatience brought a frown to the girl's brow.

"Well, I don't know. It seems worse to me, somehow—oh, it's no use, I can't and won't philosophise about it like Uncle Dan—it's too cold-blooded altogether. If you'd seen what I did——"

She stopped suddenly. She was impulsive, but not devoid of consideration for others, and she felt certain that the words on her lips would horrify her old friend.

Her guardian had set her a splendid example of self-restraint. For, let him say what he liked, his nerves must have sustained a severe shock. He had gone through worse things than she had on that day. No unpleasant detail had been spared him. He had been obliged to remain while the doctor made an examination of the body. Yet he had returned home from the dreadful scene and managed to successfully conceal every trace of emotion while devoting himself to the task of soothing his mother and dispelling her fears.

Digitized by Google

And in this he had succeeded to perfection. Fortunately his influence was paramount with her. She accepted his statements with the unquestioning faith of a child. So, when he unfolded the painful story, he did so in a way that robbed it of half its horrors. His bald narration was absolutely common-place and devoid of interest.

But of this the girl, of course, knew nothing. Only she did know that he would despise her if she allowed her feelings to undo the effect of his work.

"Where is Uncle Dan?" she asked at length. "Surely he hasn't been obliged to go to town to-day!"

The mother shook her head. "No, no! Trust my Dan for thinking of everybody," she said, with a simple pride. "It wouldn't have been kind if he had gone away to-day and left us two alone. He knew we'd be nervous after what had happened, so he sent off a telegram to cancel all his business engagements."

Nora drew a breath of relief. Nervous? Well might they be nervous when murder lurked so near. And such murder! Cold-blooded, treacherous, cowardly. Murder that struck at a defenceless old man from behind, and then crept back to its hiding-place, satiated for the time being with blood. It was indeed well for two weak women, at such a time, to have a man at hand to defend them in case of need. And, moreover, a man like Daniel Pattinson: cool, calm, resolute, alive to every danger, equal to every emergency.

"Dan's not far off, dearie. If you want him, you'll find him in the big greenhouse among his pretty flowers. He's taken his whistle to play to his pets. It's a queer taste he has for them nasty toads and creepy things, but after all I s'pose God made 'em, same as prettier creatures, an' Dan do seem to take to them kindly. But, Nora, if 'tisn't too much to ask of 'ee, I'd like a chapter before 'ee go."

"What shall I read?"

"Oh, somethin' hopeful and comfortin'! That one about green pastures an' still waters. It do bring back to me the home in the sweet smellin' west-country, an' the fields I used to walk in long ago."

The girl drew a stool close to the old lady's feet, and sitting there read the exquisite poetry of the Hebrew prophet in her low, musical voice.

When she finished she lingered a little, settling Mrs. Pattinson's cushions, straightening the knitting that would be a tangled web again before evening, but served meanwhile to occupy the poor awkward hands. Not yet had the blind woman gained the skill common to those afflicted in like manner; her deprivation of sight was the result of an attack of rheumatism, and had come upon her quite suddenly the year before. The knitting was a lucky inspiration of Nora's, for until then time had dragged heavily.

Nora was unsettled and restless, and her usual avocations lacked interest. She wandered in and out of the house, finally reaching the greenhouse, where she stood peering through the glass door. This same greenhouse was an imposing, domed erection, which Mr. Pattinson had had built from his own design. He wanted it to house his auriculas, of which he had a superb collection. He was immensely proud of them, especially of a peculiar lemon and green fringed variety which he had raised from seed. Through a dread of losing the distinction conferred upon him by being the sole owner of this wonderful auricula, he would not allow his gardener to enter the greenhouse during his absence, and attended to the watering of the plants himself.

Besides the auriculas, however, the place was inhabited by some curious creatures, not nearly so much to the taste of Nora. In fact, it was really the repulsion she felt for them that caused her hesitation upon the threshold.

She could not understand her guardian's peculiar taste. He actually appeared to relish the presence of various specimens of the batrachian and reptilian order: keeping tame toads and scaly lizards amongst his auriculas, ostensibly because they waged war upon the aphides which are such pests in greenhouses, but really, as the girl declared, because he positively liked the society of the nasty slimy things.

As she peered through the glass door she discovered him seated on a rustic bench, composed of tree roots twisted into a fantastic form, from whence he was

Digitized by Google

IT WAS A CURIOUS SIGHT TO WATCH THE MIDDLE-AGED MAN CONTENTEDLY PLAYING TO HIS STRANGE PETS.

Digitized by Google

sending forth strange and sweet strains from a somewhat primitive musical instrument; in fact, from a common tin whistle, such as street boys delight in.

He greeted the girl with a beaming smile, removing the whistle for a moment and revealing white gleaming teeth, whose beauty was marred by their being slightly pointed.

"Come, my child," he exclaimed, in a soft, caressing voice. "Come and make one of our happy party! But take care lest you scare away that little friend of mine in the corner," and he pointed to a small grey lizard of that common species occasionally met with about the fireholes of greenhouses. This creature kept protruding and drawing back its head from a hole in the wall, as alternately drawn by the music and repelled by its own timidity. It was a curious sight to watch the middle-aged man with his bland and pleasant expression sitting there contentedly playing to his strange pets. Much as Nora admired the simplicity of mind that could find pleasure in such a pursuit, she always experienced a feeling of annoyance when she found him engaged in it. There was something altogether too childish in it to please her. A tin whistle was the instrument of abject street minstrels; and toads were repulsive playfellows.

Nevertheless, after she had stood listening for a few minutes, her prejudice was apt take wings and fly away. For the music exercised a peculiar fascination over her senses. It was no ordinary strain that proceeded from the silly-looking tin tube. In vain she rebelled against the charm, and attempted to tear herself away. The commonplace reality receded and she lost herself in a dream of idyllic sweetness.

She thought of Pan piping amongst the reeds and the creatures that have their dwelling in the river deeps rising to the surface to listen; the slimy water-snakes wriggling out from the mud, the great, bloated frogs crouching upon the leaves of water-lilies.

The wind in the reeds and the rushes,
The bees in the bells of thyme,
The birds in the myrtle bushes,
The cicala above in the lime,
And the lizards below in the grass,
Were as silent as ever old Timolus was,
Listening to my sweet pipings.

Nora quoted the Hymn of Pan to herself as she listened to the weird music. Though surely nothing could be more unlike the great god with his horns and hoofs, and pointed ears, than this benevolent-looking man in coloured spectacles. Upon one of his shoulders the tamest of the toads squatted, and the other two crouched at a short distance, apparently listening to the music.

"See the poor little thing," he continued. "It is shy, so shy and constitutionally afraid of man, that it will take all my patience and kindness to render it tame. Now, Billy, here, my prince of toadkins, has ever so much more confidence in my affection."

Immediately the weird strain ceased the girl again grew contemptuous of the childish pastime.

"How can you, Uncle Dan? The lizard—well perhaps that—though reptiles aren't quite nice, not even those pretty little green lizards that peer out of the crumbling walls in Italy—but toads! Ugh! Just nasty, slimy, ugly toads—it's incomprehensible to me how anyone can endure them."

"Shame on you, Nora," returned Mr. Pattinson, playfully. "What right have you to despise the plainest and humblest of creatures? Remember how the Ancient Mariner blessed unaware the slimy things of the deep, and through that involuntary blessing rid himself of his horrible burden. Besides, do you know that toads are most interesting? They are the enigmas of natural history. We know shamefully little of their peculiarities. Some scientists laugh at the idea of their entombment for centuries in the hearts of rocks, but who knows for certain? For my part, I believe them to be philosophers. I like to think of them as philosophers, and that conviction forms the strongest link between us; for I, too, in my humble way, am a philosopher."

"Indeed, you are nothing of the kind! Philosophers are odious monsters who persist in viewing humanity from an entirely imaginary eminence, formed by their own sense of superiority!"

Mr. Pattinson laughed, in a noiseless fashion peculiar to him.

"Just as you persist in viewing my pets, Nora. I wonder wherein lies our superiority to what we choose to consider the lower organisms? Take my little friend, the lizard, yonder, for example. Nature is far kinder to him than to man—presumably his superior. You may destroy almost any part of his little frame, and then only give him the chance of contact with mother earth, and the missing part will soon be reproduced as perfect as ever. Even its eyes, those wonderfully delicate organs, are renewable. Just think of it! No need have they for doctors to patch and mend, as is the case with us and our own wretched, perishable bodies, and yet we have the insolence to despise them. Can we grow new legs and arms when accident deprives us of those we are born with? No, indeed. But then, after all, even doctors must live."

Digitized by Google

"All the same, I can't endure to touch a toad," persisted the girl; "and as for your philosophy, I laugh it to scorn. It's only skin deep at the best. You won't make me believe you've no affection for humanity. Why are you always doing things for people if you don't love them?"

"Feminine logic," he murmured. 'Deductions rapid and inaccurate! Humanity cries loudly for everything it wants. Its cries are clamorous and persistent. I find them very disturbing. Pleasant sounds are as necessary to me as pleasant sights; so, after all, you see selfishness rather than philanthropy may prompt my actions, and——"

"I don't believe it. I prefer to imagine you actuated by the higher motive. We know you, we two women who live with you. Even now"—here she hesitated for a moment, and continued with a perceptible effort—"I know you are trying to cheat yourself with that stupid philosophy to help you to endure the pain of the tragedy we know of. Yes, Mr. Philosopher, I've found you out," and she shook her finger at him.

He blew one shrill long note and smiled.

"Well, well, I'll not be so foolish as to contradict you when you express such a perfectly delightful belief in my goodness. It's quite refreshing to find oneself credited with so much tenderness by two such women as you and my mother. Perhaps, after all, I really am good when I am here with you. You make me what you believe me, and perhaps I do love my fellow-creatures, even though they don't move me to any passionate sympathy with their aims and ambitions. But, see, the little, wild, shy creature over yonder is eager for more music. Soon the frosts of winter will chill his slow blood, and he will fall into a long, long sleep, to awaken only with the spring. And don't you think that privilege of his is to be envied? To sleep while the sun is away. Ah, that were indeed happiness, for what is life without sunshine?"

Again he raised his pipe, and the strange, weird music came forth from it, while Nora listened, in reluctant yet enchanted silence along with the toads and the lizard.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE EVIDENCE OF THE PURSE.

Encouraged by the discovery he had made, the policeman went up to the door of the house, and giving it a slight push found it, rather to his surprise, yield to his touch. Clearly the wretched criminal felt himself secure as yet from pursuit. In truth, there was almost the boldness of innocence about this unfastened door, this carelessly displayed plunder. It was, Pawson decided, insolently audacious.

It was evident that Jerry Gobey underestimated the powers of the man he had to deal with. He didn't quite know Pawson; or so Pawson thought, with a touch of temper.

"I declare if it isn't all along of them blooming detective stories," he said to himself. "Things is come to a pretty pass when even a beauty like Jerry Gobey reads all about us in the Sunday papers and sets us down for fools. Never mind, it'll be all the worse for you in the end, my fine fellow!"

Advancing to the slovenly breakfast-table he stood looking down at the purse. It presented a sodden appearance, as though it had lain for some time in water, and a few flakes of green slime or duckweed clung about the clasps. He took it up and discovered it to be wet and limp.

"Oho, my man," he muttered, "you've been a-trying to do away with it, have you? but on second thoughts you decided to bury or burn it instead of letting it lie in the water. Earth's safer than water, and nobody ever digs in such a wilderness of a garden. But I've been too many for you this time."

Suddenly as he spoke someone came behind and made a grab at the purse. But the policeman was accustomed to such proceedings and merely tightened his own grasp.

Digitized by Google

"I say, look 'ere. That's mine! Wotcher mean by touchin' another chap's proputty? You bloomin' coppers thinks yer little tin gods, but I'll let yer know yer can't sneak into a bloke's house an' take wot isn't yourn, all the syme."

"So this nice purse is your property, Jerry Gobey? It's a spicy sort of a concern to put into one of your ragged pockets."

Jerry Gobey glanced at him furtively. The man was a miserable, dirty, ragged creature, with the brand of prison stamped upon him from close-cropped head to slow-dragging heel. Nevertheless, his face was devoid of the principal characteristics of the habitual criminal—the criminal whose lawless instincts are hereditary, the outcome of generations of shifty and uncleanly ancestors. His eyes were timorous rather than crafty, his mouth weak, and his chin receding, and there was more of defiant desperation than of brutality in his whole expression.

Even while attempting to play at bravado with the village constable a wholesome terror of the law was on him, and his ill-fitting courage shrivelled beneath the calm, unintelligent gaze of Pawson, as a sheet of paper shrivels beneath a flame.

"I say, you copper, wotcher a-drivin' at? There ain't nothin' agin' me just now, not as I knows on."

"Oh, ain't there just?" returned Pawson, drily. "Look here, Jerry Gobey, don't you go for to try that innercent lay on me, for it won't wash, and so I tell you straight. For instance, where did you get this tasty article? A real Russian leather one," continued the policeman, holding it to his nose, "and silver clasps, no less. I suppose you'll tell me you found it, eh?"

A vague alarm was the cause of Jerry's hesitation before answering. He was so accustomed to be cornered and browbeat that it behoved him to be cautious, though the question be ever so simple. The policeman, irritated by his apparent evasion, laid a rough hand on his shoulder.

"Come now, you needn't take the trouble to invent any lies," said Pawson, "and don't you think to fool me, either, for I know more about you than you'll like to have told in court. Where did you get that purse?"

Jerry wriggled like an eel beneath the ungentle grasp of the policeman, but though he contrived to slip from under it, he made no further attempt at escape.

"Wotcher a-drivin' at?" he repeated, sulkily. "I dunno, but ye've hit it fust time. Yus, I did find that purse. But wot's the good of tellin' you. Ye'll say it's lies, I s'pose?"

"You didn't happen to find it where it was never lost—in a gentleman's pocket, for instance?"

Jerry gave one startled glance, then his face hardened to the immobility of a mask.

"No, I just didn't," he exclaimed. "But wot's the use of tellin' the truth when ye won't believe it?"

"Well, let's hear yer fairy tales, anyway? Daresay they'll be as amusing as some o' those in the papers."

"I wasn't paid to amuse coppers! An' ye've always had a down on me, Pawson, ever since I can remember, though Lord knows why, for I never done nothin' agin you that I knows on. Dunno wot I was borned for. Even if I 'ave a bit o' luck it turns out rotten bad jest cos it happens to me. Look 'ere, 'twas like this: I was down at the bottom of the garden close to the water early this morning, watchin' the minners swimmin' in an' out o' the shadders, when I sees somethin' a-shinin' between two big stones right down at the bottom of a deep pool. Fust I thought it was on'y a bit o' tin-top of a sardine-box, or suchlike—but I puts down my arm—you can see for yourself how wet the sleeve still is—an' fished the bloomin' purse up. But I might ha' knowed it'd bring me bad luck. Everything does. They used to call me 'unlucky Jerry' when I was a youngster, an' the name seems to stick along with the bad luck."

He snivelled, and rubbed his sleeve across his eyes. But the constable was not to be influenced by any display of emotion. So Jerry rubbed his eyes again and continued:

"It was no such great shakes, either, for there was precious little in it, on'y 'arf a quid, two bob, an' a tanner. 'Ere they are. I haven't 'ad time to melt them yet."

He produced the various sums named from portions of his ragged garments which an ordinary person would have deemed eminently unsafe for storage. Pawson looked with unconcealed disgust at the coins lying in the dirty palm. Was it for this paltry sum that a man had been done to death?

Digitized by Google

"Was that all?" he asked, sharply. "Did the purse contain nothing besides?"

Jerry turned to the table and picked up a card. "This was in it," he replied, "an it give me the nyme an' address, sure enough. The leather's strong, an' it's hardly even damp. If you'd a-given me time I'd a-brought it to the police-station an' seen as if the gent as owned it wouldn't have spared a poor devil like me a sixpence."

The constable glanced at the card. It contained the same address as was written within the hat of the murdered man.

"Very likely. But, you see, I will save you the trouble. You're sure that's all?"

"That's all! I 'aven't 'ad no time to spend it, I tells yer. More's the pity, for I 'spose now ye've got it ye mean to keep it."

"Yes, you may rely on that," and Pawson pocketed the purse as he spoke. "But, look here, if you haven't spent any money, how've you managed to get such a spread?" and he pointed to the untidy fragments on the table.

"Why, yes'day mornin' a young lady, her as lives over yonder, she gave me a sixpence. She walked into me for a lazy vagabond, but she gave me sixpence all the same. An' Meg Sanders, her as has a shop in the village, she's always been good to me, she has 'cos she knowed my mother, so when I crep' up there yes'day she give me a loaf for the sixpence, an' some cheese, an' tea an' sugar into the bargain."

"Do you want to make me believe that you've not been up Dredman's Lane since yesterday morning?"

"Well, no more I have. Wot's there to go for? They all look at a pore chap as if he was a mad dog 'cos he's done time. Dashed if I know wot I come back 'ere for at all. Seems like as if one allers does the most unlucky thing for onesel'."

"You've certainly done the worst possible thing for yourself this journey, my lad," returned the policeman, grimly, "and now you've got to come along with me to the station. I haven't a warrant, but it won't do to wait for that with such a slippery customer as you to deal with."

"Me? Got to go along of you to the police-station? Wot then, along of the purse? I tell yer I found it honest enough."

"You can tell what story you please to the magistrates."

"But wot's it all about?" cried the wretched man, drawing back from the arresting hand. "You can't take me in custody for nothing at all, only pickin' a purse out of the stream?"

"Oh, can't I though? Not if the original owner has met with a cruel death at the hands of some scoundrel or other? Jerry Gobey, I take you into custody on suspicion of being concerned in the murder of a gentleman whose dead body was discovered in Dredman's Lane early this morning. That there purse is sufficiently good circumstantial evidence to warrant your arrest, so don't you make any mistake!"

The wretched Jerry gasped but offered no resistance, as Pawson, brimful of the dignity of office, rolled out his inflated periods.

"O Lord!" cried the prisoner, despairingly. "It's all along with the rest. I might have knowed that no good luck was like to come my way. An' as for you, Pawson, you bloomin' copper, you've had a down on me all my life, an' now I s'pose you'll not be content till the rope's round my neck. I dunno wot I was born for?"

"To be hanged, it seems," returned Pawson, as he slipped on the handcuffs.

CHAPTER IX.

"WILFUL MURDER."

The inquest upon the body found in Dredman's Lane took place the following day. It was identified by a gentleman who proved to be a clerk in the firm of Carlton and Co., City merchants, of Stag lane, Eastcheap, as that of his chief employer, Mr. John Carlton.

Beyond the identification of the body, however, the witness could throw no light on the matter. So far as he knew, Mr. Carlton was not likely to have had any business to bring him to that locality, but he must just state that he was not familiar with the private affairs of his employer. Mr. Carlton was extremely reserved, and never spoke of his own doings, except when required so to do in the course of business.

Digitized by Google

When the clerk concluded, his place was immediately taken by Mr. Pattinson, the tenant of Grove Cottage, who gave his evidence in a clear and concise manner, worthy of commendation. He described the finding of the body of the murdered man in the lane by himself and ward while taking a morning walk to the village. Jack Ditton, the milk boy, followed with corroborative testimony. It was not judged necessary to call Miss Shelley at this stage of the proceedings.

The most curious item of evidence was that relating to the weapon by means of which the murder had been committed. Mr. Pattinson, without a moment's hesitation, identified this as one that had—up to the time of the murder—been in common use in his own household. It was to all appearance an ordinary white-handled carving-knife, rendered sharp by much use; but the witness pointed out a small figure cut on the handle representing a stag's head with spreading antlers —evidently a trade-mark of some firm of cutlers. The set of knives to which it belonged had been in his possession for a period of at least ten years.

When asked if he could in any way account for its presence where it had been discovered—namely, in the fatal wound—Mr. Pattinson declared that he could only surmise that the person who had committed the crime had seen it in his garden and stolen it from thence. Yes; he had been using it himself in order to prune some branches of willow at the bottom of the garden, finding it sharp and well adapted for this purpose; but, having been suddenly called away, had left it on a seat, and forgotten all about it until he was horrified by discovering it upon the table in the police station where Dr. Hawthorn had laid it, after withdrawing it from the wound.

The coroner proceeded to question the witness minutely concerning this statement, and Mr. Pattinson appeared eager to give him all possible information.

Had he ever—prior to the occasion spoken of—noticed that the knife was sharp?

No, he couldn't say he had. It was simply because the one he generally used for pruning purposes had just proved too blunt, that he looked about for a more suitable instrument and found the other just within the open window of the breakfast-room, where his housemaid had left it.

Would it be possible for any person, in want of such a weapon, to see him place it upon the garden seat; and subsequently contrive to secure and conceal it without observation by the inmates of the house?

Yes; he thought it quite possible! There was, close to the seat, a gap in the hedge through which anyone so disposed could easily scramble.

Outside the garden, a rough path led along the bank of the stream; therefore — the seat being upon a slight eminence—the knife might easily be perceived by anyone secreted at the time amongst the bushes, and, given a fitting opportunity, there would be no difficulty about the matter.

JERRY WRIGGLED LIKE AN EEL BENEATH THE UNGENTLE GRASP OF THE POLICEMAN

Digitized by Google

The doctor's evidence proved conclusively that the deceased met his death by murder, not suicide. The wound could not possibly have been self-inflicted. In his opinion the crime had been committed by some person thoroughly conversant with the laws of anatomy, for the stab had been so dealt as to pierce a vital part and to cause instant death.

After this, the coroner recalled Henry Ashton, the clerk who had identified the body. Questioned as to the habits of his employer, Ashton displayed a reticence highly commendable to everyone present with the exception of the coroner, who was an irascible man and one accustomed to carry matters with a high hand.

The latter therefore commenced to harass the witness with questions irrelevant to the case, which were answered with evident reluctance.

Yes; it was true that Mr. Carlton had lived alone in chambers in Chancery Lane ever since Mr. Herbert—that is young Mr. Carlton—left the country.

Yes; he believed that father and son had quarrelled, and that it was owing to this that the young man went off to Australia. Did he know the cause of the quarrel? No. Mr. Carlton had told him nothing. Had he no means of knowing? Well, the fact was he never attempted to pry into what did not concern him. The private affairs of the head of the firm did not affect the routine of clerical work.

How then had he become acquainted with the fact at all? Why, only through Mr. Carlton ceasing to mention his son's name, although previously he had been exceedingly anxious that Mr. Herbert should become a member of the firm.

Yes! Mr. Carlton was a widower. His married life had been of brief duration, for his wife had died a year after they were married, died in giving birth to a boy—the present representative of the firm.

Questioned as to the financial position of the firm at the time of the murder, the clerk hesitated before answering. Upon pressure he admitted that matters were not in a satisfactory condition, and that he knew Mr. Carlton had been forced to borrow large sums at a heavy rate of interest, in order to meet his liabilities.

Such things were quite usual with firms whose trading was of at all a speculative character, but Mr. Carlton seemed more affected by his position than the facts of the case seemed to warrant. His temper and spirits were alike uncertain, during the past few months, and he was alternately depressed and elated without apparent cause.

The coroner, who was annoyed by the dry concise manner of this witness, and had apparently taken a dislike to him, treated him brusquely; indeed, almost with rudeness. In place of thanking him for the information which had been given so reluctantly and under such pressure, the coroner immediately pooh-poohed it as foolish and irrelevant.

Had there been any question of suicide it might have been important for the jury to hear of Mr. Carlton's embarrassments; but as it was obviously impossible for a person to stab himself in the back in the manner so clearly described by the medical witness, Mr. Carlton's state of mind prior to his death was entirely unimportant, and, in his estimation, had better have been withheld.

Ashton, the clerk, returned no answer to this taunt, although his dry parchment-like skin flushed a dusky red. He merely bowed and stood aside, waiting with admirable self-control and attentive patience for the verdict.

There was no hesitation about this on the part of the jury. It was brought in "Wilful murder against some person or persons unknown."

Then followed an unofficial announcement to the effect that one of the village constables had just made an arrest on suspicion, and that further developments might be expected shortly.

As Henry Ashton, the clerk to the murdered man, was hurrying off to catch the first train back to town, intent upon commencing the necessary preparations for his master's funeral, he was stopped by the gentleman who had been the principal witness as to the finding of the body.

"Mr.—ah, pardon me, but I didn't catch your name."

The other paused with evident reluctance.

"Ashton's my name," he said, shortly; "you were close beside me in court."

"Yes, but either I was inattentive, or a little hard of hearing at the moment. But I wish very much to speak to you. I didn't quite like the way you were treated. This is a most painful affair, Mr. Ashton, most painful to all of us. I can see you feel it deeply, and I honour you for the affection you so evidently feel for your late employer."

Digitized by Google

Ashton seemed restless, and shifted the black bag—without which it seems impossible for a self-respecting clerk to travel—from one hand to the other.

"Surely it's not so astonishing that one should lament the loss of a good master, after more than twenty years' association?" he returned, rather stiffly; "but really I must ask you to excuse me, sir, for there's a great deal to do, and I want to catch this train."

Mr. Pattinson pulled out his watch. "You can spare me ten minutes, and still catch it easily," he said; "and perhaps I may be able to assist you, if you will only allow me. Although a complete stranger to poor Mr. Carlton, I feel in some degree linked with the tragedy of his death, because I was almost the first on the spot afterwards. It seemed to bring murder close to my threshold."

The clerk—a dry, wizened man of forty—did not respond to this display of emotion. Years of City life had gradually enveloped him in an armour of suspicion and propriety. He was smarting under a sense of undeserved contempt, and sore at the manner in which his reluctantly-given evidence had been thrust aside as unnecessary and irrelevant. He had his own idea of its importance, and held to this in spite of the animadversions of the wooden-headed coroner.

Besides all this, and putting aside all personal annoyance, he was more moved by the death of his employer than he cared to admit. The careless sympathy of this intrusive stranger touched him upon the raw, and struck him as ill-timed and unreal.

But he had to deal with a man of wonderful tact and strange intuitions; so his resentment was easily detected and met.

"Pray forgive me, Mr. Ashton," said the benevolent-looking stranger. "Not for worlds would I intrude upon your private sorrow. I merely want to assure you that if you should be landed in any monetary difficulty—and from what you said just now, I infer that such a thing is possible—I will take it as a personal favour if you will apply to me."

"Thank you; but I don't fancy such an extreme measure will be necessary," returned the other, "for I've already written to Mr. Carlton, junior, who, unfortunately, is abroad at present. He would, I know, be extremely averse to any such idea."

"But, pardon me; it is not idle curiosity makes me ask the question. Is the young man in a position that will permit of him discharging any debt you may contract in his name?"

"Yes. I have reason to believe that Mr. Herbert is doing extremely well," replied Ashton, briefly. He was evidently unwilling to afford his questioner any more precise information.

The latter shot a quick glance at his prim face from behind the coloured glasses.

"I fancy you know more about the relations betwixt father and son than you were inclined to admit at the inquest," exclaimed Mr. Pattinson. The clerk returned his look coldly.

"I don't see why you should jump to such a conclusion," he replied. "Nor do I see the necessity of admitting your conclusion to be correct. In any case, it's time I went to the train, so you must just excuse me," and without further ado he hurried off.

Mr. Pattinson gazed after him thoughtfully. "A man of character," he murmured. "Dry, cool, unimpressionable, and absolutely honest; one would prefer this Mr. Ashton for a friend rather than a foe. Down at the bottom of his exact, precise, orderly mind is a deep and abiding sense of loyalty towards his late employer. He is, in that respect, a model clerk. He doesn't merely carry that virtue in his black bag to be laid aside on reaching home along with his high hat and frock coat. Such an attachment is as rare as valuable nowadays. I'm quite sure my confidential clerk cherishes no such feeling towards me. Far from it. He studies me in a more impersonal fashion than I do my toads. Pooh! What does it matter? He does my work fairly well, even though he squirms at it occasionally, and I pay him his wages. Anything further is not in the bond; only if he gets too curious and knowing he must certainly go."

Mr. Pattinson did not talk much about the inquest at home that evening; but after his mother had retired Nora lingered behind.

"What was the poor gentleman's name, Uncle Dan? I don't think you told us," she inquired casually.

Mr. Pattinson told her, and was rather surprised at the effect produced by the information. She started, and the colour mounted to her cheeks.

Digitized by Google

"Why, Nora, what's the matter? Are you familiar with the name?"

"Ye-e-es; but it can't be the same. I once met a young—— Someone of the name, I mean, but it's years ago and——No. It can't have any real connection with him—with the one I knew."

The girl exhibited a confusion that aroused a certain degree of curiosity in the gentleman's mind, and he questioned her closely, but without eliciting any further information. She was generally frank to a fault, but in this instance evidently preferred to keep her own counsel. Some odd and unusual feeling of shyness had always hitherto prevented her mentioning the adventure associated with the name of Carlton; and even now—when her guardian said that a letter, signed Bertie Carlton, and presumably written by the son of the dead man, had been found in one of the latter's pockets—she bit her lip and kept silence.

But she was restless and unlike herself, and soon, with a hasty good-night, ran upstairs to her room.

Here she immediately took off her pretty frock and put on a dainty dressing-gown, loosened her long, dusky tresses, and sat down by the open window.

Faint odours of dying flowers crept up from below, and a cool air fanned her hot cheeks. Suddenly, as she looked out upon the dark garden, she recognised that the winter was closed at hand. There was a suggestion of death and decay in the air—of fleeting summer and the long sleep of the earth—that saddened her, so she closed the window, though she still sat and gazed up to the stars.

Then a handsome, haggard face rose before her mental vision.

"Perhaps he's dead, too," she mused. "And yet somehow I don't believe it! I fancy we're fated to meet again some day—somewhere. But not, I hope, through a tragedy. Surely fate would be kinder to us than that? I do wonder where he is and what he's doing just at this minute? I'm sure he won't be thinking of the silly little girl who spoke to him that day. How ashamed I feel now of the part I played. And yet, after all, what is there

SHE GAZED CRITICALLY AT HER OWN REFLECTION.

Digitized by Google

to be ashamed of? I'd do the same to-morrow! He was horrid just at first, poor fellow; and no wonder, either. How could anyone be nice when they were starving? Oh, it makes me feel sick only to think of it; and then, well then he was quite different after. But I oughtn't to have allowed him to kiss my hand. It was stupid and sentimental; and I hate sentiment—at least, most people's! I was a silly little thing in those days. Life seemed so dull, so prosaic. And about that adventure there seemed a suggestion—the merest suggestion, you know—of poetry. And, well, I suppose I always loved romance down in my heart, though I wouldn't confess it!"

Here she laughed at herself, and going to the looking-glass began to plait her long hair. Then her eyes fell upon the window and the still undrawn blind.

"Yes, indeed, I must shut you out, you dear, bright stars," she exclaimed, ruefully, "although there's no one to overlook me save the ghosts over at the Bungalow."

When she had drawn the blind she lighted the two candles standing on either side of the mirror and gazed critically at her own reflection.

And a very pleasing one it was. The white robe, with its dainty ruffles of lace and pink ribbons, threw up the richness of her brunette tints, and the warm darkness of her hair and eyes. And when she smiled—as how could she fail to smile at the pretty picture?—the mischievous dimple that lurked in her right cheek crept out and added a touch of witchery to the reflection.

"Well, there's one comfort, my dear," she said to her shadow in the glass, "you've not lost your looks during the last few years. In fact, I believe you've rather improved than otherwise since that eventful day on the bridge. I wonder what he'll think of you now, if ever he should turn up again? Oh, me, it's very weak of me, but I do wish he may! He had fine eyes, though they did look gloomy at first. But really, I must be as silly as ever, or I wouldn't be sitting here admiring myself and talking nonsense, instead of going to bed like a sensible girl. And after such a frightful day, too! But perhaps that's just why! I was impatient with poor old Uncle Dan for seeking consolation in his toads and his tin whistle, and, behold, I'm quite as frivolous in turn. Heigho! We all want happiness in some form or other, and grumble because we can't command it at will. Well, well, good-night, Nora," and here she blew a kiss to her counterpart in the mirror. "Try to imagine the moon's made of green cheese, and very indigestible at that, and then you won't cry for it any longer. And try to go to sleep and awake in a more sensible frame of mind in the morning. But all the same, he had nice eyes, and the adventure was romantic. So there!"

CHAPTER X.

AN IMPORTANT WITNESS.

Time passed, and the remains of the murdered man were laid to rest in Highgate Cemetery beside those of the girl-wife to whom he had remained faithful through so many years. Ashton, the clerk, was his sole mourner, for he had no relative save the son who was across the seas.

Jerry Gobey was brought before the magistrates in due course, and committed for trial at the coming assizes.

The solicitor who had undertaken his defence found him a very difficult subject to deal with. Half-a-dozen times he appeared on the point of making some admission, but invariably thought better of it at the last moment. Mr. Ryder, the solicitor, lost patience.

"Really, you ought to be frank with me," he exclaimed. "How do you expect me to do anything for your defence if you will persist in withholding evidence bearing upon the case?"

"Who's a-witholdin' of evidence?" returned the prisoner, regarding the solicitor suspiciously. "I never said nothin' agen' nobody, now did I?"

"No, indeed! That's exactly what I'm complaining of. I feel quite convinced in my own mind that you could throw a good deal of light upon the proceedings that took place on the eventful night if you would only open your mouth. It's an exceedingly ill-advised proceeding, your silence, I can assure you! I wonder if you quite realise how strong the circumstantial evidence against you is? Many a man has been hung upon less."

The solicitor thought to frighten Jerry into speaking out, and certainly an expression of deadly terror crept over the poor wretch's face, while his hands went up to his neck involuntarily. But in a moment he pulled himself together, and the defiance returned stronger than ever. "Better even that than sneak on a pal," he muttered to himself.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Ryder's ears were of the quickest.

"Ah! There's someone else involved, is there?" he asked sharply.

"I never said nothin' about nobody," repeated the prisoner.

And he was on his guard for the remainder of the interview. The solicitor had had considerable experience amongst the criminal classes, and was thoroughly convinced that this special one with whom he had to deal was shielding someone, or, at any rate, withholding important evidence from some mistaken feeling of loyalty. Such things were by no means unusual amongst criminals. And he knew sufficient to make him despair of getting the truth from Jerry Gobey. His was exactly the sort of weak yet dogged nature that would prefer death to disloyalty. The only alternative, therefore, was for his solicitor to advertise for such person or persons as might be in a position to throw any light upon Gobey's movements during the night of the murder. Accordingly, a carefully worded advertisement was despatched to such of the newspapers as were at all likely to be read by any friend of the prisoner. Mr. Ryder did not hope much from this move, but it was all he could do.

The trial took place a month after this, and the same witnesses appeared as at the inquest. Miss Shelley was called upon this time, but her evidence, given with traces of emotion, merely corroborated that of the other two witnesses who were present at the finding of the body. One point in her evidence, however, told in favour of the prisoner. His counsel, a smart young barrister employed by Mr. Ryder, asked whether at any time on the day preceding the murder the prisoner had appealed to her for assistance, and she had given him sixpence in answer to his appeal? He had stated this to the constable when arrested. She glanced at the prisoner and declared his statement to be correct. The prisoner was the same man who had begged of her in Dredman's-lane.

She was anxious to assist him now, for some subtle instinct assured her he was innocent of the crime laid to his charge. How or why her first bad impression of him had given place to a feeling akin to compassion she never could explain. He was degraded and abject in the extreme, but from the moment she saw him standing there in the dock she felt convinced that his plea of "Not guilty" was no mere legal fiction, but the absolute truth.

Her heart sank, therefore, under the clever cross-examination of the prosecuting counsel. He attempted to prove that her evidence told against rather than in favour of the prisoner. It showed conclusively that he had been in the neighbourhood shortly before the murder.

Pawson gave his evidence with commendable brevity. He stated that the prisoner's record was a bad one, even previous to this affair. Gobey had been, in fact, just released from gaol, where he had been for three months on a conviction for felony. Remembering this, and having long had the prisoner under his eye, his suspicions immediately fell upon Jerry. He described his approach to the Bungalow, his discovery of the purse belonging to the murdered man—which said purse had since been identified by Mr. Carlton's clerk—and the prisoner's demeanour at the time of arrest.

The defendant's counsel requested permission to cross-examine this witness; and, his request being granted, proceeded to ask whether the behaviour of the prisoner was unlike that of an innocent man falsely accused.

Well, no, Pawson couldn't exactly say that; but criminals had different ways to other folks. Some of them were artful enough for anything, and contrived to assume airs of innocence that would deceive persons unaccustomed to them. The prisoner's story of the finding of the purse was, to his mind, quite incredible.

Was it not quite as incredible that, having gained possession of it in the manner insinuated by the witness, he should have made no attempt at concealment, but had, instead, claimed it openly, and indeed, tried to snatch it from the hand of the witness, as he had himself averred?

Was it not also a fact that the witness was well known to have conceived a prejudice against the prisoner, and had never missed an occasion of badgering or browbeating him?

The witness coloured up and wiped his forehead while cogitating an answer. But the judge came to his rescue, ruling that the question was irrelevant, and that the constable had not, at least in the present instance, exceeded his duty. The evidence upon which he had arrested the prisoner was sufficiently strong. Nevertheless, the barrister had scored a point, and sat down contentedly.

Digitized by Google

The case, however, still looked pretty black against the prisoner, when a crumpled bit of paper was handed to his solicitor, whose face lightened as he conferred with the counsel. The latter rose and stated that he had an important witness to produce, one who had unexpectedly come forward at the last moment in the prisoner's behalf, and who was in a position to prove conclusively that at the very time the murder had been committed—which according to medical evidence was between the hours of ten and eleven at night—the prisoner was in Dredman's Bungalow with a friend, who had not left him until late the following morning.

Upon hearing this statement the face of the wretched being in the dock was transfigured, and for a moment he grew human.

"That's Bill! Hang me, if that isn't just Bill all over! Jolly glad I am I didn't sneak on him," he muttered to himself.

(To be continued.)

MOTHER.

I have seen the sunrise breaking on the shores of distant seas—
I have seen the mists of evening creeping slow across the leas
To the borderland of twilight when the birds were winging home,
And the air was filled with sweetness from the newly-furrowed loam;
But the wondrous tints of evening and the glory of the skies
Cannot move my soul to gladness like a smile from Mother's eyes.

I have heard the chimes of church bells faintly echoing on the breeze—
I have heard the south wind sighing soft and low among the trees
When the moon had bathed the hilltops in a weird and magic glow,
And her wake was traced in silver on the river far below;
But the sweetest strains of music cannot make my heart rejoice
Like the love note low and tender that I hear in Mother's voice.

M. Le Roy Osborne.

Digitized by Google

SOVEREIGNS I HAVE MET.

By CHARLES LOWE.
(Formerly Correspondent of the TIMES at Berlin.)

CROWNED heads have always a natural attraction for everyone—no matter what their politics or social views; for, whatever their personal merits or failings, Sovereigns are at least personages who represent their people, besides being the embodiment of more or less authority over them, and the seat of personal power is ever a centre of popular interest—the greater the power, the greater the interest. Thus it was that when, in the winter of 1878, I went to Berlin as the resident correspondent of the Times, I confess that my primary idea was to see—not the old Emperor William I., who was the titular ruler of Germany, but Bismarck, whom I knew to be her real Sovereign; and my curiosity was first gratified in the Reichstag, to which the Iron Chancellor had come express from Varzin with his famous "Christmas card" to the nation, which took the form of an announcement that he now intended to commit the Fatherland to the experiment of a protective tariff.

Soon thereafter, I had an opportunity of seeing the real and the titular Sovereigns of Germany standing face to face at a very grand ceremony in the Royal chapel, the Emperor's golden wedding. The former had advanced from a crowd of courtiers to congratulate his "old master"—"whom I have always," as he once said, "been able to talk over, if not to persuade"—and what a contrast was presented by the two men! Bismarck, in his white Cuirassier uniform and long jack-boots, looked such an embodiment of personal power—physical and intellectual—as the world had, perhaps, never seen before; and it is not too much to say that, by comparison with him, Kaiser William I. was a perfect pigmy—in the stature of his mind at least, as this was impressed upon his otherwise pretty stalwart, but by no means lofty, figure. Bismarck's head required a specially made helmet—the largest in all the German army; that of the Kaiser was the very smallest. But if William I. was deficient in fine intellect, the lack of which made him but as potter's clay in the hands of his Chancellor, he had force of character, shrewd common sense, tenacity of purpose, justice, and great generosity of heart—in fact, like Spenser's hero of the Red Cross, "he was a very perfect, gentle knight"—patient with his foes, and to his friends faithful unto death.

It was the fidelity of William I. to his friends that was the means of enabling me to add another portrait to my gallery of European Sovereigns, in the person of his nephew, Alexander II., the Czar Emancipator of Russia. This was in the autumn of 1879, at Alexandrovo, on Germany's eastern frontier, whither the old Kaiser had secretly repaired to meet his Imperial nephew of Russia, with the object of dissipating the international misunderstanding connected with the results of the Berlin Congress, which threatened to end in another war. By good luck I managed to get wind of the meeting, and to be the only English correspondent present. The details and incidents of the meeting I learnt from a very good friend of mine in the suite of the German Emperor, who came to the railway station to despatch a telegram, and found me a close prisoner in one of the waiting-rooms—I had attracted his attention by rapping on the window—to which I had been roughly consigned on alighting from the train, and revealing my inability to satisfy the demand for my passport. Accordingly, I was at once "interned," and condemned to return to Germany by the next train; but, in the considerable interval which elapsed, I had time to learn all the particulars of the Imperial meeting from my officer friend aforesaid, whose intercession with my captors even induced them to "enlarge" me for the remainder of my brief sojourn on Russian soil; so that, under his guidance and protection, I even enjoyed an opportunity of having a good peep from the lawn of the pavilion where they met as their Imperial Majesties sat at meat—their faces suffused with the satisfaction of estranged friends once more reconciled. I thought I had never seen a more thorough-looking gentleman than Alexander II., the Czar Liberator.

Digitized by Google

My next visit to Russia, also by way of Alexandrovo, was of a very different kind. For no grim, grey-coated, revolver-armed gendarmes durst interfere with me now, seeing that I was bound for Moscow to describe the coronation of Alexander III., whose personal guest I became. What a magnificent personification of will-power over the 120,000,000 of his fellow-men forming his subjects did Alexander, the Moujik Czar, look, as on his snow-white palfrey—the central figure of a gorgeous pageant of Princes and potentates—he paced through the acclaiming streets of Moscow to his palace in the Kremlin on the day of his entry into the ancient capital of Muscovy—the will-power of a Bismarck without his luminous, controlling mind. But of all the pageants of that gorgeously festive time the one which I love by preference to recall was the grand supper banquet in the Kremlin, soon after the triumphal entry, where we grouped ourselves at little tables, with a mixture of social ranks as fortuitous as the dealing out of cards, and where these little tables were in turn made the round of by our Imperial entertainer himself, who, bending his gracious head, solicitously asked us whether we had enough to eat and drink, and whether there was anything else he himself could do for us—such the bounden duty and custom of the mighty Czar of Muscovy on occasions of that kind.

But this was not the only occasion on which I was fated to be flattered with the personal attentions of the Great White Czar. For on the night of his coronation in the Cathedral of the Assumption in the Kremlin, at which I had the honour to be the sole representative of the English Press—all my less fortunate colleagues having been excluded for want of room—I was so exhausted by the fatigue and excitement of the long day that, after reeling off my last slip of copy for the telegraph office, I threw myself on my bed, dressed just as I was, and never woke till well on into next day—only to discover, on going to my littered writing-table to see what o'clock it was, that my watch had disappeared, together with my pocket-book, containing from £20 to £30 (nominal) worth of very dirty rouble-notes. I searched, and searched, and made sure in every way; but my pocket-book and my watch were hopelessly gone, and I began to feel like Shylock when he fell to exclaiming: "Justice! The law! My ducats and my daughter!"

I need not detail the uproar, the runnings about, the ransackings, and the formal investigations which now ensued, all to no purpose. The very day of my departure had dawned, and I was lying in bed reflecting on the situation, when a knock came to my door, and in there stepped, to my great surprise, a dashing young officer, who, from his aiguillettes, I could perceive to be an aide-de-camp—of the Governor-General of Moscow, as it turned out. To my greater astonishment he put his hand into the breast of his tunic, and drawing forth my missing watch and chain, said: "C'est à vous, monsieur?" (Is this yours, sir?)

And then my handsome visitor proceeded to explain. A rumour of the theft had got into some of the Russian papers, and even attracted the personal notice of the Czar. The Governor of Moscow was at once communicated with and told that the stolen watch of the Times correspondent, who was the guest of his Majesty, must, at all costs, be found. Whereupon the Governor had summoned to his presence some of the most notorious thieves in all Moscow, and threatened them with Siberia unless they succeeded in discovering the whereabouts of the missing watch, for, as being practised robbers themselves, they must be familiar with the methods of their brethren and their methods of disposing of stolen goods. How or where my watch was discovered, or by whom it had been stolen, I never discovered. It was satisfaction enough to get my ticker thus restored to me, and the same day I left Moscow for St. Petersburg with the profound conviction that there are worse forms of government after all than an autocracy, with its rough and ready methods of dealing with crimes such as that of which I had been the victim.

Digitized by Google

At St. Petersburg I was treated with much distinction, and enjoyed the guidance of an officer of the Czar's household, who conducted me over all the imperial palaces, and showed me things not generally shown—among others the extraordinary collection of Chinese wall-paintings at the Katherinenhof. I visited the Anitchkoff Palace, on the Newski Prospect, which is the Marlborough House, so to speak, of St. Petersburg. Here Alexander III. had lived while heir apparent, and here his children, including the present ruler of Russia, Nicholas II., had been born. In Moscow, I had seen the little Czarewitch, marvelling much at his astonishing likeness to his cousin, his Doppelgänger, the Duke of Cornwall; and in the Anitchkoff Palace it was explained to me how simply and severely he had been brought up. I saw the simple bedroom to which, no matter how late the Emperor returned home, he always came to cross himself over the cots of their little occupants and kiss their cheeks; and I was taken to their schoolroom, of which the little inmates had tried to relieve the harshness by pasting all over the walls war pictures of the Russo-Turkish campaign, cut from the Graphic and other illustrated English papers. On several occasions after this I had an opportunity of seeing Nicholas II., among others, at Châlons, in 1897, when I witnessed the grand review organised in his honour by the French. On this occasion he looked dapper enough in his scarlet uniform of the Cossacks of the Guard, which becomes his slight, unsoldierly figure much better than the scarlet tunic and heavy beetling bearskin of his English regiment, the Scots Greys, who had overwhelmed the horsemen of his mighty ancestor at Balaclava; and, indeed, it was a cruel freak of English Court flattery to indue with such a warlike uniform Nicholas II., the unwarlike and Peace-Conference great-grandson of the bellicose Nicholas I.

Yet once the Court of Berlin was guilty of an indiscretion equally great, if far more serious in its consequences. In the year of the Coronation of Alexander III. —1883—I went to Homburg to attend the autumn manœuvres of the 11th Army Corps, which were witnessed by quite a galaxy of sovereigns, including the Kings of Saxony, Servia and Spain; and with the last-named I may be said to have had a vicarious interview, through his Foreign Minister, the Marquis de la Vega de Armijo. From Homburg, on his way home, Alfonso XII.—a little, rickety, shallow, pimpled, effeminate sort of sovereign, but with a fine high spirit in his unsoldierlike body, went to Paris, where he was received with hisses and howls of execration—and all because, at Homburg, he had the effrontery to accept the honorary chiefship of a Prussian cavalry regiment, and become what the Parisians scornfully described as a "roi Uhlan."

Most unfortunately for him, the lancer regiment of which he had become chief happened to be stationed at Strasburg, the capital of one of the conquered provinces, and the impulsive French at once jumped to the conclusion that here was another of M. de Bismarck's studied and gratuitous insults. As a matter of fact, Bismarck had no more to do with this than the man in the moon. It happened that, at this time, there were only two Prussian cavalry regiments vacant of a chief—one of hussars, the other of lancers —and the choice of these had been offered to Alfonso the Brave, who innocently chose the Uhlan one at Strasburg because it chanced to have yellow facings, which would thus suit his own sallow complexion—a proof to me at the time that a political earthquake might possibly spring from a pimply face.

But while on the question of uniforms I may as well allude to the Emperor Frederick III., whose character I had exceptional opportunities of studying. In his showy war paint and fine knightly presence, "Unser Fritz" seemed to be the very beau idéal of a soldier. But appearances were never more deceptive. The Crown Prince had little taste and less talent for soldiering, and no one was more aware than he himself that the victories for which the huzzahing public gave him credit were mainly due to his Chief of the Staff, General Blumenthal, as evidenced by the fact that one of the very first things he did on succeeding to the throne was to confer a marshal's bâton on the man who had organised for him his triumphs in the field. Frederick III. was a man of generous impulses and noble aspirations, but, like his uncle, Frederick William IV., who very nearly ruined Prussia by his fantastic emotionalism, his mental composition was marred by a vein of personal vanity, romanticism and impracticable idealism, which, on the whole, rendered it rather fortunate for his country that his reign was only one of ninety-nine days. William I. was a monarch of character, without much intellect; his son, Frederick III. was a monarch with a good deal of mind, but without much character; while his grandson, William II., as a sovereign inheriting at once the character of his grandfather with the intellect and, above all, the will of his English mother, is beyond question by far the ablest Sovereign who has sat upon the Throne of Prussia since it was vacated by Frederick the Great.

Digitized by Google

I have said that William II. was indebted to his gifted mother for much of his intellectual outfit, but I may add that he has also inherited some of the sovereign qualities of his English grandmother, our late Queen—especially those which caused even Bismarck to confess, after an hour's interview with her Majesty on the occasion of her visit to Berlin in the spring of 1888 to take farewell of her dying son-in-law, that "Queen Victoria possessed the most statesmanlike mind of all the European Sovereigns he had ever come across," and praise from such a quarter was praise indeed. I had seen Queen Victoria twice, at least, before this in Germany—at Darmstadt, to which her Majesty had gone for the confirmation of her grand-daughters, and the second time for the marriage of one of them to a Russian Grand Duke; and on one of these occasions I chanced to come into contact with John Brown, whose very strong character and personality struck me so forcibly that I ceased to wonder why he had become so great a favourite with his royal mistress, or that the Earl of Beaconsfield, a shrewd judge of means to end, had thought it worth while to conciliate the favour of this highly privileged and very powerful menial.

Another minor German Court, with an English family connection, was Brunswick, to which duty once took me for the purpose of describing the celebration of the Duke's jubilee—"Brunswick's fêted chieftain," as I punningly called him; and on this occasion I learnt from our Ambassador, the late Lord Ampthill, who was full of all sorts of curious gossip, that the Duke had remained single all his life, if not exactly a clerical celibate, because he had vowed never to marry any other woman after having been disappointed in his youthful ambition to wed his own distinguished cousin, our Queen.

Still another German Court with Royal English kinship and connections was that of Saxony—a Court, among other things, held in high account by Americans, who could always manage to get presented there when they found this giddy social distinction impossible of attainment either in London or Berlin. I had a good opportunity of studying the humours and characters of this Court when I went over to it once to describe the investiture of the King of Saxony with the Order of the Garter, by the Duke—then only Earl—of Fife, at the head of a ceremonious train of heralds, pursuivants, and other representative dignitaries; and the very high opinion which I then formed of the character of King Albert made it quite clear to me why, upon his death-bed, the Emperor Frederick had entrusted his son, the present Kaiser, to the special care of the King of Saxony and Grand Duke of Baden, two of the wisest Sovereigns in all the confederated Fatherland.

If Frederick III. might have been described as Kaiser "Toom Tabard"—a phrase which the Scots applied to one of their early kings from the fact of his being all show and little substance—his son and successor may be said to have begun his career as a kind of Kaiser "Tom-tom," seeing that he was for ever beating the big drum at Berlin, and keeping the nerves of all Europe on edge by his perpetual "alarums and excursions." On some of those excursions it was my duty to accompany, or at least to follow, the Tourist Kaiser—above all, to Constantinople, where I was able to add still another to my gallery of Sovereign portraits. The Kaiser determined to see something of the East, but previous to this the East, in the person of the Shah of Persia, had determined to see him, and for this purpose, in the summer of 1889, had taken Berlin on his way to London. On this occasion I saw a good deal of the Shah, and heard still more of his curious Oriental ways of life in the Château Bellevue, which had been assigned him as a residence in a remote corner of the Thiergarten.

I saw the Shah again in Scotland. For, chancing to spend my holiday in my native country, I was making a hill-pony tour among the Deeside Highlands, and in the course thereof came to Ballater, where his Majesty, after all his feasting in England, was presently expected to enjoy a taste of Scottish hospitality at the hands of Mackenzie of Glenmuick, which being interpreted, as they told me, means the Glen of the Pig's nose. Being known to a member of the Mackenzie family, I was kindly bidden to the grand ball at Glenmuick House, held in a huge marquee on the lawn, and my road companion up the glen was an earl's son, who was then serving as a private in the Cameron Highlanders, furnishing the Queen's Guard of Honour at Ballater. We had rare good fun at the ball—"Faith, we'se hae fine remarkin'" being our motto, from "The Holy Fair." But what most of all amused me was to see the Shah go up to a rather ugly old peasant woman, who was standing among the miscellaneous crowd of spectators around the dancing arena, and poke her under the ribs with a squirking sound from his throat, till the poor old thing almost squealed and "skirled." The Shah seemed to enjoy the joke immensely, though it was not a very dignified action on the part of the earthly King of Kings.

Digitized by Google

Much more grave and dignified in his demeanour than the Shah-in-Shah was the Padishah, who was the next Oriental Sovereign I was to see. For scarcely had I returned to Berlin from witnessing the grand naval review at Spithead in honour of the German Emperor than I was ordered off with him, at an hour's notice, on his Eastern tour to Athens and Constantinople. The Sultan lives the life of a timorous, almost a terrified, recluse; but one day, when, as the guest of his Majesty, I was sitting in the little pavilion just outside the gates of Yildiz Kiosk, sipping his excellent Turkish coffee, tasting his rose-coloured jelly, and smoking his fragrant cigarettes, I had a very good opportunity of observing the Commander of the Faithful, as, accompanied by white-bearded old Osman Pasha, the heroic defender of Plevna, he drove to his customary Friday Selamlik service in his usual mosque, and thereafter passed in review, in presence of the Kaiser, a body of the very finest troops I had ever seen. If the personal character and energy of the Sultan only corresponded to the magnificent fighting material of his subjects, what a factor the Ottoman Empire could yet become in the politics of the world. A played-out dynasty, that of the Sultan, but by no means an effete people! Upon me Abdul Hamid, passing through the lanes of his soldiery to the mosque with the air of a criminal being hurried to execution, made the impression of a terror-stricken phantom – a phantom at the head of one of the finest, if not the very finest, army in the world.

At Vienna, on my way home from Stamboul, I had no opportunity of viewing that "Grand Old Man" of European monarchs, the Kaiser Franz Josef. But in the spring of the same year—1889—I had seen and admired him at Berlin, where he came, for the second time only after his defeat by the Prussians at Koniggrätz, to return the German Kaiser's first duty-call of the previous year. This return visit was all the more noteworthy and historical as it gave me occasion for recording that at the manœuvres near Spandau, in honour of his presence, a great surprise was sprung upon him, and upon us all, by the use of smokeless powder for the first time by the German army. The other great innovation in the Prussian army, in the shape of the needle-gun, had been shown to the Austrians with disastrous effect at Sadowa; and at Spandau their Sovereign had now been treated to the first exhibition of the bewildering effects of smokeless powder. But at Sadowa the Austrians and the Prussians had been mortal enemies, and now, at Spandau, they were sworn allies and eternal friends.

The following spring I had again occasion to be in Vienna, where I had an opportunity of seeing the noble Kaiser Franz Josef in a new light—not of a soldier, but of a Samaritan Sovereign. In all the range of public or private spectacles, none is so touching as that of the Easter "Foot-washing" at the Court of Vienna, where the mighty chief of the Hapsburgs, surrounded by all the grandees of his ceremonial Court, the haughtiest in Christendom, stoops to wash the feet of a dozen of the poorest beggar-men in all the Kaiserstadt, and distribute among them basketfuls of food. The function recalls the ministrations of the Founder of Christianity, and forces the Austrian Emperors, like the sedes stercoraria of the Popes of Rome, to remember, in the midst of all their pride of earthly power, that after all they are only human.

Digitized by Google

And as for the Pope, Leo XIII., whom I had occasion to see when, in January of 1892, I paid a visit to Rome, what shall I say of him? But is the Pope a Sovereign! Yes, undoubtedly, and a mighty one too, whom Bismarck, after the Kulturkampf, once addressed as "Sire"! though his kingdom is no longer of this world, and he sits for ever scowling across the valley of the Tiber at the Palace of the Quirinal, where lives the royal ex-propriator of his temporal power. But if the late King Humbert was the natural enemy of "the Paip, that pagan full of pride, who blinded us fu' lang," he was, at the same time, the staunch ally of the Austrian and German Emperors; and of all the scenes of popular enthusiasm which I ever witnessed in Berlin—a scene almost to be compared with the triumphal entry of the German troops after the war with France—perhaps the most frantic was the arrival of the late King of Italy in the summer of 1889, to return the Emperor's visit of the previous year. The son of the Ré Galantuomo, King Humbert had a fine soldierly appearance, with a manner almost as bluff and hearty as that of his father, and in Berlin he was acclaimed to the skies as one of the pillars of the Triple Alliance, the central bulwark of the peace of Europe.

But far more touching, if not so clamorous, was another spectacle which I witnessed in connection with the great Peace Convention at the Hague. This was the entry into her capital of the young and winsome Queen of Holland, who had returned there to greet the representatives of over twenty of the civilised Powers of the world assembled in conference, to devise means of obviating the dangers and alleviating the horrors of war—a conference which may be said to have sat at her feet as an Angel of Peace.

CHARLES LOWE.

THE GREATEST LOVE.

When one has learned love's heaven to resign,
And brave a life grown tragically grey,
Upon the long, unsheltered, rugged way
A light of wondrous sweetness oft doth shine.
What though the soul thou lovest ne'er be thine?
It may be thine to minister some day,
To give thy life, while holding tears at bay;
And in thy heart will bloom a joy divine.
Oh, it were sweet to journey hand in hand
With one of kindred mind, and feel the tie—
Each day's acquaintance adding a new strand—
Grow strong as cables! Yet should fate deny
This happiness, love still! That love is grand,
Which lives to bless when it were sweet to die.

Mary S. Lothrop.

Digitized by Google

In the Public Eye

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

PROFESSOR W. S. McCORMICK, of Dundee University, who has received the important appointment of Secretary to the Carnegie Trust for the Universities of Scotland, is a native of Galloway, where he was born forty-two years ago. His early and University education was received at Glasgow, and he graduated at the University of that city in 1880. He afterwards proceeded to the Universities of Gottingen and Marburg where his studies served to give him a thorough knowledge of German literature. Italy also was his home for some time, which further broadened his literary conceptions.

From 1884 to 1889 he assisted Professor Nichol in conducting the English Classes in Glasgow University, and for a session he fulfilled the duties of the Professorship in the absence of Professor Nichol. He was also Lecturer in English Literature in Queen Margaret College, Glasgow; Examiner and Lecturer to the University Extension Board. In 1890, in succession to Professor Gilray, he was appointed to fill the Chair of English Literature in University College, Dundee.

PROFESSOR W. S. McCORMICK,
The newly-appointed Secretary to the Carnegie Trust for the Scotch Universities.
Photograph by J. Rodger, St. Andrews.

The management of the gift of £2,000,000, given by Mr. Carnegie to defray the fees of struggling students in Scottish Universities, will be under his control, and from his knowledge of student life he will be able to dispense this magnificent gift with a wise hand.

THE Rev. R. W. Freeman is an ex-President of the Newfoundland Methodist Conference, and his portrait will be welcomed by his many friends in that colony and in Canada. Though his ministry has been spent in Newfoundland he is a native of this country, having been born in Sheffield in the year 1848. In early life the family removed to the old town of Retford and here his schooling was received. Here too he began his Christian work, being promoted to the position of Sunday-school teacher at the early age of fifteen.

Digitized by Google

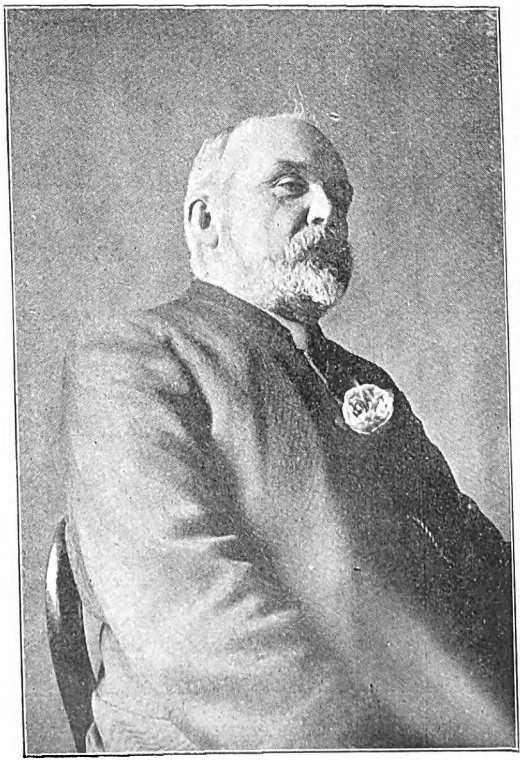
On entering a business career he still served his Church as a local preacher in the Sheffield, Doncaster, Malton, and Rochdale circuits. Feeling called to the work of missions, he offered himself to the Eastern British American Conference, was accepted, and sent to Newfoundland.

Twenty-eight years have been spent in this sphere of toil. His ministry has been owned of God in the prosperity of the churches under his care both spiritually and materially.

As an administrator Mr. Freeman possesses powers of a high order, and he has in consequence been called to fill the highest positions in the Methodist Church of Newfoundland. He has sat on the Board of Missions; has been the delegate to the General Conference; and has filled the chair of the Conference under which he works. Mr. Freeman was elected this year to represent that Conference in the Ecumenical Methodist Conference, held in London in the early part of September.



REV. R. W. FREEMAN,
Ex-President of the Newfoundland Methodist Conference.

MISS ETHELWYN WEAGER is a rising young violinist who has already begun to make her mark in the musical world.

She is only now nineteen years of age but has already made her first appearance at the Crystal Palace concerts as solo-violinist under the ægis of Mr. Manns. Her mother was an accomplished pianist and her father studied singing under Garcia. Miss Weager took to the violin when quite young and at thirteen obtained a scholarship at the London Organ School and International College (Dr. Yorke Trotter, Principal). She was fortunate enough to be placed under Herr Sachse—a professor of the Joachim school.

To use her own words, she soon found that real training was not play, and many a time she approached her lessons with fear and trembling, but came to see, however, that to surmount difficulties as they arise is an essential element in successful study.

Miss Weager always took a keen interest in the Crystal Palace Classical Concerts, and from a child cherished a secret ambition to be able some day to play at one. She remembers when quite young being taken to shake hands with Mr. Manns, who, on learning that she had obtained a scholarship for the violin, gave her a kiss, and told her to work hard and come to him in five years' time. Two years ago she had the temerity to remind him of his request, and to her unbounded delight he said he would hear her privately, at the same time telling her he was inundated with applications, but made it a rule not to entertain any where he was not satisfied that the applicant had received proper technical training in a well-known college. It was arranged that she should play to him Wieniawski's Grande Polonaise—of course without music. She never knew what nervousness meant until that moment. When she had finished playing the violin, however, he came forward and shook hands, and when

Digitized by Google

MISS ETHELWYN M. WEAGER,
Who has just made her debut as Solo-Violinist at the Crystal Palace.
Photograph by Reed, 443, Strand, W.C.

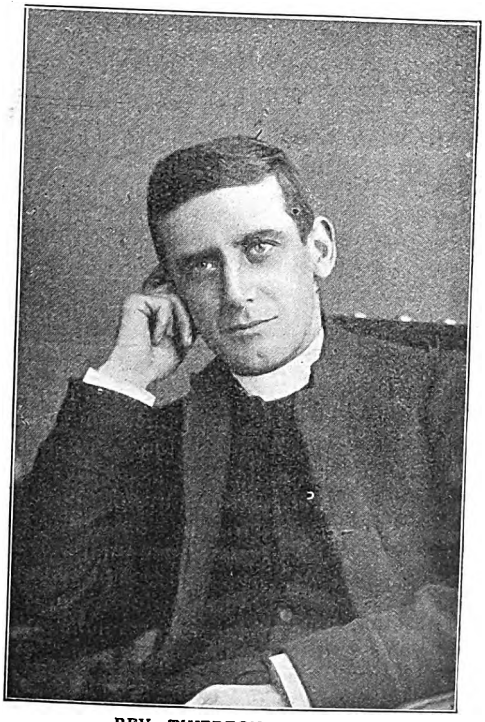
he said he would be pleased to introduce her to the Palace Concerts she did not know whether to laugh or cry.

Miss Weager has always cultivated the habit of playing without music, for she thinks you can hardly do justice to a composer otherwise.

THE REV. TIVERTON PREEDY, who is in charge of the All Saints' Mission at Pentonville, is to be congratulated upon the success of his efforts in raising funds to start building a church in which his people can worship together. The old building which was used as a church is now pulled down, and at present three rooms—knocked into one—of the mission house do duty as a church. The old church was formerly a cow shed and some of the inhabitants of the district can remember buying milk at its doors before it was turned into a place of worship. Mr. Preedy is one of those clergymen who, for the love of Christ, choose to live in the slums, give up the society of their compeers and do all in their power to uplift spiritually and socially those who are less fortunate than themselves.

The inhabitants of this densely packed district are mostly of the coster class. Newspaper vendors, flower girls, hawkers of all kinds claim him as their friend, and if ever any of them get into trouble the first person approached is their clergyman friend. The new church when finished will have under it a large room for a club. In it the costers can meet, and there will be mothers' meetings and girls' evenings and other interesting gatherings.

Until the new building is finished Mr. Preedy is working under great disadvantages. He has had to take a small house, next door to the mission house and use its rooms as a meeting place for his people. All who know anything of the difficulties met with in working in such a district must wish Mr. Preedy God-speed in his efforts. That some people do so earnestly was shown by the splendid results of the Mansion House meeting which was held a month or two ago in aid of funds for the mission.



REV. TIVERTON PREEDY,
Head of the All Saints' Mission at Pentonville.
Photograph by W. Gothard, Barnsley.

Digitized by Google

TO MRS. RICHMOND, daughter of the late Rev. Edward Rowlandson of Kington St. Michael, near Chippenham, Wilts, belongs the credit of having induced the authorities of Swanley Horticultural College to open a branch for ladies, with the result that a large number are now receiving the best training in a profession which has the advantage of not being overcrowded and in which there are many good and well paid positions to be filled.

All her life Mrs. Richmond has been devoted to the study of horticulture, her father being a keen lover of flowers and of all things pertaining to their culture, and when after her marriage with an officer in H.M.I.A. she went to India with him, her love of the floral part of nature went with her, though she soon found still greater interests to claim her attention.

Here the practically philanthropic side of her character asserted itself, for deeply impressed with the fact that on embracing Christianity, women in the Zenanas are often turned out helpless into the world with no work to do and no place to go to, it occurred to her that if they could be induced to take up Cottage Hospital work—for women and children only—positions as nurses in Zenanas might be found for them, and they would thus be able to earn their own living in a satisfactory manner.

Ill health compelling her return to England, she wrote to the late Queen explaining her ideas on the subject of Cottage Hospitals, and received a kindly acknowledgment, shortly after which the Queen sent for Lady Dufferin (at the time of Lord Dufferin's appointment as Governor General of India), and impressed upon her the necessity of medical help for the women and children of India, this having the gratifying result of the splendid work in Indian Zenanas inaugurated by the Countess of Dufferin.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Richmond had been devoting herself to various philanthropic schemes for the well-being of working girls in Torquay, where she had taken up her abode; while halfpenny dinners for the very poor during the winter months, and Saturday social evenings for the men, also occupied her time.

MRS. RICHMOND.
To her efforts is due the opening of a branch of the Swanley Horticultural College for Ladies.
Photograph by McLanachan, Torquay.

It was when settled in a charming house in Tiverton that Mrs. Richmond determined to make a great effort to get the authorities at Swanley to open a branch for ladies, as she foresaw what an immense opening there was for cultured women in this direction. With great energy she set to work and finally carried her point, the late Empress Frederick readily becoming patron of the new branch. There are now four houses open for ladies at Swanley, and a number have already obtained good and lucrative posts.

SINCE the day that the sons of Australia rallied so promptly and generously to the aid of the Mother Country in South Africa, and since the federation of our Colonies in that great continent and the brilliant visits of the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall to inaugurate the new Commonwealth, the land of the Southern Cross has bulked largely in the nation's eye. Women do not fight—Heaven be praised!—but very many, in our lands over seas, as here, "Help to make the World Brighter and Better."

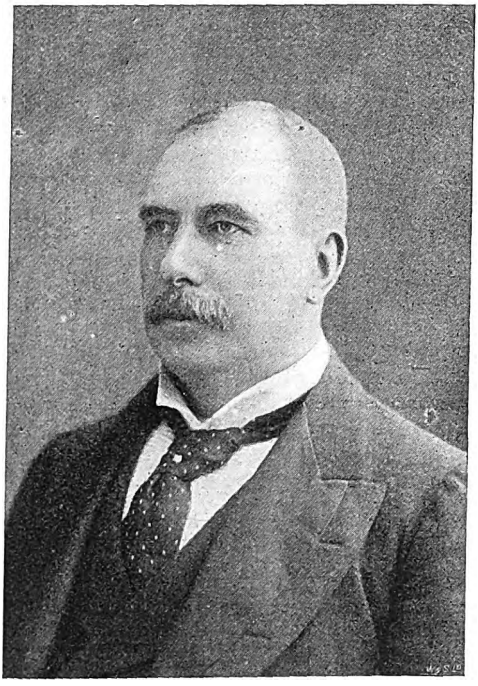
Digitized by Google

LADY CLARKE,
One of Australia's most beneficent Lady Philanthropists.

Janet Lady Clarke (widow of the late Hon. Sir William J. Clarke, Bart.) who acted as Victoria's delegate at the London International Congress of Women, and who is almost as well known here as in her own Australia, is a staunch supporter of the higher education of women. When the urgent need for a Hostel for Women University Students was felt in Melbourne, Lady Clarke munificently presented £5,000 to the building fund, afterwards subsidising the amount with another £1,000. Thus, with some other subscriptions and public help, the "Janet Clarke Buildings," as the handsome edifice was called, reared at their opening a debt-free head, and the Colony became possessed of an invaluable aid to the higher education of its womankind.

As in all schemes tending to the truest culture of her sex, so in all forms of good work, whether connected with churches or charitable organisations, Lady Clarke has been ever a foremost figure and practical worker and her bright example has been an important factor in keeping in healthy activity the philanthropic side of a large section of the Australian world. With all her public spirit and humanitarian enterprise, this lady has time also to be a leader of society, being an almost colossal entertainer of the best people in Australia and of all the notable and aristocratic visitors (and their name is legion!) to those far-off, but hospitable shores.

TO be at once popular with the rank and file of some 60,000 employés, and a firm disciplinarian; to be boldly enterprising yet shrewdly cautious, is the difficult task which has been successfully accomplished by Mr. Joseph Loftus Wilkinson, the general manager of the Great Western Railway Company. He is a "railway" man in every sense of the word, having risen from the ranks himself; and, passing from one stage in the service to another with the rapidity which marks the man of rare quality, he has filled each position with clever adaptability, until he now directs from his busy office the marvellous web of traffic which is practically "switched" on and off according to his desires.



MR. J. L. WILKINSON,
Manager of the G.W.R., who has taken such an active interest in the families of Reservists in the Company's employ.

Largely to Mr. Wilkinson's influence is due the fact that the Great Western is the most delightful of railways to travel by, for his thoughts are continually bent on improving the service, and he has the satisfaction of knowing that some of his express trains are making record long-distance runs. Progress, efficiency, development: these are his watchwords. But there is another side to Mr. Wilkinson's character—his sympathy and kindliness. He has taken a personal interest in the welfare of the families of the many absent reservists who are connected with the Company, and he is ever ready to give ear to reasonable representations from the humblest of the employés.

Digitized by Google

Believing firmly in the old formula, "a sound mind in a sound body," he encourages the practice of athleticism amongst the staff, being the donor of four challenge cups in the annual competitions. By his influence in this and other directions, Mr. Wilkinson is doing a good work in an unostentatious way. One marvels how he finds time to take a personal interest in comparatively small details when one learns that the G.W.R. earns £30,000 on each and every day of the year, and that the keen eye of its chief executive officer has always to be kept on the proportionately large outgoings in this gigantic concern. Even with all these outlets Mr. Wilkinson's energies are unexhausted, for he is associated with the Veteran Company of the Honorable Artillery Company, and is a Colonel of the Engineer and Railway Volunteer Staff Corps, in addition to his membership of the Railway Army Council.

THE ONLOOKER.

THE FALSE LOVE AND THE TRUE.

Oh, an old man sat and blinked i' the sun
And a song o' the sea sang he.
He sang a song of a mariner bold
And his sweetheart so true—the sea.
Sing ho, yo ho, sing hey!
O'er crested billows, thro' dashing spray,
With sails a-bulging she scuds away;
Away, away o'er the waters grey—
Away through the dying day!
Sing ho, sing hey!

Oh, the mariner bold his ain love pressed
To his heart and her sweet lips kissed—
Sweet lips that swore they would e'er be true,
When he sailed away i' the mist.
Sing ho, yo ho, sing hey!
Through the singing tops the wild winds blow,
Into the dank mists the ship doth go,
And the mariner sings as he rolls below,
"My love will be true, I trow!"
Sing hey, yo ho!

Oh, the lassie ashore forgot her man,
But his sweetheart, the sea, proved true.
She lulled him to rest on her heaving breast
And her white arms about him threw.
Sing ho, yo ho, sing hey!
He went to his one true love that day,
At peace in her arms till the last great day,
Less lasting the lassie's peace, they say—
She wed with a lump o' clay!
Sing ho, sing hey!

Digitized by Google

THE STRANGE BEHAVIOUR OF MR. KAYE.

By ADELINE SERGEANT,

Author of "A Deadly Foe," "Beyond Recall," "Jacobi's Wife," etc.

MR. and Mrs. Kaye were sitting at the breakfast-table. Three children sat between them, two on one side, one on the other; all three were immaculately clean, and extremely well-behaved. The elder girl, Nellie, who had reached the mature age of seven, kept a watch over Tiny, who was only four; while Jack, who was eight, and occupied the whole of one side of the table, munched his breakfast in solemn silence, knowing that he rendered himself liable to criticism and reproof if he opened his mouth in any other way.

Not that "mummy" reproved him. Jack was well aware, in an undefined way, that she worshipped the ground he trod upon, and that almost everything he did was perfect in her eyes. It was "father" of whom he was afraid; "father" who snarled and scolded, not only at the children, but the dearly beloved mother as well; "father" who was never satisfied, never content, always burdened with a grievance which he did not put into words, and which cast a shadow over the life of the house. Jack was old enough to begin to feel the gloom that settled down when his father was at home; he was not old enough to know exactly what it meant.

Eleanor Kaye knew. She knew that it meant jealousy, more than anything else. Thomas Kaye had always been an intensely jealous man. He had been jealous of her mother, so long as she lived; he was jealous of the children; he was jealous of her friends. He was always finding new causes of complaint against her. It had been so from the day of her marriage up to the present time—nine years of fault-finding and suspicion, nine years of an ever-deepening unhappiness.

She was eighteen when he married her, and at twenty-seven she had lost her bloom, but her slender figure, her sweet eyes, were charmingly youthful. She had dark hair with a natural wave in it, and finely-marked eyebrows above her dark blue eyes. There was something of natural distinction in her appearance, which was probably the reason why people turned so often to look at her when she was in the street. But her husband reproached her for it, and told her with peevish bitterness that she tried to attract attention, and that nobody would look twice at her if she did not "make eyes" at men.

It will be seen from this remark that Mr. Kaye was not a man of much refinement of feeling, or courtesy of manner. Some people who knew him pretty well called him a cad. He had a curiously mean look; he was spare, wizened, withered; a small man, without dignity, with a furtive grey eye, a thin mouth, a long upper lip—traits which had no beauty of their own, and seemed stamped with the impress of a small and sordid mind. He was nearly twenty years older than Eleanor, and looked even more than his age. By profession he was an accountant, and had chambers in town; but his leisure hours were spent at the suburban house, in a row of houses all alike, at Highbury, where he was reputed to be better off than he chose to appear.

It would have been a dull life to Eleanor but for her children. Even they did not always preserve her from feeling it monotonous. She wanted a drive sometimes, a concert, a theatre, a dinner-party. These things were not absolutely denied to her, but they came so seldom, and were accompanied by so many disagreeables, that she could hardly regard them as enjoyments. An invitation had just arrived; it was that which had made the breakfast such a silent meal that morning. Mr. Kaye was in a bad temper; and Eleanor had much ado to keep the tears from her eyes. She was glad when the weary meal came to an end, and the children were dismissed from the room. Then her husband looked at her, with the little furtive glance she knew so well.

Digitized by Google

"I should like to know why you want so much to go to this affair?" he said, pointing with his hand towards the invitation card that lay on the table.

"I don't want to go so very much," said Eleanor, meekly.

"Oh, yes, you do! You needn't tell me that. You're longing to go. You are always wanting to leave your own fireside and gad about town. You find your home very little of a tie to you, I must say."

He shrugged his shoulders and stood up, waiting for a reply, with a face half averted from her. She often wished she could be silent when he made these vague accusations; but she had not the self-command for it. She was obliged to reply.

"I am at home more than most women are, Thomas. I go out very little. I only wanted to go to this party because it is given by my old friend, Mrs. Glayebrook."

"And to meet other old friends, I daresay," he said, with a strange and rather terrible grin—or so it seemed to her in the light of subsequent events. "Other old friends, such as——"

"Don't mention names," she said, suddenly and sharply. "I do not want to meet anyone in particular. Only to have a little change."

"Change!" he repeated. "Change! Oh, well, there is no reason you should not have change. You shall have a change, Eleanor—more change than perhaps you want."

And he looked at her so oddly, so penetratingly, that she felt herself struck with a moment's terror, and wondered what new means of punishment he had thought of, in what new way he meant her to suffer. For she always suffered—he always found some way of punishing her—when she offended him. She had never escaped yet. And she felt sure that he did not mean her to escape this time.

"I will not go to Mrs. Glayebrook's since you do not wish it," she said, trying, perhaps weakly, to propitiate him.

"Oh, go, by all means," he said, "if you feel inclined. Write an acceptance, and if—if Mr. Philip French is there, give him my remembrances. Don't forget."

"Tom, what do you mean?" she cried, a wave of crimson dyeing the pallor of her delicate face. "I know nothing—now—of Mr. French——"

"But I know a good deal," her husband answered, with that curious oblique glance of his, which always confused and irritated her. "I know, for instance, that you were engaged to him before you married me——"

"We were boy and girl together," she murmured, turning pale again as she recognised the venom of his tone.

"Ah, yes, boy and girl." He spoke ambiguously, and with something of a smile. "Well, that is a good while ago, isn't it? It is a pity Mr. French doesn't get married; you may tell him that also if you like, from me."

"I have no concern with Mr. French's affairs, and I shall certainly not give him any such message," said Eleanor.

"You won't? Oh, I fancy you will some day," said her husband. "In the meantime, write and accept Mrs. Glayebrook's invitation."

"For yourself too?"

"Oh, yes, for myself." He laughed aloud, and there was something peculiarly sinister and menacing in his laugh. "Yes, for myself. If you go, I will go—I can safely promise that."

Eleanor looked at him. There was something in his tone which she found it very difficult to understand. "I will not go to Mrs. Glayebrook's at all if you do not wish," she said, gently.

"Don't make rash promises," he answered. "Accept the invitation, I say. You can easily send an excuse when the day comes, if you do not want to go."

He walked out of the room, smiling as he spoke. He had a quiet, cat-like way of moving, which sometimes irritated his wife unreasonably. And that sinister smile of his was not reassuring. She felt almost as if she hated him, while watching him out of the room.

Digitized by Google

But she was a conscientious woman, and a good wife, although she did not love her husband. She roused herself next moment, and followed him dutifully into the hall, where she helped him into his light overcoat, handed him his hat and gloves, and opened the front door for him. He liked these little attentions—or, at any rate, he exacted them. The elder children generally came into the hall to wish him good-bye; Eleanor had trained them to do it as part of their duty to their father. Sometimes he took no notice of them at all. But on this occasion he kissed them, and nodded to his wife, with the enigmatic smile which she had already wondered at that morning. She stood at the door for a minute or two to enjoy the soft freshness of the sunshine, and to watch Mr. Kaye down the sidewalk of the terrace in which they lived. When he reached the turning by which he made his way to the railway station, he looked round and waved his hat to the little group upon the steps. It was an unusually gracious action for him, but it was marred, to Eleanor's mind, by the strange smile which she thought she could still distinguish upon his face.

"He's gone; now we can get back to the nursery," said Jack, with a perceptible tone of relief.

"Why did father take his black bag, mummy?" said Nellie.

Eleanor did not know. She had not noticed until that moment that he had held in his left hand a small black bag. She supposed that it contained papers, and said so. Then she went back to the dining-room and wrote her letter to Mrs. Glayebrook—a letter of acceptance for herself and her husband. Afterwards, she busied herself in her usual way, with household tasks, with the children's lessons, with little duties of various kinds; but in the intervals of her occupations, two things constantly recurred to her—the thought of Philip French, and the remembrance of her husband's mystic smile.

She had known Philip French all her life, and had drifted into a girlish attachment for him, to which her parents had speedily put an end. He had no means of his own, they said; he was a more or less penniless artist, who might make a name for himself by and by, but in the meantime had no settled income, no comfortable home. It would be much better if she would agree to marry Mr. Thomas Kaye, who was highly respectable and successful; it would be a great comfort to her father and mother to know that she was so well provided for. She ought to consider their wishes rather than her own.

Eleanor was only a girl. She hardly knew her own mind. She was certainly not very much in love with Philip, and she believed what she was told when her parents said that it was her duty to marry Mr. Kaye. She yielded, and made him a true and dutiful wife, but awoke too late to the knowledge that she had thrown away her chances of happiness. Thomas Kaye was utterly uncongenial to her, and even the birth of her children did not satisfy all the cravings of her heart.

She was a good wife to her husband, and a less carping and suspicious person than Mr. Kaye would have been happy enough with her. But from the very day of her marriage he had shown himself jealous, exacting, distrustful; he had sly ways of spying upon her actions, reading her private letters, examining her boxes, as if he always expected her to be deceiving him. It was his constant suspiciousness that had alienated Eleanor more than anything else. And of late it had so much increased that she sometimes felt her life a burden to her.

Philip French was nothing to her now. She had no thought that was disloyal to her husband. But she had been pleased to meet him again—pleased to talk of old times, of books and pictures; she had looked forward to seeing him at Mrs. Glayebrooke's house. But what was the use of meeting him, she thought to herself, if it was only to occasion each time sneers and unpleasantness from her husband?

She dragged herself through the duties of the day rather wearily. For some reason she looked forward with a kind of dread to the dinner-hour.

What new insult would Thomas Kaye have invented to heap upon her head? She knew that he meant to punish her—and for almost the first time in her experience she dreaded the punishment. Her nerve was going; she felt as if very little would make her sit down and cry like a frightened child.

The dinner-hour came, but Mr. Kaye did not arrive. In an hour's time the cook grew impatient, and Eleanor anxious.

Digitized by Google

Another hour, and yet there was no sign of him. And then Eleanor began to wonder whether this were not the form of punishment that he had chosen for her—silence, absence, mystery, anxiety—things that would wear her spirit and subdue her courage, that—if she had loved him—might break her heart. But as the night went on a more pressing and real anxiety took possession of her; surely some harm had happened to him or he would have returned by this time. She sat up all night, and the early dawn found her still watching, but he never came.

She sent for his friends next morning, and made inquiries at his office in the City; but there everything was at a standstill, and nothing at all was known. And as he did not reappear she took the usual methods of search for those who are missing. She advertised, offered a reward for information, consulted detectives, but without success. Blank silence, absolute ignorance, was all that resulted from her search.

Her friend, Mrs. Glayebrook, came often to see her, and was a little surprised by Eleanor's manner at this time, which seemed to her curiously cold and reserved. She was not broken down by grief, as Annie Glayebrook said that she would have been under similar circumstances. She grew thin and pallid, but she did not weep, she did not lament, and the settled gravity of her face expressed resignation rather than despair.

"I can't think how you bear up as you do, Eleanor," said Mrs. Glayebrook almost reproachfully.

"I must bear up for the sake of the children," said Eleanor.

"Oh, yes, I know. But it is so terribly sad. It quite spoilt my enjoyment yesterday evening; you know we had that party, and you and your husband ought to have been there——"

"Ah, yes, I remember," said Mrs. Kaye. She thought of the morning on which she had accepted the invitation, and of her husband's words to her: "If you go, I will go. I can safely promise that." And then he had laughed aloud. What had he meant? "It is nearly three weeks ago now," she said, thinking aloud.

"Yes, my poor dear. Eleanor, my husband thinks—thinks I ought to warn you; he says it looks as if there had been foul play."

"I do not think so," said Eleanor very calmly.

"You don't think so? But why, dear? For if he had met with no mishap he would have been back by this time.

Eleanor was silent for a moment. "Perhaps so" she said at last, and made no other answer. But the more she thought of the matter, the more she became convinced that her husband's disappearance had not been unintentional; that he had planned to leave her; and that his anger with her had taken this form—an inexplicable absence which would leave her to contend with all sorts of difficulties both for the children and for herself.

She felt curiously little anxiety on his account. If he were, as she imagined, living in some other part of the world, she was sure that he had managed to preserve an independence for himself. Perhaps he had a private fund—a banking account of which nobody else knew anything. She was confident in his power of looking after himself.

In the meantime she was much hampered for lack of money. Philip French would gladly have provided her with as much as she wanted; but she refused to accept his aid. The Glayebrooks came to her assistance until such time as her husband's affairs could be settled; for, as months rolled by, it became more and more an understood thing that he was dead, and that Eleanor was practically a widow. The Law Courts empowered her to act for him, and entitled her to the use of such moneys as were forthcoming; but for some time she was much perplexed and distressed, scarcely knowing what she ought to do or how she ought to live, and heartily wishful that this new and strange kind of independence had never come to her. But she still believed that Thomas Kaye was living, and that he would one day return. And after all, she knew him better than anybody else, and was more likely than anyone to judge correctly of his motives.

So ten years came and went; but nothing was heard of Thomas Kaye.

II.

Ten years brought Eleanor to the age of thirty-seven, and to Philip French's mind she was handsomer then than she had been at eighteen.

Digitized by Google

She was slender and graceful still, and her face wore a look of serenity which had been a stranger to it in her younger days. Ten years of peace, untroubled by the fault-finding of a suspicious husband, had brought back the bloom to her cheek, the light to her eyes. Her children adored her; she had many friends; and her home, although much smaller than it used to be, was always dainty and well kept. In spite of the almost tragic story which lingered about her name, she was a happier woman than she had been when Thomas Kaye was master of the house.

Philip, with the grey threads in his hair, and the look of quiet, purposeful patience on his face, told her so one day.

She looked remorseful. "Oh," she said lingeringly, "I did not know that I was so—unfeeling."

"You are not unfeeling—only natural," he said.

"I often think of—of him," she answered, in a wistful kind of way.

"I am sure you do. I meant no unkind reflection, Eleanor. But it is ten years since he disappeared; it would not be right that you should mourn him for ever."

"Mourn him?" she said, rather doubtfully.

"I don't think there can be any reason to believe that he is still living," said Mr. French. "We should have heard of him by this time if he were still alive."

She was silent, but something in her look, in the turn of her head, showed him that she did not agree. Nevertheless, he went on desperately.

"Eleanor, we are no longer young. Our lives are slipping away like a dream, and we have not tasted what is best and brightest. At least, I have not; and you too, I believe, did not know all the happiness you might have done. Forgive me if I speak too frankly. I only want to put it to you—why should we not snatch a little satisfaction, a little happiness, for ourselves, before we are too old to enjoy it?"

"I am happy enough," she said, with a little trembling in her voice; "I have my children. And you, Philip, you are successful, and rich, and honoured; you have your satisfactions."

"Very poor ones. I have wanted another kind all my life. Eleanor, you know how I have loved you——"

"Oh, hush, Philip! I am a married woman; you forget——"

"You do not really think," he said, turning upon her suddenly, "that that man is alive?"

She dropped her eyes. "I have never been able to believe," she answered, "that he is dead."

"But consider; if he is living, he must have knowingly deserted you. Is that possible? He always seemed attached to you—and the children."

"I know he did. I can't talk about it. It is only my feeling—a very foolish feeling, I dare say—that he is still alive."

"Alive—in a lunatic asylum, then!"

"Even if he were in a lunatic asylum, my marriage with him would not be dissolved."

"Not legally; but surely, Eleanor, after all these years—and as everyone believes that he is dead—you are justified——"

"I could not do it!" she answered breathlessly. "I should feel as if he were living—watching me—as if I were committing a crime. It is impossible."

"You have no reason for this feeling?"

"None."

"You have not heard of him or from him since he went away ten years ago?"

"No."

"Then, dear Eleanor, believe me it is simply your nerves that are at fault. This feeling of yours comes from brooding over the past. You are perfectly at liberty to marry."

"And suppose he came back?"

"After ten years?"

"He might do so. One hears of stranger things. No, Philip; unless I know that he is dead, I cannot consider myself free."

"You refuse to make my life happy, Eleanor?"

"I cannot help it. You must be happy without me."

"That is so difficult—in fact, so impossible," he said, "that I have made up my mind to a complete change in my life, if you refuse me absolutely. I shall not stay in England; I shall travel in the East, and perhaps arrange to live there. I have long had a fancy for the rose-gardens of Damascus. And I want to see India."

It was on her lips to say "O Philip, do not go!" but she restrained herself. Why should he not go? If he still wanted to marry her, and she thought it right to refuse, would it not be far better that he should go away from her, to some land where he might learn to forget the woman that he had loved for nearly twenty years. She was touched by his faithfulness. She even went so far as to acknowledge to herself that she might have loved him had she been quite free, as she had loved him in her girlish days; but she dismissed the possibility hastily from her mind, not thinking it right so much as to look it in the face. No second marriage could come under consideration until she knew whether Thomas Kaye was alive or dead. And perhaps she would never know.

Digitized by Google

She had never mentioned to any living soul the words that had passed between her husband and herself on the day when he had left his home. It seemed to her that the words that he had spoken veiled a threat which had been carried out. She had had "a change," more of a change than she wanted, certainly; and possibly he had intended the change to be brought about by his absence. His temporary absence, she imagined. It hardly seemed possible that he had intended it to last ten years. Probably he had met with an accident, or been prevented in some way from returning. It might be even that he was dead. But it always seemed to Eleanor that he must be alive; she could not believe that the furtive grey eyes were closed for ever, or that the mean, stooping little figure was laid at rest beneath the green sods of a grave.

She sent Philip away from her, and he started almost at once for India, much to the regret of her children, who adored him, and to whom he had been everything that it was in the power of man to be, as guide, philosopher, and friend. Mrs. Glayebrook and others who were in the secret blamed Mrs. Kaye unreservedly; they said that she was fostering a morbid scrupulousness, that Thomas Kaye was undoubtedly dead, and she need have no objection to the thought of a second marriage. But Eleanor said nothing, and held on the even tenor of her way without explanation. She did not even say to Mrs. Glayebrook as much as she had said to Philip French. But for weeks after his departure she was obsessed by a new sense of her husband's nearness; and she would not have been in the least surprised, when she walked into the drawing-room, to find him quietly seated in the most comfortable chair, with the Times newspaper in his hand.

She grew nervous, and she did not quite know why. The least thing gave her a shock—what the servant called a "turn." She was discomposed when the cook complained of a "queer old man" who hung about the house at twilight; and when Jack, now a handsome lad of eighteen, asked if she thought he meant to rob and murder them in their beds, "O Jack, don't talk of such horrible things," she said.

"Dear old mummy, my talking won't bring it about," said Jack, but he patted his mother's hand affectionately, and changed the subject to that of golf.

But when something unexpected actually happened, Eleanor's nervousness disappeared.

She was pottering about in her pretty little suburban garden one afternoon in May, when she saw a shabbily dressed woman standing at the gate, looking at her. Mrs. Kaye went up to her at once. "Good afternoon. Do you want anything?" she asked courteously.

"Only a message, ma'am," said the woman. "My lodger says he'd be much obliged if you would come and see him."

"Your lodger? Who is he?"

"I was to say that you wouldn't know his name, ma'am, but that it was after ten years. What he meant by that I can't tell; but those were his words."

"Why did he not come himself?" said Mrs. Kaye quietly, although her hands were beginning to tremble.

"Oh, he's too ill for that, ma'am. He's in bed."

"I will come with you," said Eleanor. "Is it far away?"

The answer startled her. "Not two streets off, ma'am. Number 12, Mead Road."

Eleanor was ready; her bonnet was on her head, and her gloves were in her pocket. It did not occur to her to doubt the validity of the message or to hesitate before penetrating into a strange house in a mean little street with a shabby woman whom she did not know. It seemed to her only that her hour of doom had come.

They walked rapidly down the two streets—Mead Road was not five minutes' walk from Eleanor's house—and reached a red-brick tenement, with small, ugly windows and an unpainted door—a singularly sordid-looking abode. "Does he live here?" said Eleanor, stopping short and gazing at the house with a kind of horror in her tone.

Digitized by Google

The woman seemed offended. "Me and my husband have done for him this five years, ma'am," she answered, And Eleanor said no more.

Up the narrow, rickety stairs she went, and into a little bedroom beneath the roof; not scrupulously clean, and certainly not beautiful. On a wooden bedstead, covered with a coloured quilt, a man was lying; Eleanor noticed instinctively that his head was covered with grey hair, and that his hands were yellow and claw-like. When she stood by his bedside she ventured to look at his face, and saw that the features were those of Thomas Kaye.

"Tom!" she said faintly.

"Oh, you know me, do you?" he asked, in a voice that had grown coarse and common, she thought, as well as weak. "I wasn't sure whether you would recognise me again."

"Oh, yes; I should know you anywhere," she breathed.

And yet—he was a good deal changed. The lower part of his face was covered by stiff bristles of rough grey hair; the complexion was yellow, like parchment, and the features seemed to have enlarged; but the eyes were the same—the little grey, furtive eyes, with their look of suspicion and mistrust. Eleanor could not have been mistaken in those eyes.

"Then, if you know me," said Thomas Kaye, querulously, "why don't you kiss your lawful husband? For I've been true to you, you know, whatever you've been to me."

Almost mechanically, Eleanor stooped down and kissed the withered cheek. Then, as if the action gave her freedom of speech, she said quickly,

"Do you call it being true to me to leave me all these years?"

"I have not left you. I have been close to you all the time."

"But I did not know that!"

"I did not mean you to know. I was close to you in the old house, and soon after you removed to your present abode I came to Mead Road. I have seen you almost every day."

Eleanor caught her breath. "Thomas, why did you do it?"

"I wanted to see what you would do," he answered quietly. "I expected to hear of your marriage to French before this time——"

"So that you might step in and denounce us at the last moment?"

"I am not sure," he said, in a deliberative tone. "No, perhaps I might have let the thing slide. I have grown used to this kind of life; I should not have wanted to change it."

"But the wrong-doing," said Eleanor. "You would have let me commit bigamy without protest?"

"It would not have been wrong-doing if you did not know. Of course, if I had once let it pass, I should have kept to my intention."

"But, Thomas, did it not strike you that I was suffering? Did you not think of the suspense, the anxiety, the terrible agony of ignorance that I had to undergo? Did you think that all this would not trouble me? Did you not know that it would nearly break my heart?"

She spoke rapidly, with vehemence, and yet in a low tone. Thomas Kaye listened to her, with his eyes wide open, and a ghost of his old, furtive smile upon his face.

"I knew," he said at last, in a grating voice, "and I was glad. I wanted to punish you."

"For what? I had done my best to be a good wife to you. I had nothing to reproach myself with. You were unjust."

"No, I was not unjust," he said, rolling his head from side to side upon the pillow. "I knew very well what I was about. You never cared for me. You never loved me. You loved that other man—Philip French."

"Indeed, indeed you are wrong, Thomas. I never loved Philip French. I have been true to you in word, and thought, and deed."

"All the same," he said obstinately, closing his eyes so that he should not see her agitated face, "you would have loved Philip French better than you loved me—if you had had the chance."

"I do not know why you sent for me," said Eleanor, now bitterly hurt, "if you only want to insult me by your suspicions."

"I don't insult you," he said, opening his eyes. "I only want you to hear the truth. Sit down beside me, and talk sensibly. I shall not be here very long."

His meaning did not dawn upon her all at once. "You are coming—home?" she said, slowly and with some difficulty.

He smiled, keeping his eyes upon her. "No, my dear, I am not coming home. Don't you see that I am dying?"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, no!' she said, shocked by his tone. "Not dying, Thomas; only ill. We will get a doctor and see what can be done for you."

"A doctor can't do anything for me. I've worn myself out. I shall last a day or two longer, and that is all."

"What have you been doing all these years, Tom?" she said, putting her hand on his and trying to speak tenderly.

"Watching you," he answered unexpectedly.

She drew back. "Watching me?"

"Yes. Watching you day and night, looking at you when you went shopping, following you down the street, peeping in at your garden gate, counting your visitors. I could tell you how many acquaintances you had, how often they came to see you, almost how much money you spent and what kind of dinners you ate. I knew the smallest details of your life."

"But why—why——"

"I knew more about you in that way than I should have known if we had lived together. I wanted to know. I wanted to understand you, that was all."

"It makes things no clearer for me," said Eleanor.

"Then I will make them clearer. First tell me one thing, and speak the truth. You say you did not love French. But he loved you?"

"I am proud to say that he did love me."

"Then why has he gone away?"

"He asked me to marry him, and I refused. I considered myself your wife still."

"He had not made love to you all these years?"

"Never!"

"And now he has gone away?"

"Yes, to India."

"Ah!" he said, with a low-breathed sigh of satisfaction. "Then I was justified in what I did."

"How?"

"I wanted to prove to myself that you were a good woman. I could not be sure. If you had sent him away before I would have come back to you. I vowed to myself that I would never come back while he was hanging about. And I never did."

"You call that justifiable?" said Eleanor, rising in indignation.

"You were my wife," he said doggedly. "I chose to prove you—to try you. What's ten years, after all? Only a little shave out of a long life. When I was convinced of the truth, one way or the other, I meant to declare myself—either to come back to you or to divorce you. If this wretched illness had not overtaken me I should have come back to you to-morrow."

"Do you think I would have received you again as my husband when you had suspected and deserted me for ten years?"

"Oh, yes. You would have done your duty. You always did—I will acknowledge that now," he answered. "I have gained my end."

"But at what a price! A miserable life for yourself—and for me——"

"I have not been miserable," he said. "Neither have you, on the whole. I had invested money for myself under another name; I have always lived very comfortably. I have left my savings to you, Eleanor—to my true and faithful wife—there's a testimony to your character! You'll find the will in my desk when I am gone."

She turned away from him. She felt as if she could not bear to listen to another word.

"Are you going?" he said placidly. "Well, perhaps you had better. I am a little tired. Give me a kiss before you go, Eleanor, and come again to-morrow."

She hesitated. Should she kiss him or not? Should she forgive him his cruelty, his distrust, his long suspicion of her? She almost refused. Then she looked at his yellow face, his grey hairs, his sunken eyes, and a great pity surged into her heart. After all, he was dying; and in spite of what he said, he had had a most wretched, a most miserable life. She stooped and kissed him, soberly and gently, upon the forehead.

And she was glad that she had done so. For when she visited the house next morning he was dead.

Mrs. Glayebrook sent a long letter to Philip shortly afterwards. And it is said that he is already on his way home from India. Eleanor will not refuse him now.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

A PHOTOGRAPHER OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

Miss Alice Hughes and Her Artistic Work.

By REGINALD TURNER.

PHOTOGRAPHERS of Royalty are many, but in some important respects Miss Alice Hughes holds a unique position.

There are two kinds of photographs of Royalty taken—those for public and those for private use. Anybody can go into a photographer's shop and buy the likeness of the King or Queen, or other members of the Royal Family for the small sum of a shilling or eighteenpence, but there are photos of Royalty that no money can purchase, and those by Miss Alice Hughes come under this category. When Royalties desire to present a photograph to their private friends you may be sure it is not one that everybody can buy. Such a gift would confer pleasure neither to the donor nor to the recipient.

Although Miss Hughes has taken many photos of the Queen not one was ever published, and the same applies to other Royal ladies; and, indeed, all Miss Hughes' commissions are private. She never advertises, and if at any time you have occasion to ascertain her address in the directory, avoid the list of photographers, for you will not find it there. "Once you advertise in this way," said Miss Hughes, "it gives anybody and everybody the right to invade the privacy of your home — advertisement canvassers, insurance agents, and the like, at once look upon you as their legitimate prey." To anyone who has had the pleasure of visiting Miss Hughes the idea of an advertisement canvasser in possession of her lovely drawing-room seems in the last degree grotesque. And yet, for all that, No. 52, Gower-street is a busy place. Miss Hughes pays quite a fabulous sum away per week in salaries; though I am not at liberty to state the figure. Her wonderful success is due to a combination of several factors—social opportunities, natural inherited talent, perseverance, and capital.

OUR FUTURE KING, AND HIS BROTHER AND SISTER, PRINCE ALBERT AND PRINCESS VICTORIA OF CORNWALL.
Photo by Alice Hughes, 52, Gower Street, W.C

Digitized by Google

Her father, Mr. Edward Hughes, is a portrait painter who in the pursuit of his art has been brought into life-long contact with Royalty and the best families of England. Since the death of his wife, which took place when the subject of this sketch was quite a child, Mr. Hughes has moved but little outside his immediate circle. Very early domestic cares and responsibilities devolved upon the shoulders of the girl, but amid her multifarious household duties she yet found time to be a frequent companion to her father in his studio, and it was a source of never-failing delight to her to watch the forms of beautiful patrician women grow upon the canvas.

MRS. WILLIE GRENFELL AND HER TWO SONS.
Photo by Alice Hughes, 52, Gower Street, W.C.

Her artistic soul longed for like expression and found it—in the camera. Probably she would have preferred the brush, for even now at the apex of success she has been heard to deny that photography is an art, though the products of her studio are an eloquent witness against such an opinion.

Like thousands of others, Miss Hughes amused herself with the camera, with no idea of making it more than a plaything, when someone suggested that she should try her hand at reproducing her father's pictures as a useful outlet for her energy. She made the attempt, and with such happy results that Mr. Hughes at once recognised her special aptitude.

She was encouraged to take direct from life, and no doubt visitors to the studio afforded her many opportunities. A course of regular study at the Polytechnic, Regent-street, gave her the required technique. Her progress was more than usually rapid and when she was ready she found a splendid connection to her hand in her father's clientèle and their friends. But if Miss Hughes at this early stage of her career had opportunities that might well be envied, it must not be overlooked that, where much is given, much also is required. Her sitters were all people of the higher social class who may be credited with the possession of very critical tastes. In short, the standard set her was a high one, but she reached it. Owing to her father's connection she soon had the honour of photographing Royalty, to whom she became a private photographer; but on her experiences in that capacity Miss Hughes is not to be drawn.

"When once the Royal family take you up they stick to you," she remarked, "as long as you behave yourself, but directly you forget your place you lose their favour. No lady-in-waiting or responsible Court official will divulge any information concerning Royalty, and I have to be equally careful."

"Then how is it Miss Hughes that so many personal anecdotes of Royalties find their way into print?"

"Oh, through servants, undoubtedly,

Digitized by Google

and a very large proportion have but slender foundation. Not long ago a Royal princess expressed her annoyance at some of the things that were published, her principal grievance being that they contained so little truth."

MRS. G. CORNWALLIS WEST.
Photo by Alice Hughes, 52, Gower Street, W.C.

This much, however, Miss Hughes vouchsafes. All the Royal ladies are ideal sitters, and are most appreciative of the work when done. "But not all my subjects are as considerate as Royalty. Some are very unreasonable. Rich women who are really plain, but who have fallen a prey to flatterers, are almost impossible to satisfy, for although my endeavour is to bring out all that is good in a face, and to soften down non-agreeable traits, my camera speaks the truth. When I fail to do what I consider a successful portrait I return the cheque. This, fortunately for me, does not often happen.

"Another class of people who are very troublesome are those who know a little about photography and think they know a very great deal. Generally the complaint is that the portrait is

MRS. RUPERT BECKETT.
Photo by Alice Hughes, 52, Gower Street, W.C.

H.H. PRINCESS HENRY OF PLESS AND BABY.
Photo by Alice Hughes, 52, Gower Street, W.C.

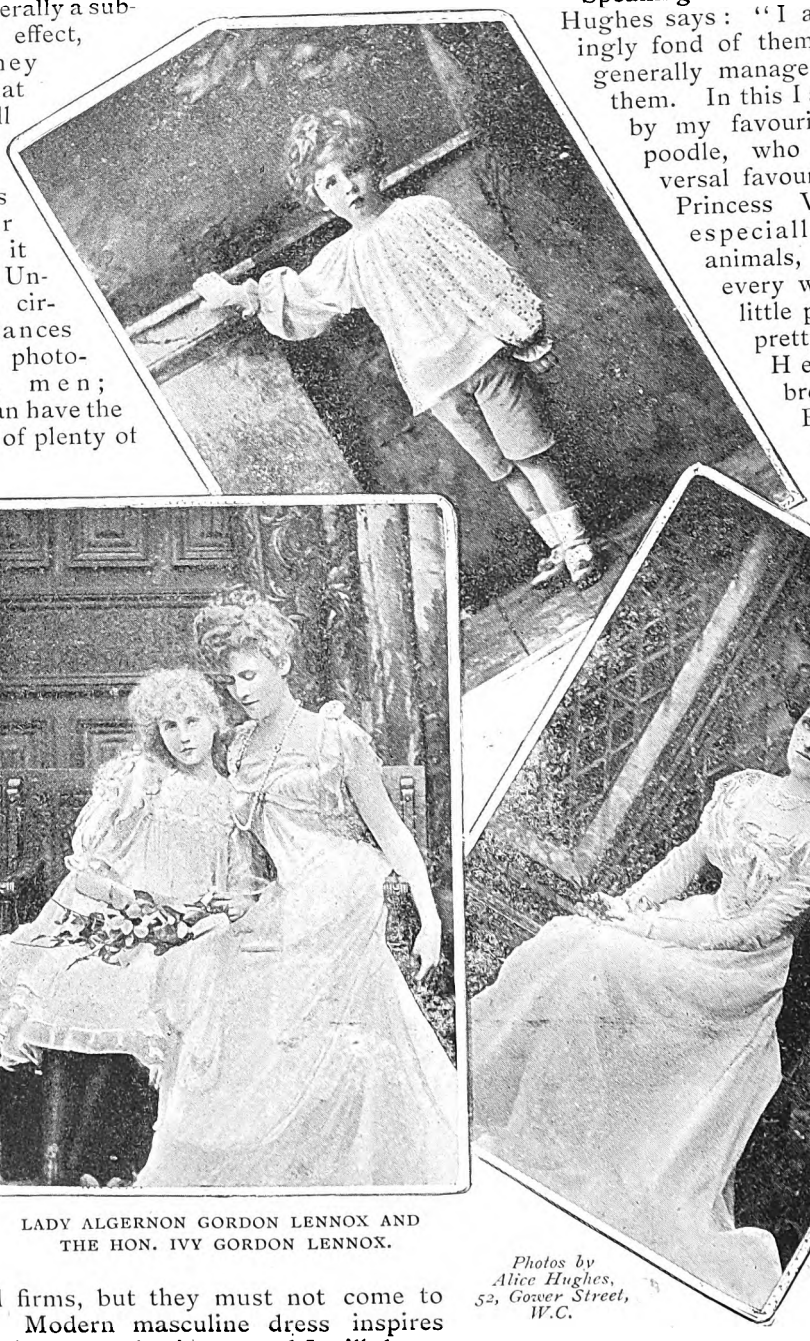
Digitized by Google

not sharp all over. It that is all they want they can get it at any shop in the Euston-road for a shilling. But, as I tell them, that is not what they pay me for. This has generally a subduing effect, and they think that after all they had perhaps better leave it to me. Under no circumstances do I photograph men; they can have the choice of plenty of good firms, but they must not come to me. Modern masculine dress inspires me with no enthusiasm, and I will do no work in which I cannot take an interest."

"Have you ever taken photos under circumstances of unusual difficulty?"

"I cannot say that I have, because all my sitters, with the exception of the Queen, visit me here, and sometimes Royal ladies drop in very unexpectedly."

Speaking of children Miss Hughes says: "I am exceedingly fond of them, and can generally manage to interest them. In this I am assisted by my favourite Maltese poodle, who is a universal favourite. Little Princess Victoria is especially fond of animals, and is in every way a sweet little person, with pretty blue eyes. Her little brother Prince Edward is not an ideal sitter, and not unfrequently requires tactful handling. One of his most successful portraits, in which he wears an almost angelic expression,



MASTER ANTHONY EDEN.

LADY ALGERNON GORDON LENNOX AND THE HON. IVY GORDON LENNOX.

LADY DICKSON POYNDER.

Photos by Alice Hughes, 52, Gower Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

was the result of an appeal to his chivalrous feelings. 'You are now a man, Prince Edward,' said I, 'and must be a good boy and take care of your baby sister. Will you be a good boy?' 'Yes,' he replied readily, and indeed he was during that sitting."

Miss Hughes has had many a confidential little chat with our future king, but she is not going to divulge state secrets. The soldiers of the King form a subject of which the child is never tired of talking, and Miss Hughes confesses that he knows a good deal more about them than she does herself.

"When I grow up I mean to be a soldier," he told her.

"And what will you do if the soldiers won't obey?"

"I shall put them in the guard room," was the stern reply.

Miss Hughes has to deal with many little foreigners, and one thing that astonishes her is the number of languages some of them can speak.

"I have had a child of six address me in three tongues, but, with the exception of French, I know no language but my own. American children can generally speak French.

"I have photographed a large number of foreign ladies of title—Russian countesses, German, Austrian and Italian."

"Do you find them differ much from our nobility?"

"No, a lady is a lady all the world over. Continental women are seldom so tall as English, and are therefore not so graceful to photograph, but many have very beautifully moulded figures. The other day I "took" the Countess of Montelano, lady in waiting to the Queen of Spain."

"What advantages does photography offer as a profession for women?"

"There is no lack of lady photographers now-a-days," said Miss Hughes, "and I think that they are well able to hold their own against men. But I should not recommend girls to go in for it unless they have artistic talent, and some capital.

"I myself employ a large number of girls, but most of them are engaged in work that requires no high degree of skill, and consequently their salaries are not large, varying from 10s. to £1 per week. The higher positions are generally held by men."

Miss Hughes added that she had not observed much ambition among her girls, though in some cases they showed natural aptitude.

"Do you receive many letters from people wishing to take up photography?"

"I am simply bombarded with them," said Miss Hughes, "and they come from people in all classes of life, but in the great majority of cases the writers have no serious intentions. They seem to think that photography is a thing to be taken up to-day and laid down to-morrow.

"Some few summers ago I was bathing in the sea when, to my astonishment, a lady swam up to me and exclaimed that she wished to learn photography, and between the trough of one wave and the crest of another she expected the matter settled. She was a complete stranger to me.

MRS. ARTHUR PAGET.

Photo by Alice Hughes, 52, Gower Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, and I get some truly extraordinary letters sometimes. Not long ago I received a number of laudatory verses entitled the 'House with the Green Doors.' The front doors of this house are green as you may have noticed."

In conclusion, Miss Hughes said she did not see why women should not do very well at photography: they could acquire the necessary skill. Business capacity was perhaps their weak point. She herself had no liking for figures, and did not suppose that she got as good discounts as she would if she were a man. "But it would not pay me to bother about that when I can spend the time in taking photographs."

"What do you say to having a man to manage the business side?"

"I am afraid it would only make more work for me; you see I should have to look after him, too." And with this quaint remark the interview ended.

Enough has been written to show that Miss Hughes is one of the most remarkable of women workers of the day. She has set an example that ought to stimulate others of her sex to follow in her footsteps, though not necessarily in photography. Nowadays, there are very few spheres closed to women, and few in which success may not be gained by those possessing energy, ability, and strength of purpose.

REGINALD TURNER.

HIGHER DESTINY.

She thought the rain would surely bring
The dear one to her door;
Earth's every little upward thing
A cup of raindrops wore.

She knew he loved their peaceful sound,
And blessed the gleaming gems.
Or laughed to think his forehead crowned
With such cool diadems.

Upon the path she heard them beat,
And whispered low his name;
Sometimes she took them for his feet,
His feet that never came.

She heard them falling in the rills,
And wept for what might be,
Nor caught the music on the hills
Of higher destiny.

Agnes Lee.

Digitized by Google

Is Protestantism in Danger?

THE OPINIONS OF NOTED EVANGELICAL DIVINES ON THIS VITAL QUESTION.

REV. H. W. WEBB-PEPLOE, M.A.,
Prebendary of St. Paul's.

In answering the question "Is Protestantism in Danger?" great care must be taken to define the limits of our subject. Are we to speak only of Protestantism in the Established Church of England or of the whole country and its working therein? The Church of Christ is not coterminous with the Church of England, and while there may be, and indeed clearly is, great danger that Protestantism may be crushed out of the Established Church (by the cruel if not criminal neglect of our rulers both in Church and State), there seems no reason to think that the great middle classes of the land and the poor have any strong affection for the Pseudo-Romanism which now prevails so largely among "Society people" and which appears to hold sway in most of our ecclesiastical arrangements. The Church of England may be split to pieces by divisions from within, and the party which regrets "Protestantism" may appear for the moment to triumph when Disestablishment is brought about by their own unfaithfulness to the Reformation, but while wealth and titles may be on their side it seems blessedly certain that the heart of the nation is sound and that either in one form or another the "people" as a whole will cling to the old faith and simple practices inherited from their forefathers, especially when they see the real perils of those false doctrines and practices which, in the fifteenth century, were boldly cast aside by Englishmen, though at the cost of much blood, viz., transubstantiation, confession to a priest and all that is involved in priestly authority. The Church of Christ will be safe, therefore Protestantism (so far as its true meaning is apprehended) must, of course, be equally safe. "Protestantism" could only mean "declaring at all costs the gospel of Jesus Christ." But if the Church of England, or any other Protestant Church, deserts the "one foundation," Jesus Christ, whether for Romanising Ritual or for Rationalising Neology, that Church's candlestick will, of course, be removed and people will talk of Protestantism as fallen. Yet, meantime, the Lord reigneth and His arm will prevail. Magna est veritas et prevalebit.

H. W. Webb-Peploe

REV. HUGH PRICE HUGHES, M.A.,
Ex-President of the Wesleyan Conference.

It is very difficult to answer your question. Romanising doctrines and practices are greatly on the increase in the Church of England, and it is impossible to predict how far this reactionary movement will extend. I have ample evidence that Romanism pure and simple is losing ground all over the world, and in the Church of England my personal impression is that it is very largely a clerical movement, and that at present the immense majority of the laity have no sympathy with the Romanisers. How far, however, the practices of the clergy and the introduction of the Confessional may affect the children and young people is the serious problem. On the other hand, we must remember that the great majority of the religious public of England are not members of the Church of England but of the various Free Churches, and they were never more Evangelical and Protestant than they are to-day. The serious evil is the absence of courageous and effective leadership on the part of those members of the Anglican Church who are in sympathy with Scriptural Christianity. Mr. Gladstone and Lord Salisbury have done their utmost to pack the highest offices in the Anglican Church with representatives of the Romeward party. The connection with the State and the total absence of the lay element in the governing assemblies of the Established Church have greatly helped Romeward Ritualism. There is no real antidote to the Romanising Priest except the Christian Layman, and until the laity have some voice in the policy and government of the Anglican Church we have no security against the Romeward movement.

Digitized by Google

H. Price Hughes

REV. W. HAY M. H. AITKEN, M.A.,
Canon of Norwich.

I have no fear for the Protestantism of the nation. Ritualism has not as yet touched the masses to any considerable extent. Romanism is an anachronism in the Twentieth Century. It is altogether out of harmony with the spirit of our times, and it is admitted by their own statisticians that neither in England nor America is the Roman Church holding her own in proportion to the increase of the population. This is an age in which everything has to submit to criticism, and that which cannot be critically justified will have to be abandoned. But what evidence is there that could satisfy even the most lenient criticism that St. Peter was ever Bishop of Rome at all? And if there is no proof of this one point the whole system falls to the ground, like the baseless fabric of a dream. This being so—in spite of Mr. Carlyle's well-known and uncomplimentary assertion about the inhabitants of these islands—I have too much respect for the common sense of my compatriots to believe that they will be captivated by this strange recrudescence of exploded superstitions. But the question of how far the Protestantism of the Church of England may be regarded as secure is a very different matter; and I confess that I have absolutely no confidence in its being maintained in the future, unless the Church speedily acquires such a measure of autonomy as shall enable her to deal summarily with distinctly Roman innovations, and if necessary with Roman innovators.

W. Hay M. H. Aitken

REV. ALFRED ROWLAND, LL.B.,
Ex-President of the Congregational Union.

I take a more serious view than many do of the progress of Romish doctrine and practice in England. It is true that the direct efforts of the Papacy are not producing very startling effects, but the Protestantism of this country is being rapidly undermined by Anglican priests. With the exception of the Papal Supremacy and the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, I hardly know of any distinctive Romish dogma which is not held and taught in the Established Church, and these exceptions are less pernicious than auricular confession and transubstantiation. Unfortunately, Anglican priests have influence in Society which they do not hesitate to use to the utmost, and their deprivation of this through disestablishment appears to me in the highest degree desirable. If only the laity of the Episcopal Church possessed the power held by their brethren in Nonconformist Churches they would make short work of men who profess to be Protestants while seeking to destroy Protestantism.

Alfred Rowland.

THE HON. AND VERY REV.
W. H. FREMANTLE, D.D.,
Dean of Ripon.

I do not think that there is much danger for Protestantism generally in England. The Nonconformist half of the country is little affected by Ritualism, and even among those attending the

Digitized by Google

Church services there is, on the whole, a healthy and independent spirit.

The word Ritualism is somewhat ambiguous. We have to admit that more of order and ornament is often only the natural result of the progress of artistic feeling; and also that cultivated men often are drawn to sacramental ordinances rather than to preaching, without any liking for the clericalist or Roman system.

Ritualism proper seems to imply a belief that the pre-Reformation system of ordinances had some sort of divine sanction. But this idea has been undermined by the better understanding of the New Testament and of the earliest age of the Church, which shows men that our Lord and His Apostles left the Church free to create its organisation and its arrangements for worship, and to change them as need might require, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. If this is held fast, the idea of any obligation to continue the arrangements of the pre-Reformation system falls to the ground; and men will accept cordially the affirmation of the Articles of the Church of England, that every national church has the right to regulate these things for itself. The conviction I speak of may take some time to spread, and to counteract the teaching which has for some forty years been prevalent, but the facts that I have mentioned are generally accepted now by the leading minds, and the contrary teaching cannot fail to be modified. I believe this would appear very soon if facilities were given by law for the formation of parochial Church Councils as proposed in the Bill brought into the House of Commons by Mr. Mellor.

W. H. Fremantle

REV. JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.,

Ex-President of the Baptist Union.

Is Protestantism in danger? Not if we take into consideration the whole world. It is gaining rapidly in France, it is advancing slowly but surely in Italy, Austria, and Spain. It is full of vigour in some parts of the U.S.A., but at home in England it is gravely menaced.

The forces that make against Protestantism are numerous:—

(1) The wide-spread love of pomp and show, of national splendour and of vain aggrandisement, foster those elements in Romanism which pull down manhood and destroy the State.

(2) Another danger to Protestantism is the growing impatience of thought, of earnest individual search for truth and the habit of accepting what is easiest and pleasantest. Protestantism appeals to the intellect as well as to the heart, and demands thinking as well as charity, but the trend of the age is against strenuous thinking and in favour of listless acquiescence in the last thing said or read.

(3) There is also the arrival of the monks and specially the Jesuits from France. This will issue in the quickening of the activities of the Roman Church as a proselytizing agency.

(4) Another peril springs from the capture of the children of Protestants through cheap secondary schools, managed by Romanists. This works stealthily, but most disastrously for Protestantism.

(5) But the chief danger to Protestantism is the same as it has been for the whole of the last half-century, viz: our Anglican Church. This is the lever that has lifted the Roman Church in England. The spread of Ritualism in that Church has led to the despisal of sermons, i.e., of that part of the services of the Church which quickens the intellect, and develops a robust and manly piety. It has substituted show for reality, the external for the inward. It has been the overflowing fountain of Roman ideas and of Roman forces, and though the mischief is not so great as it was, it is still operative over wide areas and in manifold ways.

But Protestantism is eternal. It will conquer. It is conquering. The great Free Churches have the future in their hands. The Methodists rise to 20 millions, the Presbyterians number as many if not more. Congregationalists and Baptists rise towards 10 millions. Even judged by figures we need not fear, and when we remember that all the really progressive peoples are Protestant, and that the truths and forces of Protestantism make character, we may confidently expect victory.

John Clifford

Digitized by Google

REV. W. CARLILE,

Hon. Sec. and Founder of the Church Army.

In reply to your question, I believe imperialistic John Bull is now less likely than ever to enthral his empire under the enervating superstitions of an effete Vatican.

As one who has conscientiously come over from Nonconformity myself to the Church, I greatly regret to find that many of the so-called "evangelical" clergymen seem more keen on preaching "justification by faith" than simply lifting up Him who justifies. The letter may kill when the Spirit gives life.

On the other hand, I am astonished to find that the simple Gospel message has so leavened many of the "High," and even the "Broad," that, though under much more esthete externals, there is now to be found the old evangelical basis that revived the Church in the last century.

W. Carlile

REV. SILAS K. HOCKING,

Novelist and Methodist Preacher.

I am in no position to offer first-hand evidence on the question you raise, but from the testimony of those who are in a position to judge, it would appear that such Protestantism as we have in the Church of England is being seriously undermined by Romish teaching and practices. How far this is to be regretted on spiritual and ethical grounds is not for me to say. Time was when Protestantism stood for the ideals of the New Testament in a way that Roman Catholicism did not; but, like all other "isms," Protestantism has yielded to the spirit of the world, and what is needed to-day more than anything else is a new Reformation.

Like the Greek and Romish Churches, the Protestant Church has signally failed to represent the ideals of Jesus Christ. Christianity stands for peace, for brotherhood, for justice, for goodwill toward men, for purity of life and conduct. But he would be a bold man who would say that Protestantism now stands for these things.

The great body of the people have become indifferent to all "isms," not because they have lost faith in Christianity, not that they have lost their reverence for Jesus Christ, not because they have no respect for the high moral teachings of the Sermon on the Mount, but because the Churches have so utterly failed to represent in the world the spirit and teaching of the Nazarine. The Protestant Church just as much as the Catholic Church upholds war, condones the drink-traffic, panders to the rich, encourages class distinctions, and lacks the courage to rebuke sin in high places. The only remedy is to return to Christianity. Men have departed from Christ—from the simple teaching of the New Testament—and so they try to satisfy their hearts and consciences by ceremonialism; by confession, and penance, and all the other vagaries and superstitions of priestism. The growth of Popery is only a symptom of a deeply-rooted disease. When, as a nation, we have recovered our moral sense and given up advocating force as a remedy, and the doing of evil that good may come, we shall discover that Christianity in its unadorned simplicity is quite sufficient to win the hearts of the people. My fear to-day is not for Protestantism but for Christianity.

Silas K. Hocking

THE VEN. JOHN W. DIGGLE, D.D.,

Archdeacon of Westmorland.

I am persuaded that the revival in our age of historical studies and the better cultivation of habits of exact scientific thinking, together with a more intelligent knowledge of the true character of revelation, cannot fail, under the operations of God the Holy Ghost, to replace in time the religion of Christ upon the throne now occupied by Ecclesiasticism.

John W. Diggle

REV. CHARLES MOINET,

Ex-Moderator of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of England.

I certainly think that the so-called Catholic Revival in the Church of England is making people familiar with a type of doctrine and worship which has much more in common with Rome than with the Reformed Churches, and is thus making the transition from the one to the other a much more easy thing than it used to be. Fifty years ago it was a long step from the Anglican to the Roman Communion, but now the step is so short that many take it without much consideration, and without feeling that it involves any appreciable change in their convictions or practices. In consequence the Church of Rome has gained, and will continue to gain, much by the spread of ritualism in the Church of England. For I do not think the ritualistic movement is an ephemeral one. It has succeeded in capturing the Diocesan Training Colleges and the most influential positions in the Universities, and will mould to a large extent the clergy of the future, and through them the mass of Church-going people.

Digitized by Google

As to the remedy, the most effectual remedy which the Church itself could adopt would be the admission of the laity to their proper place in the administration of its affairs. As to outsiders, I have greater faith in a fuller and more faithful proclamation of the truth than in anything else. For this we need a more earnest and a more efficient and thoroughly trained ministry. English Nonconformity appeals to a limited section of the community, and fails to satisfy many of its own members, owing to the poverty of its teaching, and the want of culture and devoutness in its services. If this were remedied it would not only retain many of those whom it loses, but attract many who are dissatisfied with the condition of things in the Established Church. In this way it would immensely strengthen the cause of truth.

Charles Leonard

REV. NEWMAN HALL, D.D.,
The Veteran Nonconformist Minister.

I think that the present forward Romeward movement is confined to the one department of the Church which is confined within the higher social class, and includes only a section of these. Those regarded as the middle and lower classes have no sympathy with it. The Nonconformists, who constitute the majority of Christian worshippers and workers in the three kingdoms, are entirely in opposition —or absolutely indifferent. I consider the great mass of the people are absolutely Protestant, and that Parliamentary elections will only show a stronger tide of opposition. The remedy is in the increase of true Evangelical preaching and circulation of the Bible, and such other work as all the various other Churches are engaged in with entire unity. There is not the slightest tendency towards Ritualistic doctrine or practice in any of the Nonconformist clergy.

Newman Hall

REV. J. MONRO GIBSON, D.D.,
Hon. Sec. National Council of Evangelical Free Churches.

I have no fear of the present generation, because I am sure that the Church of England as a whole—that is, the laity —is still sound in the Protestant faith; but the danger is the large and apparently increasing number of the clergy who take the anti-Protestant attitude, and the power they have, both directly and through political agitation, to influence, and even in many places to control, the education of the children. When I see the tightening grasp of the High Church clergy upon the schools, I confess I do tremble for the future.

J. Monro Gibson

REV. T. B. STEPHENSON, D.D.,
Founder of the "Children's Homes."

I do not believe that there is any great "Romeward" movement of the mass of English people. The middle and lower classes have never been widely or deeply affected by it. Even the "High Church" movement has, I believe, reached and passed its highest point.

The best ways of meeting such a tendency are, in my judgment: 1. An intense evangelism. 2. A more thorough and scientific use of all Church activities. 3. The cultivation of reverence in worship, especially amongst Noncomformists, and perhaps most of all among Methodists. 4. The teaching of the true doctrine of the Church—as against individualism.

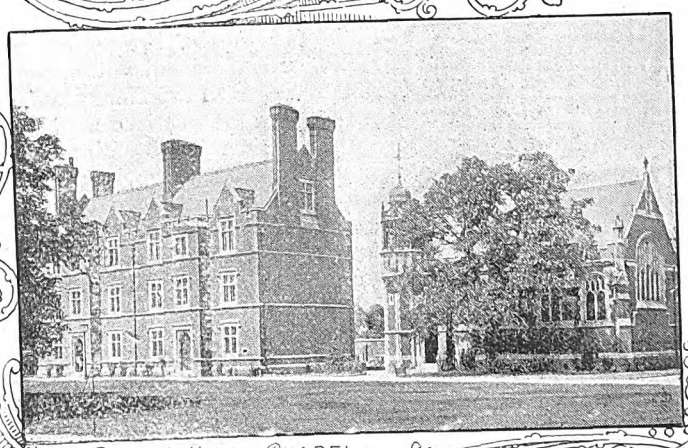
T. Bowman Stephenson

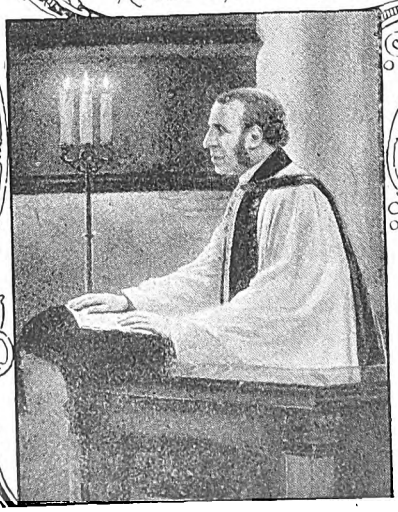
Digitized by Google

The New Bishop of Durham.

A SKETCH OF THE LIFE AND WORK OF DR. HANDLEY C. G. MOULE.

By CHARLES SPENCE..





DR. MOULE PREACHING THE ANNUAL SERMON OF THE C.M.S. AT ST. BRIDE'S, FLEET STREET.

DR. HANDLEY C. G. MOULE, who succeeds the late Bishop Westcott in the See of Durham—the "Prince Bishopric," as it has been called from time immemorial—has long been recognised as one of the most zealous and influential leaders in the Church of England and as a tower of strength to the Evangelical party.

The work that he has carried on for nearly twenty years at Ridley Hall, Cambridge — the great school of Evangelical Theology—in training candidates for Holy Orders has been in every way worthy of the martyred saint from whom the hall takes its name.

Ridley Hall men are everywhere noted for their zeal in good works and the deep spirituality of their teaching, for Dr. Moule has this characteristic in common with all great leaders that he can imbue his followers with his own enthusiasm and ideals. The Hall has been a fruitful recruiting centre for the mission field. Dr. Moule's sympathies were from his childhood enlisted on behalf of foreign missions by his father, the Rev. Henry Moule, and in the old country home the achievements of these devoted Christian pioneers were followed with the deepest interest by the Vicar's children, and the calling of a missionary held up before them as the noblest of careers. Two of the Bishop's brothers in after years went out as missionaries to China and devoted their lives to the work.

Digitized by Google

Why Dr. Moule has not long ago been raised to the Bishops' Bench has been a matter for wonder to many people—though it is doubtful whether before his work at Ridley Hall was put on a firm and lasting basis he could have done greater service in the more exalted position.

Though a pronounced Evangelical, and one of the most powerful champions of the Protestant cause, he is a conspicuously fair and courteous opponent, never forgetting to exercise the virtue of Christian charity, while at the same time leaving no doubt as to his own position.

Dr. Moule's relations with Nonconformists are of the most fraternal character, and at the Keswick Conventions he is one of the most familiar figures and always a welcome speaker.

He numbers many eminent Dissenting ministers among his personal friends, and has often been seen in a Nonconformist gathering when one of them is giving the address.

The Rev. F. B. Meyer and Dr. Moule have the warmest appreciation of each other's great qualities, and Mr. Meyer has often given testimony to the value of the doctor's writings.

He once said to Mrs. Moule, "We all owe your husband a great debt for his books." To which the wife replied, "I have seen every one of these books lived."

Dr. Handley Carr Glyn Moule was born in 1841 at Dorchester, his father, the Rev. Henry Moule, being the Vicar of Fordington, and having come to the parish in 1829, twelve years before the birth of his youngest son, Handley. On taking up the work, Mr. Moule had found the religious life of the neighbourhood sadly neglected. There were a few earnest Christian workers in the slums of the town, but the task was too heavy, and the labourers too few for them to make much headway.

To them Mr. Moule came as a most valuable ally, and finding that he could not get the people to come to church he boldly followed the example of John Wesley and took the church to them, preaching in the fields, or wherever he could attract a congregation.

Happily the days of such narrow-minded bigotry as drove Wesley out of the Church were over, though Mr. Moule had to submit to a good deal of unkind criticism. Largely through his instrumentality the Dorchester Races were abolished, and with them many attendant evils which had been sapping the morality of the people.

The Vicar and his wife endeared themselves to all hearts by their practical care for their flock, which took them into the homes of the people at all times, and especially in those of stress and trial. In the terrible cholera epidemics of 1849 and 1854 the only bright spot in that dark time was the devotion of Mr. and Mrs. Moule, who fearlessly visited the sick and dying and helped the poor to the utmost of their means.

The future Bishop and his brothers received their early education from their father, and Handley made rapid progress in English and classical knowledge.

Besides this aptitude for scholastic studies, he displayed considerable talent in music and drawing, pursuits in which he now takes great pleasure, though while reading for his degree his mother made him promise that he would not touch the piano till the ordeal of examination was over.

He was twenty-one years old when he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and very soon began to make his mark. In his second year he became Browne's Medallist, and was placed second in the Classical Tripos of 1864. He next took up the theology course, and gained a first class, which was followed by his election to a fellowship of Trinity. In fact, in scholarship Dr. Moule has shown himself a worthy successor to the learned Bishop Westcott, and the best traditions of the Episcopal Bench in this respect have been well maintained by these two great scholars. For two years Dr. Moule was assistant master at Marlborough, but after taking Holy Orders in 1867, was appointed to a curacy at Fordington, his father's parish; and during his six years' stay succeeded in extending the good work which his father had commenced.

He left Fordington to become Dean of his College, an appointment which he held for four years, from 1873 to 1877. Then again he sought out the old home parish, and took up the work there which he had laid down to fill the high position for which Alma Mater had selected her distinguished son.

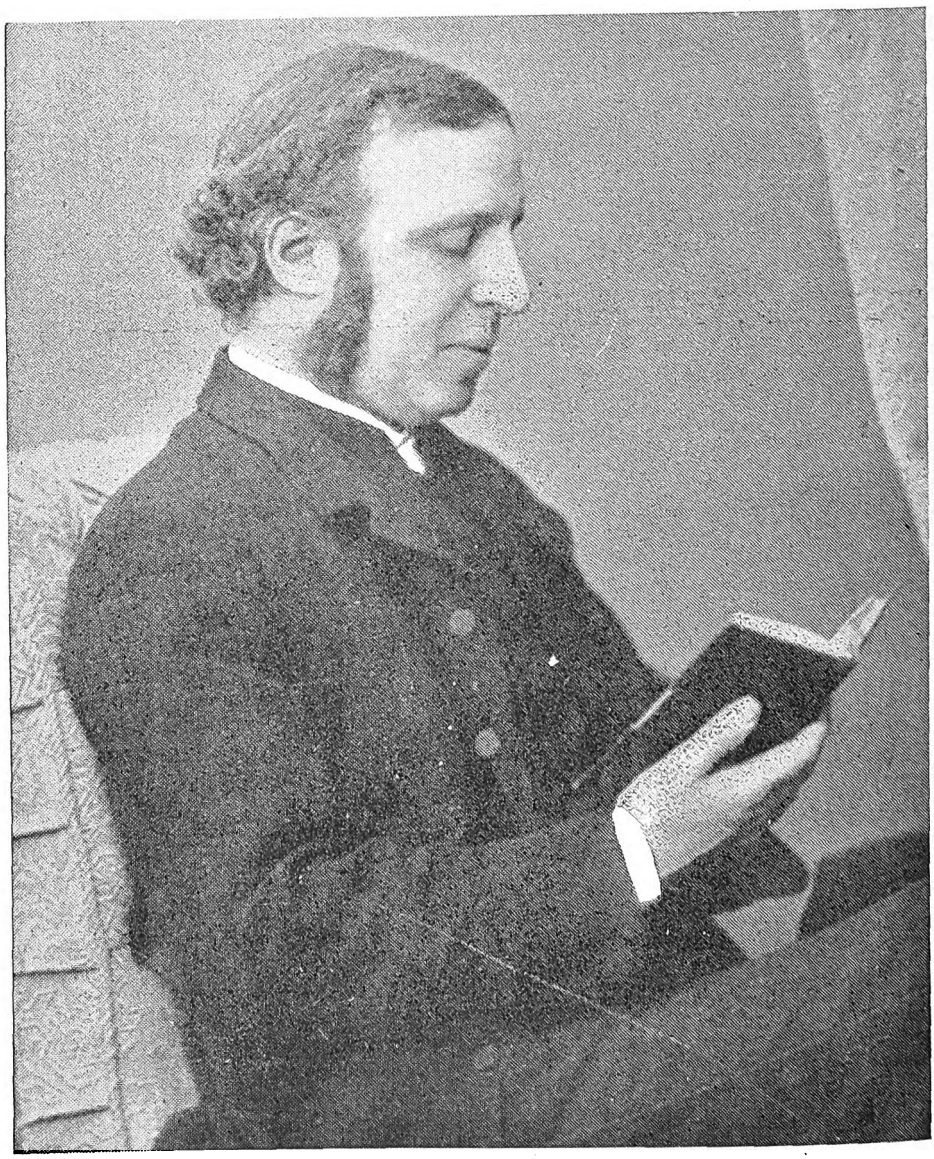
Digitized by Google

The ministrations of the father were repeated in those of the son. There was the same self-effacing devotion, and the same tender solicitude for the welfare of the flock which made the pastor the most frequent and welcome of visitors in the homes of his people; and the same tenacity to dearly-cherished principles, coupled with a broad-minded tolerance of all who in a different way were trying to serve their Master.

Three more years of devoted service, then Dr. Moule was called to undertake what has up till now been the greatest work of his life, the training of theological students at Ridley Hall, on Evangelical lines.

He went to Cambridge to organise the work in 1880, but the Hall was not actually opened till two years later, and it was during this busy and anxious time that he found a life partner in the daughter of the Rev. C. Boileau Elliott, F.R.S., to whom he was married in 1881.

Dr. Moule is a most eloquent and persuasive preacher, and has been seven



THE RIGHT REV. HANDLEY C. G. MOULE, D.D., BISHOP DESIGNATE OF DURHAM.
Photograph by R H. Lord, Cambridge.

Digitized by Google

times elected Select Preacher to the University of Cambridge, and in 1895 was invited to come to Oxford as Select Preacher. He has many times preached on behalf of the Church Missionary Society, in which he takes the warmest interest, and record collections have followed his stirring addresses at St. Bride's, Fleet Street.

Dr. Moule is a prolific writer, and many very valuable works on Scriptural Exegesis have come from his pen. He has also published one or two volumes of poetry, and his verse is marked by great sweetness and elegance. The new Bishop is in all respects well equipped for the great task that lies before him; an eloquent preacher, a sound theologian, a great scholar, and born leader of men, he has all the intellectual advantages which make for success, and, greater than these, that full consecration to his Master's work, without which mere intellectual gifts serve but to make their possessors as "sounding brass and tinkling cymbals."

CHARLES SPENCE.

VENI, SANCTE SPIRITUS.

Descend, O Spirit, with higher power descend;
Breathe on the souls of men and purify
Their thoughts and loves, which in mere matter lie;
Some touch of Heaven to their strivings lend;

To earth-bound hopes appoint immortal end;
To death, not less than life, show God is nigh;
Reveal the worlds hidden from human eye,
Where jarring elements harmonious blend.

Our scattered knowledges together bind,
Our freedom consecrate to noble aims,
To music set the visions of the mind,
Give utterance to the truth pure faith proclaims.

Bishop Spalding.

Digitized by Google

OLD PHILEMONA.

By R. MURRAY GILCHRIST.

Author of "Passion, the Plaything," "The Stone Dragon," "Hercules and the Marionettes," etc.

IN front of the cottage lay the rough pasture in which old Philemona Grindlowe kept her cows. The moorland touched it on the north side; eastwards lay the copse of young beeches; southwards a narrow ravine, where a rillock, that leaped from the trough into the garden, gathered together a few springs and prattled over huge stones and luxuriant moss down to the village. Sometimes trout from the river, that bordered the moorland four miles away, mounted to the shallow pools in this gorge, and Michael, Philemona's son, caught them with his hands.

The sun was so hot that the air seemed to tremble. Philemona sat on the stone bench by the door and stitched rapidly at the hem of a white skirt that she was making for a farmer's wife who lived across the heath. Since her husband's death she had eked out the scanty income from the land by taking in plain sewing.

Michael had gone down to the village with the horse and cart to load stone for the new bridge, and save for Philemona the place was quite deserted. There was a glad look on the brown, wrinkled face, and the needle was moved even more deftly than usual. That very morning her boy had confided that he was in love, and the girl whom he had chosen was one whom she had long secretly desired for a daughter-in-law. Her name was Nancy Elyot, and her father was a man of some private means. He was known in the village as being both churlish and miserly, but Nan was very pretty and affectionate, and the best butter maker in the county.

Suddenly the wind brought across the valley a strong aromatic smell, and looking to the further hillside she saw that the gorse was afire. Since Michael had grown up she had always reserved the burning of her own gorse for one of her own tasks; it was easy and pleasant, and she was no longer strong, her back being crooked with a maturity of hard work.

She went into the house to put down her work, and took a brand from the hearth; and, protecting its flickering light with her fingers, she went through the garden and down the rough steps into the field. It was plentifully besprinkled with rich, full-flowered gorse, full to the tip of each spike with inflammable sap. Philemona thrust the brand into the heart of the nearest bush, and in another moment the crackling sound told that it had caught fire.

The smoke was woolly at first, saffron, and grey, and white, and amber, and purple; but soon the flame shot out crimson tongues, and the wind caught the columns and spun them into a veil, and drew it across the heath towards the grotesquely-shapen peaks in the far distance. Bees hummed slowly past on their way to the straw skeps in the garden; a few yellow butterflies rose, half suffocated, from the heated turf. Philemona stood beside each bush like a priestess of old.

The fire leaped forward quickly, leaving the hearts of the bushes black and dead, but the ends of the lower branches and the golden flowers still unscorched. Unluckily, however, the grass was drier than the old woman had thought, and a long ribbon of flame began to run towards the beech copse. She grasped a stick and endeavoured to beat it out, but her efforts were useless, and in a few minutes a tree on the other side of the wall caught fire and burnt like a bundle of torches.

Philemona's heart beat furiously—unless something hindered it at once, the whole plantation would be destroyed. It belonged to Elyot, and the poor woman dreaded lest he should punish Michael for her fault. She climbed to the top of the wall and struck wildly at the boughs. As she was doing this Elyot himself appeared, his face very red and angry.

Digitized by Google

"'Twas a mishap!" Philemona gasped. "I couldna help't."

He did not speak until the fire was extinguished, then he came nearer and shouted furiously:

"If I ketch ye at this game again, ye old tarlock, I'll pack ye off to gaol!"

All Philemona's confusion disappeared, she grew white and rigid. "Neighbour Elyot," she said proudly, "this is na' the way to speak to an old woman. If my lad was here——"

"Be hanged to ye an' yere lad! I were just a-comin' o'er to warn ye as I won't ha' ony goins on o' his, and here I find ye a-burnin' o' my good beeches."

Philemona turned away in silence. Her composure irritated him still further; he leaped over the wall and followed.

"I've long jealoused as yere Mike were after my gal, but he's had no encouragement fro' me; an' this forenoon Nan ha' told me as how he's offered her wedlock. But I vow to Heaven as he shanna ha' her. Whatten's he to marry my gal's guineas? Why, there isna' 's much goodness in yere land as'd feed a goose? Yere ony a poor broken-down thing, forced to tak' in sewin', or else go to th' Bastille!"

Philemona turned. "I'll tell my lad," she said, "an' leave it t' him to set right. If he'd ha' been here he wouldna ha' stood yere talk, howiver much he cares for the lass. An' as for my being poor—poverty's no shame when there isna' disgrace an' dishonesty attending 't. Ye go back an' leave me be!"

She climbed the steps again and went into the cottage. After awhile she leant her head on her hands and wept silently, until she heard the shrieking of a cart-wheel in the distance, and knew that her boy was returning. Then she bathed her face in warm water, and prepared the tea, so that by the time all the twists of the road were turned everything was ready.

Michael was a stalwart fellow of twenty-four years; his skin brown with exposure to the sun, his eyes large and brown and soft like his mother's. This afternoon his forehead was covered with beads of perspiration, and his short chestnut curls pressed limply to his head. There was something strikingly ingenuous about him; very few could meet him without acknowledging his fascination. To Philemona he was doubly dear—for his own sake, and for the sake of the dead husband to whom in his early prime he bore a wonderful resemblance.

When the horse was stabled he came up to the cottage; his mother welcomed him at the door.

"Eh, lad, th'art dog tired!" she said; "'t has been o'er hot for thee. All's ready for tea!"

Despite her endeavours to appear cheerful, her voice broke; looking at her, Michael saw that her eyes were red and swollen.

"Whatten's wrong, mother dear?" he cried, putting his arm around her waist. "Nay, till me why'st been cryin'?"

"I were burnin' th' gorse i' th' long close," she said, mournfully, "thou canst see the place—an' th' grass got afire an' lighted one o' Elyot's beeches. An' he came 'long an' called me, an' said as his daughter were none for thee."

A smile crossed the young man's bright face; he was too sure of his love to feel fear.

"Dunna' trouble about it, mother," he said. "Nan'll stick to me, spite o' whativer he does. I knew she were goin' to tell him—I wanted her to, an' I knew likewise as he'd refuse. But time changes a' things, mother, an' we can surely wait. Nan's o' full age i' another year."

"But, lad, 't always seems to me as folk wed early are folk wed best. Drink thy tea an' dunna' wait for me. I amna' thirsty. Howsomever, he used words to thy mother as thou wouldstna' ha' stood."

Michael flushed angrily. "I'd ha' drubbed him sure enough," he said, "though he's but an ailin' man. 'Twere best for him as I werena there."

Philemona's excitement calmed soon, and they began to talk together, just as if nothing unpleasant had occurred, of all the news he had heard in the village. Afterwards, when tea was over, and he had gone to milk the kine, she took out her sewing again, and finished it before he came in with the glistening pails that were frothed to the brim.

"I'm thinkin' I'll take this skirt home to-night," she said. "Mrs. Curbar's wantin' it in a day or two. I'll leave you to yere readin'."

She handed from the top shelf of the dresser a dumpy little copy of "The Farmer of Inglewood Forest," which Nancy had lent him a few days before.

Digitized by Google

Soon she went upstairs and put on her black straw bonnet and a scarlet shawl, on which yellow monsters revelled, and after kissing Michael fondly she set off for the farm.

Philemona was held in high esteem by the country folk. Mrs. Curbar took her into the best parlour, where the window was full with scarlet and white geraniums in brightly raddled pots, and the furniture covered with soft faded chintz. Two girls were sitting on the settle, talking earnestly in low voices. The younger was the daughter of the house, the other Nancy Elyot herself. Not for the first time did Philemona notice her loveliness. Michael might well be proud of such a sweetheart.

Nancy took her hand timidly, but Philemona leant forward and kissed her, and Nancy's little fingers pressed hers affectionately. Then both the girls left the room, and Mrs. Curbar began to relate how Elyot had been to see her that same afternoon.

"All in a fume he were," she said. "He swore as he'd liefer see her dead than married to yere Mike, an' took an oath as if it were brought to pass he wouldna' leave her a shillin'. I told him as 't were a proper match, an' then he went on 'bout yere place! Soft-yedded miser, that's whatten he is!"

Philemona told of his usage of her, and received her friend's sympathy. After drinking a cup of tea she rose to go. Nancy met her in the garden.

"May I walk on wi' ye, Mrs. Grindlowe?" she said. "I'd like to have a talk."

The old woman was delighted. "Most certainly, my dear," she replied. "I'll be welly proud. I go yere way 's far as the Green Hillocks."

They walked together; Nan began to pour confidences into her ear. "Mike ha' told you all?" she said. "I'll wait till I'm twenty-one quietly, if he'll wait too; indeed, I'd wait all my life—an' father canna cut me off as he reckons, for after all I'm his on'y kith an' kin. He told me to-night as how he'd let ye know his mind, but you mun forgive him. Father's none a bad sort at bottom."

"I'll bear no malice," Philemona said. "I'd forgive onybody for my lad's sake; I'd thought—I—I'd thought for a long time as he were i' love."

Nancy kissed her again; they had reached the Green Hillocks, where the paths diverged.

"'Tis years sin' I lost my mother," she said, "but 'twill be like finding her again. Good night."

It was twilight now. As Philemona walked slowly along the raised pathway she saw a man riding in her direction. The road was narrow, and as the horse seemed rather wild she climbed up into the brushwood. She recognised the man as a rich landowner, who was addicted to drink and gambling. His waistcoat was unfastened and he was bareheaded.

After he had passed her she saw a scarlet book fall from his pocket and lie unheeded on the stones. Her first impulse was to pick it up and run after him, but ere she could descend she saw Elyot coming along the road. He, too, must have seen it fall. He stooped, picked it up, unfastened the strap, and examined the contents; then, after looking around furtively to make sure that none had seen him, he ran towards his house.

Philemona followed him without knowing why, slipping behind the bushes every time he showed any disposition to turn, down a long deep lane lined with full-bloomed hawthorns, whose perfume the cool air dispersed.

He reached a stable which lay at some distance from the homestead, and taking a large key from his pocket he unlocked the door and entered. She peeped in, and finding that he had gone to the further end stole silently after him, and hid herself behind a half-rotten partition, against which stood a large corn-bin. A lantern hung from a nail in the wall; he lighted it, and sitting on the bin commenced, chuckling meanwhile, to spread a number of papers and coins on a shelf.

"Five, ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, thirty," he muttered. "There is notes, by jove; fifty pound each, an' eight o' 'em. Here's a gran' find."

His little grey eyes sparkled brilliantly in the dim light. Philemona saw that his fingers were curved like the claws of a bird of prey. She held her breath, fearful lest the beating of her heart might betray her presence.

"Well, findin's keepin'," she heard him whisper. "Nobody's seen me, an' it's a' mine."

He replaced the money in the pocket-book, meditated for a few moments, then he lifted the lid of the corn-chest and burrowed in a corner until he reached the bottom. And there he hid the treasure. As if afraid that even now someone might be seeking him, he closed the lid hastily and went to the door. Before Philemona could move he had locked her in the stable, and was on his way to the house.

Digitized by Google

At first she was terrified with the thought of being locked up all night in this strange place, but all at once her spirits began to rise.

"It's just Providence," she said, half aloud. "I've got him i' my hands, and I'll make him do 'zactly as I want. Mike 'll happen think as I'm stoppin' a' night wi' Mrs. Curbar—I ha' done't afore—an' so he'll never know. I wunna get afraid nohow. If he's uneasy, to-morrow 'll set him right."

In a stall near the door a lazy mare stood, the sound of its shifting comforted her; through a cross-shaped notch in the wall she could see the moon and stars. Under the manger rats began to play; she could hear their cries, so she climbed to the top of the corn-bin, and sat with her back to the partition.

"Good lack!" she exclaimed laughingly, "won't neighbour Elyot be struck i' th' morn."

She did not sleep, but pondered all night on her son's coming happiness, making delightful visions of the family life he and Nancy would lead, visions in which she nursed pretty bantlings, and had naught to do but look after them.

"Nancy's a beautiful wench. Did ever I hear the like o' th' way she said I'd be her mother! My lad ha' chosen well. She's thrifty, too, I vow, an' I dessay her father'll be none so bad when he's browt to his senses!"

The hours passed quickly. Her excitement prevented her feeling any exhaustion, and when the dawn came cold and grey, and the larks began to rise from the grass outside, she got down, and lifting the lid took out the pocket-book and held it in both hands. The bell of the village church struck four—simultaneously she heard the key turning in the lock. Elyot had risen betimes to count the money again. The door swung open, and she confronted him. He staggered forward, yellow with dread, and leant against the wall.

"Good morrow, neighbour," she said boldly. "It werena' a kind trick, though, to lock me up here a' night!"

He lifted his eyes and began to glare. An indistinct curse fell from his lips.

"Hush," she said, "ye munna talk like thatten! Time enough to do that when yere sent off to gaol."

"Good Heaven! Mrs. Grindlowe, we're old friends. I didna' mean to steal 't. Strike me dead if I werena'goin' to take 't back."

"I dunna believe ye. I'm off to th' constable now."

He sank to his knees. "Ye'll disgrace me for iver!" he screamed. "I ha' allus been a honest man."

"On'y one thing 'll mak' me let ye off. Onyways th' money mun be returned—that o' course—but I'm content to hush 't if ye'll de whatten e'er I wish."

"Ay, I'll do aught," he said, humbly; "an' be grateful, too. I were tempted. Yere Mike shall ha' the lass."

"Honour good?"

"Ay, ay. On'y dunna expose me. I'll swear to 't."

"Well, then, I'll take this book back to th' owner. It'll be cried to-morrow, sure enough, if I don't. Ye can come too, if ye like." He shook his head feebly; she lifted her forefinger and shook it contemptuously. "I've no patience with dishonesty," she added, "I were a-watchin' ye a' th' time."

She passed into the open air.

"Now, if ye go back o' your word, I'll out wi' 't all," she said. "Otherways I'll be silent as th' grave to iverybody i' th' world—e'en to my own lad."

She left him standing there, his lips trembling foolishly, and made straight for the house of the man who had lost the money. On her way she met Michael, who had been seeking her all night. He was haggard and frightened looking. She put her thin arm around his neck and waited in silence.

"Oh, mother, where hast been?" he said.

"Doin' naught wrong, thou mayst well believe," she replied. "Eh, lad, I've news for thee. Old Elyot wunna trouble thee wi' opposition now; thou mayst ha' Nancy."

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

A Beautiful Bible Story.

By the Rev. MARK GUY PEARSE.

THERE is a story beautiful as it is blessed in Luke viii.—the story of how nobody became somebody, and how somebody became everybody.

First, then, nobody. The story opens with a picture of a woman not important enough to have a name. Poor and feeble, she comes before us thrust hither and thither in a crowd. And if you want to be nobody and to know it get into a crowd. Solitude is often the best company — for real and utter loneliness you must be lost in a crowd. But this woman's loneliness was not only in a crowd, it was everywhere. You see, she was a woman; and that of itself was rather a dreadful thing until Jesus came. We read of His disciples that they marvelled that Jesus should talk to a woman. One of their reverend Rabbis had declared that it was better to burn the words of the Law than to teach them to a woman. A woman was forbidden to worship God in the same court as her stately lord and master.

And this woman was enfeebled by twelve long years of sickness. Her very sickness shut her away from intercourse with others, whilst it dragged down all her energy and hope. She was poor, wretchedly poor. "She had spent all her living upon physicians, neither could be healed of any." Every thought of herself only thrust her further away from help, and shut her up in her dreary loneliness.

The very sympathy of those about her had spent itself; they had grown so used to seeing her as she was that they had ceased to think of her with any tenderness. What is so familiar cannot continue to impress. One who had been ill for twelve years must not expect to be pitied by her neighbours; they had got so used to seeing her ill. If ever she felt that she was nobody, it was certainly to-day. The great Prophet of Nazareth was in the village, passing her very door, and yet she dared not ask Him to heal her. There was Jairus, a man of influence and importance—oh, happy maiden, who had such a father to speak for her! And yet even Jairus had fallen at the Feet of the great Prophet and besought Him to come and lay His Hand upon the little maiden. What room, then, was there for a poor feeble body like her, in the presence of such a One as that?

And there were His disciples—Peter and John and James and Philip and Andrew—she dared not speak to one of them to get their influence, she whom the law pronounced unclean. Yet like a guilty creature she whispered: "If I may but touch the hem of His garment, I shall be made whole."

Now forth she ventures into the crowd, but her case is worse than ever. Borne hither and thither by the surging mob, fearing that she will be trampled underfoot of those fierce fellows that press on every side—poor thing, this is no place for her. And as the crowd sweeps past let us stay a moment to think of it all.

How many there are in a like evil case, who seem to have everything against them, who are shut off from all help, look where they will! Around them there are only hindrances, within them weakness, and worse than weakness, alas! Their struggles have left them in despair, they look at one and another, and think how gladly they would change places with them, just as this poor woman looked on Jairus and the disciples. Some people seem to have all the advantages, and some seem to have no chance at all, nothing but failure and disappointment, do what they will.

But now let us turn to the second chapter of our story—somebody. We see again this feeble woman, wasted and wearied by being pushed and hustled to and fro in the crowd, all unable to hold her own amongst the press. Then suddenly some happy chance brings her close to Jesus. Without a moment's delay, or the opportunity will be lost, she thrusts forth a trembling hand and touches the hem of His garment. Instantly she feels the healing virtue flooding like a tide of new life within her, and she is whole.

Digitized by Google

But see, Jesus stops, and the host of people stand still. What is it? A hush of wonder falls upon all as the Lord Jesus turns Himself about in the crowd as if looking for someone. Is He not in haste to get to the house of the ruler to heal the little maiden? Why, then, this delay? And now, as all is hushed, He asks: "Who touched Me?"

It was a strange question to ask when on every side the great crowd had been surging about Him. All wondered. The frightened woman stood with downcast eyes, trembling from head to foot, hoping she would be overlooked. She is nothing and nobody; they will not suspect her. Then Peter remonstrates: "Master, the people throng Thee and press Thee, and sayest Thou, 'Who touched Me?'" Jairus, too, must have ventured to look the entreaty that perhaps he shrank from putting into words: "Master, never mind who touched Thee; my little daughter is at the point of death."

But Jesus stands still looking about Him. "Somebody — somebody hath touched Me." So, then, this poor nobody was somebody now; somebody. We do not read the word rightly if we think of it as having any touch of reproof—we do not read it rightly if we think of it as spoken in a tone of mere curious wonder. It was all tenderness. He Who felt the touch read with infallible love all that it meant. "There is a poor trembling soul here afraid to ask for healing. Who is it? Somebody has touched Me." "And when the woman saw that she was not hid she came trembling and falling down before Him, and she declared unto Him for what cause she had touched Him, and how she was healed immediately." Yes, she is somebody now.

Everybody. We must hurry on, the story is too beautiful to break it here. She is somebody now. Look at her at His Feet, where Jairus had been, she, the poor wasted woman, in the place of the ruler of the synagogue! As they stood, and watched, and listened, they saw Him, the Almighty Prophet, lay His Hands upon her tenderly, and He said: "Daughter"—no more gracious words ever fell from His Lips—"daughter, be of good comfort." It fell like healing balm upon her timid soul. It quieted every whisper of her fear. Well might they marvel at the gracious words which proceeded out of His Mouth. "Be of good comfort; thy faith hath made thee whole. Go in peace." Now is it as if she were everybody—thus to have His tender recognition of her, to hear His benediction, to feel His virtue healing her, to have the blessing of His touch and the sweetness of such a name from His Lips, and to go away as into an atmosphere that He has charmed and hallowed. How gladly would all that host change places with her now, and even Jairus, the ruler of the synagogue, might well have blessed her, for by that miracle of healing his faith was strengthened to expect the little maiden from the dead. This is what the Lord Jesus Christ has come to do for every one of us—to make nobody into somebody, to take away all the littleness and loneliness and emptiness of life, and to fill it with His love.

I saw it all beautifully illustrated one day. It is some time since that I happened to find wandering aimlessly along the street a lost child of some three years. It was just dazed and bewildered. I spoke to the little one, but it only looked at me with great sorrowful eyes and shook its head. "What is your name?" said I, "and where do you live?" But never a word could I get in reply—only that look of unutterable grief. If there was ever a nobody in the world, here was one! a lost child, unable to tell its name or its home.

I took the child to the house of a friend near by, and telephoned to the police-station. Ah, it was somebody then, as one and another began to ring the bell, and half-a-dozen came in succession to ask questions about it, and all sorts of police arrangements began to be put into use for it. And the excitement spread as they telephoned to another office, and yet another. "Come, little one," said I, "you are somebody now." At length there came a message that a woman had called at the office in great distress about a lost child. It was hers, and she was coming to fetch it. At last I heard a knock at the door, and myself opened it, with the child. Then, when the mother took the little one with a great sob, and pressed it to her heart with tearful eyes, and kissed it, and sat down overwhelmed with gladness, that little one was no longer somebody only—to her it was everybody. That is the gospel of God. A love that finds us out one by one, and makes us feel that we are not hid. Live where we may, be what we will, that great love finds us. The love of God is not like the sun in the heavens, a blaze of splendour infinite in its vastness, but far above us; it is like the sun whose warmth and blessing creep into each separate flower, fitting it perfectly, and unfolding its fragrance and glory.

Digitized by Google

Everything about the Lord Jesus, everything that He said, and everything that He did, and everything that is said of Him reveals to us this separate and individual love. Nothing else can satisfy us. His love must come to each of us by ourselves, fitting into the separate character, helping each in the separate needs, dealing with each in the separate circumstances; responding to my heart and giving me Himself.

MARK GUY PEARSE.

DREAMS.

Through the busy hours, with a thread of brown,
I weave all day a plain, brown gown;
It is dull and coarse and commonplace,
And the skill of the weaver its chiefest grace.

But, oh, in the realm where I reign a queen,
There is royal purple with silver sheen;
There is cloth of gold with jewels rare—
Oh, the realm of the soul is a realm so fair!

There's a fabric as pure as a snow-white bird;
It is made of the thoughts my soul has heard;
It is chaste and white and soft as spray—
Oh, the realm of dreams that we dream by day!

There's a robe of the deepest crimson glow—
'Twas the blood of my heart that made it so;
The chalice is broken and lies at my feet,
But I drank the dregs and called them sweet.

There's a garment spun of the sunset's gold,
And on dull, grey days, when my heart grows cold
And the shadows deepen and the lights burn low,
I wind about me the golden glow.

Oh, the thread of brown is not what it seems,
For in and out in the mesh of my dreams
It is weaving the fabric of life to-day
That enrobes my soul in its regal array.

Muriel Strode.

Digitized by Google

Rev. J. Stockwell Watts and the "Liberator" Relief Fund.

By ROBERT VINCENT.

THOUGH nine years have gone by since the gigantic Liberator swindles spread ruin broadcast through the land—swindles so heartless and despicable that it would be difficult to find their match in the history of the last hundred years—the impression which the disaster has left on the public mind is so vivid that we can hardly realise that it all happened so long ago.

It would ill become us, too, as a Christian nation if the memory of this terrible wrong should be allowed to grow faint while so many of the victims are still suffering all the agonies of want, and, after struggling on bravely since the crash, have now nothing to look to but the workhouse.

Though much has been done to alleviate the distress, it is still widespread, nor is this to be wondered at when we remember that no less than seven millions of money were swallowed up in the crash, and that this enormous sum chiefly represented the life savings of poor, thrifty people, and on whom the blow fell with crushing force.

The disaster was thus all the more pitiable because it involved in financial ruin a most deserving part of the community; people, moreover, whose acquaintance with business was so limited as to make them a helpless prey to unscrupulous speculators, and who had the more reason to trust in the enterprise because it had received the unqualified approval of many of their religious leaders.

REV. J. STOCKWELL WATTS.
Founder and Hon. Secretary of the Fund

All these points served to differentiate their case from that of the ordinary sufferers from company swindles, many of whom embark their money in speculative concerns with a full knowledge of the risk.

Unhappily the public was at first too much inclined to put the Liberator sufferers in this class, for aid was tardy in coming. The hour of darkest need was at hand, but where was the man to step into the breach and bring succour to the sufferers?

Digitized by Google

He was found in a Congregational minister who had for many years worked devotedly among the people of the East End and who came forward to face the gigantic task of relief. This was the Rev. J. Stockwell Watts, the originator of the Liberator Relief Fund, through whose untiring efforts, in the face of much discouragement and some opposition, the great sum of £100,000 has been collected and distributed to the sufferers.

Mr. Watts comes of a clever family, and possesses business abilities which have particularly fitted him for his great task. His brothers have risen to high positions, one being manager of Messrs. Armstrong Mitchell's Shipbuilding Yard, and another, who died many years ago, having been engaged in the Naval Construction Department of the Admiralty and afterwards being appointed Professor of Marine Engineering at the Royal Naval College, Greenwich.

Though equally well equipped, Mr. Stockwell Watts abandoned his chances of making money by entering the ministry in accordance with his mother's dying wish.

His work as a minister at Bethnal Green was very successful, and he attracted large congregations, and did a great amount of good in a district where vigorous Christian effort is much needed.

He first came into notice outside his pastoral work by his wise and courageous action in connection with the "Richard Green" Building Society, in which many of his people were deeply interested, and whom he saved from financial disaster. There had been a serious loss owing to the defalcations of a confidential clerk, and the directors decided to wind up the company.

Mr. Watts, who knew that the concern was otherwise in a very good condition, pointed out in the strongest terms the folly of the proposed course. It would be suicidal, he said, and inevitably entail a much greater loss. He completely won the confidence of the shareholders, and was appointed chairman of the investigating committee, and afterwards a director. The society prospered much under Mr. Watts' able guidance, and, after controlling its fortunes for ten prosperous years, he resigned his post owing to the increasing calls of his pastoral work.

But the experience thus gained of the working of building societies, and of the laws regulating them, afterwards proved invaluable in connection with his work on the Committee which sat to examine the affairs of the Jabez Balfour companies, and his warmest sympathies were enlisted on behalf of the confiding shareholders who had been so grossly swindled.

The task of relief upon which Mr. Watts entered when the great crash came was one which might have damped the spirits of the most sanguine, but though in poor health at the time, Mr. Watts boldly faced the situation and started his Fund, which he took good care should loom largely in the public eye. He secured Royal patronage for the undertaking; enlisted the sympathy of many of the foremost religious leaders of the day, circularised indefatigably, and made the wants of his poor clients widely known through the daily and weekly press.

One hundred thousand pounds was the sum for which he asked, and which he succeeded in raising, but even this has fallen short of the needs of the situation.

Over 3,000 applications for relief have been received, and nearly all have been attended to, some receiving two, three and even five grants. More than half the victims are unmarried women and widows, often feeble and aged and incapable of earning a penny for themselves.

There are 1,486 over sixty years of age, and 824 are seventy years of age and upwards. Of the latter some 500 have been placed beyond the reach of want for the rest of their lives by the investment of a sufficient sum in Government securities.

But, after all that has been done, the work is still incomplete.

There are at least 500 other old men and women who fall just short of the threescore and ten who are quite as much in need, and there are another 200 to 250 who, though not more than sixty, are confirmed invalids.

It is to help these that Mr. Stockwell Watts is endeavouring to raise the necessary funds.

"We have been helping them a long time past," he told the writer, "but we shall not be able to continue the grants indefinitely unless the charitable public again come to our aid.

Digitized by Google

"Some people are beginning to grumble and say that, having asked for £100,000 and obtained it, I ought to remain satisfied, and not increase the demand at a time when people have so many other calls upon them, but I cannot remain satisfied when I see hundreds of helpless people threatened with absolute want through no fault of their own, who, when the grants cease, will have nothing left to them but starvation or the workhouse, and I appeal most earnestly to all religious people to render such a cruel thing as their abandonment impossible. In order to provide for them we require either a capital sum of £20,000 or else £1,600 or £1,700 a year for the next ten years."

Mr. Watts gives some startling facts to show how widespread has been the misery caused by these frauds. The 3,000 odd people on the books of the Fund are living in all parts of the Kingdom in no less than 1,000 separate places.

Innumerable cases of the most pitiable description have come before Mr. Watts, and we can just quote one as showing how disastrously the frauds have affected a most industrious and praiseworthy class of people.

A man and his wife had been in business in London for many years. It was a good business, and on retiring, at the age of sixty, they invested their savings, some £3,600, in the different Balfour companies, under the impression that they were separate undertakings. The smash came, and everything was lost, and the old people bravely resolved to start life again. But they found the business very different from what it had been, and notwithstanding their struggles they went back and back until at last their health broke down. The husband lost his sight, and the wife became a helpless cripple and could do nothing for him, and so at last they were driven to apply to the Fund.

ROBERT VINCENT.

TRUE LOVE.

Safe in love's hand I placed my own
Ere the first buds of June had blown;
  Then, in broad summer fields astray,
  We watched, through sunny days and gray,
At length the fair wild rose full blown.

We lingered till its joy had flown;
And, when its sweets were wayward thrown,
  My pledge unharmed, unsquandered, lay
    Safe in love's hand.

The winds reaped what the winds had sown;
But the brief season had foreshown
  No likeness to love's endless day:
  I trust my troth, and well I may,
Henceforth, through paths unseen, unknown,
    Safe in love's hand.

F. W. Hutt.

Digitized by Google

LITERARY JOTTINGS.

By J. CUTHBERT HADDEN.

MR. BORLAND, the minister of the classic Vale of Yarrow, has conceived a very novel method of dealing with the vandals who scratch and cut their names in "places of public resort." He has been specially incensed at the way in which James Hogg's monument near St. Mary's Loch is being disfigured, and his plan is to print in the local newspapers the names and addresses of persons who have been guilty of the outrage. It is not a bad idea, but I doubt its effectiveness. People who leave their names behind them in public places are mostly tourists from a distance who never see the local paper.

PROBABLY the most interesting article in the whole of the two supplementary volumes of the "Dictionary of National Biography" is Mr. Sidney Lee's memoir of Mr. George Smith, the publisher of the monumental work. We learn, for instance, that Thackeray's salary as editor of Cornhill was £1,000, afterwards increased to £2,000. Besides this, he was paid large sums for his own contributions to the magazine. For example, he had twelve guineas a page for his "Roundabout Papers." Does any monthly editor nowadays receive £2,000 a year? George Henry Lewis was also associated with Smith in the way of giving advice, for which he received £300 a year. The old story of the starting of the Pall Mall Gazette is told again. Smith had a terrible fight before establishing the paper. The circulation of the first number was 4,000, but three months after publication the sale was only 613 a day, while the amount received for advertisements was often only £3. Fortunately George Smith was a wealthy man, and he could afford to hold on. In 1873 he became one of the owners of Apollinaris Water, out of which he made an enormous fortune. No doubt he made money as a publisher, but we may safely take it that if it had not been for his success in other business enterprises we should never have had the "Dictionary of National Biography," which he must have seen from the first would never pay its expenses.

IT is amusing to find a simple soul writing to one of the papers to ask why people should pay big sums for first editions of celebrated books when they can get these books in fine modern editions for a modest shilling or two. "When you can buy 'Pickwick' for sixpence," says he, "why should anyone pay, perhaps, £50 for it in its first form?" It must certainly look like an inexplicable problem to the uninitiated. But ask a Dickens collector about it. He will tell you that there are not more than a dozen true first editions of "Pickwick" in existence, and with the collector the element of rarity always counts for a great deal. But there is more than rarity to account for the run after first editions of "Pickwick."

Suppose we enumerate the "points" as these are set down by the collector. Of course the book must be in parts as issued—arrayed in its green cover with the advertisements; the value of the green cover being that it proves the "sporting" complexion at first intended to be imparted to the narrative. Then it is de rigueur to possess the various classes of illustrations. There are those by Seymour, who committed suicide after the record number had appeared, and was succeeded by the now forgotten Buss, who was tried and found wanting in two suppressed plates which every first edition must have in order to be regarded as genuine. Buss was followed by the versatile "Phiz," who immediately provided substitutes for the suppressed plates; and then there was a further plate of Seymour's with which Dickens was dissatisfied, and which in courteous terms he begged him to withdraw. This plate, if secured, enriches the book enormously. Nor are these the only points. There are still the scarce addresses found in parts 10 and 15, and so often wanting. A "Pickwick" in this state, perfect and clean, would certainly bring £30 at Sotheby's any day, and might, if properly heralded in America, sell for nearly £50. Even the novice can see that it is intrinsically much more valuable than any modern edition of "Pickwick" can ever be. Whether as much can be said for all the other first editions on the bibliomaniac's search list I am not prepared to affirm. I am afraid that in the case of a good many books the first edition hunt is simply a craze.

Digitized by Google

THE collecting of rare postage stamps, a favourite diversion of boys, is perhaps more reasonable. It has, at any rate, become a great trade, and some extraordinary prices have just been realised in London. A fine unused example of the eighty-one paras Moldavia stamp of 1854 was sold to a private collector for £220, while a Saxony stamp of 1851 ran up to £44. Not improbably we may before long witness the sale of a stamp for something like £1,000, for the very rarest known has not of late come under the hammer. In London there are many shops doing an excellent business in stamps, and in Paris there is a regular bourse held every Thursday and Sunday in a corner of the Champs Elysées where hundreds of men, women and boys congregate with their albums and packages for sale and exchange. It is said that thousands of francs change hands there every market day. The impudence of collectors of autographs is only too notorious, but most previous feats in this line were lately surpassed by a stamp collector in the Leeds district. This gentleman asked a British Consul in South America to send him some old postage stamps, and forwarded the letter preferring the request unstamped and marked "O.H.M.S." That collector will succeed in filling his album!

J. CUTHBERT HADDEN.

THE LIGHT OF HOME.

The light of home's a wondrous light,
So tender in its shining,
So soft it follows through the night,
The darkest storm-clouds lining.
Though lonely and for years we roam,
Far from the ones who love us,
Yet ever shines the light of home,
Like God's grace spread above us.

The light of home's a wondrous light,
Through youth and manhood beaming;
And when with age the hair is white,
Clear on in front 'tis gleaming.
It shines from where our dear ones are,
Our hearts in love entwining!
And through the gates of heaven ajar
At last we see it shining!

Digitized by Google

Conducted by
THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.

THE CRUTCH-AND-KINDNESS LEAGUE.

As this most merciful League is carried on in connection with the Ragged School Union, and many of the friends of the poor, maimed bairns—especially those who live abroad—have an impression that the cripples reside in a school ("Ragged School") I should like to say a few words about this great organisation.

The good Earl of Shaftesbury gave this name to the Union more than half a century ago, when it really meant a combining of many philanthropic agencies which had been at work for teaching the rough children of the slums, when no School Board was dreamt of, and for otherwise ameliorating the terribly sodden condition of the London poor. Much has changed since then, and changed, let us trust, for the better, but the poor are with us still, and the hooligan—and the poor cripples. So the great organisation of merciful workers goes on under the old name whilst adapting itself to modern methods and needs.

The following statement of last year's work will show, better than many words could, the character of the Union and its responsibilities :—

5,227 children, senior scholars, and adults sent to the country or the seaside for a fortnight; 1,004 cripple children sent to the seaside for two or more weeks; 30,000 children had a day in the country; 48,950 garments supplied to poor children; 3,818 pairs of boots purchased; £2,104 grants to affiliated missions; £661 cases of destitution, Bovril, soup kitchens, free meals, etc., etc.; 351 sufferers assisted with surgical appliances, crutches, etc., to the value of £591 13s. 1d.; 593 faithful service prizes, making a grand total of 32,373; 82 goose clubs with 9,096 members; 5 children placed in permanent homes; 8,800 robin dinners, Christmas and other festivities; 318 entertainments supplied with magic lanterns and slides; 204,000 books, periodicals, etc., circulated, including "In His Name;" 33 engagements by the Cripples' Choir; 36 missionaries, kindergarten teachers, holiday home matrons, assistants, and staff; the Ashley Mission, Bethnal Green; the Battersea Shaftesbury Welcome, and the Battersea Gipsies' Rest are wholly sustained by the Society, as are also the Crutch-and-Kindness League; Sea-Shell and Scrap-Book Mission, Ragged Church and Chapel Union, the Hearts-and-Hands League, and the Guild of the Good Samaritan.

The tale this tells is suggestive enough of what has been accomplished in a single year, but how much more suggestive it becomes as we cast the eye over the following abridged summary of operations conducted in these Ragged School Missions :—

There are 152 separate buildings, 209 Sabbath Afternoon and Evening Schools, with an average attendance of 39,816; 6 Day Schools (940); 41 Week-night Schools (2,369); 43 Industrial Classes (1,721); 179 Institutes, Recreation Classes, etc. (5,703); 15 Boys' Brigades (479); 3,770 Voluntary Teachers. Average attendance on Sundays (3,003); 63 paid teachers; 580 situations found for scholars; 222 scholars became communicants; 170 special religious services (15,800); 221 Bible Classes (3,899); 65 Christian Endeavour Societies (1,986); 110 Mothers' Meetings (7,828); 179 Prayer Meetings (7,973); 138 Bands of Hope (11,598); 76 School Libraries (21,034 vols.); 66 Penny Banks—Amount deposited £8,112 3s. 11½d., balance in hand £2,020 16s. 4¾d.; contributed by members of 43 Clothing Clubs, £1,463 1s. 8½d.

The most careless, casting an eye over such a list of merciful operations will be amazed at so much good being done so quietly and unostentatiously. In the sight of all this it is surely not too much to say that the Ragged School Union is a kind of saving salt amongst the sadly submerged in London.

But the work which lies most at my heart, and, I am grateful to say, at the heart of about 5,000 friends in all parts of the world, is that which is carried on among the poor, crippled children, under the name of the Crutch-and-Kindness League. There are more than 6,000 of these poor hapless children in London alone, and their lot is very, very sad and lonesome. Take this, related by Winifred Bertram, as a fair example :—

"You think a great deal, Dan!" said the visitor, as he looked at the little thin suffering face of a London child.

Digitized by Google

"Yes," said Dan confidentially, "but most at nights. The court's quiet then, and I don't feel so much that I should like to be out to play with the others all in the sun. And it's all dark except up there in the sky. And the stars come out, such lots of them, for they're not the same, and they don't keep in one place." (Dan announced this as a discovery.) "They keep going on. Sometimes there's four or five of 'em in a bunch, and sometimes three in a row. And then there's one or two brighter than all the others, that don't wink, but keep looking at me so kind and steady like. They make me think of mother, and of our Saviour, and of the children in heaven. And I 'most think I can hear 'm singing up there sometimes." Then after a little pause, he suddenly looked up with a penetrating look and said—

"What becomes of them stars all day long?"

"They are always there," was the reply, "only they are hidden in the sunshine."

Dan nodded as if confirmed in a conviction.

"I thought so," he said; "and that's how it is with heaven, and the Lord, and the children up there. It's just the same as with the stars."

"What do you mean, Dan?" asked the visitor, anxious to bring out the boy's thought.

"Why, they're always there," said Dan, in a low, happy voice. "They're always there, looking and smiling on us; only there's too much dazzle for us to see 'em, or hear 'em, and too much noise."

Now who with a heart of compassion can think of children, poor, maimed, quite lonesome too, often by day, and suffering continually, day and night, without wishing, at least, to do something to brighten them up a bit? But many who have the heart have little time, or do not know how they can help. The Crutch-and-Kindness League just meets such cases. All it asks of each member is—to write a wee letter once a month, or if too busy for the letter, to send an old picture-magazine, or some other such pleasing trifle to the little cripple whose name, with all particulars, is given him or her for this purpose. This is the gist of all—but how much the postman's visit means to the wee lonely one! An invalid can do this work, a child can do it, young or old, far-off or near—this is within the reach of all who have the sympathetic heart.

All further particulars may be had for a stamp from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary, Ragged School Union, 32, John-street, Theobald's-road, London, W.C.

NEW MEMBERS FOR THE MONTH.

Mabel Rowe, Eva Earsdale, Janet MacKensie, New Zealand; Mabel Long, Sheffield; Miss Annie Barfett, Devon; C. Moody Esq, Salisbury; Mrs. McAllister, New Zealand; Miss Williams, Staffs.; Miss Theodora Harris, St. Albans; Miss Connie Hickin, Stourbridge; Mrs. A. H. Thompson, Australia; Master P. Glasier, Sandown, I.W.; Miss Foster, Selby; Miss Ethel E. Thomas, Bournemouth; Miss C. A. Robinson, London, W.; Miss Ethel Casson, Miss Maud Casson, Hull; Miss Scrumslan, Nottingham; Mrs. Marie Moss, Hitchin; Miss Wakefield, Northampton; Mrs. Lewis, Cronborough; Miss R. Hedge, Luton; Miss Olive Eldridge, St. Leonards; Miss Murray, S. Australia; Miss Dora Pope, Bicester; Miss M. E. Smith, Hove; Miss May Johnson, Miss Chillingworth, Miss Z. Masterson, Miss Cissie Burrows, Miss N. Walter, Group 90; Miss M. Barnard, Eastbourne; Miss M. Richmond, Redhill; Miss E. A. Jay. Lee; Miss R. H. Fountain, Bath; Mrs. Dudney, Bexley-heath; Miss A. Pinnock, Master Pinnock, Bristol; Miss M. Bolton, Glasgow; Miss Bunn, New Zealand; Miss Jean Lillicrapp, S. Australia; Miss M. Lake, New Zealand; Miss Winifred Burrows, Miss Elizabeth Burrows, Atherton; Miss Clara Sanderland, W. Bromwich; Mr. B. Kingscote, Miss G. Kingscote, Miss M. Kingscote, Llandyssul.

PRIZE COMPETITION.

"THE KINDEST OLD LADY OR GENTLEMAN."

Let anyone look back on his very young days, and, at the heart of all else, he is sure to see the figure of some man or woman whom he looked on as "the kindest in the world. Position is nothing; heart is everything to us then; the genial old sailor who used to tell us stories—big "stories" too sometimes, there is reason to fear—or the carrier, always willing to give us a lift—or the blacksmith who gave us the free run of his vice and a file—what a high niche these lowly folk hold in our hearts still! They "liked" us for our own sakes, purely and simply. I have read, twice at least, the two big volumes of the life of Dr. Thomas Chalmers (not altogether from choice, I admit, but rather to please the kindest old lady I have ever known), but though I have forgotten as much of the contents as any man, one green little bit always stands out clear—concerning his "kind old gentleman." He was but a carpenter, but he let the little laddie have the run of a bench, with a few odd tools and scraps of wood, and here the boy who was afterwards to shape and construct a vast and living church, pottered away, day after day, and learnt to find his fingers. But the heart of the picture, as it comes before me again to-day, was when "Tam's" mother, thinking to reward the old man for his kindness, offered him some money. The look in the old man's face!—so pained and humiliated! "Noo, ma'am, ye've spoilt a'!" A benison on the memory of this bairn-loving man—and on the many and many like him we have all known!

This is a word on behalf of kind men, and I put it in because all my young correspondents have written only of kind ladies—though I gave them an option. But the fault is not with the girls, it is with the boys; they too have had their "kindest old gentleman," but they are too lazy to write about him! That's about it, is it not? Well, well!—they have their man too, and are storing up memories now that will, at a later date, come back fresh and green, as many come to me now. Our kindness to the bairns now is only sweetness invested.

The samples I give of the letters sent in are fair specimens of those for which I have no space. The charm of all the descriptions is that these dear old folk have evidently learnt the art of never growing old—which isn't such a "bull" as it looks!

I know an old lady of about 74 years of age; with white hair, and very thin. I like her because she loves me, and I love her. She is very kind, and good, and gentle. She is a very good walker and likes driving very much. She has very good sight, and can do needlework beautifully. She is very industrious and always busy at something. She is very particular about manners, and is very neat and tidy herself. Her eyes are brown, and she has a lovely colour in her cheeks. She is altogether a very pretty and dear old lady.

Digitized by Google

KATHLEEN J. HENDERSON.
(Age 12 years.)

DEAR SIR,—The kindest old lady that I know is my great "Aunty Goody." Her real name is Sarah, but she used to give us so many "goodies," that by the time I was born it was her regular name. She is now 84 years, and when I went to see her last, I took her in her bath-chair for a walk every day it was fine, and often in the evenings we had games of dominoes and draughts. She is continually giving us presents, old silver, jewelry, and such like things, out of her old stores. A long time ago when I was at the kindergarten I learnt to make baskets, and made her a basket-work fire-screen which she still uses. One day when I was going home, she put into my hand a little pill-box, which she thought would be useful on the journey in case I felt ill. When I opened it, to my surprise I found it full of—threepenny pieces! I must now conclude.—Yours truly,

WILFRID NEWCOMB.
(Age 12 years.)

DEAR SIR,—I am writing about the kindest old lady I know. She often comes to see us and brings buns and sweets for us children in a little dark purple bag which she always carries to church with her. She always invites us to spend our holidays with her, and a jolly time we have of it. Every Christmas she sends us hampers of good things and some spiffing mince tarts and toys, and never forgets anyone, even to the baby, who is only a mite yet. She is very fond of visiting sick people, and often reads to me and brings me fruit when I am ill. But she is always so afraid of giving us trouble that she never stays very long. I must now stop.

Believe me, sincerely yours,
ANONYMOUS.
(Age 15 years.)

Elmwood, Moffat, Scotland.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—This is the first time I have entered for any of the competitions in THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE, although I always take a great interest in them and enjoy reading the letters sent in. I think the kindest old person I know is one who lives in this town. She is a dear old lady in her 99th year, so has lived during the reigns of five sovereigns. Although so old in years she is still quite young in manners. She takes a great interest in all young folks and can fully enter into the spirit of their fun. Her memory is excellent considering her age, and in fine weather she is still able to walk or drive about. She is not very wealthy, but is ever willing to give to those in worse circumstances than herself. When people call upon her she is never satisfied unless they go away laden with gifts either for themselves or those at home. At Christmas, especially, she gives away a large quantity of presents to rich and poor alike. In some ways, however, she is rather eccentric. Some years ago she had her tombstone erected with a full inscription upon it, only omitting her age and the date of her death.

With much love, and hoping that I am not too old to enter for the competition, believe me ever your interested reader,

ANNA S. MILLER.
(Age 15 years.)

This has been judged the best, and to the writer, accordingly, a handsome volume has been sent.

The next Competition will be on :—

"HOW I FILL UP MY SPARE TIME."

Everybody has some spare time and some favourite way of using it. Tell me what you like to take up in these moments, and why it is so pleasing to you. Write on one side of the paper only, with name, address and age (under 16), and send it not later than the 20th of this month (earlier the better), to Rev. J. Reid Howatt, the Crescent, Camberwell-grove, Denmark-hill, London, S.E., and I shall give a beautiful book-prize for the best paper.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

READERS should place their orders early for the Special Christmas Number of the "Temple"; full of splendid stories and articles by the best writers, profusely illustrated.

Among the contributors are GEO. MANVILLE FENN, JOHN STRANGE WINTER, MARY ANGELA DICKENS, FIONA MACLEOD, LUCIE HEATON ARMSTRONG, DR. PARKER, etc.

There will be articles on Dickens's London, the Countess of Meath and the Ministering Children's League, the Rev. F. B. Meyer, Christmas Amusements, "What Christmas Means to the World," by Dr. Parker, and many other interesting features. See advertisement on page vi.

VOLUME V. of "THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE" now ready. See advertisement on page viii.

Digitized by Google

Medland Hall,

"A HOME for LOST & STARVING MEN."

The only Free Shelter in London open all the year round.

2,400 Free Beds provided EVERY WEEK.

Last Year's admissions for the night	148,820
Additional supplied with food ..	14,494
Number of different men helped in 1900	12,896
At Sunday Evening Services	29,324

Average cost—less than 1½d. per man per night.
Over 400 men have been settled in Canada.

A Gift of Two Guineas endows a Bed for Twelve Months.

*

Contributions welcomed by Rev. A. Mearns or Mr. E. Wilson Gates (Superintendent of the work) at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C.

The Children's Home = and Orphanage,

Chief Office—

BONNER ROAD, LONDON, N.E.

Branches—LONDON, LANCASHIRE, BIRMINGHAM, CANADA, etc.

Principal—Rev. Arthur E. GREGORY, D.D.

Vice-Principal—Rev. R. Bevan SHEPHERD, M.A.

*

1,200 children in residence.

5,000 rescued.

£60 PER DAY NEEDED FOR SUPPORT OF THE HOME.

Many are crippled, epileptic, infirm.

No Election by Subscribers.

NEED not CREED is considered in receiving cases.

*

Contributions should be sent to Rev. Arthur E. Gregory, The Children's Home, Bonner Rd., N.E.

Cheques crossed London, City and Midland.

Royal Hospital for Incurables,

PUTNEY HEATH.

Patron :

HIS MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII.

President :

The Most Honorable the Marquess of Northampton.

Treasurer :

Herbert John Allcroft, Esq., F.R.G.S.

This Institution maintains 220 Inmates and 663 Pensioners for Life at a cost of £32,000 yearly, of which only £3,500 are guaranteed. Funds are urgently required to meet present liabilities, and New Subscriptions and Donations will be thankfully received.

W. DAVID NEWTON, Secretary.

Office: 106, Queen Victoria-street, E.C.

URGENT.

To complete the Good Samaritan Work of the

'Liberator' Relief Fund.

After eight years' earnest pleading, a further £10,000, or 200,000 shillings, still urgently needed to give relief to hundreds of aged, destitute, and afflicted victims of the great "Liberator" fraud, who were taught and trained in habits of temperance and thrift by their trusted leaders, only to find themselves suddenly robbed of their life-savings, and driven to face the dreaded workhouse, in spite of all their praiseworthy endeavours to make some provision for their old age.

Ninety per cent. of these sufferers are members of some section of the Christian Church.

"Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

There are 3,014 cases on the Books of the Fund, of whom—

1,548 are Widows or Spinsters. 1,486 are over 60 years of age. 824 are over 70 years of age. 223 are over 80 years of age. Over 400 deaths through the disaster.

The Bitter Cry For Help

Is still coming to the Committee from sufferers who have bravely borne with their difficulties, till sickness or great destitution has compelled them to apply.

Cheques and P.O.'s should be made payable to the "Liberator" Relief Fund, crossed "The London City and Midland Bank," and sent to the Secretary—

REV. J. STOCKWELL WATTS,
16, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Needham's Paste

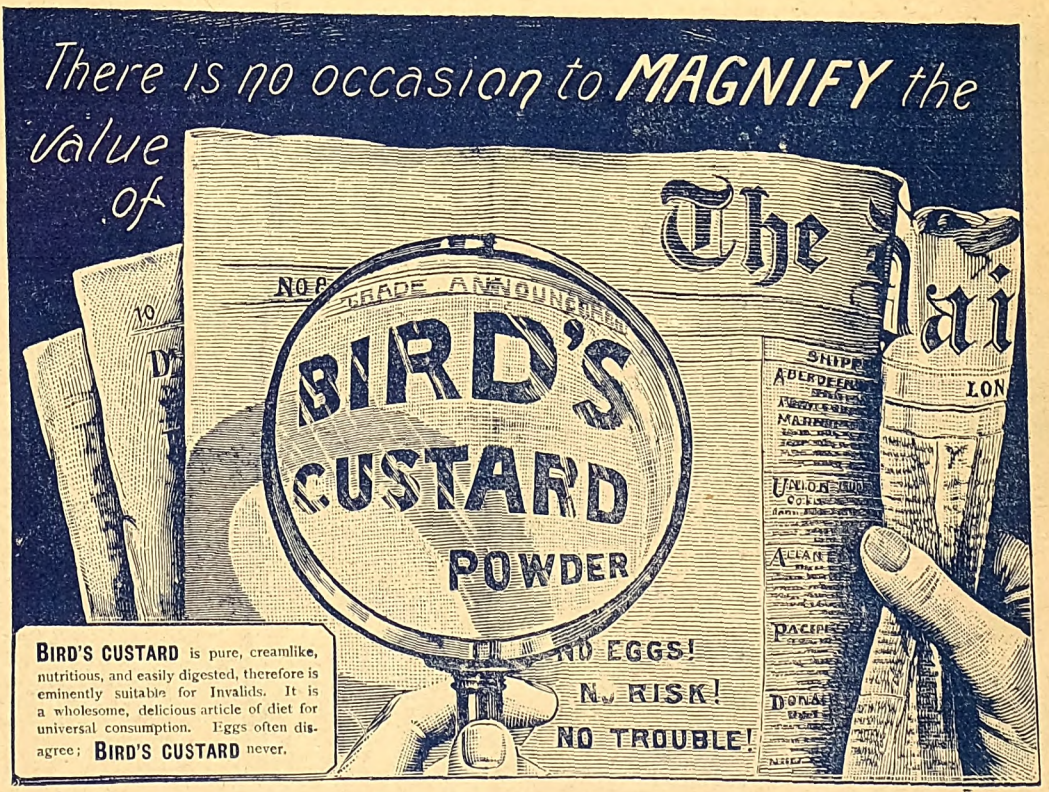
METAL POLISHING

FREE FROM GREASE ACID AND GRIT.

Over 75 years reputation as the best and most economical preparation for producing a perfect polish on Brass, Copper, Tin, Britannia-Metal, &c.&c.

Sole Manufacturers: JOSEPH PICKERING & SONS, SHEFFIELD.

SCRIVEN.



BIRD'S CUSTARD is pure, creamlike, nutritious, and easily digested, therefore is eminently suitable for Invalids. It is a wholesome, delicious article of diet for universal consumption. Eggs often disagree; BIRD'S CUSTARD never.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS,
AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Digitized by Google

VOL. 6.—DECEMBER, 1901.—No. 3.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

Christmas Number.

The Slipping of the Christmas Log.
By George Manville Fenn.

What Christmas Means to the World.
By the Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D.

The Ministering Children's League.
By the Countess of Meath.

Girl's Love and a Woman's Heart.
By John Strange Winter.

The Romance of the Christmas Card.
By Arthur Welby.

A Drama in the Snow.
By Fiona Macleod.

Etc., Etc.

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.
"The Standard of Highest Purity."
—The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

INVALUABLE FOR NURSING MOTHERS.

A Delicious and Wholesome Tonic—Refreshing, Invigorating, and Sustaining.

EASILY DIGESTED BY THE MOST DELICATE.

Brewed by Messrs. BEAMISH & CRAWFORD, Ltd., Cork, from the Finest Malt and Hops, and Guaranteed by them to be ABSOLUTELY PURE.

An EMINENT DOCTOR says:—

"I can strongly recommend BEAMISH'S STOUT. I have prescribed it for many of my patients with excellent results."

LABORATORY, 24, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.
March 4th, 1901.

A careful analysis has been made of this sample of Beamish's Stout, as a result of which I am able to state that it is an excellent one. It is good in flavour, high in extractive matters, rich in albuminoids, yet contains only a very moderate amount of alcohol, and is very low in acidity. Although I understand the sample which I have received has been in bottle for two years, no active fermentation is taking place.

LAWRENCE BRIANT, F.C.S., F.R.M.S.

Agents Wanted Everywhere.

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

This is the only Stout which will not introduce into the system unfermented yeast cells, and consequently it can be taken by the most delicate without fear of indigestion.

Delivered carriage free to any address in the United Kingdom in Cases containing 3 dozen reputed pints, Price 18/- per case.

Wholesale Agents to whom all communications should be addressed—

GENDALL & CO., 34, Norfolk St., Strand, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 11 12 1901

Digitized by Google

"NEGO" FIRELIGHTERS

Are a scientifically prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. ONE OF THESE FIRELIGHTERS IS QUITE SUFFICIENT TO BOIL A KETTLE IN A FEW MINUTES.

Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d.; or twenty packets will be sent post free on receipt of 5s. P.O.

A Sample "NEGO" Firelighter will be sent post free on application.

Sole Wholesale Agents for the United Kingdom CENDALL & CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, W.C.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

AMERICA'S PERFECTION in Ladies Boots and Shoes is named

SOROSIS

TRADE MARK REGISTERED

In every size that can be desired, and every style that fashion requires or experience can devise.

ONLY AND ALWAYS AT ONE PRICE. 15/-

Mothers already wearing "SOROSIS" and know of their comfort and durability will be glad to learn that our assortment of Boots and Shoes for children's wear are just as complete in styles and widths as our Ladies' Stock. They are built on Hygienic principles for preserving the natural shape of the foot.

Children's Boots, In sizes from 8 to 10½. 10/6

Misses Boots and Shoes, In sizes 11 to 2. 12/6

SOROSIS SHOE Co., Regent House, Regent St., LONDON, W.

(Few doors below Oxford Circus.)

Please send for Art Catalogue, Vol. I., post free on application.

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

FASHIONABLE FURS.

For best, smart and expensive wear ermine fur will this winter lead the way. It is so dainty and so pretty, and, to a really good complexion, so very becoming; while if big revers, a large high-standing collar, and a good-sized flat muff are arranged en suite, these etceteras will "make" the toilet, and guarantee a success to its wearer. Collarettes, tippets and victorines will be worn during the autumn, independently of coats and mantles; and here, for economical wear, one may strongly recommend skunk fur as hard-wearing, becoming, and distinctly more dressy in appearance than many of the imitations of better furs which one sees used far too frequently. Astrachan, caracul and Persian paw furs also make smart and up-to-date collarettes and muffs. These are also wonderfully wear-resisting furs, so that, although the initial outlay may be a little more than the afore-mentioned skunk, still the results are well worth the extra outlay. Chinchilla may be adopted by those who can afford a second set of less delicate furs; but chinchilla soon loses its silvery effect, and turns a trying and unsatisfactory yellow.

THE DUKE AND THE OLD LADY.

The following paragraph is taken from a private letter received from a Canadian correspondent. The writer, we are told, is the daughter of a well-known public man, and the little incident may be accepted as perfectly true: "There was a big dinner at Government House in the evening, and as there was no time for presentations (the reception was held afterwards at the Government buildings) an old lady sat next to the Duke and never knew it. She told him that she really did not know how to address Royalty, and that she was timid. So the Duke said: 'But you are not frightened of me?' She replied: 'Oh, no, you are such a nice man,' and went on to ask him whether he was married, and if he had any children; and on being told of his family, she said: 'You are too young for that.' The Duke tried to enlighten her, and she even said he reminded her of pictures of the Royal family, to which he replied: 'I am the Queen's grandson,' and yet she did not grasp the fact. Afterwards the hostess came up to the old lady and said everyone was so pleased to see how well she had got on with the Duke. 'But I have not even seen him,' said she. You may imagine her horror on learning what she had done. The Duchess was much amused, and said she would tease her husband about being too young to be married."

Digitized by Google

HOVIS BREAD.

TRADE MARK

"As good as it is nice, and nicer than any other."

Agents' Addresses will be sent on application.
HOVIS LTD., MACCLESFIELD.

By Royal Appointment.
THOMAS TURNER & CO. MAKE THEIR OWN STEEL.

ENCORE RAZOR

SEND FOR FREE LIST OF CASES

Hand Forged. Extra Hollow Ground. Carefully Set. Guaranteed Perfect. See "Encore" on Shank.

IVORY ... 6s. 6d. | BLACK ... 4. 6d.

Send for Free List of Cases. From all Dealers, or write direct to Makers, T. TURNER & CO., Suffolk Works, Sheffield, who will supply through nearest Agent. Ask for "Encore" Pocket and Table Cutlery.

TO ASTHMA SUFFERERS

INSTANT RELIEF is gained in all cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, CROUP, and WHOOPING COUGH by the use of

POTTER'S DATURA ASTHMA CURE

Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists, in Tins at 1s. each Free Sample sent on receipt of Post Card to POTTER AND CLARKE, Artillery Lane, London, E.

TO ADVERTISERS.

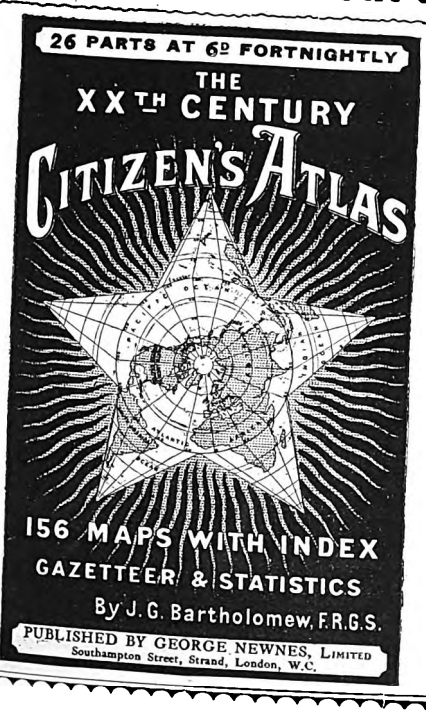
All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

Messrs. H. DAWSON & Co.,
34, NORFOLK ST., STRAND. LONDON, W.C.

No one can afford to be without a Good Atlas!

Merchants.
*
Statesmen.
*
Business Men.
*
Travellers.
*
THEY ALL WANT ONE!
*

Everyone should see for themselves a specimen of the XXth Century Citizen's Atlas at their Bookseller's or Newsagent's.



Students.
*
Thinkers.
*
Newspaper Readers.
*
Politicians.
*
THEY ALL WANT ONE!
*

Everyone should see for themselves a specimen of the XXth Century Citizen's Atlas at their Bookseller's or Newsagent's.

Digitized by Google

READ OUR STARTLING OFFER!

A Complete Outfit of Genuine Sheffield Cutlery.

41 PIECES FOR 27/6

INCLUDING A HANDSOME SET OF CARVERS AND STEEL.

WELL WORTH DOUBLE.

SEND ONLY 5/-

CUTLERY

7 DAYS' FREE TRIAL.

Nothing can be fairer than this offer. We will send you one of our Famous Sheffield Parcels on receipt of 5/-, and your promise to complete purchase in three monthly payments of 5/- each and one of 7/6. Cash with order 26/- Money returned at once if parcel does not give entire satisfaction.

CONTENTS OF OUR SHEFFIELD PARCEL:

1 Real Stag-Handled Carving Knife.
1 ,, ,, ,, ,, Fork.
1 ,, ,, ,, Steel.

Note.—The Carvers and Steel alone worth 15/-

6 Best White Handled Table Knives.
6 ,, ,, ,, Dessert ,,
6 Pure Nickel Silver Table Forks.
6 ,, ,, Dessert ,,
6 ,, ,, ,, Tea Spoons.
2 ,, ,, ,, Table ,,

The blades are Genuine Sheffield Steel, and of fine temper and finish. The Handles are specially selected and fitted. The Spoons and Forks are of Pure Nickel Silver, highest quality (and not brass or white metal), and warranted to wear as white as Sterling Silver throughout.

BE SURE TO READ THIS.

We are daily receiving hundreds of unsolicited testimonials from all parts of the United Kingdom, and we are proud to be in a position to say that we have not had to return a single customer's money through our parcels not giving satisfaction. This fact alone proves the value of our Parcels.

All classes of Cutlery on the Easy Payment System. Write for Catalogues and Book of Unsolicited Testimonials.

BUY DIRECT FROM WAREHOUSE AND SAVE MIDDLE PROFITS.

BURNAND BOOTH & CO. Ltd.,

Westminster Works, SHEFFIELD.

Digitized by Google

A Christmas Problem Solved

You want to give a ——
. . PRESENT CERTAIN TO PLEASE.

THEN BUY

Volume V. OF THE Temple Magazine

NOW READY.

(HANDSOMELY BOUND IN RED AND GREEN CLOTH.)

TWELVE MONTHS' READING for 7s. 6d.

The most interesting and varied Magazine published.

Over Eleven Hundred Pages and not a dull one.

The Volume Contains—

TWO SPLENDID SERIAL STORIES

By DORA LANGLOIS and Mrs. BAGOT HARTE.

Scores of Short Stories and Special Articles.

Illustrated by some 700 Beautiful Pictures.

OUR CONTRIBUTORS INCLUDE Dr. Joseph Parker, Ian Maclaren, Rev. Silas K. Hocking, George Manville Fenn, Joseph Hatton, Adeline Sergeant, Mary E. Wilkins, Clive Holland, J. A. Hammerton, Leonard Graham, Lady Violet Greville, late Rev. H. R. Haweis, Lady Henry Somerset, Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, Rev. E. J. Hardy, Thekla Bowser, Rev. Joseph Hocking, Mrs. Hirst Alexander, Mary Angela Dickens, Hugh W. Strong, and many other well-known writers.

Of all booksellers or the Publishers, Messrs. HORACE MARSHALL & SONS, Temple House, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

Price 7/6. ✻ Price 7/6.

Digitized by Google

WORRY KILLS SUCCESS.

Perhaps there is nothing else so utterly foolish and unprofitable as a habit of worrying. It saps the nervous energy and robs us of the strength and vitality necessary for the real work of life. It makes existence a burden and weariness, instead of a perpetual joy and blessing, as it should be. Poise and serenity are necessary to the complete development of character and true success. The man who worries is never self-centred, never perfectly balanced, never at his best; for every moment of mental anxiety takes away vitality and push, and robs him of manhood and power. Worrying indicates a lack of confidence in our strength; it shows that we are unbalanced, that we do not lay hold of the universal energy which leaves no doubt, no uncertainty. The man who does not worry, who believes in himself, touches the wires of infinite power. Never doubting, never hesitating, he is constantly reinforced from the God that creates planets and suns. Enough vital energy has been wasted in useless worry to run all the affairs of the world.

MAN'S LIKENESS TO MAN.

While it is true that no two persons are alike, it is also true that no two are wholly different. The bond of likeness of man to man is greater than the separateness of unlikeness—for man is made in the image of God. No one has a right to consider himself entirely incapable of forms of evil to which others have fallen a prey. If he has not yet fallen into them, so much the greater his need of gratitude. But he is like those who have so erred in that he is not out of danger. Neither is there any height of spiritual attainment reached by his fellows of which he ought to consider himself incapable. In liabilities and possibilities men are much alike, even though in the end they have differed in degree. It is more essential for the mutual assistance of each to each that men should think more of that which unites them as one in kind, than of that which separates them as diverse either in kind or in degree.

Where there are confusions, and griefs, and fears, and unattained pursuits, and avoidance in vain, and envy and rivalry, can the way of happiness lie there?

Buyers and Sellers.

Our business is to introduce buyers to sellers.

We have been engaged in doing this successfully for many years. Our friends admit that the results of our efforts on their behalf have been a large accession of buyers for their goods. They say, in short, that they are better off to-day than they were when first they made our acquaintance.

We should like you to be in their position. If you have an article of merit that people want, we should be glad to discuss with you our system of creating a demand for it by means of advertising, &c. It saves our clients' time, worry, and money.

The advertiser has a greater opportunity of selling his goods than a non-advertiser.

H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The Gregorian is distinctive in the exquisite quality of its tone.

Gregorian Church and Chapel Organs

It is indorsed by leading organists, and meets the demand of critical musicians at moderate expense.

Prices, 70 to 600 Guineas.

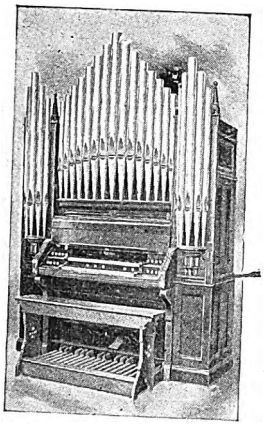
The Gregorian's rapidly increasing popularity for Church and Chapel use is ample reason why it should be investigated by all Churches contemplating the purchase of an organ.

Its method of tone-production is radically different from all others.

Catalogue A2, giving full description, will be mailed on request.

DISTINCTIVE FEATURES.

QUALITY and POWER of tone, Variety of registration, and Price.



STYLE 22.

"These instruments will be extremely desirable for churches and halls. It is a new and original idea, for your have modified the tones of the reeds in such a way as to reproduce perfectly the tones of the pipe-organ, especially diapason and clarabella tones."—ALEXANDRE GUILMANT, Organist and Composer, Paris.

"The voicing of your instrument is noteworthy; each stop has its characteristic quality—the flute is really flute-like, and the clarinet preserves the peculiar wooden character of the original. Most remarkable is the close approach of sound to the pipe-organs, many of these not being its equal in quality and tone. Last, but not least, the light, quick action and never-varying accuracy of intonation deserve special mention."—WALTER J. DAMROSCH.

THE ORCHESTRELLE COMPANY,
225 Regent St., London, W.

Have you tried Osman Turkish Towels?

HIGHEST AWARD: "Grand Prix," Paris Exhibition, 1900, Two other Medals, and 15 Awards.

HIGHEST QUALITY!
PRICE MODERATE!!
WEAR GUARANTEED!!!

The "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWELS are made in small sizes for Face Towels and in larger sizes for the Bath-room, with knotted fringe or hem-stitched ends. Once you have used "OSMAN" Towels you will buy no others. The wear is guaranteed by the manufacturers.

BARLOW AND JONES, LIMITED,
MANCHESTER.

SOLD BY ALL THE PRINCIPAL DRAPERS AND HOUSE FURNISHERS THROUGHOUT THE EMPIRE.

Digitized by Google

CLOTH COAT.

The sketch shows a tight-fitting cloth coat, which may match the skirt or be in black, dark grey or dark blue cloth. A sort of dull bottle-green is also in favour, and nearly every shade of red is worn in coats this season. This shape, with the basque added on, is more easily fitted to the figure than those in which the cloth is in one piece from neck to hem. The double-breasted shape makes it very protective, and the way in which the fur is put on is much safer than that which carries it up into the throat. The hat has patterns of string-coloured lace laid round the velvet brim, and a tuft of dull gold leaves resting on the hair at the left side.

Peonies are to be the flower of next year. As a decorative flower, indeed, none other compares with it. The old-fashioned magenta peony was not seductive in colour, but now you can have the flower in colours delicate as a wild rose—pink, white, mauve, purple, white with purple spots—what you will.

THE FASHIONABLE FAN.

The newest fan is a revival of the old-time Watteau model, and is very small. The designs painted on satin, silk, gauze and lace are the most expensive, but those even on the cheaper fans are often exquisite. The fan has the scene with the figures and flower gardens, green trees and tinted skies painted on its face, and the clouds, trees and greensward reproduced on the back, only omitting the figure and flower beds. Then there is another model—a tiny Watteau medallion set in the midst of most exquisite sprays of mignonette, clusters of violets, with here and there a daintily coloured butterfly or a bespangled bird. An Empire fan in one of the shops was of black, red, white, or dark green gauze, with lace figures and designs over it, outlined with tiny spangles which caught the reflection of the lights and threw out iridescent rays as the fan was waved to and fro. Most costly of all are the weblike affairs of Honiton with a plain medallion in the centre, upon which is exquisitely painted a Watteau scene.

A DUCHESS'S WARDROBE.

Auction sales bring to light queer things. The sale in London of the effects of a Duchess, but recently deceased, showed that distinguished lady to have been a person of much eccentricity in the matter of her wardrobe. Among 1,600 lots offered for sale were 500 lace and other handkerchiefs, 2,000 pairs of gloves, 500 Indian and other shawls, 600 pairs of silk stockings, and dresses of all sorts and descriptions of forty years' fashion. This was all the more strange for the reason that the owner of these things had for thirty years before her death led the life of a reculse, shutting herself up in her house and yet always ordering regularly from her milliner at each change of season the dresses she would have worn if she had been mingling in society. Every three months she was dressed in Court costume, as if going to a regular reception, and would walk in it up and down her own rooms.

A statistician has made a study of the records of shoplifting in this country. Women of the middle and upper classes are, he states, the chief offenders, although it is difficult to credit such a statement. Kleptomania is not always the reason for these thefts, because the shoplifters often hunt in couples, one engaging the attention of the attendant while the other does the thieving. For every man caught at the work there are 300 women.

Digitized by Google

ORDER AT ONCE. PRICE FOURPENCE.

CHRISTMAS NUMBER
. . OF . .

Myra's Journal.

In Addition to the Usual Fashion Contents will be Presented:

A PHOTOGRAVURE PLATE, WORTH 1S. 6D.

"HER HEART SAID YES!"

The Prettiest Christmas Plate issued this Year.

Handsomely Executed In

REMBRANDT PHOTOGRAVURE,

Size, 16½ by 12 Inches.

Two Cut-Out Patterns.

200 PRIZES Of a Valuable and Useful Character.

NUMEROUS CHRISTMAS ATTRACTIONS.

The whole enclosed in Handsome Coloured Cover.

CHRISTMAS FASHIONS, CHRISTMAS PICTURES, CHRISTMAS LITERATURE.

PRICE FOURPENCE, POSTAGE, 2½D. EXTRA.

The Cheapest Christmas Number.

BEETON & Co., Ltd., 10 and 11, Fetter Lane, E.C.

Hall's Wine

THE MARVELLOUS RESTORATIVE.

AFTER TYPHOID, INFLUENZA, SCARLET FEVER,

or any illness, where your patient is exhausted and wasted, a few glasses of HALL'S WINE will be sufficient to effect that change which will bring back health and strength.

ONE TRIAL IS ALL WE ASK.

You will be well satisfied with the result.

IT CURES—

Neuralgia, Sleeplessness, Anæmia, Nervous Debility, and Physical Breakdown.

A Member of the Royal College of Physicians writes:

"Gentlemen,—I feel it my duty to let you know how satisfactory Hall's Wine has proved in the many cases in which I have used it.

"Recently I had extensive experience of its value in the convalescent stage of Typhoid Fever. I have prescribed it in Influenza, Phthisis, Neurasthenia, etc., and always with benefit. I shall have pleasure in prescribing it when suitable."

Sold by Licensed Grocers, Chemists, and Wine Merchants.

3s. and 1s. 9d. per bottle.

The Smith Premier Typewriter is a Revelation of the possibilities of Typewriter Mechanism

The Embodiment of Strength & Simplicity

GRAND PRIX PARIS 1900

Art Catalogue Free

The Smith Premier Typewriter Co.
14 Gracechurch St.
London E.C.

Digitized by Google

EVENING GOWN.

Evening gowns are being much flounced and frilled—oftentimes the said frills being edged with baby velvet or satin ribbon. Young girls may wear such frocks frilled from waist to foot hem, but the matron will frill only the lower half of her skirt, the upper part being "polonaised" with a closely fitting overpiece either of the same or some richer material. Elbow sleeves for evening wear are, undoubtedly, catching on; while bodices are, if anything, rather less pouched than they were. This is but a slight indication of change, but doubtless it is only a question of time ere we return to the tight Court bodices of former years. There are many figures whom this syle suits admirably, but we may happily hit upon a medium of both styles that shall prove as entrancing as the falling Empire fashions to which we are just now pinning our affections.

There never was a day that did not bring its own opportunity for doing that which never could have been done before, and never can be again.

NOVEL OCCUPATIONS FOR WOMEN.

It is almost easier nowadays to say what work women do not do than what they do. St. Neots has in Miss Kate Sibley one of the first lady rate-collectors in Great Britain; Whaplode, near Spalding, in Mrs. Bourne one of the most energetic truant hunters in the kingdom. A few years ago the district councillors of Glyncerrwg appointed Mrs. Evans James Jones as the first lady lamplighter of the United Kingdom, from which it will be gauged that woman's sphere of usefulness has greatly increased during the last few years. If this country cannot emulate Nova Scotia, one of whose daughters has started as a rat-catcher, it can at all events claim the first lady book-maker. The lady in question, until she died a year or two ago, carried on her business in Birmingham, where she had a very numerous clientèle. Miss Fanny Shannon, of Mount Carmel, Illinois, is said to be the first lady traveller engaged in the timber trade, but her example has not been followed by her sisters in this country, who can, however, point with pride to the fact that the first lady "cabby" set up in business at Bembridge, Isle of Wight. Quite recently an American woman has set up in the same business, which appears to bring in a good return.

Gresham's School

HOLT, NORFOLK.

Founded 1555.

Headmaster—G. W. S. HOWSON, M.A.

(late of UPPINGHAM SCHOOL.)

Three miles from the sea and close to Sheringham and Cromer. Splendid Climate. The soil is gravel on chalk. Entirely new drainage.

GOVERNOR:

The Fishmongers' Company and County and Local Representatives.

Classrooms, Laboratories, and Workshops are in course of erection, at an estimated expenditure of £40,000.

Highest Inclusive Fees, £57 per Annum.

Science and Modern Languages taught throughout the School.

Yearly leaving Exhibitions of £60 per annum for three years.

For further particulars address the Headmaster.

Digitized by Google

27

YEARS' SUCCESS

AS THE

UNIVERSAL REMEDY

FOR

Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, Influenza, Whooping-Cough, Hoarseness, &c.,

HAS MADE

Owbridge's Lung Tonic

AN ABSOLUTE NECESSITY TO EVERYBODY

Important Notice:

SUBSTITUTION.—There are so many imitations of this successful, and therefore popular, remedy that it is of the utmost importance you should use the word "OWBRIDGE" when buying Lung Tonic, and TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

Prepared by

W. T. OWBRIDGE, M.P.S., Chemist, Hull.

Sold everywhere

in bottles, at 1*s.* 1½*d.*, 2*s.* 9*d.*,

4*s.* 6*d.*, and 11*s.*

COPYRIGHT.

Digitized by Google

THE - - - HOME - - - BEAUTIFUL.

Furniture and Metal Work require constant attention, if the beauty of the Home is not to be sacrificed. The "GLOBE" METAL POLISH will effectively attend to the Metal Work in the house, as it imparts a lasting brilliance, which is unobtainable by any other means.

The "GLOBE" FURNITURE POLISH is equally effective in its own sphere of usefulness; applied in accordance with the directions which accompany each box, there is nothing so effective for cleaning and renovating furniture.

THESE POLISHES ARE OBTAINABLE AT ALL GROCERS, STORES, &c.

If there is any difficulty in obtaining them, write to us and we will see you are supplied.

RAIMES & CO., LTD.,

STOCKTON-ON-TEES, and BOW, LONDON, E.

Digitized by Google

2/6 Billiard Table Offer.

WE ask you to pay the balance in ELEVEN (not thirty) MONTHLY INSTALMENTS, which amount to a fraction above

THREE PENCE A DAY.

A Magnificent Billiard Table, full-size for any ordinary room, forwarded with all accessories, packed free of cost, carriage paid, for £5 18s. 6d. If you do not like the billiard table

IT WILL COST YOU NOTHING

because we shall promptly return your half-crown and there will be an end to the transaction. But as the same tables that we offer as an advertisement for "The Slate" are

LESS THAN HALF PRICE FOR INSTALMENTS, NEARLY 25 PER CENT. EXTRA DISCOUNT FOR CASH,

YOU WILL WANT ALL YOUR FRIENDS TO HAVE ONE.

ABBREVIATED SPECIFICATION.—Best Bangor slate bed, superfine West of England billiard cloth, frost-proof "Lightning" rubber cushions, real ivory balls, solid mahogany table, fully guaranteed to be mathematically constructed and tested. Made in every size, from miniature to full size, including 2 cues (tested), 3 ivory balls, spirit level, mahogany marking board, various chalks, cue tips, spots, wafers, &c , &c.

CAN BE INSPECTED AT "THE SLATE" OFFICES,
59 and 60, Chancery Lane, and 9 and 10, Southampton Buildings, London, W.C.

SPECIAL WARNING.

WHEN BUYING A BILLIARD TABLE insist upon it being forwarded, carriage paid, and Packed Free of Charge, as with "The Slate" Billiard Table, otherwise you may have to pay 30s. extra.

CUT OUT ONE OF THESE FORMS and post to the Manager, Billiard Department, "The Slate," 9 and 10, Southampton Buildings, Holborn, W.C.

I, the undersigned, herewith enclose crossed Postal Order 2s. 6d., and desire you to provisionally reserve for me one of your Billiard Tables. If I do not desire to complete the purchase, or your offer is withdrawn, or through any unforeseen circumstances you are unable to accept my order, the return of the half-crown cancels the agreement.

Please send the full particulars and illustrations per return post.

Name _____
(State whether Rev., Mr., Mrs., or Miss).

Address in full _____

T.M. Occupation _____ Date _____

INQUIRY FORM.

Please send me full particulars and Illustrated Pamphlet regarding your 2s. 6d. Billiard Table Offer.

Name _____
(State whether Rev., Mr., Mrs., or Miss).

Address in full _____

T.M Occupation _____ Date _____

Crossed P.O.s should be made payable and all letters addressed to THE MANAGER, "THE SLATE," 9 & 10, SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

WORLD - TRAVEL

Organised by

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., F.R.G.S.,
W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,
AND CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

CRUISE

on the Magnificent Ocean Yacht "ARGONAUT."

Tonnage 3,254, H.P. 4,000. Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

Sailing as follows to* THE MEDITERRANEAN:—

December 24th to January 17th, 1902.—From Marseilles to Palermo, Jaffa (for Jerusalem), Alexandria (for Cairo), Malta and back to Marseilles. A Twenty-five days' Cruise for £28 7s. and upwards. Return Ticket London-Marseilles included.

January 17th to February 10th.—From Marseilles to Palermo, Jaffa (for Jerusalem), Alexandria (for Cairo), Malta and back to Marseilles. A Twenty-four days' Crnise for £27 6s. and upwards. Return Ticket London-Marseilles included.

These Cruises are under the auspices of the Co-operative Cruising Co., Ltd.

£10 10s. and £13 13s. TOURS to ROME, vid the Mont Cenis Route. With Optional Extensions to Naples, Assisi, Perugia, Siena, Florence, Venice, and the Riviera.

£12 12s. TOURS to FLORENCE and VENICE.

£10 10s. Winter Skating and Tobogganing Parties to CHAMONIX and to GRINDELWALD.

A WORLD'S TOUR for 200 Guineas.

Full Particulars from the Secretary—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE WEALTH OF MALLERSTANG: An Upland Tale. By ALGERNON GISSING.

THE TRIUMPH OF HILARY BLACHLAND. By BERTRAM MITFORD, Author of "The Gun-runner."

DESPAIR'S LAST JOURNEY. By DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "Joseph's Coat."

THE PURPLE CLOUD. By M. P. SHIEL, Author of "The Yellow Danger," etc.

THE LOVER'S PROGRESS. Told by Himself, and "Dedicated to all who Love."

DUMB. By the HON. MRS. WALTER R. D. FORBES, Author of "Her Last Run."

A SOWER OF WHEAT. By HAROLD BINDLOSS, Author of "Ainslie's Ju-Ju."

THE CANKERWORM: Being Episodes of a Woman's Life. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

A FIGHT TO A FINISH. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "Joan the Curate," etc.

THE HOUSE ON THE SCAR: A Tale of South Devon. By BERTHA THOMAS.

THREE MEN OF MARK. By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "St. Mungo's City," etc.

JUDAH PYECROFT, PURITAN: A Romance. By HARRY LINDSAY. [Shortly.]

A STUMBLE BY THE WAY. By L. T. MEADE, Author of "The Voice of the Charmer," etc. [Shortly.]

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY BOOKS.

TALES OF A DYING RACE. By ALBERT A. GRACE.

A BLIND MARRIAGE, etc. By GEORGE R. SIMS (Dagonet).

THE JOY OF LIFE. By EMILE ZOLA. Edited by E. A. VIZETELLY.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR DECEMBER, 1901.

			PAGE
I.	A Christmas Morning Walk		Frontispiece
II.	What Christmas Means to the World	Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D.	189
III.	The Slipping of the Christmas Log. Story. Illustrated.	George Manville Fenn.	193
IV.	The Countess of Meath and the Ministering Children's League. Illustrated.	Leonard Graham	202
V.	Girl's Love and a Woman's Heart. Story. Illustrated.	John Strange Winter	208
VI.	A Drama in the Snow. Story	Fiona Macleod	215
VII.	Princesses of Wales. Illustrated.	Laura A. Smith	221
VIII.	The Romance of the Christmas Card. Illustrated.	Arthur Welby	228
IX.	The Tenant of Grove Cottage. Serial Story. Chapters XI.-XIV. Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Adam Lilburn	235
X.	Christmas Amusements in the Home.	Lucie Heaton Armstrong	249
XI.	The Uninvited Guest. Story. Illustrated.	Mary Angela Dickens.	253
XII.	A World-Wide Christian Alliance. An Interview with Mr. E. P. Field. Illustrated.	James Grant	261
XIII.	Known Through Failure. Poem.		265
XIV.	A Christmas Eve Dream. Story	Ethel Glynne	266
XV.	In the Public Eye. Illustrated.	The Onlooker	272
XVI.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	279

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

INSIST ON HAVING

PETER'S

THE ORIGINAL

MILK-CHOCOLATE

IMITATIONS LACK THE CHARM AND DELICACY OF PETER'S.

A SWEETMEAT AND A FOOD

Sold Everywhere in 1d., 2d., 3d., 6d. and 1s. Tablets; 6d. and 1s. Croquettes.

Sole Agents: S. J. MACKENZIE & CO., LTD., London.

No More Chapped or Rough Skin!

"BEETHAM'S" Regd Larola

will very soon remove all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, CHAPS, IRRITATION, &c., and render THE SKIN delicately SOFT, SMOOTH, and WHITE. Try a 6d. bottle. Its effect will delight you! Bottles, 6d., 1/-, 2/6, of all chemists.

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

A Magnificent Gift Book for Young People.

. . NEW EDITION OF . .

THE CHILD'S BIBLE.

Reset in clear, handsome type, and illustrated with including 12 in Colour, by W. H. MARGETSON, expressly prepared for this Edition.

100 FULL-PAGE PLATES,

COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME, Cloth Gilt, Gilt Edges, price 10s. 6d.

In The Child's Bible, such portions of Holy Scripture as seem best adapted to the wants and capacities of childhood are put into a consecutive form.

It presents to the young reader, in their order, all the leading points of the Old and New Testament narratives; and it gives these records in the words of the Authorised Version.

The former Edition of this Work attained a sale of more than 150,000 Copies, and has up to the present time continued in considerable demand. The Publishers, however, feel that in the case of a Work of such importance a New Edition, illustrated to meet the requirements of the present day, is called for; and that for an Edition illustrated in the best style of modern art, a sale corresponding to that of the original Edition may be anticipated.

The text of the previous Edition has been adhered to, as it is felt that no improvement can be made in the selection or arrangement; but it has been reset throughout in clear, handsome type.

The Twelve Coloured Plates that appear in the new Edition have been specially executed by Mr. W. H. MARGETSON. They are beautiful drawings of special interest to children, and have been reproduced in the best style of modern art colour-printing.

The 88 Full-page Illustrations have been prepared for this Edition from pictures by modern artists, great care having been taken in the selection of the subjects and the printing of the plates.

In addition to being published in one complete volume, this New Edition of THE CHILD'S BIBLE can also be obtained

IN MONTHLY PARTS, PRICE 6D. PART 1 NOW ON SALE.

CASSELL & COMPANY, Ltd., LONDON, and all Booksellers.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

What Christmas Means to the World.

By the Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D.

LET us, as far as possible, carry our minds back to the period immediately preceding the Birth of Christ. We cannot but be conscious that there is a sense of expectancy in the very air. Everyone is sure that something is about to happen that will have a powerful effect upon the conduct and destiny of mankind. A curious feeling is that which precedes a great change. The old course has worked itself out; a desire of change has sprung up in the mind; perhaps the desire is all the more pathetic that the heart cannot explain its urgency, or its dumb aspirations; some such feeling may take possession of the mind in the hour and article of death. Paul had a "desire to depart." What is the meaning of such desire? What is its range? How is it enlarged and strengthened by unknown spiritual ministries? These questions can only be answered by men who have passed through the gate which on one side is blacker than night, and on the other is brighter than all the glory of opening day.

Placing ourselves mentally amongst those who lived in the days of the Birth of Christ, we cannot but share the common expectation. What is going to happen? Who is coming? With what pomp and circumstance will He come? How will the old heavens be rolled together like a scroll? How will the old earth be covered with a new mantle of loveliness? Imagination has its answer ready, but the answer of imagination is always conjectural and speculative, and is often not only reversed but confounded by historical fact. It was pre-eminently so in the case of Jesus Christ. The world was to be changed by the birth of a Babe! Thus we may put it in a literal sense, forgetting the high significance of such a birth, meaning as it does spiritually that man is the gift of God, and that the moment the Babe enters the world the world itself is handed over to a new and perfect redemption.

In asking ourselves what Christmas means to the world we shall lose nothing by getting rid of certain accessories and superstitions which had nothing to do with the original intent and purpose of the Incarnation. Looking at the Incarnation as the Birth of the Man may be the best way of finding our way back and up to original and exhaustive meanings. Christmas now means to us Christ's Birthday. But why this ado about the birthday of a Child? Countless millions of children have been born into the world, thousands are born into it every hour; why should this Child have a pre-eminence so overshadowing in majesty and influence? Why should all other children be baptised in His Name? Why should He represent ideal and even celestial childhood? These questions are founded upon the commonest matters of fact. Whoever Jesus Christ was, His Name to-day is the most potent name in history. For two thousand years no name has had so deep an effect upon human thinking and upon the spread of civilisation. Is the splendour of Christ's majesty fading? Is the energy of Christ's influence declining? Who celebrates the birth of Moses or

Digitized by Google

Abraham, of Solomon or Paul? Yet for centuries Courts and Governments, wealth and poverty, destitution and orphanhood, have dated their letters from Bethlehem, and calculated the calendar from the sorrow of the Virgin.

There must be some meaning in all this, and thoughtful men are bound to inquire what that meaning is. John Milton says: "One day there will be a resurrection of great names." England has lately celebrated the millenary of Alfred the Great, and put up a visible memorial of his rulership and large-mindedness. The record is crowded with great names, and yet towering above all is the name of the Bethlehem Child, the Only Begotten of the Father! Not only is this the case as a matter of common fact, but the very greatest men in history take off their crowns, and with rapturous adoration cast them at the Feet of Mary's Child! What is the meaning of this? It is not superstition; it is not sentiment; it is not transient emotion; the temples, the ministers, the abbeys, the cathedrals, and the humblest conventicles, scattered over the face of the whole earth, are so many tributes to this supreme Child of the world.

Is not Christ the highest interpretation and expression of that greatest of mysteries, Personality? It is by personality that the world is governed. If we really look into the matter we shall find that it is the lawgiver, rather than the law itself, which rules our civilisation and directs our progress. So far as human laws are concerned Society may be personified as the lawgiver. No law can live that does not represent the current sentiment of the age. Judges tell us that they cannot administer any law which has become a dead letter; that is to say, any law that does not express the current and active sentiment of the time. Thus Society energises its own laws and gives them all the impressiveness and magnetism of living personality. This is one of the most interesting features in the study of Christianity. In quite the largest sense of the words Jesus Christ is still saying to His Church: "Lo, I am with you always even unto the end of the world."

Those who commune most deeply and continuously with Christ are most assured of His actual presence and personal influence. To them Christ is not set back as a dim figure in the fading centuries; He is the most active and dominating presence of the immediate moment. This is not to be explained in words or made clear to the common reason, but it is not the less a ruling fact in experience, and an inspiring consciousness in the whole development of life. There is more of Christ than in any other man—more of Him, more in Him, more done by Him, more, therefore, done for Him. The supremest motive still is: "The love of Christ constraineth us." We know Christ no longer after the flesh, but for that very reason we may know him more intimately by spiritual perception and appreciation. The Bethlehem Babe is now the Christ of the whole world. In His Name we pray, in His priesthood we confide, in His blessing we are rich, in His service we are blest. No merely book-Christ could have wrought the wonders which are daily accomplished by His realised Personality. He is near the soul, He is in the soul, He rules the soul, He thrills and sanctifies the soul. If we do not realise this happy experience we have not yet come into our full inheritance of grace and truth.

Every day the message of Christmas to the world is, that in Christ only do we realise all that is meant by spiritual completeness. "In Him dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." We are complete in Christ because in Christ all completeness is fulfilled. The believing soul never goes out of Christ for anything essential to growth, culture, inspiration, hope, and vital energy. We have all things in Christ. All things are Christ's; therefore, in having Christ we have all things, in having Christ we have God. Many illustrious teachers and leaders have been efficient and sufficient at various useful points, but Jesus Christ is equally strong along the whole line of His personality and kingship. Nature, as well as grace, culminates in the adorable Saviour. Science and philosophy find their completest expression in Jesus Christ.

The Apostle Paul did not scruple to find all things in Christ. The great expressions of the Pauline epistles cannot be properly construed without investing Christ with everything essential to completeness of life, and character, and service. "By Him were all things created that are in Heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by Him, and for Him. "To whom, therefore, can we go to make up the deficiencies of Christ? What other teacher, or leader, must be called in to make up that which is lacking in the Son of God? "Of Him, and through Him, and to Him are all things."

Digitized by Google

It is impossible to construe such words in a way which leaves the faintest trace of deficiency, or incompleteness, in the personality, or priesthood, of Jesus. "He is the Head of the Body, the Church: Who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things He might have the pre-eminence." "For it pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell." This is the view which the true Christian takes of the completeness of Jesus Christ. To the Christian Jesus is chiefest among ten thousand and altogether lovely. He believes that Jesus Christ upholds all things by the word of His power; and that He is the One Personality which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty. This fulness illustrates and confirms the essential doctrine of the ever-enduring Personality and Presence of Jesus Christ.

Christmas sets before us, as it were, pictorially, the very highest and sublimest conception of moral character. Human nature needs such exemplification. Christianity is a grand appeal to the senses, as well as to the spiritual understanding. We are to behold the Lamb of God, look upon Him, watch Him, take special note of the whole expression of His life. Jesus Christ Himself said: "I have given you an example." In the very largest meaning of the term He says to all men to-day: "Follow Me." He embodies His own beatitudes. If we want to know what human nature is at its best we must look at the Son of God. Although there are points at which He stands infinitely above the reach of our ability, although He is nothing less than God, manifest in the flesh, yet there are other points which are imitable, and which, indeed, we are called upon expressly to reproduce, in our own degree, in our personal character. "Learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly in heart." "If ye keep my commandments ye shall abide in My love; even as I have kept My Father's commandments, and abide in His love."

The message of Christmas is, Represent Christ. As He was, so are we to be in the world. Some would so learn Christ as to make a mere image of Him, a spectacle to be admired rather than to be copied with disciplinary sternness. "But ye have not so learnt Christ. If so be that ye have heard Him and have been taught by Him, as the truth is in Jesus; that ye put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and be renewed in the spirit of your mind." Such passages enable us to testify that Jesus Christ has had the most powerful and gracious effect upon human experience. Every Christian is a miracle of grace. "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature; old things are passed away, behold, all things are become new." Such miracles Jesus Christ is working to-day as certainly as He worked them when He was visible amongst us. "Our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin."

He does not make His followers better externally and mechanically, so as to present a good appearance to the world. His cleansing is internal, spiritual, complete. We are renewed in the spirit of our mind. A clean heart throbs within us, a right spirit inspires our ways. A great voice is continually sounding in our ears: "Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." Jesus Christ is reincarnated in the experience of all who truly love and follow Him. "Put on, therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering, forbearing one another, and forgiving one another. If any man have a quarrel against any, even as Christ forgave you so also do ye." These are not ancient virtues, out-worn moralities, temporary laws that have been superseded by higher legislation. These are to-day's virtues, to-day's crown of glory. "Be ye, therefore, followers of God, as dear children, and walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God, for a sweet-smelling savour." "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." What wonder if a Man Whose personality was so intense, and Whose character was so glorious, should continue to be the supreme mind of the civilised world? Jesus Christ is not a suppliant for His life. He does not beg us to continue to respect Him. He works so profoundly that all other workers are ashamed to compare their service with His, and He works so beneficently that the world cannot do without Him. No orchard bears fruit like His, no river is so full of water as the river of life; no smile is so benignant as the light of His countenance. The message of Christmas to the world is a message of goodwill, neighbourliness, brotherhood, fellowship, noble and sweet and helpful. The danger is that men should consider that the message of Christmas is merely ethical. For my own part I have a growing distrust of the word "ethical," because I see it is separated, in many instances, from the spiritual and priestly work which Jesus Christ came into the world to complete and establish. Men are trying to invent a morality. We are now too much governed by programme and schedule and experiment; we do not get back to the foundation truths of redemption by blood, and sanctification by the Holy Spirit. Believe me, the morality which is invented, or carved, or painted, is a very poor respectability, a calculation that works itself out, because it does not go back to eternal counsels and everlasting purposes. The only morality that can endure is the profoundly theological morality that draws its motive, its inspiration, and its sustenance from the Cross of Christ.

Digitized by Google

JOSEPH PARKER.

SET APART.

Her home, beside a country road,
With loving inward gaze I see—
The shaded, tranquil, fair abode,
Where dwells the friend who prays for me.

Hundreds of miles away, uplift
The roof-slants grey, in clear, sweet air;
And fragrant, wilding grasses drift
Around her door with violets fair.

Long years, the friendly, spotless rooms
Have heard her low-toned words above
The dropping of the rose's blooms
Since last I kissed the face I love.

Friend of my heart! and set apart
By illness from Life's restless ways;
Vestal whose pure refining art
Makes sacred all its common days.

Never by loving thoughts forsook—
A day of any passing year—
Across the limpid leagues we look
Into each other's eyes sincere.

Eliza Woodworth.

Digitized by Google

THE SLIPPING OF THE CHRISTMAS LOG.

By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

SLIP THE FIRST.

IT did seem strange that John Leslie and Frank Eldon, old school-fellows—cricketers in the same eleven, best men in the football team, sergeant and corporal in the local rifles, chums in the true sense of the word—should have become fierce enemies.

Why?

Who upset the bliss in the Garden of Eden?

Eve, of course, and though Beechcroft was not another Garden of Eden, being only the most populous and beautiful village in Hants, woman was there to set things at sixes and sevens—woman in the shape of as sweet, innocent, true-hearted and charming a girl as ever stepped.

It was not Nelly May's fault. Nature made her attractive and light-hearted, and gave her a silvery thrilling voice which when she sang in sweet forgetfulness of being heard, made young men's hearts throb, and on Sundays, when at the Rector's special request she sat with the village choir, brought tears into the eyes of the congregation, and did—the old clergyman declared with a smile—quite as much good as his sermons.

There was the cause of the feud. It was kept quiet and other reasons given, but young men had fought about her, and then dropped out of sight, giving it up as hopeless, everyone owning that either Jack Leslie or Frank Eldon would carry off the prize, while all the time Nelly May's choice was—to be let alone in her natural innocence and happiness, untouched, heart-whole, hardly conscious of the trouble she caused.

Then there came a day when Mrs. May gave a pleasant dancing party at the Manor Farm, and both the favourites for the matrimonial race were there, when twice over Frank Eldon was Nelly's partner, and Jack suffered from pique, thinking the handsome young farmer quite boorish in his neglect.

That night—or, to be correct, next morning—Jack went home half mad with jealousy, for Nelly had hardly spoken to him. Worse still, Frank had taken her in to supper, talked very impressively to her, and the jealous eyes had seen her limpid gaze turned to her companion, watched her smiles, and afterwards heard her merry laughter when the dancing was resumed and Frank was her partner again.

For the happy, light-hearted girl had thoroughly enjoyed the party, and slept afterwards the restful sleep of sweet eighteen without a care.

Frank Eldon went home too after the dance, feeling it very likely that his old companion would be on the look-out for him, and taking care that they should not meet.

The next afternoon Jack Leslie went up to the Manor to pay his call after the dance, found his opportunity of being alone with the sweet maiden he worshipped, and noted at once that she blushed vividly and looked scarlet.

"Proof of her guilt," said Jack's jealous brain—to wit, guilt of liking someone better than himself, after he had spent a year in trying with his eyes to make her see that she was the sole object of his worship.

Digitized by Google

Then—was there ever a very young and honest man, true as steel, who was clever at making love? Never.

Perhaps that is too strong. Jack Leslie was not. He was red-hot, too, with jealousy, and there was more anger than tender passion in his words, and in a very short time he had blundered into a rage, brought Frank Eldon's name into the business, and consequently roused the indignant colour to deepen the scarlet in Nelly's cheeks.

There was a good deal said, but afterwards, when Jack went away, all he could recollect of Nelly's indignant words were:

"How dare you speak to me like that! No, Mr. John Leslie, no!"

"And she looked so beautiful, too!" thought Jack, as he walked home. "Hang Frank Eldon! He'd better not come across me! Bah! I'm not going to waste in despair because—— Hang the song! I forget it. Then the game's up. I've lost, but I'm not going to cry for the moon that shines for someone else," and he went home to his mother, the sweet, gentle widow lady whose hushand fell in India, leaving her with a child unborn—Jack.

Mrs. May's party was just at the time when bad news kept on coming from the Cape. The Boers were running rampant in Natal, people at home looked gloomy, and the cry was spreading like a tocsin through the country:

"Volunteers for the front!"

A few days later and Jack Leslie was coming away from the London depôt, where he had been proving to his examiners that he was sound as a bell, well drilled, and a hunting man who could ride like a cowboy, when he suddenly stumbled on Frank Eldon—a sight which made his teeth clench and give him a peculiar spasm of the muscles which turn hands into fists.

Then a peculiar look came into both the young men's eyes, and simultaneously they gave vent to a growl.

"What are you doing here?"

"Been passing for the front," said Jack, bitterly. "Aren't you glad?"

"By George, yes! But I thought—— Here, I say, what does Nelly May say?"

"What!" growled Jack. "Leave her name alone, please. No; what does she say to you?"

"Here, I say!" gasped Frank. "I thought—Look here, you and Nelly——"

His words were checked by his companion.

"Nonsense! She as good as told me she was engaged to you."

"Then she's a miserable little jilt!" cried Frank passionately, and the two young men stood gazing at each other defiantly for a few moments before Jack's face softened.

"Let her be, lad," he said, sadly. "She's a woman, and very young. We've been making fools of ourselves about a frivolous child who doesn't know that a fellow has got a heart. So you're going off?"

"Yes. And you?"

"Yes, as soon as ever they'll ship me."

"But, Jack, old man, I've got no one to care a straw about me. What does the dear old mother say?"

"That it's hard to bear, old fellow, but that I am a soldier's boy, and that as the country calls for her sons to fight, she would not say a word save, 'God bless and bring you safely back.'"

"Amen to that, old man," cried Frank, heartily. "I say, what are you going to do to-day?"

"Loaf about. And you?"

"Ditto."

"Let's go and dine somewhere."

"Agreed."

"I say, going down to Beechcroft again?"

"Some day, perhaps. Are you?"

"No," said Jack, firmly and meaningly. "I don't want to upset the old mater again. We got the parting over sharp. I only want to hear the order—March!"

"Same here."

It came all too soon—to the young men who from that hour had renewed their old comradeship and were inseparable, marching down to the transport to the ringing of joybells and the strains of the bands, and echoing the cheer that followed them from the quay.

The news reached Beechcroft quickly enough, and that night Nelly May's pillow was wet with tears which did not cool her fevered cheeks, for since the day after the party at the Manor, brief as was the time, she had leaped from girl to womanhood, and thoroughly realised the fact that a strong, earnest man who tells a woman he loves her has a heart, and also that she possessed one of her own, which all through that weary night kept on beating, as the poet said, "funeral marches to the grave," till she shuddered and seemed to force it to change the tune to "Come back! Come back! Come back!" Once she repeated the words with her lips:

Digitized by Google

"Come back, Jack dear. I did not know it then, but I do love you. I always have loved you. Come back to me, Jack dear! Oh, come back!"

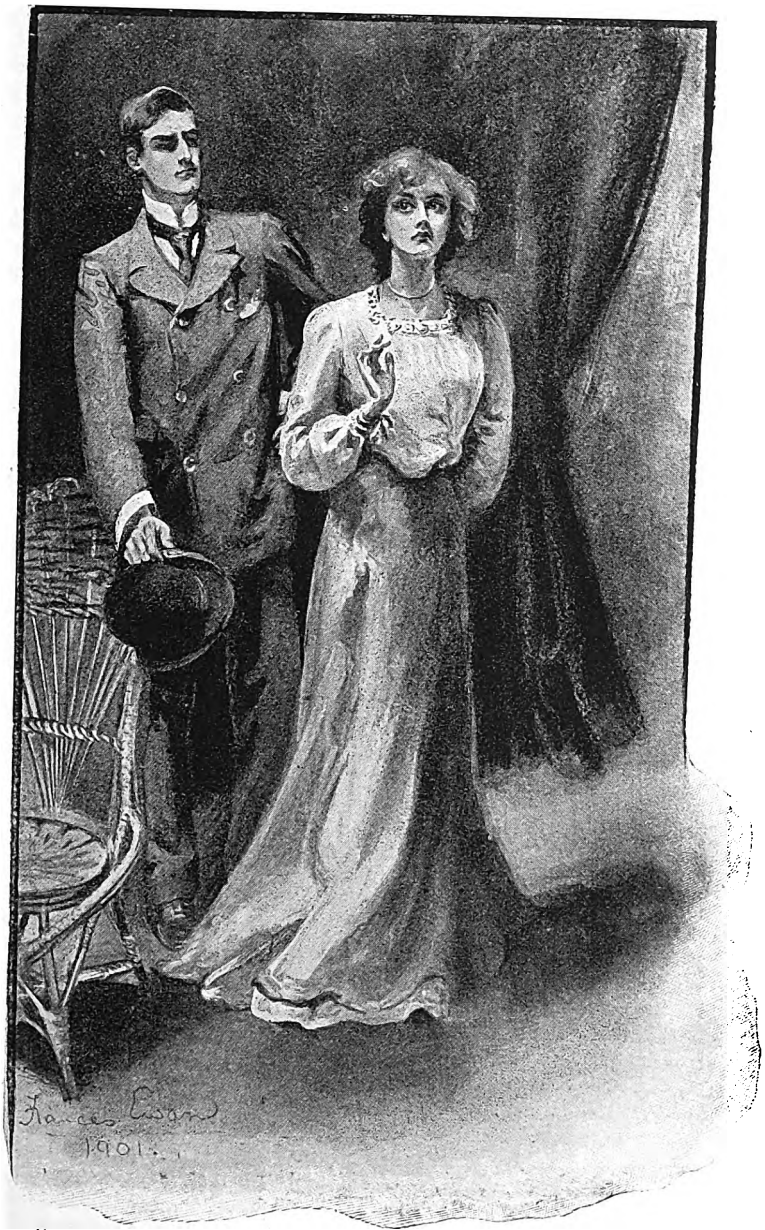
What time Jack Leslie with his comrade—rivals no more—felt the quivering of the great liner whose every portion throbbed as if it were some live thing responding to the efforts of the mighty twin screws inexorably forcing them on to where they were wanted—those two brave young sons of a great nation—to fight for country and for Queen.

SLIP THE SECOND.

The weeks glided on, and Beechcroft heard from time to time that those the Rector termed their young heroes were well to the front in engagement after engagement, and passing unscathed through two of the fiercest encounters, till in one list of casualties after the word "Killed," they read the name of Frank Eldon.

It was two months later that full particulars came to endorse the announcement in a letter from Jack Leslie to his mother, telling how he and Frank rode together with some fifty more right into an ambush. One minute they were cantering along talking about home, the next a perfect hail of bullets was decimating them from some low bushes hard by, and Frank threw up his hands and fell over sideways, right across the pommel of the writer's saddle.

"I managed to keep him there," wrote Jack, "till we were out of danger, but he was quite dead—a bullet through his brain."



"HOW DARE YOU SPEAK TO ME LIKE THAT! NO, MR. JOHN LESLIE, NO!"

Digitized by Google

Plenty of news followed, but no more for the cottage.

"My poor brave boy," Mrs. Leslie used to sigh. "He can have no chance to write. He would not forget me, and I must wait."

She waited—waited patiently, and suffering agony, but not alone, for a fair young face was rapidly growing pale, thin, and bearing the anxious looks of a woman as she thirsted feverishly for the news that did not come.

Nelly had shed a few tears when she heard of Frank Eldon's fate, for she had known him from a child; but in that sorrow there was none of the despair which attacked her and laid her prostrate with fever.

It was when the nation was smitten with something like despair at the news of Spion Kop, and in the first lists was the name of John Leslie as missing—later on as dead.

SLIP THE THIRD.

When she recovered Nelly's first walk was to the cottage, and at the first sight of the visitor the stricken widow gave vent to her sorrow, mingled with passionate reproaches against Heaven and the strangely changed girl before her.

What had she done, she cried, that first her husband and then her beloved only child should be taken from her like that?

"It was all your doing," she cried, fiercely. "False-hearted, thoughtless coquette! He would never have gone if you had not trifled with him and cast him off like a broken toy."

"No, no, no," cried Nelly, frantically, as she threw herself upon her knees and clutched at the speaker's dress. "I did not know. Mrs. Leslie—mother! Oh, listen to me. I loved him dearly all the time, but I was young and foolish then. I did not know—I did not know!"

"What, girl! You threw him over for Frank Eldon. My poor boy told me so."

"Poor Jack!" sobbed Nelly. "All a mistake. I never cared for Frank. How can you be so cruel to me when I come to you like this? I did not know till he had gone, but couldn't you see I loved poor Jack with all my heart? I'd have given the world to stop him when it was too late; but he wouldn't forgive my saying 'No.' And he never came to wish me good-bye."

"No. He told me he couldn't after seeing the way in which you returned Frank Eldon's looks."

"Oh, no, no, it was all a mistake. I quite hated Frank Eldon, for it seemed to me then that he was the cause of Jack going. I never cared for Frank a bit. It was all one dreadful, miserable mistake."

"Is this true, Nelly?"

"True!" cried the girl, wildly.

"My poor darling—my poor child!"

The widow held out her arms, and the next moment Nelly was sobbing upon her breast, the two women mingling their tears.

The following Sunday the Rector said a few words in his sermon about the loss the village had sustained in the second of their brave young heroes who had fallen fighting for Queen and country, for he had not noticed that the widowed mother was present and not alone.

Nelly had gone down to the cottage and walked with her to church, sharing her pew.

The words had hardly passed the speaker's lips when there was a wild cry of despair and a slight figure in deep mourning sprang to her feet.

At the same moment there was a piteous moan like the sighing echo of that cry, and Widow Leslie sank back and would have fallen but for Nelly's quick act.

The sight of the mother's pain had come as a reaction, and crushing back her own agony the poor girl bent quickly down to save the suffering mother, helped to recover her and assist her to leave the church, and supported her upon her way home.

SLIP THE FOURTH.

The weary war went on, with its terrible news of wounds, sickness and death, the news which floated over England like a black cloud, from which fell slowly the hot, bitter rain of tears. Ship after ship had departed with its freight of brave fellows who hid their sorrow under a mask and sent back cheer after cheer in answer to those which echoed and re-echoed from the crowd collected to give them a good send-off; the bands played merrily, and all that the pomp and circumstance of war could do to give éclat to the proceedings was there. But those who cheered, as well as those who cheered back, knew that the whole nation was in mourning, and of those who were played off as to a review many would never return, while more would be fated to join the sad procession of solemn transports bearing the sick, the wounded, and the mutilated who had gone out hale, but never to be the same men again.

Digitized by Google

Better news, though, had come from time to time to temper the terrible casualty lists, and our country had smiled through its tears as it read of towns relieved and the fierce defeats of the stubborn enemy. "Bravely, nobly done!" were the words on every lip, and cheeks flushed with pride as well as indignation as memories floated up about the depreciatory cry that our soldiers were not what they were in the past.

There was the hope, too, growing, sky-like after a terrible storm, brighter and bluer, for the end of the agonising months seemed to be in view as Christmas came round again; and people were thinking that some of the old festivities would not be out of place.

But there were mourning sufferers still. Several more of the Beechcroft people were still in black, and four of the brave lads who had gone off full of high spirits were back home, two terribly enfeebled by disease, the others suffering still from the effect of their wounds.

Mrs. Leslie sat alone in her chair by the fire, which burnt gloomily as if the crape about the widow's dress put it out of heart; but all at once it sent forth one cheerful flash. For the door opened, and, pale, and looking years older, Nelly May entered the room unannounced. She was always welcome now.

The fire had flashed up and glistened upon the bronze, green, scarlet and pearl of a little bunch of evergreen the girl had brought. But the flash died out again as if the sombre black of another dress was too depressing, and the fire burnt on as if half-quenched.

"You, Nelly dear? I did not think you would come to-day. I thought, being Christmas, you would stay at home."

"They have company," said the girl, with a weary sigh, "and I felt as if I could not bear it."

"But you must go back soon."

"No," said Nelly." "I told them I should spend the day with you."

She rose and crossed to the bunch of evergreens she had brought and softly untied the string, her pale face twitching and her wistful eyes becoming suffused with tears, as in a low, appealing voice she said, softly:

"I brought this—in memory—of—poor, dear—Jack."

A spasm of sobbing choked her utterance, and she dropped the bunch, which fell apart, rustling on to the floor, as its bearer flung herself upon Mrs. Leslie's breast, while the room seemed to grow darker.

"There, there," said the poor girl, disengaging herself and rising to hurriedly dry her eyes, "I came to-day to try and comfort you, and I am only making you unhappy. May I?" she said, with a saddened, deprecating smile. "Poor Jack would have liked to see a little Christmas if he had been here."

Mrs. Leslie slowly bent her head, and then sank back in her chair with her brow in lines, as she piteously watched the nervous, hurried way in which the glistening scarlet and green holly was placed here and there.

At last they two sat by the fire together, very silent and sad, listening to the passers-by, the bells, and the various sounds betokening the happiness of the festive time, till Nelly's heart sank and it seemed to her that the world was very heartless and strange. How could people be happy and rejoice at a time like this?

There was no selfish feeling left in Nelly's breast, and she tried to make her voice sound cheerful as she glanced at the lattice window.

"How soon it turns dark these winter afternoons," she said. "Shall I draw the curtains and light the lamp?"

"No, dear, I like this calm, soft gloom; but it is very grave and sad, Nelly, my child, and I am poor company for one so young as you."

"Mother!" whispered Nelly, reproachfully.

"My darling!" cried the poor woman, with a sob, and she bent forward to draw her visitor to her breast. "There, there, forgive me, dear. Sorrow has made me peevish and fretful, and old and tired before my time. I sit here alone so many hours day after day, too weak to work or do anything but look at the fire and picture all the past till Heaven is kind to me and all dies out in a holy kind of calm; and long afterwards I wake up to find that I have been dreaming, and I sit wondering how I can sleep with such sorrow in my heart."

Digitized by Google

"Yes, yes, I know, I know," said Nelly, gently. "I have often found you lying back looking so peaceful and calm."

"Peaceful and calm, Nelly?"

"Yes, it is the rest sent from above to the weary. It has come to me night after night when I have lain crying and feeling that it is all more than I can bear. For it was my doing, mother. I did not know then how I loved him, and it was all through me——"

"No, no, no, my child. It was all one great mistake, and we must bear it as we should."

The night fell, and Nelly sat in the silence gazing at the thin, worn face framed in the whitened hair standing out like a cameo from the dark red velvet chair. The eyes were closed, the lips parted slightly. So motionless was the sleeper that a momentary chill ran through the girl. But it was the sleep of restfulness, and she sat watching the pain-worn sufferer, hesitating to disturb her.

She turned her face towards the window, where the firelight was playing brightly now, and for a few moments she sat watching the reflected face dimly seen in the panes.

It did not seem strange at first, distant-looking, and misty as it was. Then a strange creeping sensation ran through her. For the shadowy face seemed to approach till it was more and more distinct and at last she realised the fact that it was no reflection of the sleeping woman's countenance, but someone was gazing in.

She shrank back, shivering and chilled so that she could hardly draw breath. She saw that a hand was close to the glass as if to open the casement; but the next instant she saw that a finger was raised as if to warn her not to speak.

Then the firelight was fitfully playing again in the very spot where she had seen the face and nothing more save a rapidly sinking glow.

"Fancy," sighed the trembling girl to herself. "Am I a coward that I conjure up such things as this? I must have been half dreaming, too. And yet it was so—so like—but wasted and worn, and—oh!" she panted, rising quickly to cross the room and softly draw the curtains across the casement, trembling with agitation the while.

Then the icy chill of horror came back—that terrible dread of the supernatural, followed, though, directly by the more natural dread of the real, for she distinctly heard the familiar click of the outer door and the sighing of the wind as it was opened and closed again.

"Some tramp who has seen our loneliness."

The thought flashed through her brain.

What should she do—call for help? No, it would horribly alarm the sleeper. It must be some outcast whom a few shillings would disarm and send away.

There was no time for further thought, for the handle of the door was turning, there was a rustle over the carpet, and there, framed against the outer darkness in the faint glow of the fire stood——the dead?

No, the thin, tall figure of Jack Leslie, in the familiar khaki, the face so worn and changed, and with his erst strong right arm not merely slung, but bandaged and bound to his broad breast, while his forehead as he drew off his slouch hat was seamed with a strange mark extending from the closely-cropped hair of the left temple diagonally to beneath the eye of the other side.

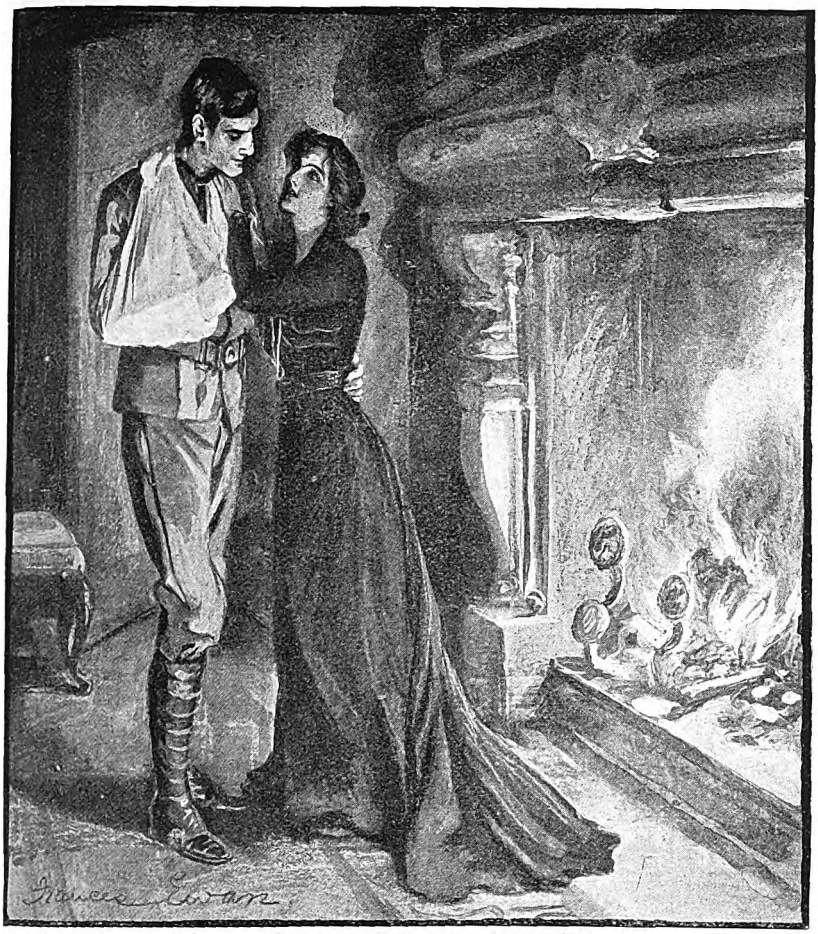
"Jack!" rose to the girl's lips, but no sound came, for the eyes that fixed her there looked fierce and wild, and the dread of the unknown returned. Was it, after all, true that at certain times the dead returned to visit those they had loved in life?

Faint and speechless Nelly gazed at the visitor, with every pulse seeming to cease its action, for the figure glided silently in, solemnly raising one hand as if in warning, and then a hysterical gasp loosened the icy chains which had held the poor girl motionless.

For the eyes were turned from her to the sleeper, the figure sank upon its knees beside the great chair, laid a hand upon her shoulder, to utter one word only—so full of passionate yearning that Nelly, choking with sobs, turned away to drop, dizzy with emotion, in the nearest chair, covering her face with her hands in her mingled joy, misery and despair.

It was no apparition, no spirit of the fancy conjured up after incessant thought—but Jack, the one love of her young heart, come back—wounded, but alive—and her sorrow had been vain. Come back, but not to her, for she had refused his love and sent him despairing away to return like this.

Digitized by Google



A RUSH OF SPARKS WENT UP THE OLD CHIMNEY WITH A ROAR SUGGESTING TRIUMPH.

For her that grave, stern look, the movement of the hand before he turned his back to kneel by the sleeper's chair, and utter that yearning cry :

"Mother!"

It made Nelly's hands drop to her lap and her eyes gazed at the group in horror and dread lest the shock might harm, and she saw through the dimming veil of tears the mother's parted lips, wildly staring eyes and thin white hands clasping the kneeling man's shoulders, holding him off at arm's length before she uttered a wildly hysterical shriek and clasped him to her breast.

"Nelly," she panted at last, "am I mad, or has Heaven heard the widow's cry? Here, quick, girl, quick! Don't you see? The reports were lying! Our darling has come back! Thank God! Thank God!"

She was covering the lost one with her kisses as she spoke, and Nelly stood there alone, with her pulses bounding now, her temples throbbing, and the burning flush gathering in her erst white cheeks; for the widow's words were ringing in her ears, crushing down all sense of joy with a load of despair.

"Our darling has come back!"

And he had no further look or word for her.

SLIP THE FIFTH.

The mother's transports had calmed down, and the war-worn soldier had answered all her questions, telling how he had been in the deadly fight at Spion

Digitized by Google

Kop, where his right arm was shattered by the bursting of one of the Boer shells, and almost simultaneously, as he lay exposed to the terrific fire, he received a shot from a Mauser rifle which struck him in the cheek beneath the right eye, and, missing that, touched the brow, to plough its way diagonally across the forehead, laying bare the bone to its exit at the left temple.

Jack glanced at Nelly as he quietly and modestly told his tale, and saw her features contract at the same moment that he noted for the first time that she was in deep mourning.

"For poor Frank!" he said to himself, with a sigh. "It was a merciful shot, though, mother," he went on, hastily, as Mrs. Leslie uttered a piteous moan. "I was in agony before, but the bullet stunned me, and I did not get my senses fully back for about a month."

And then he told how he had fallen into kindly hands amongst the Boers, having been missed by the ambulance men and left to die among the stony rifts for three days.

"But it was all like a dream to me, and it is only quite lately that I could think clearly and recall the past. And so I was reported dead, and you have been in misery all this time? Well, I don't think anyone is to blame. Those who find fault have no idea of the horrors and confusion that accompany war."

"But you never wrote, my boy?"

"No, mother," said the young man, with a sad smile. "I did try once, with my left hand, but I gave it up in despair; and even if I had written there was no means of sending my letter. When at last I fell in with a scouting party of our men, and, only half cured, was passed on to the field hospital, I felt still too confused to explain who I was. But there, mother dear, I've come home at last, and you can nurse me back to health."

"My darling!" sobbed the poor woman. Then hastily wiping her eyes and with an exultant look: "Yes, Jack dear. I have you safely now, and we can nurse you back to health."

The young man started at the word we, and glanced at Nelly, who met his questioning eyes unmoved, for his every look and word seemed to indicate that his love for her was dead.

"There is no reason why we should not be friends," Jack said to himself; and when, after three or four efforts, all of which had been imploringly checked by Mrs. Leslie, Nelly rose to go, Jack rose too.

"Oh, no," he said, with a quiet, grave courtesy. "I am not such an invalid that I cannot see my dear mother's friend home. It is late and dark. No, no, don't refuse me that pleasure," he added, quickly, in answer to the gesture Nelly made. "But one word or two first," he said. "God bless you, Ellen May, for all your kindness to my poor mother during this dreadful time."

"She has been like my own dear child, Jack," cried Mrs. Leslie; and the young people's eyes met once with the misunderstanding still keeping them apart.

In another minute they were walking side by side towards the Manor.

"Every look shows she is broken-hearted about poor Frank," thought Jack. "She loved him after all."

"He believes me a cruel, heartless coquette," thought Nelly; "and I cannot —I dare not tell him all the truth."

And so they parted with a few blank words, and not so much as a pressure of the hand. Nelly half raised hers again, but Jack did not see the movement, and as he said "Good-night," he added, with a half laugh and a gesture which it was too dark for her to see:

"I can't offer to shake hands. Good-night, Miss May, and, once more, God bless you for your kindness to my mother."

"There! That's the end of a foolish dream," he sighed, as he walked home, little thinking why Nelly could not speak.

But Jack Leslie's mother could. When her son reached the door he found her waiting with it held open, and the moment it was closed and she drew him to the light, looking alert and ten years younger, she stepped quickly behind him to pass her arms about his neck, and her first words whispered into his ear were:

"Jack, darling, have you made it up?"

He groaned, but the words his mother spoke swept the mental blindness from before his eyes, and when at last he sank down in the white bed, for which scores of times during his terrible existence of hardship and suffering he had longed, he found it no bed of rest, but one upon which he lay wakeful, longing for the day.

That came at last, but there were weary hours to pass before he could say again all that was in his heart. For the news of his coming to life had spread, and all that morning and late into the afternoon, the house was thronged by friends and neighbours eager to welcome the warrior back.

Digitized by Google

"I thought we were never to be at peace again," cried Mrs. Leslie, petulantly, after she had almost dismissed the last visitor but one, who had been brought by her own people and left in answer to the widow's prayer, to stand there pale and red by turns, trembling, half choked by her emotion, as Jack's eyes looked so differently at her now.

Mrs. Leslie behaved exactly like a mother would. She declared that she must go and bathe her eyes, for she had cried, she said, till they felt almost blind.

Then only Jack and Nelly were left alone, with the room looking dull and blank; for the big Christmas log that should have burnt on its proper day sat dark, gloomy, and heavily perched at the back of the wide, old-fashioned chimney, and all was very grave and still.

Poor Mrs. Leslie's eyes took a long time bathing, for the water set them weeping again, but they were tears of joy.

There was silence in the gloomy room below, for hearts beat wildly, and the words burning to come could not find utterance.

Then it was that eyes spoke on either side in that grand old language of love which swept every misconception and all reserve away, and lips spoke silently to lips.

Then all at once there was a loud rustling as of something falling and Nelly's arms were snatched away from where they had rested, her face flushed scarlet with what in her innocency she thought was shame, as she turned in the direction from which the noise had come to be greeted by a crackling and roar as the room was lit up by the dancing flames, gold and orange, purple and scarlet-red which were reflected from the china and glass of the corner cabinet, and the partially-curtained window panes.

There was a hiss, a loud report, and another burst of flames apparently dancing with delight, as a rush of sparks went up the old chimney with a roar suggesting triumph, for it was a veritable feu de joie.

"It makes one think of Spion Kop, dear," said Jack, smiling, as he tenderly drew Nelly to him again.

"Jack!" she cried, with her eyes dilating and face contracting with horror. "Don't, pray don't talk of that!"

"Why not?" he said, bending forward with a look that seemed to say to a pair of upraised trembling hands: "Come back! Oh, pray come back!"

They did, very slowly and softly, and somehow their gentle movements had the effect of making their resting-place speak in a whisper so that the laughing, mocking fire should not hear.

"Not talk of it, dear?" he said.

"No, Jack, dear; it was so horrible."

"Perhaps so," he said. "But it was all very brave and grand. Why, darling, I'd go through it a hundred times for this."

Never mind what this was, but the fire literally blazed as Jack said, tenderly:

"Why, little one, you're trembling like a leaf."

"The fire startled me," she whispered.

"And it was only the slipping of the Christmas log."

There was a pause, and then:

"Do I hurt your poor wounded arm, Jack dear?"

"Yes; and it sends love and life thrilling through every vein. Nelly—love—wife—my very own! I never pictured such a Christmas-time as this."

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

THE M.C.L. HOMES FOR DESTITUTE CHILDREN AT OTTERSHAW—BUILT QUITE CLOSE TO THE COUNTESS'S HOME.

THE COUNTESS OF MEATH AND THE MINISTERING CHILDREN'S LEAGUE.

By LEONARD GRAHAM.

TO band together the children of all classes and many lands in a league of kindness, so that a girdle of love may circle the world—that is truly a beautiful idea, and one that comes to us with especial force at this Christmas season. We delight to dwell on the brotherhood of man, a kinship never recognised before the reign of the Holy Child, whose message of peace and goodwill was first proclaimed to the world by the triumphant voices of the Angelic Host.

But, unhappily, to many this brotherhood is little more than an ideal, an impression which soon fades when the opportunity arises to recognise it in a practical fashion.

It was to root out this widespread spirit of selfishness and encourage the performance of kindly acts, first in the home, then in a wider sphere, that the Ministering Children's League was founded over sixteen years ago by the good and brave Countess of Meath.

The League has gathered together a mighty army of young people, some 40,000 strong, all pledged to do at least one kind act every day, and dwelling not only in the United Kingdom, but in Australia, Canada, and all the British colonies, as well as in America, Germany, France, and other countries.

These children are the members of the Society, but the aid of parents and teachers is invoked to direct their efforts and show them how they can best work for the good of others. Before any local branch is started, the help of the clergyman or minister is first enlisted, and by the aid of Sunday-school teachers and others the children who wish to join are brought together, and are soon busily engaged in some philanthropic work. Every branch is free to choose what form of benevolent enterprise seems good to it; and the beneficent operations of the League are probably more diversified than those of any other society in the world.

Digitized by Google

The influence of these ministering children is felt in many lands, in their own families, and in the homes of the poor. In hundreds of parishes all over the country, and in the Britains beyond the seas, each little band of children, when the principles of the League are properly carried out, is taught to be kind at home, to endeavour to relieve the distress in its own locality by making garments for the poor, by supporting destitute children, and by rendering Christmas a bright and happy time for those who would never have known of its joys, through gifts of various kinds made by the children's own hands. One branch this year sent away twenty-eight poor children to the country, another contributed to the local Church Repair Fund, others have subscribed to send invalids to convalescent homes, and in a hundred other ways they have brought comfort and help to the poor and afflicted.

THE COUNTESS OF MEATH,
Foundress of the Ministering Children's League.
Photo by H. S. Mendelssohn. 14, Pembridge Crescent, W.

This is all local work, but such by no means absorbs the energies of the League. Every kind of religious and philanthropic enterprise benefits by the united efforts of thousands of children. It is, indeed, the "day of small things" when great national charities and religious works such as hospitals, the Indian Famine Fund, home and foreign missions, owe much to their labours.

One of the great objects for which they have worked—an object dearest to the heart of the Foundress, and in which a large number of the English branches are interested—was the establishment of the Homes for Destitute Children at Ottershaw.

These homes were built on Lady Meath's own estate, and are situated quite close to the house, and Lady Meath is constantly in and out of them looking after the welfare of her young charges, for she takes a personal interest in each, and delights to watch the little waifs grow strong and healthy, while their pale cheeks become tanned with the country breezes.

The children all attend the village school, and the elder boys work in the gardens under the superintendence of the head gardener. As they grow up they are sent out to fill useful positions in life, and Lady Meath showed the writer with pride and affection the portraits of her old boys, one of whom is serving his King and country at the front.

In order to provide a sure income for the maintenance of the Homes, the whole estate, including the house which Lord and Lady Meath make their summer residence, has been given by them to the League, and they pay an annual rent for its use. Eventually part of the land will be let off for building purposes, which will provide a good revenue, as the land is valuable.

To mention all that the truly great and noble Countess of Meath has done would be an endless task. She is always doing something for somebody, and that has been the keynote of her life. From her youth she has taken an active part in Church work and in philanthropic undertakings of every description. Besides the Ministering Children's League, she has founded the Brabazon Employment Society for giving employment to inmates in workhouses and asylums who have been pronounced by the authorities incapable of doing any work, either from infirmity or mental incapacity, and whose lives used to be a perfect burden to them because they had no means of passing the time. They are instructed by skilled teachers in wood-carving, weaving, and sewing, and many other occupations, and make all kinds of knick-knacks. It is wonderful the skill which they attain, turning out really artistic work, which has been "starred" by the judges at the Home Arts and Industries Exhibition. This good work is being carried on in over two hundred workhouses and institutions. Lady Meath has lately extended this work under a separate organisation with very excellent results to maimed and invalid soldiers returned from the war in South Africa, and she has also founded a society for the purpose of providing trained nurses for workhouse infirmaries.

Digitized by Google

THE EARL OF MEATH.

Lord Meath is an indefatigable Philanthropic and Social Worker, and is also associated with the Countess in her numerous undertakings.

There only has to be distress, no matter where or among whom, and the sufferers are sure of a champion in Lady Meath. The terrible condition of prisoners in Morocco elicited her warmest sympathies, and only the other day she contributed a powerful article to the Nineteenth Century in which she drew public attention to the fearful misery of these unhappy subjects of the Sultan.

Then she has established at Godalming "The Meath Home of Comfort" for epileptics, because the only institution for epileptics in the country was a small home at Liverpool.

Another home of which Lady Meath is the foundress is for girls who have been discharged from the hospitals as incurable, but who with good food, country air, and good nursing often recover. Girls can go there and stay for years.

In London a great need has been met by the establishment of the Brabazon House Home for ladies with limited incomes, who, with their small means, were quite unable to obtain the comforts of a home.

When I paid a visit to Ottershaw a little time ago, Lady Meath showed me round the Children's Homes. They are situated in the midst of a lovely country, standing on a swelling slope and commanding a splendid view of the pine-clad Surrey Hills, which form an amphitheatre encircling green valleys and dark woodlands. The grounds themselves are very extensive, and there is an ample playground for the children provided with swings for the amusement of the little ones.

They all looked very happy and healthy, and welcomed the approach of their benefactress with unmistakeable pleasure. Nor is this to be wondered at, for Lady Meath is constantly among them, taking the greatest interest in their work and play and often putting them through their musical drill herself.

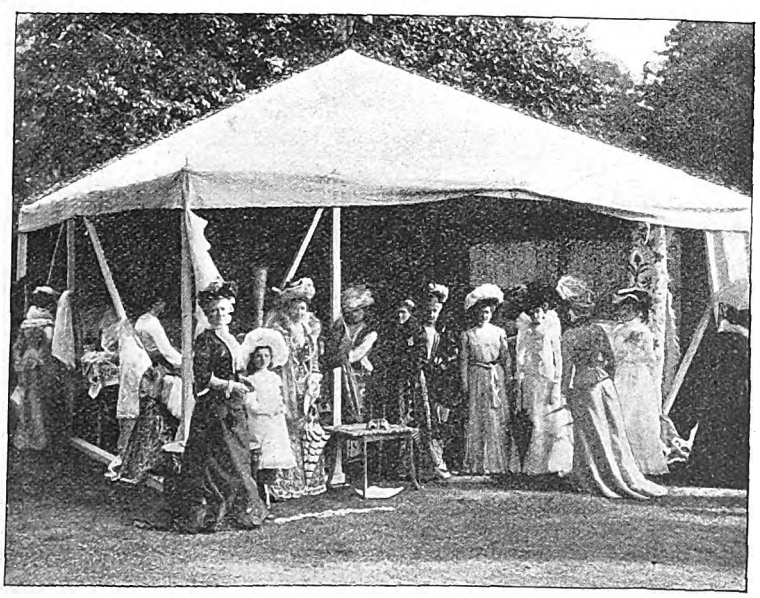
I asked Lady Meath to tell me how she came to form the idea of the Ministering Children's League, and she related the interesting story of its origin and progress.

Digitized by Google

COTTAGE BY THE SEA, VICTORIA, AUSTRALIA.

"It began in this way," she said. "I was a worker in the Girls' Friendly Society, and used to go down occasionally of an evening to the East End to attend the meetings of a club for factory girls, but I found it interfered a good deal with home duties. At the same time I could not get anyone to take my place. Do what we would, we could never get enough workers, and though this is especially the case in the East End, I have noticed the same painful lack all over the world and in all sorts of places where you would never think there would be any difficulty in securing helpers.

"This seemed to me the great want, and I thought that if we could train up the children to the performance of at least one kind deed every day, and gradually lead them to take part in Christian work, there would never be wanting thousands of helpers in the future. The League was started in a very small way. The first meeting was held in our house at Lancaster Gate, and Canon Ridgeway, our Vicar, announced it from the pulpit. The children and their parents were invited, and when the day came we had a very earnest little gathering, to whom we explained the idea of the League, which was to teach the children to be unselfish, and to think of others, to be obedient to their parents, and to those over them, and to be kind to



THE RICHMOND FÊTE WHICH LADY MEATH AND LADY LUCK ORGANISED RECENTLY ON BEHALF OF THE M.C.L.
(The Countess and Lady Luck are in the foreground.)

Digitized by Google

their brothers and sisters, to servants, and all with whom they came in contact."

"To what do you attribute the wonderful success of the League?"

"I think," replied Lady Meath, "it is because we have so few rules. We don't tie the children down to help anybody or any cause in particular, but just try to get them to help somebody. Every child who joins it has only to repeat each day a short prayer and to pledge him or herself to let no day pass without a deed to crown it. Once the habit of helping others is formed it does not stop there, and the work which our children have done has been a blessing to thousands."

"Was the progress rapid at first?"

"Yes, it began to grow very quickly. The very year in which it was founded it spread to the United States and Canada, owing to Lord Meath and myself visiting America, and now it is as firmly established in the Colonies as it is at home. In Australia it has been taken up with the greatest enthusiasm, and they are very loyal and will not make any changes without consulting us first. I think the Duchess of York, who is our patroness, must have been surprised to receive three different deputations from our children in three different Australian States.

CANON RIDGEWAY,
Who assisted Lady Meath to organise the League.

"It seems wonderful to me that a society started so unostentatiously in a private house, which has since become the central office of the Association, should have found its way into every English-speaking country with the exception of some islands, and that the links of love and sympathy should have been forged, drawing together not only those belonging to the Anglo-Saxon race but also dusky-coloured Hindustani children and even young negroes and Red Indians."

THESE LITTLE ONES OWE THEIR HAPPY TIME TO THE EFFORTS OF OTHER CHILDREN.

"Will you tell me something

Digitized by Google

about your travels on behalf of the League?"

"A few winters ago Lord Meath and I went to Teneriffe in search of health, but the climate was found too relaxing, and it ended in our taking a widely-extended tour round the world.

"It was when we were at Bombay that we started the work among non-Christian children, and this branch is known as the League of Kindness. It came about in this way: We had been holding a meeting, and at the close a Hindoo came up and said he wanted to join. This put us in a rather difficult position, because our League is a Christian organisation; but at the same time we felt that it would not be a very Christian act to exclude any who wish to join, and that the only thing to be done was to start an organisation for non-Christians under a different name.

"In the course of our travels we visited Australasia, where the League was heartily welcomed, and many branches formed. It was warmly supported by the New Zealanders, and the remark I heard again and again was, 'It is just the thing that we want for the Colonies.' In Tasmania the people were equally willing to welcome the Society and from there we sailed to Australia, and never in any country have we received more cordial greetings. In Adelaide a 'welcome' meeting was held for us, over which Chief Justice Way presided. The Bishop of Adelaide, now the Bishop of Bath and Wells, was also on the platform, and spoke most warmly in favour of the Society.

"In the United States we held several meetings while travelling across this huge continent, and received much encouragement, especially when we reached the Eastern portion of it. We heard good news of 138 fresh branches being started in the United States since our previous visit, whilst some of the older ones had accomplished remarkable work.

In the United States, besides an immense amount of local work, a church has been founded by a New York branch, and a hospital in Canada, and a chapel by the Red Indians in North Dakota. In India the branches have subscribed to send sickly children to the hills in the summer time, and they have done the same thing in Sydney and Melbourne; and in Western Australia they have founded a hospital for which the Government gave the land. When in Egypt I found that there was no single institution for the blind in the country. Since then the League has started a school for them. We had to get teachers from England, as there was no possibility of procuring them in Egypt or in Syria.

"The school is going on extremely well and the boys are now able to make baskets on their own account. It, moreover, supplies a great need, as hitherto there was no place where you could procure European baskets.

"Altogether," concluded Lady Meath, "the League has founded and supports fifteen different institutions. But the work of the League cannot be measured by the number of institutions founded—it aims much higher, it endeavours to make homes happier by training children to think and work for others, work which, commencing in the home, makes its influence felt all over the world."

The Earl of Meath is associated with his wife in all her good works. He is a well-known writer on social subjects, being the author of "Social Arrows," and joint author of "Social Aims," a book which he wrote in collaboration with the Countess, and he is a frequent contributor to the Nineteenth Century and other reviews. He was the first secretary of the Hospital Saturday Fund, Founder and Chairman of the Metropolitan Public Gardens Association, Chairman of the Young Men's Friendly Society and of the British College of Physical Education, Founder and Chairman of the Lads' Drill Association, and he has done good work on the London County Council. Like Lady Meath, he is indefatigable in good works, and their united efforts have resulted in many practical schemes of philanthropic work of the most far-reaching and widely diverse character.

LEONARD GRAHAM.

Digitized by Google

"I STAND BETWEEN YOU AND ALL THE OTHER MEN WITH MONEY," HE SAID.

Girl's Love and a Woman's Heart.

By JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

Author of "Bootles' Baby," etc.

I.

"Standing with reluctant feet
Where the brook and river meet."

EVERYBODY who knew them said that they were an absurdly young couple, and that neither of them ought even to think of getting married for years and years. He was twenty, she two years younger, mere boy and girl, you see. He was something in a newspaper office, with nothing in his position very clearly defined—to the outer world, that is — excepting his salary, which he was just able to live upon and no more. She was scarcely more than a schoolgirl, and although she had been born and bred in an atmosphere wherein everybody works who has brains to work, she had not yet found her métier, and was as yet fully occupied in encompassing the difficulties of her first season on a dress allowance of thirty pounds a year.

Her people lived up to every penny that they had; he had no people beyond an antiquated aunt or two and a second cousin somewhere in Scotland, who had never, since presenting him with a silver mug at the time of his christening, taken the very smallest notice of him. Not a very promising pair of young people to take a fancy to each other, not a very promising way of beginning matrimony. Everybody said so, and everybody mostly hits the nail of other people's business right on the head when they take up the hammer of common-sense for the purpose.

Mary Glendower's mother was one of the few who differed from the view taken by everybody.

"Not foolish at all," she said, quite sharply to a dear friend who favoured her with a little wholesome advice on the subject of Mannie's engagement—yes,

Digitized by Google

she had always been called Mannie from her cradle, though nobody knew exactly why—"not foolish at all. They're young, of course they're young, but there's nothing particularly foolish in that that I know of. I was married a year before I was Mannie's age, and I've always regretted that Valentine and I didn't marry at once instead of waiting a year to satisfy my parents."

"But Ralph Steer has no position," objected the friend.

"No more he has. Very few young men do have a position at twenty unless they're born to it," retorted Mrs. Glendower, promptly. "But Ralph has got a good start, and there are possibilities. A love affair is an excellent thing to spur a young man on to do what he might never attempt without some incentive. So you needn't condole with either Mannie or me, thank you, Mrs. Stewart; not yet awhile anyway. Mannie will stay at home and learn housekeeping, and by-and-bye you will see—you will see."

Mrs. Glendower's friend went away, feeling that with any other woman in the world she would have felt herself thoroughly snubbed.

As it was, however, she only thought, and said, that Mannie's mother was an arrant fool, and that pretty Mannie had utterly and completely thrown away her chances of making anything like a good and suitable settlement in life.

"And she is pretty," declared the recipient of Mrs. Stewart's confidences.

"Yes, Mannie is pretty," Mrs. Stewart admitted, "but it's a fragile, evanescent type of prettiness that won't last."

"Oh, I don't know," said the other, vaguely.

"But you will if you live long enough," retorted Mrs. Stewart. "If she marries she will probably get fat like her mother; if she stays single she'll be lean and hungry like her father."

"Oh, she's her father over again."

"Yes, she takes after him, and, of course, Valentine Glendower owes more than he knows to his looks."

"How so?"

"Well, he is the ideal of an artist in appearance. Silky, yellow hair that falls about his head in waves, long lithe limbs, white shapely hands, neat feet and a charming smile; a soft voice that can whisper a compliment on the spot to every sort and condition of women. Art such as his owes so much to externals. There's nothing in Valentine Glendower, it's all trick—a taking, flashy style, a bit of an old building, a stretch of snow, a cottage interior, something everyday or homely, but always done in a lurid, artificial light which makes most people think themselves clever in liking it and the few who know sick. It's just the same sort of thing that makes some people feel themselves smart to eat caviar or munch olives. And how much of it all does Valentine Glendower owe to his wife's studio teas, her flaming tea-gowns, and her well-stocked buffet to flank the tea-table? Far more than most people suspect or he would like to own to. By the way, did you hear that story about William Brown, the man who runs the art-class at Putney? No? Ah, it was rather funny. You know Valentine Glendower's way of taking himself with absolute seriousness, how difficult it is to get admission to the sacred studio unless all is prepared for a festive occasion and all the rest? Well, one day William Brown took two of his most promising lambs to see Glendower's pictures. 'But, surely, Mr. Glendower,' said one of them, pointing to a canvas, 'surely that effect is false?' 'Yes,' said Glendower, solemnly, 'it is false, but—the lie is beautiful!'"

"How clever," cried Mrs. Manningtree.

"Yes, and how like Valentine Glendower," rejoined her friend.

Still, it was all in the main true enough. Valentine Glendower was a man with a vogue, but not a great artist. He made a good income and spent it. There was no money with which to dower pretty daughters, and, what was more, everybody knew it. So when the Glendowers not only sanctioned but actually encouraged their elder girl's engagement to such a very young man as Ralph Steer, all their world thought and said that they were something more than foolish.

True, the young people themselves were very happy. Ralph Steer went everywhere that the Glendowers went. He gave Mannie a pretty engagement ring, a band of gold with a single diamond set in it like a dew-drop. It did not cost very much, and it looked very pretty on Mannie's slender hand, but it took all Ralph's spare cash for that quarter, leaving him nothing for odds and ends such as come into the expenditure of every young man during the course of the year.

Digitized by Google

"Now, you are never to give me one other bit of jewellery, Ralph," Mannie said, when he had put the ring on her finger, and she had kissed him for it. "Not at least until you are quite, quite well off. I love this"—looking at the ring—"because it makes you mine, but I want no more."

He congratulated himself on her goodness, and on the fact that she loved him for himself and not for what she could get out of him, and he faithfully kept his promise as regarded gifts of a similar kind. But he couldn't pass over her birthday without some little remembrance—what lover could?—or leave her without some little token at Christmas time, or on St. Valentine's Day, or on the anniversary of their betrothal. And so he used to send her a few flowers, or a case of scent, or half-a-dozen pairs of gloves, and, besides these, there were other little expenses connected with his engagement, and so slowly, almost imperceptibly, Ralph Steer got into a very mild and modest form of debt.

It was nothing serious, goodness knows, but when debts get at last to amount to as much as a quarter's income it is useless to think then of launching out into fresh expenses. And so the engagement went, in a kind of way, out of date, and no one who knew the Glendowers ever regarded it as being at all likely to come to any sort of fruition.

In his profession Ralph Steer did not by any means stand still. In his office he was looked upon as a steady young fellow, keen and alert in his work, afraid of nothing, and ready for any and every emergency. Over and over again he was sent away to different parts of the world on special missions, and his pay went up accordingly. But, alas! his debts always seemed to rise to precisely the same level, and the day which would transform Mannie Glendower into Mrs. Steer seemed as far off as ever.

She had other offers and chances. Once, when Ralph had gone to Berlin to do some great function for his paper, Mannie went north to pay a long-promised visit to an old school-fellow, and while she was there a man in the neighbourhood fell in love with her and proposed to her. Of course an explanation followed, and her admirer had no choice but to bow to the inevitable, which he did in the most manly, straightforward fashion.

"I shall never forget you, or cease to regret that I did not see you before the other fellow made his footing secure," he said, "but as I can't have you myself I hope you'll be happy and prosperous all your life."

Mannie Glendower, much touched by the magnanimity of her disappointed lover, confided the story to Ralph Steer when they met again. To her horror, however, he went off into a paroxysm of jealous wrath.

"How dare the follow propose to you," he fumed, "and then patronisingly wish you happiness when he found he couldn't have you!"

"O Ralph," she cried, "why, he didn't even know I was engaged."

"Don't you wear my ring when you're away?" he demanded.

"Ralph!" She was so much hurt that she made no attempt to answer his question.

Ralph Steer went passionately on: "I didn't mean that; but can't you understand how it maddens me to know that other fellows covet the prize I have won and can't take for myself? It's all the fault of my people, fooling away a heap in sending me to Harrow and Oxford when they might have spent it setting me up in business. I may have to keep on for years at this awful journalistic work before I get anything like an income that can keep you as you must be kept. It's heartbreaking—it's—it's—O Mannie, can't you understand how I feel to think I've ruined your life, that I stand between you and all the other men with money who could marry you to-morrow and give you everything you could wish?"

Mannie Glendower had grown white to her very lips. "Ralph," she said, "are you trying to make me understand that you want to be free? If you are don't hesitate, put it more plainly."

He turned and looked at her, then caught her to him with a cry of choking agony. "O Mannie, Mannie, do you want to give me up?" he cried, in an exceeding bitter voice.

She put out her hands with a gesture of infinite tenderness and drew his head down to her cheek. "Do I want to throw away my happiness, my life, my soul?" she asked.

He rested his cheek against hers with a relief that was almost pain. "The time has been so long, the prospects are so bare," he whispered. "Every time I come here, I feel more and more hopeless of ever being able to give you a home such as you are used to. I feel such a brute to hold you to your promise when I know that the best years of your life are going, and yet—yet I can't give you up, Mannie; I can't bring myself to shut the door on my happiness."

Digitized by Google

She held him close to her with an ineffable smile of protection and proud pity. "I would rather live in a garret with you, Ralph, than in a palace with any other man that ever I saw," she said softly. "If ever you want to give me up, say the word and I will not lift a finger to prevent you or to keep you. But till you do—nothing but your death shall step in between us."

II.

So the bond between Ralph Steer and Mannie Glendower was strengthened, and, as it were, made absolute. From that day there was no further talk between them of giving up, but when Mannie chanced to have another offer of marriage, and this time from one who knew Ralph Steer well, and thought he was treating the girl infamously, she kept the fact in her heart and did not even tell her mother what had happened. To Ralph himself she never breathed so much as a hint.

The years slipped by one after another until Ralph, like Jacob, had served seven years for Mannie. Alas, alas, the day of rejoicing seemed to be as far off as ever, for though Ralph had undeniably got on into a recognised position, he was no better able to keep a wife than he had been in the beginning. Another year went by, and yet another, and then there came a change. For the dogs of war were let loose in Africa, Gordon was at last to be avenged.

Then there was a sending to and fro in the haunts of great newspapers, and Ralph Steer, who had so long been faithful to his first channel of work, suddenly announced that he was leaving.

"You can't possibly leave us just now," said his chief. "I want you to take Wilson's place."

"I'm very sorry," said Ralph, firmly. "I asked you to send me out to the Greek business, and you told me then that I was quite unfitted for the work of a war correspondent. You gave Wilson the place I wanted, though I have worked and waited patiently for it."

"And you're going to the Soudan?"

"For the Daily Post," said Ralph, simply.

The chief screwed up his lips, though no sound came from between them. "Well, my dear fellow, I wish you well," he said cordially. "I confess you have surprised me."

So ended Ralph Steer's connection with the office in which he had served his apprenticeship—aye, and his journeyman's time in the often thankless profession of journalism—and his place there knew him no more.

From that time until his departure for the seat of war life was a drive and a bustle for him, and Mannie Glendower saw but little of him. "I have such a heap of things to do and to see to," he said to her one day about a week before he departed. "You mustn't think anything of my not coming. You see I've got a chance now, and everything depends on my making a hit this time. I shall be working for both of us, and you must help me by sparing me all you can."

"But you'll think of me, Ralph," she breathed, a sudden fear catching at her faithful heart.

"Yes, but I shall have to keep even my thoughts for the Daily Post," he said, smiling. "I'm going to make a hit this time, Mannie. All these years I've been working away on the News, they've been keeping me back, making a hack of me, though I didn't see it. It was that article I did for the Mask about the Greek business that got me this billet, and I don't mean to let the chance slip or to disappoint them. 'If you can write like that without having seen it,' the chief said to me, 'you're the man for us when there's anything like service on again. Consider yourself booked when we are sending a war correspondent elsewhere. I only wish we had had you for this Greek campaign.' It's hit or miss this time, Mannie, and I mean it to be hit."

How proud she was of him, how she choked back every qualm of fear, every feeling of regret, so that he might think of her as all that a war correspondent's sweetheart ought to be. If she cried her eyes out, as they say, it was under the safe shelter of the night, and to the safe confidence of her pillow. To the front

Digitized by Google

"WHAT'S THE MEANING OF THIS?" HE ASKED IN THE SAME ROUGH TONE.

she was calm, serene, almost unmoved, and, when Ralph Steer had actually gone, life in the busy house at Kensington was as unruffled to all outward seeming as is the surface of a pool half-an-hour after a pebble has been dropped into it.

But I used a wrong word when I spoke of life in the Glendower establishment as being unruffled. I should have said that only inasmuch as Mannie's purely personal affairs were concerned. For during the past two or three years things had not gone as well with the popular painter as he could have wished. The market had been a good deal overstocked with rapidly done sketches, bearing a fantastic V.G. in the top left-hand corner. Other favourites had risen up and pushed the older ones somewhat out of place. The world was used to Valentine Glendower, and yet it expected just as much of him as ever.

For crowds had got into a habit of flocking to Mr. Glendower's tea-parties, and where once they had stood wrapped in admiration before his flashy pictures and lurid effects, they now remarked to one another and almost in his presence, that he had made the fatal mistake of going one better too often. Alack-a-day, neither Valentine Glendower nor any other can stay on the crest of the wave for ever!

So life was not as smooth as it had been for the Glendower family, and sometimes hints were thrown out that Mannie had thrown the best years of her life away, and that she would never be able to call back the days that had been laid waste, while Ralph Steer lived the life of a butterfly, and spent every farthing he made on himself. They had all got used to the ring on Mannie's left hand, and saw it as it was, no great matter of a ring, after all. Money was wanted, and wanted badly, for the boys—Gerald, who had gone on the stage, and made about thirty shillings a week, playing an exceedingly minor part which had to be dressed to a couple of thousand a year, and Geoffrey, who was following in his father's footsteps and studying art in the Quartier Latin. Then there was Constance, five years younger than Mannie, and not at all as pretty as Mannie had been. She had to have her chance, and somehow

Digitized by Google

Constance did not seem to attract men of any kind. "How can I when there is always Mannie there?" she exclaimed pettishly one day to her mother. "Yes, I know Mannie is engaged, but it's the kind of engagement that makes men feel they're safe in carrying on anyhow."

"I must say that for Mannie, she never carries on," said Mrs. Glendower, in a judicial tone. "Of course, it is a bad thing that Mannie should be engaged so long, and I'm sure nobody feels that more than she does. She never has a penny extra for anything—in fact, I don't believe she spends all her allowance."

"It's a great disadvantage to a girl to have a dowdy elder sister," rapped out Constance. "If one were as lovely as Hebe, the men would only feel that after a bit one will grow like her."

"My dear," said Mrs. Glendower, wisely, "you'll never be half as pretty as Mannie was when she got engaged to Ralph Steer."

"As Mannie was," retorted Constance, tartly.

It need not be imagined that the usual atmosphere of the Glendowers' family was one of bickering and fault-finding. By no means. On the contrary, the force of habit had made it second nature to them all to cling together and be outwardly kind and forbearing one with another. It was only now and then that the deeper feelings came up to the surface and gave themselves expression in such a scrap of conversation as this. But the truth remained the same, the nine long years of waiting, of hoping almost against hope, of continual putting on of time, of pinching, and saving for a far distant day in the future, had made of pretty Mannie a mere dowdy. It is one of the saddest fates that can overtake any pretty woman.

Then a kind of thrill went through the world in which the Glendowers moved, and the name of Ralph Steer was on everyone's lips. For the Daily Post had got all the ripest fruit out of the war basket; the Daily Post was the most sought after by those who were keenly interested in the war news, and undeniably Ralph Steer was the man of the hour.

After leaving Cairo, Mannie never heard a word from him. "Don't expect me to write," he wrote to her. "Keep your eye on the D.P., and take those letters as written to you. I am going to work for all I'm worth, and I want to be free of every obligation to write so much as a single line outside of the D.P. until this campaign is over."

It never occurred to Mannie to read this other than as it showed upon the surface. By right she was daily accorded the first sight of the Daily Post, and she read every word of Ralph Steer's with flushed face and beating heart exactly as she would have done had they been autograph letters addressed to herself. Then, when the newspaper had been the round of the household, she cut the war-letters out and pasted them in a small scrap-book which she had bought for the purpose. She was proud, and happy, and satisfied. Ralph had proved himself at last, and she was justified in her choice, she was rewarded for her constancy and for her time of waiting.

Then the war came to a brilliant end, and the home-coming of the wanderer was within measurable distance. Mannie, although the season was past and the Glendowers were taking their holiday in a shanty up the river, went the length of having a new frock in order that she might do honour to her hero. It was a blue frock, soft and clinging in material, just such a stuff as she had worn on the day when he had first asked her to wait for him. Perhaps some thread of romance had helped her choice, some idea that he would remember the past.

She did not wear it, although a whole week went by after it came home. She was saving it for him——

"Come out in the boat-house, Mannie," said the voice of her sister, breaking in upon her thoughts.

"All right," said Mannie.

It was early evening. The Glendowers had just finished dinner; the light had faded almost to darkness. The sisters stepped into the little craft, the younger taking the pair of light sculls while Mannie took the guiding-ropes.

"How lovely it is to-night," said Mannie.

"Shall we stop here a while?" asked Constance.

"Yes, do. Just look at the effect of that streak of moonlight on the water. Father ought to see it."

The younger sister was about to ask whether they had not better go back and fetch their father when a voice from the bank broke in on the stillness.

Digitized by Google

"He has made a name that anyone would be proud of," it said.

"Yes, true," answered another speaker. "I suppose he will never look behind him now."

"I don't know. He's engaged, you know; he got entangled when he was very young to the daughter of that man who paints, Valentine Glendower."

Constance Glendower was within a hair's breadth of calling out when Mannie's hand fell like a vice upon her wrist and the fingers of the other hand were laid imperatively upon her lips.

"Oh, what a pity!" one of the voices went on.

"Yes, it is. Such a lot to be mixed up with. And she's such a dowdy, faded creature. I suppose, after waiting for him all these years, he will feel in honour bound that he must marry her."

"Still, it's a pity. Such a mistake when very young men get mixed up with the wrong set."

"Oh, there's nothing against the girl or her people, so far as that goes, but Ralph Steer could marry anybody now. If he could put the time back for her and not for himself, it would be all right. She used to be pretty enough, but she's very much the light of other days now."

The speakers passed on, and then Mannie turned to her sister.

"Let us go home," was all that she said.

"But, Mannie——" Constance flamed out.

"No, don't talk about it. I want to go home," said Mannie.

The next day Mannie's ring was missing from her hand. Constance Glendower's soul fairly raged within her, but she was afraid to speak. She saw by her anxious face that she had passed through a night of agony, and guessed that the ring had gone back to Ralph Steer as a token of freedom. So several days went by. Mannie was outwardly her own quiet self and Constance waited.

But not for long. On the tenth day, towards evening, Ralph Steer came, walking abruptly into the little drawing-room where Constance was playing to herself in the half-light.

"Where's Mannie?" he demanded, roughly, adding not a word of greeting to her.

"I think she's down by the river," Constance replied. Before she could add a word he had swung out by the open French window, down to the bit of walled terrace which guarded the garden from the river's brim.

Yes, Mannie was there, and Ralph Steer went straightway to her holding out a letter and something that twinkled pathetically in the waning light.

"What's the meaning of this?" he asked in the same rough tone.

A great light blazed up in Mannie's eyes. "I—I——" she stammered.

"You're not changed?"

"Changed!" her voice rang out glad and triumphant, telling its own story in a single word.

"What does it mean, then?"

"I—I—heard somebody say something, Ralph. I felt it was true. You could marry anybody now," she said. "I was pretty once. I'm old and faded—and—and—dowdy——"

He caught her to him with a fierce, rough tenderness. "Thank God!" he said. "I thought you meant it. It almost killed me. Old—faded—dowdy—bah! you're the woman I love, the woman I've worked for, the woman who waited for me, the woman I've come back to. What a home-coming. Never play that trick on me again. Promise, Mannie, Promise."

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

A Drama in the Snow.

By FIONA MACLEOD.
Author of "The Mountain Lovers, etc."

ON the twelfth day of December, in one of the black years of the "eighties," the snow suddenly came in a compact mass across the North Sea. It was as though a whole continent of Polar vapour had swung southward, upborne by an Arctic tempest, and had been driven with undiminished frontiers against the cliffs of the Scottish coast, from the Ord of Sutherland to the Bowies o' Buchan. The great fall began an hour after mid-day, and almost without warning. The sun had risen clear, though there was a white light in the pale gold which suffused the south-east, and a glaring brightness in the blue even of the zenith. Shortly before noon an almost invisible web was spun northerly. By noon, west, north, and east were grey as an owl's wing.

Then, straight, dense, flake upon flake, so close that not a whirling gnat could have swept betwixt them, the snow-feathers fell. In a brief while the mountains, the hill-slopes, the straths, the glens, every machar, every field, every hidden copse or meadow-hollow, was covered. There was no wind, so there was no drift. The shepherds seldom let their gaze wander long from the north or north-east. If wind were to come, with all that snow unfallen and like to fall, there would be a crying of starving sheep, a belling of forlorn deer, the hill-sorrow everywhere, save for the hoodie-crow and the raven.

That night a long sighing breath came over the hills of Sutherland. For an hour or more there was no augmentation of this ominous sound. Then all at once a vast volume, a flood, an overwhelming sea of tumult resounded hollowly. A dull roaring held the mountains. Long before midnight there were scores of ewes dead on the upper slopes, drowned in dense compact snow. By dawn—if that could be called dawn which was a slight greying of a dusk—hundreds of sheep were dead or dying in the drifts. Already a universal decrescent movement had begun among the deer. In a few hill-byres the wild creatures sought shelter.

The wind sustained its devastating course until noon. For a few hours thereafter it lapsed. The snow, however, never for a moment ceased to fall, nor could any man say that in this or in that hour the downcome was less dense than before, less insistent.

For three days and three nights without a break the white flood poured upon the land. In many places the tallest man could not have held a hand above the surface. Everywhere the folk of the hills and glens were exiles from their fellows. There was not a laird who did not suffer, not a farmer who did not bewail his bitter ill, not a crofter who did not pray to God to be merciful. Sheep perished by hundreds daily. Deer and wild birds were seen in village streets, in farm-steadings, in sheltered graveyards. In Monalee Kirk, up in the wild hills beyond Strathgask, the belling of a stag was heard. The beast was found there a month later, with his horns tangled in the pulpit stairs.

From the third day there were frequent lapses, sometimes long lapses, in the storm. But no thaw came, and intermittently the snow fell, now for an hour or two, now for many hours, occasionally throughout a whole day or night. When two weeks were passed, Christmas was come. It is told to this day, in Sutherland and Ross, how on that Christmas—am Nollaig-Dhu, the Black Christmas, as it is still called—not a bell was tolled in any kirk in the hill-country. The kirks were there, but there were no roads, no paths, no wayfarers. The whole land was submerged in a white silence.

Digitized by Google

Here and there a few places were slightly favoured. A river-way was feasible now and again ; or a frozen loch was available, with the black ice-path shelved through high walls of snow.

It was thus at Monalee. The folk in the hamlet of Ballingask, at the south end of Loch Monadh, could communicate with their neighbours in Monalee, at the north end. Loch Monadh, though never half a mile broad, and, as a homing crow flies, not more than three miles in length, curves its narrow, tortuous way for seven miles. In the mile and a-half straight between the precipices of Ben Monadh and Maol Gask it is scarcely more than a hundred yards wide.

Christmastide had begun, however, before the men at Ballingask and Monalee cleared a path along the seven-mile reach of the loch. Once the ice-way was made throughout, it was easy for the laddies of the two hamlets to sweep it clear after any sudden fall. Nowhere was the path wider than two yards, and for much of its length a yard width was all that had been made. A skater by night, therefore, and particularly when the mists were abroad, had need to go warily.

Few persons, however, whether on foot or on skates, cared for that long lonely journey. The deathly cold from the walls of snow, from six to ten feet in height, was alone enough to daunt most would-be wayfarers. Moreover, a rumour had spread from croft to croft, from cottage to cottage, that the Grey Woman had been seen more than once, now in the rocky graveyard of Monalee, now on the ice-way on Loch Monadh itself.

No one could give a quite authentic account of the Grey Woman. Some said that she was a spirit, the ghost of a woman who had been foully slain in bygone days ; others, that she was a Cailleach, a witch of the hills ; a few, that she was a demon, allied to the kelpie, a demon born of the snow ; and one or two old people maintained that the ancient wisdom must be right, and that she was the Banamortair of Ben Monadh, the murderess of the hills—to meet whom was to court death by strangulation, or in some other horrible guise. She had not been seen for nearly a generation ; but now she was come again, it was said.

On the night before Christmas, Ulric Cameron thought of this uncanny tale, and not without a shiver. It had been a dark, lowering day, with an occasional slight snowfall, but windless, and heavily oppressive, with a peculiar gloom. Since morning the young man had moved to and fro in silence. There were few other thoughts in his mind save those which turned upon Margaret Ruthven and their love for each other, and how they were that night to meet by the old tower at the lonely north-east end of Loch Monadh.

The more he thought of the maze of love into which they had fallen, the more he feared some mischance in the fulfilment of their plans. That he, the son of Sir Kenneth Cameron, of Achnagair, should mate with the daughter of Alexander Ruthven, the laird of Monalee, might well have seemed an appropriate union, were it not that Achnagair was an impoverished estate, and that General Sir Kenneth Cameron had very limited means beyond his official pay, while "Monalee" was one of the richest commoners in the northern counties. Moreover, the widowed Earl of Mongarry wished to wed Margaret Ruthven, and her father had set his heart on the match, notwithstanding the girl's dislike of their heavy-featured, heavy-handed, and heavy-minded neighbour, a man of more than double her age, and about whose name was an odour of ill deeds. True, this repute belonged rather to his past than to his present ; yet no one, except one so selfish and blinded as Alexander Ruthven, could have wished to see united so fresh and sweet a girl as Margaret and so commonplace a wreck of true manhood as Lord Mongarry.

These, and other circumstances involved, placed Ulric and Margaret in a sufficiently difficult position. But to add to it, there was an unexpected complication. Catherine Ruthven, Margaret's cousin and housemate—as dark as she was fair, and with a proud look on her handsome features that was often mistaken for beauty—happened likewise to love Ulric. Always a repressed, and even a bitter, nature, she had concentrated all her force of will upon the gaining of his love in return. When she perceived that her hopes were in vain, and that Ulric Cameron unquestionably loved Margaret, she did not relinquish her quest, but changed her tactics. For, as she knew, she had one weapon which was all the more likely to be effective from the fact that it was, then at least, invisible to the two whose happiness it menaced. James

Digitized by Google

Ruthven, cousin both to her and to Margaret, the son of Robert Ruthven, the minister of Strathgask, also loved Margaret. With this secret knowledge she realised that she might possibly be able to bring about her own ends; for, rightly or wrongly, she was convinced that Margaret cared for, rather than loved, Ulric.

But as spring grew into summer, and summer waned into autumn, what had been kept secret was made clear. To Ulric himself there was no longer any uncertainty. When, at the gathering in the glens at Martinmas, Mr. Ruthven had spoken to him, and added that he would never consent to the marriage, and that Margaret was destined for marriage with Lord Mongarry, he knew well that "Monalee" had been put on his guard by Catherine.

When by midwinter all else had failed he and Margaret had made up their minds to tempt circumstances no longer. They were to meet on Christmas Eve, and then definitely arrange how and when to escape southward together. The endeavour, as Ulric knew, might well prove to be futile, did the snow spell hold. There was no traffic anywhere in the north, and for twenty miles south of Ballingask there was not an available path, save a narrow footpath along which a flight such as they projected would be impracticable.

When the morning of the 24th broke, there were signs of a thaw. Long before noon, however, these had vanished, though the day remained dull and heavy.

Ulric had left Achnagair in the late afternoon, in order to pass his hour or two of suspense at the house of Roy McLean, an ex-keeper on his father's impoverished estate. Roy's cottage was on the loch side, away from the village, and it would be easy to skate thence without being seen of anyone in Ballingask.

In this he felt sure he was successful, when, in the early evening and in a cloudy darkness, he emerged from the comfortable peat-glow of Roy's hearth into the cold blackness. The transient thaw had added to the chill breath of the snow, and the night air was piercingly cold. He was glad, having first slipped on his skates and muttered a good-bye to Roy McLean, and then moved cautiously through the reeds, to glide swiftly along the cleared ice-path which led to the main way across the loch from Ballingask to Monalee.

Although there was no light from moon or star, and the blackness overhead was intense, there was a wan gleam from the snow. Ulric at first could not see the ice at his feet, though he could discern the filmy white walls which closed him in; but as his eyes grew accustomed to the obscurity he found he could see clearly enough to enable him to double his speed.

About a mile and a half from the bend which hid Ballingask he had a bad fall. The way seemed clear, and he was skating with a long swinging glide, when simultaneously he felt a pain above the ankles like a sudden burn and was precipitated head foremost upon the ice.

Half-stunned, he lay for a few moments inert. Then, aching and chilled, he staggered to his feet, and looked for the loose branch or frozen snag which had upset him. Nothing was visible. He was about to move onward, under the impression that his fall was due to some little cleft in the ice, when he remembered the stinging pain. Puzzled, he stopped, slipped a box from his belt-pouch, and lit a match.

A yard or two away lay the broken end of a piece of cord. Clearly, it had been drawn across the path, and must have been fastened securely at either end. Following that which he held, Ulric speedily discovered that it was knotted to a stout alder embedded in the snow. Although he could not find the other half of the cord, a brief examination revealed that on the other side was another stunted tree. He knew now where he was; a little island locally called Heronshaw.

That the cord had been drawn taut, and left in that state for a definite end, was unmistakable. What could this end be, he wondered, and who was the person?

A vague uneasiness possessed him. And yet, he muttered, was it not the most likely thing that the cord had been put there by a poacher, perhaps by a crofter eager to intercept a deer?

However, as the problem was not one to be solved then and there, particularly as there was not a sign of anyone, nor even a trace of the missing part of the cord, Ulric decided to waste no more time. He still felt somewhat dazed and stiff from his bad fall, but motion helped him, and in a brief while he glided along as swiftly and easily as before.

He had skated not more than three or four hundred yards when abruptly he lessened his speed, and swung slowly round, to stand poised and intent.

Digitized by Google

Surely, he thought, that was the sound of skates he had heard, and not far behind him. Now, when he listened, he could hear nothing; and yet could ears so keen and trained as his be mistaken in a sound so peculiar?

For at least three minutes he stood motionless. There was not a sound in the black night. Not even a breath of wind ruffled the surface of the white walls which banked the narrow ice-path in its seven-mile course.

Stooping, he laid his head close to the ice. There was not the faintest vibration.

Convinced at last that he had been mistaken, he slowly moved on his way once more. In a few seconds he was round another bend, and so even a fairly audible sound behind him would now be deadened. Realising this, and that he need no longer listen for what, after all, was probably imaginary, he gave way to his impatience and sped onward.

The third, fourth, and fifth miles were passed; always in the same frozen silence.

It was in the sixth mile that once again Ulric was startled by the sound of following feet—the sound of a skater at no great distance behind.

This time there could be no mistake. True, the bend in the snow-walls that at that moment intervened deadened for a moment the rhythmic sighing sound, but when Ulric stood still and listened intently he could hear the thin crackling vibrate along the sensitive ice.

Who could it be, he wondered? Was it, as was probable, someone bound for Monalee on some urgent errand? or, perchance, was he pursued, and if so, by whom?

While he was still pondering, his strained ears caught the sound of motion beyond him. Yes, another wayfarer was abroad, despite the terrible darkness, in that desolate place; but one who walked, who did not skate. Could it possibly be Margaret? No; they were to meet at a spot called Forest Cross, a short distance to the eastward of Monalee, and some three hundred yards inland from the loch; moreover, yet another hour would elapse before the meeting was due.

Nevertheless, his heart beat when, a vague whiteness in the dark, a woman's figure came stealthily out of the night.

The spot at which he had stopped was at a curve where the rocky wooded shore lay sheer above the water. A great boulder leant forward, so that under its protruded bulk there was shelter. In this cavernous hollow Ulric had lain down, glad to find that, though not a yard from the ice, he would be invisible to any passer-by, while through the tangled mass of frozen reed and bracken he was himself able to see as clearly as the darkness would permit.

When first he caught a shadowy glimpse of a woman's figure he almost betrayed himself. Margaret's name sprang to his lips, and it was with an effort that he checked himself. As it was, a slight sound escaped him.

The woman stopped abruptly. It was impossible to see who she was, or if young or old; scarcely even if tall or short, for she was but a dusky haze against the wan gleam of the snow.

The thought of the terrible Banamortair made him shiver. Was it she indeed, to meet whom was certain death? Rumour had been busy of late with that terrible legend. Had not even Roy McLean that very gloaming alluded to the Grey Woman with credulous awe? Had he not spoken of her as having been seen a month ago by Alpin McRurie, the shepherd, who had been found dead in the snow three days later? And what of the awful fate of Peter Strachan, the blind fiddler? The doctor and the minister at Ballingask declared that the man had perished of an apoplexy, induced by drink and after-exposure; but had he not all the appearance of having been strangled, and, too, had he not boasted that very day that he had heard the Banamortair laughing among the pines of Alltnagask, and that he had laughed back, he not caring a straw for any witch or bogie that ever lived?

Whatever it was, she appeared to have been startled by the sound she had heard. She moved close to a snow-wall, and became almost invisible; the utmost that Ulric could see was a faint shadowy obscurity, scarce distinguishable even to eyes that knew what to look for.

Doubtless she too had now heard the sound of someone rapidly approaching.

The skater came on with a long swinging rhythm that was clearly audible. If, indeed, he did pursue Ulric Cameron, he must have believed he was out of earshot, or else he no longer cared.

Digitized by Google

A slight confusion even in the blackness of the night made Ulric peer anxiously this way and that. A few cold flakes on his face made him understand why he could no longer see even the ice-track a yard to two away. The snow had begun to fall again.

Perhaps for the same reason, the skater missed the track at the bend and came into collision with the snow-wall. With a dull thud he fell. Then slowly, and as though in pain, he rose.

Had he caught sight of the Grey Woman, Ulric wondered, for the man now remained perfectly still, and appeared to await someone or something.

It was impossible for Ulric to see anything. In front of the hollow where he lay a momentary wan shimmer passed continuously through the blackness. The snowfall made the darkness doubly, confusedly dark.

At last the new-comer moved slowly forward. In a low voice he asked if anyone were there. There was no answer. Again he spoke. This time his voice struck Ulric as vaguely familiar. Surely, he thought, it was that of James Ruthven!

Abruptly the man gave way, and began to glide rapidly forward; but with still greater suddenness he sprang to one side, with a hoarse cry.

Instinctively Ulric rose. Stealthily he moved out of the bend of the boulder, and stood among the frozen reeds by the ice-edge.

"Is that you, Ulric Cameron?"

Amazed beyond words, Ulric remained silent, stricken speechless. Not only was he thus mysteriously addressed by an invisible speaker, but the voice was that of a woman, and, unless he were dreaming, the voice of Catherine Ruthven!

But if he were bewildered by this unexpected summons, he was still more mystified when a response came, a few yards from where he stood.

"Yes."

That was all. But what did it mean? Who was this who simulated Ulric Cameron, and to what end?

Whether it was that the snowfall had ceased, or that a few stars emitted a faint gleam, it was now possible to see further and with a certain definiteness.

From where he stood Ulric could discern the figure of the man whose following steps had so perturbed him. He could not see who he was, but, bearing in remembrance the voice he had heard, he did not doubt that the skater was James Ruthven. But if so, why had he answered that he was Ulric Cameron?

Again the woman's voice broke the stillness, and again it sounded to him as that of Catherine Ruthven.

"You are going to meet Margaret?"

For a moment Ulric hoped there would be no response, but the next moment a muffled voice spoke.

"Yes."

He caught a momentary shadowy glimpse of the skater as he moved forward. But after that he heard nothing, saw nothing.

Figures, voices, both disappeared as absolutely as though they had never been. At first he listened intently, and strained his eyes to pierce the darkness, but without avail. Once, for a second, he fancied he heard a rustling sound a long distance away. When he listened again it was gone, if it had ever existed.

Minute after minute elapsed; five minutes, ten, twenty. Still there was no sign, not a sound.

Startled by a sudden thought, he lit a match in the hollow of his hand, and glanced at his watch. It was just possible he had slept and dreamt it all. But no; the evidence of the watch disproved any such idea.

Till half an hour had passed he waited with anxious patience. Then, dreading to be late for his perilous appointment with Margaret, he moved on to the ice-path, feeling more assured as soon as he heard the crackle of his skates.

Once only was he alarmed, and that was a few minutes after he had begun to glide steadily forward. For a moment he imagined that someone had moaned—a low dull moan, like that of a deer stricken to death and dying solitary. It was so profoundly dark that he could discern nothing. He stopped, peered about him, even felt here and there along the snow-walls. Nowhere could he find any trace of a creature in the rude hummocks into which the snow had there been thrown.

For the first time he was conscious of genuine fear—fear of he knew not what. Almost before he realised what he was doing he swung forward at full speed.

Flying along the ice as he was, it was difficult for him to perceive any object, even if strongly outlined against the snow-wall; but once he shuddered, for he thought he passed the Grey Woman herself!

Digitized by Google

Thereafter he scarce drew breath till he reached the end of the loch. The few red lights which showed where Monalee clustered comforted him unspeakably. As swiftly as was possible he unfastened his skates, hid them in the cranny of a tree he knew well, and, after some vain searching, having found the path which led to Forest Cross, disappeared into the double darkness of the wood.

With what joy it was that at last he found Margaret in his arms! to know her safely there, and ready to hazard all! What had seemed to be infeasible was now feasible. If they could make their way through the wood from Forest Cross to Meldunn they would emerge upon Loch-na-Roid, across which Roy McLean and one or two friends had, during the last week or more, cleared a path. Five miles upon Loch-na-Roid would bring them to Innerbruay, a village upon the King's highway, now at last open after weeks of isolation.

One question only Ulric had asked, that had surprised Margaret. This was about Catherine. Where was she? Had she any knowledge of this secret meeting? Had she left the house?

To this she could reply only by negatives. So far as she knew, Catherine was at that moment in her room.

. . . . . .

An abrupt ending! Yes. But what need to say more than can be told in a few words?

Ulric and Margaret made their way in safety through the dark wood and the blackness of the night; in safety they reached Innerbruay, and thence to the town where they were made husband and wife. As all who know their story are aware, this runaway match proved to be one of the happy romances of the world. Not only was their own joy assured, but even stern Alexander Ruthven was won to forgiveness—partly, no doubt, because Lord Mongarry consoled himself elsewhere.

But what of the tragedy—what of the tragic drama of that night?

No one knows the exact truth. To this day no one has associated the terrible death of James Ruthven, whose strangled body was found in the snow on Christmas morning, with any human creature; no one, except Ulric Cameron—who knows that Catherine Ruthven will never meet him again, will never again look him in the eyes.

Throughout Strathgask and all that desolate region it is held as irrefutable that James Ruthven was the victim of the Grey Woman, the terrible Banamortair of the hills. He was the third victim, it was averred; so she would not come again for a generation.

That he had been strangled was unmistakable, and that swiftly and surely. But there was not a shadow of evidence against anyone, nor did a breath of suspicion rest on any innocent person. From the southernmost glen watered by Monalee Water to the wild shores of Cape Wrath no other version of his death was accepted than that which attributed the tragedy to the agency of the Grey Woman. Even when, a month or two later Catherine Ruthven left her home abruptly, and was never seen in the neighbourhood again, there was no tongue busy with her name.

Only Ulric Cameron knew that he had seen the Grey Woman in very truth, more terrible in his eyes than any legendary phantom; and only Ulric Cameron knew that the victim of that unforgettable Christmas Eve was meant to be—Ulric Cameron.

By what strange fatality the tragedy had been wrought otherwise than was intended he could never know. Another had paid with his life for possibly an innocent heedlessness; and the murderer was free.

But is there any freedom for one who has taken life in murderous hate? Is there not a more dreadful Nemesis in Time than in the bitter law of man, or in the old Scriptural requirement that a life shall pay for a life? There is a life more terrible than death.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

Princesses of Wales.

By LAURA A. SMITH.

NO consummation to that world-wide tour round the British dominions by our King's son and his beloved consort could be so fitting, or appeal so strongly to the hearts of the people, as the bestowal on them of the titles of Prince and Princess of Wales.

These titles are regarded with special affection by Britons the world over, because of the loyalty and love which we feel for the royal and gracious pair who so long bore them—our King and Queen.

The name "Princess of Wales" is associated in our minds with all that is brightest and most endearing in the Royal Family, owing to the personal charm of Queen Alexandra, and in the "Princess May," as we knew her in her younger days, we have another Royal lady who has completely won the hearts of the people, and whose popularity as Princess of Wales is assured.

In this connection it is interesting to cast a retrospective glance at those ladies who have borne this title. Strange to say, there have only been seven previous to our present Princess of Wales, and in several cases the dignified position of wife of the Prince of Wales has only been a very temporary distinction, and the lives of three or four of them have been full of sorrow and of tragedy.

The love affairs of that renowned warrior, Edward the Black Prince, seemed to be fated, for extraordinary accidents constantly occurred to prevent the realisation of any of his matrimonial schemes. Possibly the truth was that he had for several years been passionately in love with his beautiful cousin, Joanna, the Fair Maid o' Kent, daughter of Edmund, Earl of Kent. This lady had in her infancy been wedded to the Earl of Salisbury, but after her divorce she remained unmarried until she was twenty-five, when, finding that neither King Edward nor his Queen Philippa were likely to consent to her union with their son, she gave her hand to Sir Thomas Holland. Queen Philippa had a very poor opinion of this Kentish beauty, hence her objection to her as a daughter-in-law, and her determined effort to keep the Prince out of the way of her fascinations.

H.R.H. THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

Photo by Elliott & Fry, 55, Baker Street, W.

Digitized by Google

Time went on and still Edward, Prince of Wales, remained a bachelor for the sake of his fair cousin of Kent.

Eventually the King and Queen withdrew their opposition, although Queen Philippa still deemed her unworthy of her son, and also because of the nearness of kin and the Prince's having formed a still stronger relationship with her, according to the laws of the Roman Catholic Church, by becoming sponsor to her two sons, and having held them in his arms at the baptismal font. The marriage was solemnised at Windsor Chapel on October 10th, 1361, after which the King gave over the Duchy of Aquitaine to his son, and he and his long-waited-for bride set off for that territory.

But before long the Black Prince was taken ill in Gascony with a pining decay, and he never lived to come to the throne, whilst his beautiful Princess died of a broken heart. Their only child was Richard II., known as Richard of Bordeaux, the most poetical and musical of kings, born in sunny Provence, and nurtured midst the luxurious surroundings of that beautiful land of the Troubadours. When he married his first Queen, Anne of Bohemia, his mother Joanna, Princess of Wales, had great influence over her, and, indeed, over Richard too, and this influence she used to ensure the safety of Wickliffe, whose convert she was.

The murder of Lord Stafford by Joanna's son (the King's half-brother), John Holland, eventually caused her death. She pleaded vainly with Richard to spare his half-brother, the murderer, and, finally worn out with grief, she died at the Castle of Wallingford.

Anne of Warwick, subsequently the Queen of Richard III., was the second Princess of Wales and one of the most unhappy bearers of the title. Very brief was the wedded life of Anne and Prince Edward of Lancaster, for they were married in the August of 1470 at Angers, and the nineteen-year-old Prince fell at the Battle of Tewkesbury on May 4th, 1471. Under the stately towers of the Abbey there this ill-fated Prince of Wales was buried, and his resting-place marked by a tombstone of grey marble said to have been placed there by Anne. This poor young Prince and Princess of Wales were devoted to each other, and theirs is probably one of the saddest stories of the Plantaganet days.

Anne was the daughter of Anne, Countess of Warwick, and she was one of that unfortunate party of Royal ladies who had to take refuge in the Convent of Beaulieu, in Hampshire, during the reverses of the Lancastrian party. After her mother-in-law, Margaret of Anjou, had been taken to the Tower, the widowed Princess of Wales hid from her abhorred cousin Richard of Gloucester. She disguised herself as a servant, and for nearly two years she lived in a mean house in London, where Richard eventually found her.

Immediately after his discovery he placed her in the Sanctuary of St. Martin's-le-Grand. From there she was removed to the Archbishop of York's care, he being her uncle and a good friend to the unfortunate Princess. All this time Anne refused to listen to her cousin, the hated Gloucester, but in 1473 she married him, compelled by his constant persecutions. She went to live at Middleham Castle, where her son Edward was born, the only consolation which this poor lady ever had from this union with her venomous hunchback husband. Many a time, when shut up in this dreary Yorkshire house, did Anne's thoughts turn to her all too brief life with her dearly loved husband Edward, Prince of Wales. Her little son was created Prince of Wales the same day that she and the King were crowned. Later, when the sovereigns were recrowned at York Cathedral Anne walked through the narrow streets of the city holding little Edward by the hand. He wore the demi-crown of the heir apparent.

The death of this idolised child in 1484 was the forerunner of the Queen's own end, and she died at Westminster Palace in 1485 in the midst of a terrible eclipse of the sun. "No memorial," says Agnes Strickland, "marks the spot where the broken heart of the hapless Anne of Warwick found rest from as much sorrow as could possibly be crowded into the brief space of thirty-one years."

Digitized by Google

The first wife of Henry VIII. is not often thought of in the rôle of Princess of Wales, but hers perhaps was one of the most interesting tenures of this Royal womanly dignity. Her husband was, of course, Prince Arthur, the son of Henry VII. She was the daughter of Ferdinand of Arragon and of Donna Isabel, Queen of Castille, and Erasmus tells us "she was imbued with learning by the care of her illustrious mother from her infant years."

H.M. QUEEN ALEXANDRA.
Photo by Russell & Sons, 17, Baker Street, W.

In 1497 she was betrothed to the Prince of Wales, the correspondence which was carried on between the lovers being in Latin and under the strict surveillance of the tutors, preceptors, confessors, bishops, lady-governesses and lord-governors, who were on duty at the Alhambra and at Ludlow Castle. The letters were of course much what might be expected from young people of the ages of Katharine and Arthur. Here is a specimen from the latter:—

> have read the sweet letters of your Highness lately given to me from which I easily perceived your most entire love for me. Truly those letters traced by your own hand have so delighted me and made me so cheerful and jocund that I fancied I beheld your Highness and conversed with and embraced my dearest wife. I cannot tell you what an earnest desire I feel to see your Highness and how vexatious to me is this procrastination about your coming.

This letter is inscribed "To the most illustrious and excellent Princess the Lady Katharine, Princess of Wales, Duchess of Cornwall, and my most entirely beloved spouse."

It was not until 1501 that the Infanta set off from Grenada for England, where a very loyal reception awaited her amongst the people she was destined later to have as subjects. The King and Prince Arthur set out to meet the bride, and when she got near the plains (probably the Downs) they could see a party of Spanish cavaliers pacing over them in very solemn state. Their errand was to forbid the approach of the bridegroom and his father to the presence of the Infanta, for according to Moorish etiquette she was not to be looked upon by her betrothed until she met him at the altar. There was of course much consternation at this, and King Henry raised objections in true British fashion. Calling those nobles who formed his Privy Council round him, the English Soverign propounded his dilemma to them in spite of the heavy rain which was falling.

In wordy harangue came the Council's opinion, and it was to the effect that the

Digitized by Google

Spanish Infanta being now in the heart of this realm, of which King Henry was master, he might look at her if he liked. Leaving the Prince on the Downs the King went to Dogmersfield, where the Infanta was, and great consternation prevailed when he demanded to see her. The Lady Infanta had retired to her chamber, they said, but Henry's answer was, if she were even in her bed he meant to see her, and to speak with her. He succeeded in doing so, but an interpreter had to assist at the interview, which was however most satisfactory.

ANNE, PRINCESS OF WALES.
Bride of Prince Edward of Lancaster, and afterwards Queen of Richard III.

The King sent for the Prince, and after supper the Infanta and her ladies, calling for their minstrels, danced for the amusement of their English guests. Prince Arthur was not able to follow the fantastic terpsichorean measures of the Spanish ladies, but, not to be outdone, he took the Lady Guildford, his sister's governess, and "danced with her right pleasantly and honourably." The Infanta's entry into London was, of course, marked with much rejoicing. She wore a coif of carnation colour, and her rich auburn hair streamed over her shoulders.

The marriage, which took place in St. Paul's Cathedral, was one of the most gorgeous pageants which graced the Court of Henry VII. Edward the Fourth's daughter, the widow of Lord Wells, was her train-bearer, the train being of white satin; indeed the descriptions given in the old Chronicles of the "goodly and costious apparel" worn that day are quite bewildering. Strange to say, it was the young Duke of York, afterwards Henry VIII., who led the Infanta from the Bishop's Palace to St. Paul's. The sixteen-year-old bride was inclined to be very sad when her Spanish attendants left her, but King Henry took her to his library where he entertained her with his books, and where he had brought a jeweller from whom she was told to select jewels at her pleasure.

The young Prince and Princess left for Ludlow Castle after the marriage, and here they kept up a miniature Court, modelled on that at Westminster. Ludlow Castle had been repaired by Edward IV. as the Palace of the Princes of Wales, and to serve as the appointed place for meeting his deputies, the Lords Presidents, who held in it the Court of the Marches, for transacting the business of the Principality.

Prince Arthur and his bride were deservedly popular at Ludlow, but their happiness was of short duration, for he died of the plague in 1502.

The troubles of the Princess of Wales seemed to begin from the day she lost her young husband. She came at her mother-in-law's request back to London, in a black velvet lined litter with valances of black cloth, and took up her abode at the country palace of Croydon, her time being divided between here and Arragon House, Twickenham.

KATHARINE OF ARRAGON.
[The wife, first of Prince Arthur, then of Henry VIII.

Henry VII. soon began to torment her with proposals of marriage with her brother-in-law, the Duke of York, or rather Prince of Wales, as he had then become, the King's real object being to retain the

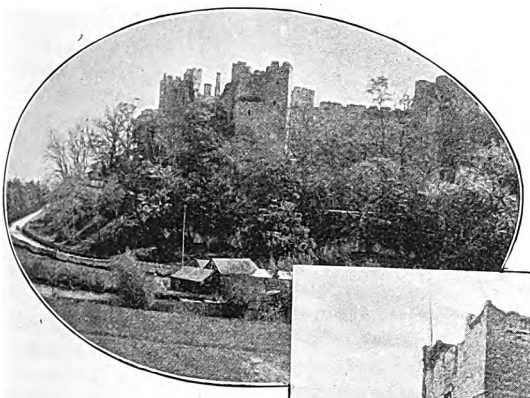
Digitized by Google

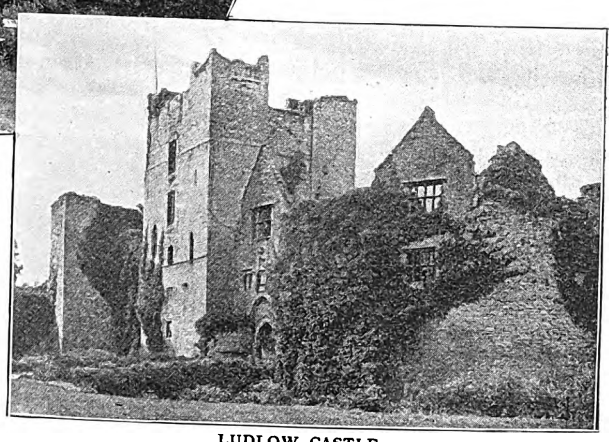
Spanish Princess's marriage portion in the family. The betrothal took place on June 25th, 1504, at the Bishop of Salisbury's house in Fleet-street. Unfortunately for Katharine her mother, Queen Isabel of Castille, died about this time, and she was left between the tender mercies of two crafty potentates, her father Ferdinand, and Henry VII.

She was kept in poverty, often lacking suitable and even necessary clothing; she had no Spanish confessor, and, worst fate of all, the proximity of her home at Twickenham to the river caused her to suffer constantly with the type of malarial fever then prevalent.

Henry VII. declared that Ferdinand had never paid in full the marriage portion agreed upon for the Infanta, and he visited this omission of the father's upon the daughter in the most cowardly way, depriving her of much, and even intercepting her letters to her father and sister. These letters were generally endorsed, "From the Lady Princess of Wales."

Space fails us to continue this sketch of the career of this most interesting Princess of Wales. Her marriage with Henry VIII. and her subsequent career and tragic end as the wife of that monster of infidelity are only too well known. It was certainly an evil day for Katharine when the pomegranite of the South was blended with the roses of York and Lancaster, and the scarlet fruit of the Tudor hawthorn.





LUDLOW CASTLE.
Where the early Princes of Wales held their Court.
Photos by Jones, Son, & Harper, Ludlow.

We have a long interval—200 years—before there is another Princess of Wales to take note of, and then we find her in Caroline of Anspach, the wife of Prince George, afterwards George II., who, as Prince of Wales, was constantly at feud with his father. George I. attributed much of his son's rebellion to the influence of his clever daughter-in-law, who, though the intrigues at this Court would fill volumes, was enabled to steer her course through them. She was undoubtedly one of the most interesting of the Georgian royal ladies, being exceptionally brilliant and witty.

The next Princess of Wales was the daughter of the Elector of Saxony, Frederick II., Princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha, the wife of Prince Frederick, son of George II. and Caroline. Of her Horace Walpole wrote "She has never said a foolish thing, or done a disobliging one since her arrival, though often placed in very difficult situations." Unfortunately, differences between the King and Queen, and her husband, Frederick, Prince of Wales, marred the Court life of this Princess, who had undoubtedly great ascendancy over him, and, had there been less interference at the time, there would probably have been a happier life—short as it was—to record of this Prince and Princess of Wales.

The death of the Prince, from pleurisy and a wound from a blow of a tennis ball, was a great grief to Princess Augusta, and she stayed four hours in his room after he had breathed his last before she could be convinced that he was gone. The King was very kind and attentive to his daughter-in-law in her widowed state, but in many ways she frustrated his ambitions concerning her son George, and finally the episode of Lord Bute and her projects for the young Prince of Wales leave but little room to doubt the deceptive course which her Royal Highness assumed.

Digitized by Google

The Dowager Princess of Wales—as Prince Frederick's widow was always termed—is the only instance of a Princess of Wales having been appointed Regent. She was, of course, subject to the control of a council composed of the Duke of Cumberland and nine other officers of State. She died in February of 1772.

CAROLINE OF BRUNSWICK, PRINCESS OF WALES.
Consort of George IV.

Our King was said to have fallen in love with the sweet face of the Danish Princess from a photograph which was accidentally shown to him. The husband of the Princess of Brunswick, as the consort of George IV. was called, had his first glowing impressions of her beauty verbally depicted for him by the Duke of Clarence. That this marriage proved a most unfortunate one is ever to be regretted but it would seem a little ungracious to revert to that in the course of this paper which has to touch upon so much that is happier.

The marriage of the Prince of Wales and the daughter of the Duke of Brunswick took place in April, 1795, he being thirty-two years of age and she twenty-three.

The Princess sailed from Cuxhaven in the Juno, and after a week's voyage she landed at Greenwich Hospital. The carriage was escorted by a small detachment of the Prince of Wales's Light Dragoons, and the fair young stranger met with the heartiest of welcomes all the way from there to St. James's Palace. The Princess was introduced into her apartments overlooking Cleveland Row, and after resting a little while she went to the window, and her appearance was the signal for some enthusiastic cheering on the part of the spectators who had assembled to catch a glimpse of the bride-elect. Presently the Prince of Wales arrived from Carlton House. He was introduced by Lord Malmesbury, but in spite of his usual savoir faire and much vaunted manners, the first gentleman in Europe was strangely agitated. He wore the Hussar uniform

PRINCESS AUGUSTA IN HER ROBES AS REGENT.
The only Princess of Wales who held the office.

Digitized by Google

and looked remarkably well.

Shortly before 5 o'clock, dinner was served, Lady Jersey, Mrs. Harvey-Aston, Lord Malmesbury and others joining the Royal party. Outside, the crowd still waited patiently, hoping for another sight of the Princess, but the Prince went forward to excuse her on the score of fatigue, and the fear of her taking cold.

The next day the marriage took place at the Chapel Royal, the Archbishop of Canterbury performing the ceremony. Supper at Buckingham House finished the day's proceedings.

AUGUSTA, PRINCESS OF WALES.
Wife of Prince Frederick, son of George II.

From the moment of her arrival in England, the Princess of Wales set the fashions. She was very graceful and always beautifully dressed, and all feminine London—or perhaps it would be more correct to say, all feminine England—sought to imitate the modes introduced by the Brunswick Royal lady.

But though life opened for her so auspiciously, the poor Princess was destined to endure years of suffering both as Princess of Wales and Queen Consort, and the indignities to which the unhappy Royal lady was subjected, the calumnies circulated about her, are all so many blots on the pages of English history which nothing can efface.

In her retirement at Shooter's Hill, one of her favourite amusements was gardening, and it may be news to many of our readers to know that Her Royal Highness cultivated numbers of vegetables and much fruit, which she sold to the London markets, the proceeds going towards the various expenses she contracted for her charitable work. The Princess was also a capable performer on the harpsichord and a clever needlewoman. So, in these womanly pursuits the second lady in the land passed her time, and we are brought to the advent of the seventh Princess of Wales—Her Royal Highness Princess Alexandra Caroline Marie Charlotte Louise Julie of Denmark.

CAROLINE, WHEN QUEEN OF GEORGE IV.

The English Press and periodical literature have long since exhausted every detail of our Queen's life and personality, but we love to go on reiterating the goodness, the charm of manner, the beautiful presence and the ever-present sympathy of her who will assuredly go down to posterity as the good and beautiful Princess of Wales.

LAURA A. SMITH.

Digitized by Google

The Romance of the Christmas Card.

By ARTHUR WELBY.

CHRISTMAS has many allies who do his work right well, but none more true has he than the Christmas card, which carries his message of love to the hearts of millions. It is the glory of the Christmas card that it widens the bounds of the home circle—that magic ring in which the White Robed Enchanter wields his rod of power—and enables us, as we gather round the hearth, to share the joys of Christmas time with others far away.

The custom of sending some slight token or greeting at this season of the year is probably as old as Christmas itself, for the very spirit of the time compels us to stretch out the hand of fellowship to others.

But the Christmas card, as we know it, has an origin easily traceable, and it is not more than fifty-five years ago since the first was designed, and sent forth on its mission of goodwill.

Mr. Adolph Tuck, the head of the famous firm of art publishers, told the writer that twenty years ago he came across the artist who claimed to be its originator and who was, at any rate, the first to see its possibilities. This was Mr. W. C. T. Dobson, R.A., who, when quite a young man in 1844, was prompted at Christmas to make a little sketch (which is reproduced with this article) symbolic of the season's joys and festivities and to send it to a friend.

It seemed to give any amount of pleasure, and next year Mr. Dobson determined to follow up the idea on a larger scale, and by having his card lithographed was enabled to send copies to some twenty-five or thirty friends. The delight with which they were received was so great that Mr. Dobson was quick to perceive that he had found out a new pleasure for Christmas, though he could not have foreseen that the card of greeting was destined to become almost as indispensable to the proper celebration of the time as venerable customs which have been handed down for centuries, and which are received with undiminished delight by succeeding generations.

The Christmas tree, always an exotic in this country, was introduced into England somewhere about the same time as the Christmas card,

"UNCERTAIN, COY, AND HARD TO PLEASE."—Scott.

By permission of Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons, Ltd.

Digitized by Google

"HER EYES ARE HOMES OF SILENT PRAYER."—Tennyson.
By permission of Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons, Ltd.

but while the latter has continually increased in popularity, the former is now seldom seen.

Once started, the custom of sending Christmas cards soon became well established, but, like every other big thing, it took some decades to become universally popular, though the difference between the output then and now was not more marked than the difference between the cards themselves.

The simple floral design, or rural scene, aggressively Christmas, with its snowclad landscape, and often designed by inferior artists, which gave so much pleasure to our fathers and mothers, has given place to the beautifully and expensively got-up cards of the present day, which are often gems of art, and are as remarkable for their range of subjects as their execution.

Nor is this only true of the elaborate and more highly priced cards which well-to-do people make the medium of their kindly greetings, for even the penny cards present beautiful little pictures, carefully printed in as many as fifteen colours.

The fact is that it pays the publishers to only employ good artists, for the process of colour printing itself is very costly, and the outlay is only wasted on an ill-drawn and inartistically painted picture. A hundred pounds and more is often spent upon a set of cards which are to be sold for a penny each.

In the year 1844, when Mr. Dobson's idea was first taken up, only one colour

Digitized by Google

"THE STAG AT EVE HAD DRUNK HIS FILL."—Scott.
By permission of Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons, Ltd.

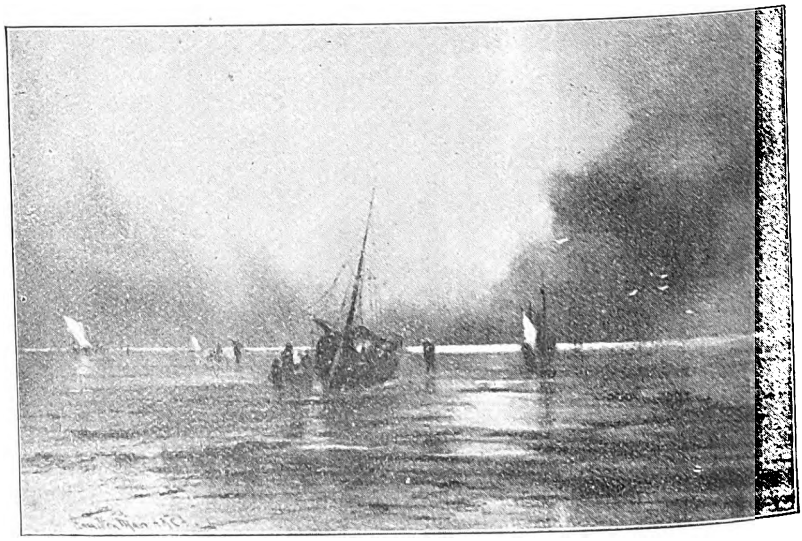
was used in the printing, and for very many years such a thing as a folding card was unknown. The next step was the introduction of the double card, and from that gradually evolved the dainty folding card, which at once took the public taste, and which is now the only kind for which there is much demand.

Besides the innate attractiveness of the idea one of the reasons why the Christmas card has such a vogue has been on account of the enterprise shown by the publishers, and especially by Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons, who are now, without question the premier firm, and with whose name the greatest triumphs in the evolution of the Christmas card are associated.

They have always anticipated the public want, never allowing people to become tired of the old attractions before they provided new, and continually creating a more critical taste by the increased artistic merit of their productions.

The commencement of what may be termed the national institution of Christmas cards, Mr. Adolph Tuck told the writer, may be dated from 1870, and from that time onward it continued to make enormous strides.

In 1880 Mr. Raphael Tuck, the founder of the firm, hit upon a happy idea which was not only destined to add enormously to the artistic value of their productions, but which drew public attention to the importance which the popular missive had assumed. He instituted a prize competition, for artists, and offered 500 guineas in prizes for the best designs submitted. The results of the competition were magnificent, and the firm became the possessors of many remarkably fine pictures, for besides awarding the prizes they invested another 2,500 guineas in purchasing the best of the works sent in.



"THE TENDER GRACE OF A DAY THAT IS DEAD WILL NEVER COME BACK TO ME."—Tennyson.
By permission of Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons, Ltd.

Digitized by Google

It, moreover, did good in other ways, for it opened a wide field for artistic talent, and brought to the front many excellent painters whose names have since become familiar, such as George Clausen, Kate Sadler, Alice Havers, F. E. Wetherbee, Troode, Alice Squire, Rebecca Coleman, Harriet M. Bennet, etc.

The selected pictures were exhibited at the Dudley Gallery, and drew crowds which would have done honour to the Royal Academy Exhibition, and the whole thing became the talk of the town.

The judges in the competition were painters and critics of high repute: Sir John Everett Millais, R.A., Sir Coutts Lindsay, Bart., and H. Stacy Marks, R.A.

The Saturday Review published a long article on the Exhibition from the pen of George Augustus Sala, who, using the phrase once applied to a famous poet, opened his account with the words, "Mr. Tuck awoke last Monday to find himself famous." This was literally true, for though his efforts in popularising the Christmas card had hitherto been crowned with great success, yet of the thousands who welcomed this economical but pleasing way of remembering absent friends, very few realised how much talent was being employed in the service of King Christmas.

Two years later Messrs. Tuck instituted their famous Royal Academy series, and among those who accepted commissions we find such names as Sir E. J. Poynter, now President of the Royal Academy, Herbert Sant, Marcus Stone, Geo. Boughton, Yeames, Storey, Horsley, Dendy Sadler, and Dobson the inventor of the Christmas card. "You have come to the right man," the latter remarked to Mr. Tuck, "for it was I who drew the first Christmas card, which was ever sent out," and it was thus that Messrs. Raphael Tuck came to find out to whom they were indebted for the germ idea, which had been evolved by their enterprise into a great national institution.

Sir John Millais was also approached, and asked to contribute designs, and though he was reluctantly compelled to decline owing to pressure of work, Mr. Tuck treasures up the memory of his half-hour interview with the great painter. "He received me most courteously," he told the writer, "but he was at the time overwhelmed with commissions, and was just then engaged on the portrait of Cardinal Manning, whom he kept waiting for ten minutes while he continued talking to me. He said that he heartily sympathised with our mission, and that we were doing an immense amount of good in the art education of the public, for no more effective means could have been devised to bring the best work into the hands of the people, for the Christmas card enters every home. 'I should only be too delighted to paint for you," he concluded, but I really haven't a moment to spare.'"

"SHE . . LAID HIM IN A MANGER."—Luke ii., 7.
By permission of Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons, Ltd.

Having enlisted the services of eminent painters, it was impossible to print under their pictures the effusions of ordinary rhymers, and Tuck's sought out no less a person than the Poet Laureate himself, Lord Tennyson, whom they offered 1000 guineas for a dozen verses of eight lines

Digitized by Google

"UNTO US A CHILD IS BORN."—Isaiah ix., 6.
By permission of Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons, Ltd.

each, or something over ten guineas a line, or a guinea a word, the highest price ever offered for a hundred lines of poetry. Tennyson once received half a guinea a word from Good Words, for his well known New Year's poem, commencing—

"I stood on the tower in the wet,
When the Old and the New Year met,"

but even he had never received such an offer before.

The Laureate, however, was not to be tempted by the golden bait, for he probably realised that nothing is more fatal to a poet's success than having to write to order, the reason, doubtless, why official verse is so often such a dismal failure.

There were others, however, of less note, who were willing and able to write verse of high literary merit, which was well worthy to appear in this remarkable series, a series that marked a new era in the history of the Christmas card.

From the reproduction of the works of celebrated living artists the next step was to make the people familiar with some of the world's greatest masterpieces, and the first picture chosen was the Madonna Ansidei, by Raphael, the wonderful work which hangs in the National Gallery and which was purchased by the nation for £70,000.

In order to produce a perfect copy it was necessary to work in front of the picture for about eight or nine weeks. It was printed in twenty-seven colours, and £1,000 was spent in its production. It was the finest piece of work which Tuck's had ever turned out, and they were overwhelmed with letters of congratulation from distinguished people, notably from Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, the Marquess of Salisbury, Mr. Gladstone, the Custodian of the National Gallery, and from any number of celebrated artists. This picture headed the sales during three seasons.

This was followed by the reproduction of the Madonna di San Sisto, Raphael's greatest work, and said to be the finest picture in the world.

"WHAT PEACEFUL HOURS I ONCE ENJOYED, HOW SWEET THEIR MEMORY STILL."—Cowper.
By permission of Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons, Ltd

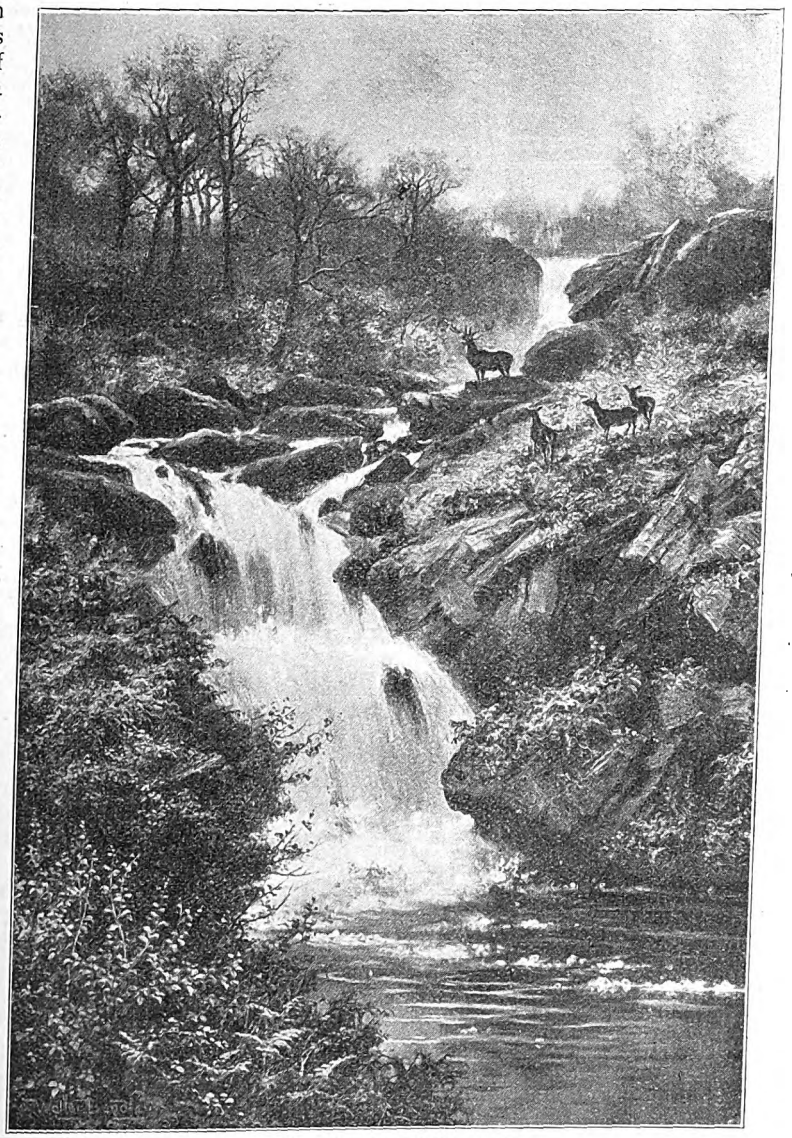
Digitized by Google

The original is at Dresden, and it is guarded day and night by sentries. The work which has been chosen as the pièce de resistance for this year will be another representation of the Madonna and Child, this time by a modern artist. Besides the excellence of the work a special if somewhat pathetic interest attaches to it, because it was specially painted for the late Queen last year.

For many years past, Her late Majesty was graciously pleased to accept, as a gift from the firm, a beautiful hand-painted Christmas card, which was sent to her on the 21st of December, and always promptly acknowledged by telegram and letter. This particular picture was greatly admired by the Queen, and was added to the collection which she had formed of her special favourites.

"We had always thought," said Mr. Tuck, "that these cards were laid aside and forgotten as soon as Christmas was over, but two years ago the Queen's cabinet makers received an order for a special screen for displaying three of the cards which Her Majesty liked best. The screen showed both the back and front of the cards, and always accompanied her Majesty in her journeys from one royal residence to another."

The Royal family were among the first to patronise the Christmas card, and every year they order large quantities to send to their friends, and their example has doubtless helped to establish the custom. It was Queen Alexandra who introduced the Tuck Christmas cards into Russia, when on a visit to her Imperial sister, and from the Court the custom rapidly spread throughout the country, until now it has become almost as firmly



THE HAUNT OF THE WILD DEER.
By permission of Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons, Ltd.

Digitized by Google

"ON EARTH PEACE, GOODWILL TOWARD MEN."—Luke ii., 14.
By permission of Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons, Ltd.

established there as in England. An idea of the progress which the trade has made in this country will be gained from the fact that when Messrs. Tuck started they sent out only six sets in the first year, which increased to thirty sets in the second, and fifty in the third year, while last season they prepared no less than 1,400 distinct sets, making 3,000 separate designs.

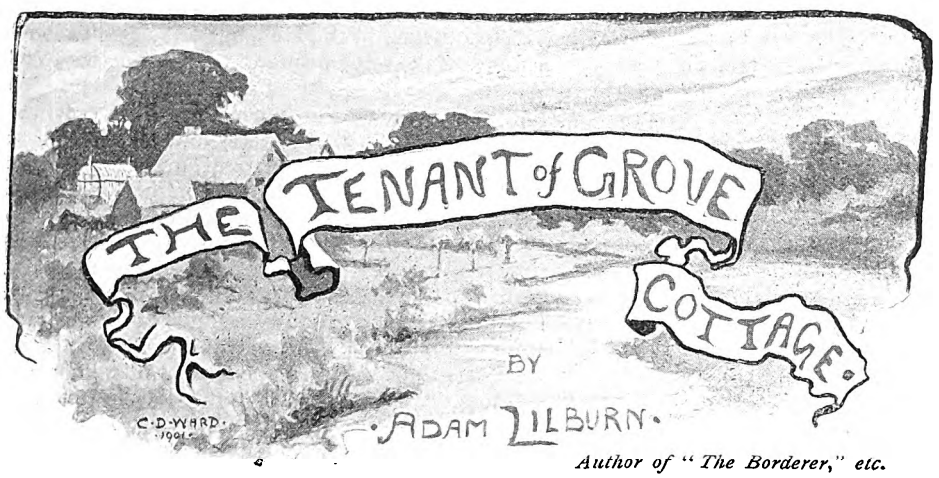
Doubtless the Christmas card has often done much to soften down harsh feeling and remove old bitterness, besides being an assurance of goodwill between friends, and there is one authentic instance in which it led to the sender becoming the recipient of a fortune of £40,000.

A certain gentleman, a doctor, living in Sheffield, had been for many years estranged from his aunt, a maiden lady, who possessed the comfortable sum already mentioned; passing a stationer's shop one day his eye was caught by a Christmas card, which he purchased and sent to his relative, though with very little hope that such a trifle would bring about a reconciliation. Even if he had entertained such an idea, it was speedily dispelled, for the missive never elicited any reply. When, however, the old lady died some time after, he found, much to his surprise, that he was left her sole heir, and he is not so ungrateful as to ascribe his good fortune to any other cause than the happy inspiration which prompted him to make amends for any unkindness by one of Tuck's Christmas cards.

ARTHUR WELBY.

THE FIRST CHRISTMAS CARD, DRAWN BY MR. W. C. T. DOBSON, R.A.
By permission of Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons, Ltd

Digitized by Google



Author of "The Borderer," etc.

Illustrated by CHAS. D. WARD.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Nora Shelley, Mr. Pattinson's young ward, walking out with her uncle from his country cottage one day, discovers the dead body of a stranger who has been stabbed in Dredman's Lane. The knife with which he was stabbed belongs to Mr. Pattinson himself. He explains that he used it to cut his shrubs with, and left it in a place where it might easily have been stolen. Suspicion falls upon the village ne'er-do-well, Jerry Gobey, who is found in possession of the dead man's purse. He is taken into custody. The murdered man is identified as Mr. John Carlton, of Carlton and Co., merchants, in London. At the trial affairs look black for the prisoner.

CHAPTER XI.

JERRY IS ACQUITTED.

THE new witness proved to be an even more disreputable-looking person than the prisoner himself. His garments—dirty and ragged—hung on his gaunt form like rags on a scarecrow, and his looks were both shifty and sullen. He nodded reassuringly towards the prisoner, for which he was immediately reprimanded by the constable standing beside him. When the oath was to be administered, he took hold of the Bible gingerly, as though afraid it might bite, but repeated the oath with a glibness that told its own tale.

"He said that his name was Bill Dawes—leastwise, that was what he'd been called when he was a boy. Yes; he'd had other names since—a few—only he didn't suppose they sinnerfied. Was the prisoner a pal of his? Yes; he wouldn't go for to deny that they'd done time together for the same offence once or twice. What of it? The best of chaps made mistakes sometimes and got into trouble."

Here the counsel for the prosecution interrupted, and inquired whether it was not a waste of time to listen to any statement, however plausible, coming from a source so utterly discreditable? It was quite evident to him that there had been a scheme concocted betwixt the prisoner and witness in order to screen the former, and attempt to prove an alibi.

The court here ruled that the witness must be heard, and that the counsel for the prosecution must reserve both question and comment until the close of the evidence. So Bill Dawes continued his statement.

"Upon the night of the murder he visited the prisoner in the tumbledown shanty the latter had chosen for a temporary abode. Jerry had sent him word that it was a safe spot to lay low in; and he, the witness, just happened to be in want of such a place just at that time. No, it wasn't anything very bad. In fact, he'd done nothin' himself, on'y had a gent's ticker passed on to him in a crowd; but the coppers was that hard on a chap wot's done time, and they was after him hot and strong. So he thought it best to lay low for a bit, and Jerry wrote that he was lonely, an' would be glad of company. Well, he waited until evening before he went. It was dark before he reached the lane, and he kept along by the hedge under the trees so as nobody should track him. Just as he got to the bend of the lane, he heard voices; and though it was too dark to see very clearly, he made out that there was two men coming towards him. He crept closer to the hedge to allow them to pass without noticin' him."

Digitized by Google

At this juncture there was a distinct sensation in court, and people held their breath to listen. For this was certainly an unexpected development. If this witness was to be credited, he must have passed the murderer and his victim just before the crime was committed.

"No; he couldn't say he saw them distinctly. It was too dark."

As the counsel on either side harassed him with questions, he grew irritable.

"A chap couldn't help it if his eyes weren't made to see in the dark—could he, now? He wasn't a-shieldin' anyone, for he didn't know who there was to shield. But he wasn't a-goin' to swear away anyone's life either by sayin' as how he could identerfy them when he couldn't. No; nor he hadn't made it all up to clear Jerry either. It was all quite true about the two men—true's death! One was a big tall man, about the size of—well, the policeman yonder—and the other"—he looked round for a comparison, and his eye fell on Mr. Pattinson, who was listening intently—"why he might be about the size of the gentleman—meanin' no offence—the one with the dark spectacles."

Both the objects of comparison started. Pawson got very red, but Mr. Pattinson, recovering himself, smiled blandly.

"No; he couldn't swear to the voices even! There was only one of them talking when they passed him," continued the witness; "but he was in a beast of a wax, and the other seemed half afraid of him. He heard the big man say somethin' about exposing somebody or other; but he didn't pay much attention, for it wasn't his biz'ness. He hurried along the road as soon as he'd passed them, for he knew Jerry was on the look-out for him. Yes: he told Jerry about the quarrel he'd overheard in the lane, but Jerry didn't seem to take much interest. They'd lots to talk about together without that. Jerry had got a bit of supper ready, and they made a night of it. Jerry and him they sat up the most of the night, and then they just rolled up together in a corner under an old blanket, and went to sleep. The sun was up before them two woke. He could swear Jerry never stirred any more than himself until late the next morning. Then he said good-bye, and went out by the back way across the fields to the next village, where he caught a train back to town. That's all he had to tell about that night."

Needless to say, the witness was subjected to a very severe cross-examination by the counsel on both sides. But this did not shake his evidence. And at length the counsel for the prosecution sat down, while his opponent looked triumphant. In vain had it been suggested that the story was a got up one; that, in all probability, the witness had borne a part in the murder himself, or was at least an accessory after the crime. There was no evidence to bear out such a statement.

After long speeches from both sides, the jury retired, and were not very long in coming to an agreement. The foreman stated that their verdict was not guilty. Thereupon the judge congratulated and discharged Jerry Gobey, and he left the court quietly, no demonstrations taking place. His previous character prevented any display of sympathy from the bystanders.

But Jerry was used to that. He expected and received nothing from his fellows but contempt and disfavour.

It was much more interesting to him to find Bill Dawes waiting for him outside. Bill greeted him with a brief nod, that meant more than speech.

"You're a silly fool, Jerry, old man!" he exclaimed, admiringly. "Why ever didn't you tell them before?"

"Wot? Me sneak on a pal? Not if I knows it!"

"Why, they'd have had a rope necktie on you in a brace of shakes if I hadn't a-been readin' a noospaper larst Sunday!"

"Well, an' how's I to know you'd got nothin' again' you jest now? Gorn! You'd a-done the syme by me, if it'd been your show!"

Digitized by Google

Bill spat thoughtfully, then his hand travelled slowly to his throat.

"No! Not me! Not when it come to scraggin', I wouldn't," he said, with decision. "There's a plice to draw the line, and that's at a dance on nothin'. But it was plucky of you, I will say that."

A lump rose in Jerry Gobey's throat at this unusual praise from his friend. Jerry worshipped Bill, as a weak nature worships a strong. Bill's example had helped to make him a thief, as Bill's example might—had Bill been a better man—have made him a hero.

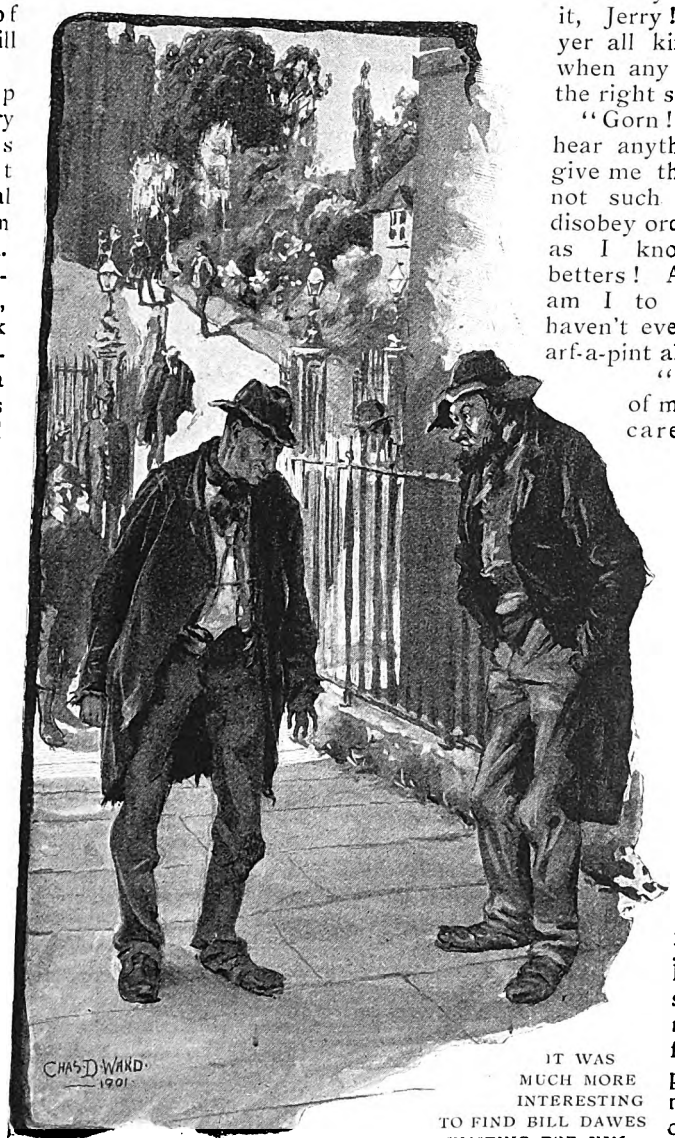
"I say, that there copper didn't like your being let orf," continued Bill. "He looked as savage as they make 'em, when the beak was a-dischargin' of you."

"Oh, Pawson's always had a down on me, an' he'd rather 'a seen me hanged than dance at a weddin'," returned Jerry; "an' he copped me besides, an' looked to be praised for his sharpness. Never mind; p'raps I could have given him a tip, if he'd not bin so beastly sharp. You know wot I mean, Bill."

Bill nodded. "Sometimes them things is worth money. Keep it dark till I've time to think it over. It's always well not to blab all yer knows, 'specially to a bloomin' copper. It's my belief that there's money in wot you an' I have—on'y be sure to hold yer tongue about it, Jerry! You know, yer all kinds of a fool when any bloke gets on the right side of yer."

"Gorn! Nobody shall hear anythink until you give me the word! I'm not such a fool as to disobey orders from them as I knows for my betters! An' now, wot am I to do next? I haven't even the price of arf-a-pint about me!"

"Come along of me, an' I'll tyke care on yer! We'll catch the next train back to town, we will. I've got a bit of brass, or I couldn't have raised the wind to come dahn 'ere and get you off. Jerry, my boy. There are a few good things going round at my place, an' you shall have yer share, old man, just for bein' plucky an' not sneakin' on a pal. Hanged if I know anybody else that 'ud do the syme!"



IT WAS MUCH MORE INTERESTING TO FIND BILL DAWES WAITING FOR HIM.

CHAPTER XII.

HERBERT CARLTON'S RETURN.

On a cold, east-windy, spring day, Herbert Carlton, the son of the man who had been murdered in Dredman's-lane, landed from the Oroya, feeling lonely and miserable in the extreme.

Digitized by Google

It is bad enough to return to one's native land when death has thinned the ranks of one's friends and acquaintances during one's absence in strange lands; but to return when there is absolutely no living creature with whom one can claim kinship is an experience more unpleasant still.

Bertie Carlton felt himself a stranger in his native land. He told himself, rather bitterly, that his rough life in the mining districts of Western Australia had unfitted him for cities and civilisation, and that the sooner he dispatched his business in London and returned to Coolgardie, the better. There was no one to welcome his return, no one with whom he could even exchange a friendly greeting.

He could not but admit that this was principally his own fault. And yet not altogether that either, for he had been down to the depths—been one of the submerged tenth, in fact; and if poverty makes one acquainted with strange bedfellows, it likewise sunders the closest of relationships. When a man is proud as well as poor, he stands no chance of retaining friends; and Bertie had shunned his as though they had the plague, or he himself had been a leper, obliged to cry: "Unclean! Unclean!"

As he drove through the crowded streets on his way to the hotel he had chosen, he recalled, with a shudder, those bitter days—days when he had tramped hard pavements in a vain search for employment, nursing all the while a hot anger against the father who had habituated him to every luxury, then quarrelled with, and eventually turned him out to starve.

He blamed himself now more than the poor old man who was gone. There had been faults on both sides, no doubt—faults of temper, of obstinacy, of pride. Both had stubborn tempers, both hated to confess themselves wrong. They were too much alike to get on without wrangling, although at heart they loved each other dearly.

Well, now he knew that he was most to blame. He ought to have gone back, begged for pardon, and yielded the point in question. What a conceited, wrong-headed young ass he had been! It was all that confounded Oxford training! He had been foolish enough to imagine that 'Varsity men were privileged to look down upon the rest of humanity from an eminence of supposititious superiority. Idiot! No wonder the poor old dad—irritably conscious of certain defects in a middle-class education of early Victorian time—should have found him intolerable.

Poor old Dad! It made Bertie wild with anger only to think of the troubles that must have pressed so heavily upon the dear old man at the very time of their estrangement. Hemmed in by all kinds of embarrassments, hard pressed for money, unfortunate in speculations, in the hands of a ruthless money-lender, scarcely knowing, in fact, which way to turn; was it at all astonishing that he should have lost patience with the finicking superfine young collegian, who had never known care or heartache, and who yet dared to lay down the law, and talk about the ethics of commercial life with all the assurance of ignorance?

Yes, it was easy to recognise all this now, now when it was too late. Alas! the past was irrevocable. However sorry he might now be for his blunders and insolence he could never undo them; not though he would willingly have bartered away ten years of life for an opportunity of saying: "Father, forgive me, and let us begin all over again."

Then he remembered that but for the crime of some villain whom he hoped to discover in God's own time, that opportunity might still have been afforded him. For the dear old father had been hale and hearty, and might have lived to a good old age but for that murderous knife. Bertie's lips took on a firm line as he vowed to bring the cowardly wretch to justice.

Then he reverted to the quarrel again. Things would never have come to such a pass betwixt father and son had there only been a woman to smooth matters over, and soften their asperities. The young man sighed for the dead young mother whom he had never known. Oh, had she but been spared until her boy reached manhood—manhood with its mistakes and crudities! And the poor father? He had indeed been left desolate. He had lived alone in chambers through so many dreary years, with none to mark his goings out or his comings in, none but a grubby charwoman to tend him when ill, or welcome him after a journey.

Digitized by Google

Bertie put himself in his father's place, and realised it all with a shudder. Even the society of his boy was debarred the lonely man. First the child required a woman's care, which he got indifferently from one who advertised in the paper for such motherless children (Bertie always likened her to the mechanical foster-mother of chickens). Then began the demands of education; and finally, the boy expressed a desire to go to one of the Universities. This desire Mr. Carlton acceded to willingly enough, being at the time in a prosperous way of business, and not realising that many young 'Varsity men acquired along with their training a foolish contempt for commerce. The walls of their beloved Alma Mater do not contain all that is worth having, but it requires time and knowledge of a larger world to teach them this fact.

With the thought of woman and her influence came a little sketchy picture of a young girl with frank, pitiful eyes. Involuntarily Bertie touched a small silver coin that dangled from his watch-chain as this picture rose before him. This was the sole memento he possessed of a pretty little romance, the one bit of poetry that had invaded a rather prosaic life.

How vivid was his memory of the day when he gained that sixpence. The hopeless misery of its cold dawn, the railway arch, where he had herded with other miserable starving wretches like himself, passed by him. The despair that quickly grew into antagonism against a cruel and indifferent world—a world the half of which can continue to laugh, and feed, and enjoy itself, while the other half starves; his sudden resolve to make an end of it, to brave the possibilities that lie beyond; then the sudden wonder aroused by the sight of a gleam of kindness in the eyes of that pretty child; the great wonder of her appeal; his first repellant attitude giving place to one of gratitude; the return of hope, and the determination he came to of making one more attempt; and finally the chance that befell him unexpectedly of beginning another life across the sea.

Truly that pretty child had proved a mascotte to him. Tiring of her saucy tricks the jade Fortune had turned a smiling face upon him ever since. He had done fairly well at the gold mines. Not that he had made a colossal fortune, for such fortunes are rare indeed, and mostly exist in the imagination of unfortunate speculators; but he had done sufficiently well to enable him to live for a few years and to devote his energies to the grim object which had drawn him back to his native land.

He had never forgotten the girl who had induced him to try again to open the hard oyster of the world. Where was she? And had she ever cast a thought to the forlorn wretch who had crossed her path so strangely on that cold winter day? He wondered if she would care to hear of his success! Well, at least he intended to let her know of it. It was but fair, if only to encourage her in such deeds of kindness in future. She had given him her address in case he should again be reduced to like straits. Well, then, surely she would not consider it intrusive if he were to seek her out and tell her of his subsequent adventures?

When he had put certain important matters in train he would certainly venture to Chelsea. He longed to satisfy himself that it was no imaginary picture of young beauty and goodness which he had cherished in his heart. He hoped instead that the real girl might surpass the ideal.

He decided to stay at the Inns of Court Hotel, because from there he would have ready access to the City; and in the City lay his present business, which was to make a careful examination into his father's affairs, and, if possible, to gain from this examination some clue to assist him in tracking down the murderer.

After a bath and a good square meal he hailed a hansom and drove to Stag-lane; where, by his express desire, Mr. Ashton, his father's chief clerk, still carried on the business of Carlton and Co.

What melancholy quagmires of debts and difficulties Ashton had waded through since Mr. Carlton's death, no one but himself knew. He never dreamt of divulging them, even to his young master; for there was a certain stubborn pride in the dry and wizened City clerk which prevented him from laying claim to any other reward for the performance of his duty than that afforded by his own conscience. He had been with Carlton and Co. ever since his start in business as a boy of eighteen; and possessed that absolute loyalty to the name and fame of the firm he served which is rarer now than pearls of price.

Digitized by Google

He made no great display of his pleasure at sight of young Carlton when the latter sprang from the hansom and ran upstairs. Merely shook hands in a decorous manner, and hoped the Oroya had made a good passage.

"Excellent," returned Bertie, looking absently around and missing sadly the face that had vanished for ever.

His eyes were dim and he turned away, pulling at his moustache. He was rather ashamed of his natural emotion. He remembered how, even as a boy, he had always felt shy and awkward before Ashton, and yet how, in spite of this, he had always liked the man.

But if the clerk displayed little emotion at his young master's return he could not avoid showing some natural pride as he explained the position of the firm at the present moment. The South American crisis has been tided over satisfactorily; trade had revived in quite a marvellous manner; and now if Mr. Herbert wished to take his proper position as head of the firm, and to continue the business, which it would be a thousand pities not to do, he would find it an exceedingly prosperous concern.

Mr. Herbert drummed on the desk with his fingers as he listened carelessly to the precise statements of Ashton. The clerk was obviously disappointed by his lack of interest. The firm was to Ashton his object in life, almost his religion. He could conceive no greater happiness, no grander ambition than to be allowed to build up the reputation of Carlton and Co. until it should stand in the front rank of great commercial houses, known and trusted all over the world.

"Mr. Ashton," said the only living representative of the old name, "you must indeed have had very uphill work during the last few months. I can see quite clearly that our present position is entirely owing to your exertions. I am not such a fool about business affairs as to deprecate your work. But, to be quite candid with you, nature never intended me for commerce, and if I interfere now with your arrangements the probability is that I'll make a mess of it. I want you to enter the firm yourself and count your brains as equivalent to my capital."

"Me, Mr. Herbert? Is it possible that you really wish me to enter the firm of Carlton and Co?" gasped the clerk.

The magnitude of the proposal quite startled him from his prim propriety. It was as though the young man had given him a careless invitation to walk into Buckingham Palace and take up his residence there.

Bertie smiled. "You seem astonished," he said; "I thought it was the sort of thing all long service clerks looked forward to, and surely if ever any man earned the right to be considered eligible for a partnership it is you! Why, the way you have pulled matters round in such a short time is simply marvellous."

"But—but—you mustn't give me all the credit, sir," exclaimed Ashton, honestly reluctant to accept his good fortune. "Things would have come round the same had your poor father lived. These are days of curiously quick ups and downs; and, once the crisis was tided over, matters righted themselves very rapidly."

"All the same, I know how to value a clever business man when I see him. Come, Ashton, you need make no demur about accepting the offer I've made you. I know no more about City business and City ways than a child of ten. Without your experience and advice to guide me, I should inevitably make shipwreck of the whole concern. Candidly, the burden will still be upon your shoulders; for I don't intend to take any active part in the firm at present, though my name and capital may rest in it; and perhaps afterwards—but I will tell you all about that later, for I want you to throw all the light you can upon the matter that lies nearest to my heart at present.

"Sit down and listen to me! The principal reason of my return is to endeavour to bring to justice the cowardly villain who killed my father. Ashton, you know the terms on which we parted—poor old dad and I—and yet I need scarcely tell you of the deep affection there was between us. I was a young fool, an insufferably conceited young idiot, or we would never have quarrelled; but, until that unpleasant blow came, I never dreamt that the chance of making it up would be denied me. Think how cruel it is! He is for ever beyond my reach, beyond the possibility of hearing me tell him of my sorrow, and gaining his forgiveness. Great Heavens, my blood boils when I think of it!"

Digitized by Google

And as he spoke, the young fellow rose and began to pace the room, his eyes flashing and his hands clenching themselves involuntarily. "To stab him from behind! That poor old man! Ashton, I shall go mad if I dwell upon the horror of the scene I have conjured up. If ever I come face to face with his murderer, I feel that I must seize him by the throat and strangle him!"

The clerk looked upon him with cold disapproval. "I think you might do better than that, Mr. Herbert."

"Better? What do you mean?"

Ashton raised a lean forefinger, and deliberately drew a line round his throat just above his spotless collar.

Bertie shuddered. There was something in the precise, unemotional tone and the suggestive action, which struck a chill into his heart.

"You are a good hater, Ashton," he said; "and this is, to be sure, an instance where hate is justified! Patience and a waiting game will certainly be best in the end. You must coach me how to proceed."

Again he paced the floor with downbent eyes, while the clerk watched him narrowly.

When he paused, Ashton's look seemed to him full of some deep significance.

"Ashton," he said, earnestly, "I am all in the dark as to my father's private affairs. If you know anything that might possibly be of use to me, for Heaven's sake don't keep it back, even though it might seem to throw discredit on the dead. I don't for a moment mean to insinuate that my father could ever do a dishonourable action; but perhaps in that wish which you have said he once expressed of making amends to me for any seeming harshness, he may have sailed somewhat near the wind—oh, how shall I put it?—perhaps pressed heavily upon some poor, desperate wretch, and so made an enemy?"

"No; Mr. Carlton was, if anything, too lenient with debtors," returned Ashton, deliberately. "The boot was on the other foot, if I may for once use a vulgar phrase. It was someone else who pressed upon him too heavily. He was in the hands of a money-lender, and an unscrupulous one—one of those sharpers who are too numerous in the City, and who are ever ready to take advantage of the sudden necessities of the commercial world."

"How do you know this? Was the money you speak of raised openly, and in the name of the firm?"

"No. Mr. Carlton was too proud to take me or anyone else into his confidence. I imagined he had a good balance at Lloyds', where he kept his private account. The firm, as you know, banks with Johnson's. Of course I was aware of the Mexican crisis, and that we were deeply involved, but I had no idea of the extent of your father's private speculations. It all came upon me as an unpleasant surprise when, at your request, I went through his books and papers after his death. By the way, when you feel rested and are equal to it, I should like to go through them again with you."

THE DETECTIVE PRODUCED A NOTEBOOK AND PUT BERTIE THROUGH A REGULAR CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Digitized by Google

Bertie nodded. "I shall be quite ready for you to-morrow, after a night's sleep! Meantime, you might tell me the name of this shark of a money-lender who harassed my poor father's life during its last months."

"His name is Solomon Bembridge. He calls himself an accountant and bill discounter, but is, in reality, a money-lender of the worst type. His offices are in some court up a dingy alley called Thumb Lane."

"Well, I shall have something to say to him presently! What have you done about this money-lending business since my father's death? Has the firm repudiated the bond?"

"It has never had the chance of doing so," replied the other. "That seems to me the strangest part of the whole affair. According to his own reckoning your father still owed Bembridge a considerable sum, for which, up to the present time, no claim has been sent in. So far as the firm is concerned the transaction might never have taken place; and, indeed, save for the private memorandum I discovered amongst your father's papers, I should myself have known nothing of it."

Young Carlton stared, then laughed rather wildly. "What? It's inconceivable! A money-lender who allows his prey to escape while there is blood left to suck? I am still more curious to see this Solomon Bembridge, this veritable prince of money-lenders."

CHAPTER XIII.

THE LAUGH OF SOME FOOLISH GIRL.

Acting upon Ashton's advice, Herbert Carlton placed the matter concerning which they had consulted together in the hands of a private detective, reserving, however, the right of assisting the latter in any way he through proper.

Salter, the detective, was a shrewd, businesslike man, whose chief aim in life appeared to be that of divesting himself—physically and mentally—of any signs of astonishment and curiosity. Possibly the wondering faculties had been worn out through too great use, for modern Arabian Nights' entertainments are quite as marvellous as those once told by the Eastern damsel. Salter was the confidant of princes and plebeians alike, but never divulged a secret or boasted of a client. He had all Pawson's contempt for the mere amateur, but prudently concealed it.

"What do you think? Is there much chance of discovering the criminal after so long an interval?" inquired Bertie, slightly depressed by the detective's sphinx-like demeanour.

"Time will show," was the oracular answer.

"I wish Ashton had engaged you before! It seems such a mysterious affair! I can't think of any motive for it. My father was the friend of the poor and the helpless, and I'm quite certain never injured or made an enemy of anyone during the whole of his career."

"It's difficult to tell! Besides, it's not those whom we've injured that hate us most! It's quite as often those we've benefited. They dislike the feeling of obligation, and make haste to forget the debt of gratitude they owe."

"God forbid that ever I should come to your way of thinking," returned the young man, rebelling against so cynical a doctrine; "but it certainly is most strange! And then, again, what business could my father have to take him to such a remote spot as this Dredman's Lane appears to be, at such a time of night? It must have been something urgent; yet, amongst all his papers and memoranda, I can find no hint of such a motive."

"Ah, there, indeed, you put your finger on what I call the hub of the mystery! If we could find that out, the rest would be easy enough. That is the point towards which we must direct our efforts."

"Can you suggest a motive?"

"I never suggest! I wait, and discover the truth! There's a deal too much imagination used in our profession, if you'll allow me to say so, sir! I don't say I haven't some ideas; but I'd rather not commit them to words just yet. Meantime, I'll set one of my best men on the job, and you may rely upon it having our closest attention."

He produced a note-book, and put Bertie through a regular cross-examination as to his father's habits and circumstances. At the mention of the Solomon Bembridge transaction, he pricked up his ears, and gave a low whistle when he heard that the bloodsucker—as Bertie called him—had let go of his prey so readily. He shut his note-book and bit at the pencil thoughtfully.

Digitized by Google

"Do you think that has any bearing on the case?" asked Bertie.

"I'll tell you better in a week," replied the detective; "but if I were you, I wouldn't pursue that design you have of interviewing the money-lender—not just at present, anyway. We must move quietly, and above all, we must avoid giving an alarm. For, if I don't make a mistake, I've heard of this gentleman before, and no good either."

"Well, if I follow your advice, you must keep me informed of everything that occurs," said the young fellow, somewhat reluctantly. "But I'd certainly like to go and give the brute a bit of my mind."

"And give yourself away at the same time! No, my dear Mr. Carlton, you really must not interfere, or I'll not undertake the business. Go down to Hawkstone, if you choose, and see what you can make of the local intellect. I find it about as difficult to get a direct answer from a modern rustic as to get blood from a stone. Fact is, the doubting spirit of the age has invaded the most unlikely places, and agricultural labourers are now quite as sophisticated as any dwellers in the East End!"

Following Salter's counsel Bertie went to the riverside village, though with small faith in his own ability to extract information. He engaged a bedroom at the Greyhound—the quietest-looking of the two inns—and spent the first day in lounging round and questioning the landlord. The latter, being taciturn, referred him to Pawson, the village policeman. It was Pawson's business to deal with criminal cases, and he himself didn't care to have no truck with such, being a quiet and law-abiding innkeeper.

Unfortunately for Bertie's impatient spirit, Pawson was off duty and away at some merry-making; and the policeman who was acting as his deputy had been newly appointed, and knew nothing of the affair.

Bertie chafed at the delay, and grew despondent. The Dredman's Lane Mystery promised to add one to the long list of undiscovered crimes which form the terror of nervous folk when summed up in the columns of the newspapers.

The words of the oracular Salter kept recurring to him. If they could but discover the motive which impelled his father to visit such an unfrequented place at that hour of the night, the key of the mystery would be in their hands. So far as he could learn, the lane only led to an uninhabited bungalow, and to the cottage whose inhabitants had been the horrified discoverers of the crime. These people—consisting of a respected business man and his ward—appeared to have done all in their power to further the efforts of the police.

Then, so far as regards friendly intercourse, Mr. Carlton had few friends or acquaintances—none that were likely to induce him to leave his chambers and meet them in a remote country place at nightfall.

During the course of the evening Bertie turned into the lane, which—since the murder—was less frequented than ever. This fact rather gratified the young fellow in his present state of mind. He wished to visit it alone, and after nightfall. He had dragged a few details from the landlord of the Greyhound, and an old newspaper had afforded him the rest, so that he experienced no difficulty in pitching upon the exact spot where the crime had been committed.

Yes. Here it was that, below the arching branches, the dear old man had walked, all unsuspecting, upon that awful night. Then came that cruel hand from out the dark, and dealt the fatal blow. Here he must have fallen, and here was the gate through which his poor inanimate form had been dragged.

It was all too plain, too vivid in every detail, as the scene rapidly reconstructed itself before him. And yet there was something wanting, something, to see which clearly, he would willingly have bartered many years of his own young life. What he craved was a fuller vision—the form, the face of the villain who had in such a cowardly manner killed his father; who had not spared those poor grey hairs, endeared by death to the son who bemoaned them.

What was the figure like? Was it possible that the miserable outcast, painted in crude colours by the publican, could be guilty of this heinous crime? It seemed probable enough on the face of it!

And yet somehow Bertie was not altogether satisfied to accept the landlord's version of the affair, in spite of his assurance that Pawson remained convinced of Jerry Gobey's guilt.

Digitized by Google

He recalled the cold contempt of Salter for the rural intellect, and thought it quite possible for the local constable to cling to a preconceived notion, despite all evidence against it. He resolved to interview Pawson the following morning, and to judge for himself. But there seemed to Bertie a devilish and studied malignity about the murder alien to such a ragged scarecrow as the landlord depicted in the person of Gobey. Besides, if the wretch had committed the murder for the sake of gain, why content himself with the purse, when the watch and chain were of so much greater value? And all this cogitation threw no light upon the purpose that brought his father here.

After standing for some time lost in thought, the young man continued his steps until he reached the little footbridge. To do this, he passed the side gate leading from the garden of Grove Cottage, but suppressed an inclination to enter it, and, making himself known to the inmates, beseech their assistance in his investigations. But, even with his hand on the latch, he bethought himself of the lateness of the hour. He could scarcely expect to find a welcome there, coming at such a time to perfect strangers and to people who had presumably already suffered great inconvenience from their proximity to the scene of the tragedy.

Nevertheless, he looked in longingly. What a pretty, well-ordered comfortable little nook it was! Its green lawn was studded with clumps of snowdrops and crocuses; its low, wide windows draped with the young verdure of various creepers, its shady trees invited one to rest and to pleasant day-dreams.

But he was out of tune for beauty and homely happiness; and when, quite suddenly, a merry laugh rang out into the night, he started as though he had been stung.

So people could still laugh and be merry, unmindful of the tragic frown life wore behind its grinning mask?

It was the laugh of some foolish girl! Well, after all, why should not youth snatch all the gladness it can? The dull years would soon extinguish in the girl any desire to laugh. It was a sweet laugh, too, not a loud and vacant one.

Yet it jarred! He frowned and walked hastily on, crossed the bridge, and found himself close to Dredman's Bungalow.

Great Heavens! What a contrast was here to the ordered beauty of Grove Cottage!

CHAPTER XIV.

BERTIE MEETS A COLLEGE CHUM.

During all his wanderings in outlandish places, Herbert Carlton had never come across such a picture of desolation as that presented by the uninhabited bungalow, as the moon—piercing at the moment through a bank of cloud—threw its cold light across the neglected garden.

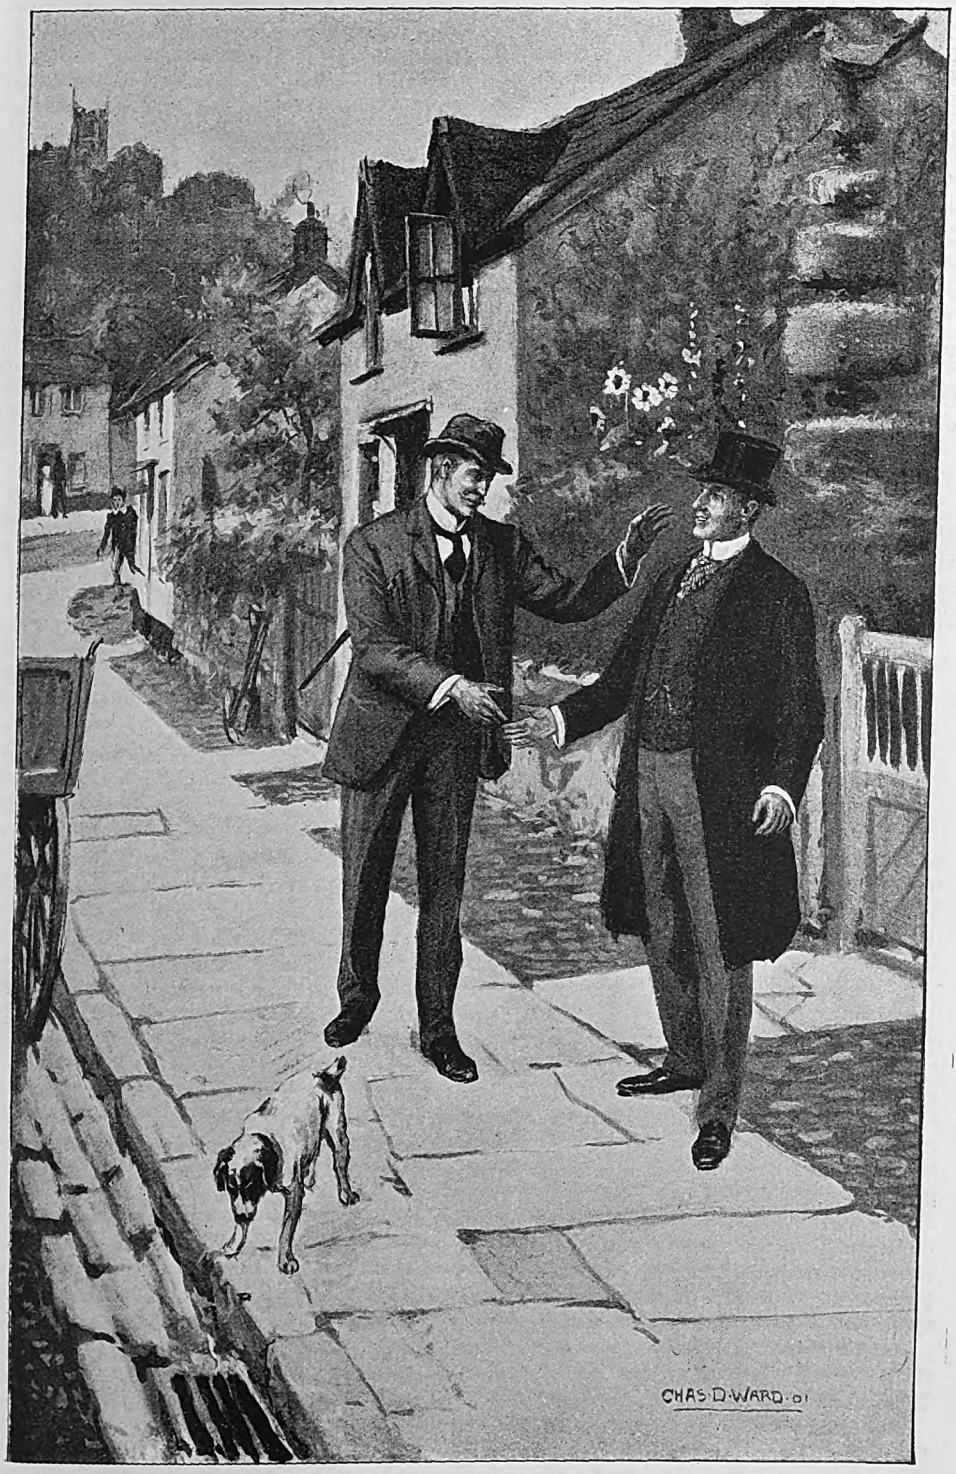
What a contrast to the little place across the water! Here nature surged and rioted in a wild endeavour to throw off the trammels of civilisation, and return to its primary condition. All traces of human occupation were being rapidly obliterated. A tangled mass of greenery enveloped the walls, flung itself across both windows and doorways, climbed the roof, and strangled the chimneys in its tight embrace.

The gate swung loosely on its rusty hinges, and emitted a harsh, creaking sound, while the wind sighed and moaned through the trees, like some evil spirit.

Bertie had not heard the story of the deserted bungalow as yet, but he could understand why it was shunned. It was an ill-looking place enough in daylight, but after dusk it seemed given over to the powers of evil. An odour of decay—of damp and rotting fungus growths—clung around it like some vile miasma; and Bertie shivered where he stood, as this persistent odour rose to his nostrils. There was fever and malaria in every breath, and suddenly he felt impelled to fly the place. At the gate of Grove Cottage he paused again.

Upon one side of the stream a world of melancholy and decay; on the other the fresh, vigorous life that rose from the earth anew each spring-time. In place of miasma, that spoke of fever and ague, here was that eternal fragrance escaping from the bosom of the ever young brown earth; that ineffable fragrance which marks so delightfully the return of sap and blossom. It dispelled the baleful vapours Bertie had inhaled, and dispelled also his aforetime morbid fancies.

Digitized by Google



"IT IS JIM HAWTHORNE, THEN?" HE EXCLAIMED.

Digitized by Google

No longer did he feel aloof from youth and happiness, no longer did he feel that the sound of innocent mirth would jar upon him. In fact, he now stood lingering at the gate in the hope of hearing that fresh young laugh again.

As though in answer to his desire, the shadow of a slim young form flitted across the window-blind, and a gay, girlish voice sang a snatch of a ballad. It was a pretty air, which he recognised as one by Mendelssohn; and the voice—though not powerful—was sweet and true.

To distant lands, in dreams, I'll wander,
There where thou art,
On snowy heights, whence streamlets yonder
Course down to crystal lakes, I'll ponder
There where thou art.

I'll round the hills with thee be winding,
There where thou art;
Or in the vale fresh garlands binding,
At every turn new beauties finding,
There where thou art.

And my delight shall know no measure,
When thou return'st,
My faithful love thou still dost treasure,
Long absence shall enhance the pleasure,
When thou return'st.

The young man listened breathlessly until the song came to an end.

"A pretty song, and sung with exquisite taste," he commented, for he had considerable skill as a musician; "and I would, indeed, be a surly brute to grudge a light heart to so sweet a singer! Nature has thrown off her winter mood, and rejoices to feel the blood run faster in her veins. So laugh, you girl, whoever you are, while your spring is still here! And as for me, I must learn to thank God that spring is eternal, both in nature and in the heart of man."

He slept well and dreamlessly that night, for the first time since landing, and woke in the morning refreshed and sanguine. After breakfast, he interviewed Pawson, the village policeman. Pawson continued to feel aggrieved because the one brilliant inspiration of his life had not turned out a success, and Jerry Gobey was still at large. Pawson was as firmly convinced as ever of Jerry's guilt, and did not scruple to state his conviction to Bertie.

"If I'd had a bit more time to give to the case, sir, he wouldn't have got off! But I did my best! I thought that there purse in itself enough to hang him; but cuccumstanshal evidence don't have the weight nowadays it had. But I've not given it up yet, Mr. Carlton! I keep my eye on him whenever he slinks back here—which I have reason to b'leeve is pretty often. And it's my firm conviction that he'll betray hisself some day, sooner or later. For, between you and me, sir, he's a bit barmy"—here the constable touched his own low brow in a significant manner—"and them sort of chaps has rum starts—see visions, or get conscience-struck, you know! Not that Jerry Gobey's exackly wot you can call nervous, or he'd not be so keen of hiding hisself in Dredman's Bungalow."

"Is there anything wrong with the bungalow?" asked Bertie. "Certainly its looks are against it, for of all the desolate places I ever set eyes on, it strikes me as the worst. I strolled past last night, and wondered if there was any particular reason for its desolate appearance."

The policeman hesitated. He was not quite sure whether it would be wiser on his part to choose the attitude of superiority to village superstition, or that of the person who could a tale unfold—an he would. Eventually, he decided upon the former as the most dignified course.

"Dear me, no, sir—nothing that signerfies; only the folks hereabouts are the most ignorant, superstitious set! They will have it that the bungalow's haunted. And now, ever since what happened in Dredman's Lane—it's your poor father's demise which I allude to—you couldn't get one of them to go there after sunset—not if you was to pay them untold gold! Why, even at Grove Cottage they can't keep their servants now because Dredman's Lane's the only way to the village, although Mr. Pattinson, the gent what lives there, is most liberal in the matter of wages, and the work's as light as light!"

Bertie did not feel particularly enlightened by his conversation with Pawson. He left the police-station rather more at sea than when he entered it; but at this juncture of affairs fate was kind, and sent him a friend. As he strolled down the village street discomfited, pondering upon what was to be his next move, a figure walking ahead of him seemed to take a sudden air of familiarity. He quickened his pace, overtook the pedestrian, then faced round.

Digitized by Google

"It is Jim Hawthorn, then?" he exclaimed. "I thought I couldn't mistake that vigorous swing of the right arm."

The man he accosted looked delighted.

"Bertie Carlton, by all that's lucky! Where in the wide world have you sprung from?"

"My last postal address was Geralton, Western Australia. But you? When last I met you, you were at Barts! Are you here as locum tenens, or are you practising on your own?"

"On my own," replied the young surgeon, without any enthusiasm. "Glued here—positively glued, my boy! No limpet was ever more tightly fixed upon a rock without chance of movement than is your humble servant, James Hawthorn, to this dull village."

"But why, since you seem to repine at your fate?"

"You ask me why? The fate that ever pins a chap down when he wants to see the world. Isn't it always the same sad story? Want of funds! You remember the absolute passion for travel and adventure I used to have? Never had a chance of indulging in it yet, my boy, never a chance."

"But why this village, of all others? 'Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife,' eh? Has a stronger passion ousted a weaker? Did some rural divinity lure you hither to twine garlands for her hair?"

"Twine your grandmother!" returned the other, laughing. "Do you imagine a poor general practitioner has any time for that sort of nonsense? Instead of twining garlands for Clarissa's tresses, I must needs decoct a nauseous mixture to settle her stomach, or give her iron pills to tone her system in place of love token. Great Scott! It's you who have all the luck, Carlton."

"I had to endure a good many kicks before I found it, Hawthorn. Though in the matter of money I've not much to complain of, after all. I brought my misfortune on myself at first. And after—well, after, I had a mascotte," and he touched the small coin that dangled from his chain.

At this moment their conversation was interrupted by the sudden onrush of a small urchin, who cannoned against the young doctor's legs, and nearly upset him.

"O doctor, come quick, please!" he cried, as soon as he recovered breath. "Our Tommy's swallered a farden, an' mother, she doesn't know what to do or to give him. She's shaken him till he's black in the face; but that hasn't done no good, for he's got such a strong stummick he isn't hardly ever sick!"

Instantly the doctor's face lost its boyishness, and grew long and grave.

"Your mother's mad!" he exclaimed, angrily. "What the mischief does she mean by acting in such a ridiculous manner? It's a lot of use my wasting time and patience trying to instil common sense into these people's heads. Here have I been holding ambulance meetings and nursing classes all the winter, and yet your mother, after attending every one of them, acts like a fool upon the very first opportunity."

"Please, doctor, it wasn't our fault," pleaded the youngster, screwing an excessively dirty fist into his eyes—which were quite tearless—"it was Mistress Bateson; she told mother, an' mother follered her advice."

"Go home as quick as you can, and tell your mother to let Tommy alone until I come! You wouldn't believe the bother I have with these fools of women. And that confounded old hag, Bateson's the worst of the crowd. Why, she actually made that boy's mother believe he'd swallowed a tadpole once, and they kept the poor little beggar without anything to drink for two days, and then held him over running water, so that the tadpole might leap forth to his native element alive. Alive, mind you, after the heat of a stomach, to say nothing of the dissolving powers of gastric juice! It's enough to drive a fellow demented. Some day I'll just chuck it all up, and follow in your steps to the colonies! But, look here, old man, I'll have to go now, and I'll be hard at it until night. Who would be a country doctor! But if you'll come to my place about nine, we'll have a smoke and a chat over 'Varsity days."

"I'll be delighted, old fellow," returned the other.

"Good-bye till then! I have to make a long round, and my horse and trap is in waiting for me now. But first I must rescue that unfortunate youth from the hands of those unlicensed murderers."

Whereupon he hurried off. Bertie was delighted at the encounter. Fate was playing into his hands. Jim Hawthorn was the Hawkstone doctor. He must, therefore, have been the one called upon to act at the time of the murder.

Digitized by Google

During the day, Bertie went to Grove Cottage, and inquired for Mr. Pattinson. He was disappointed to find that gentleman had left home, and would not be likely to return for a couple of days.

"Will you leave a message sir?" asked the rosy-cheeked maid.

Bertie considered a minute, and shook his head.

"I'm quite a stranger to your master, but my business is urgent," he replied. "It will be better for me to wait and call again on Thursday."

He lingered as he went down the garden path, admiring afresh the air of comfort and finish that there was about the little place. Save for the rosy-cheeked maid, however, it appeared void of inhabitants that day. He felt a vague sense of disappointment, because he could hear no echo of the foolish laughter he had before objected to, no sweet song that had soothed his wounded feelings on the previous night. In lonely lives a fresh interest means more than one can say; and although he had not yet seen the face of the girl who laughed and sang, Bertie already looked upon her as something to be grateful for.

(To be continued.)

LOVE'S EYES.

Love is not blind, but sees through all disguise,
And that is why we hear from day to day
Of odd engagements causing much surprise,
And weddings passing strange in every way.

"What can she see in him?" the critics say;
Love is not blind, but sees through all disguise;
'Tis those who know not his revealing ray
At whom Love laughs and leaves them to surmise.

I find in you what all true lovers prize;
You find in me all I was meant to be;
Love is not blind, but sees through all disguise,
And finds the charm—compatibility.

And so when comes the day that we are wed
We'll smile at those who think themselves more wise,
And live to prove the truth of what we've said—
Love is not blind, but sees through all disguise.

Digitized by Google

Christmas Amusements in the Home.

By LUCIE HEATON ARMSTRONG.

CHILDREN come home for the Christmas holidays full of vague anticipations of delight, and they sometimes find the time hang a little heavily during the intervals between the various juvenile dissipations which are prepared for them. The house is full of good things, and mother spends half her time at the stores, ordering more and more goodies and presents, and the children get impatient for the approach of Christmas Day, when all the little mysteries will be revealed. Mother gets anxious as she sees the troublesome stage setting in—the bored look of the enfant blasé which precedes the terrible query of "What shall I do now?" She knows that though she proposes a string of occupations each will be discarded for some good and sufficient reason, and that her letter-writing will be interrupted every minute by the cry of "I'm tired of playing at soldiers, mother," or "What had I better do next?" Poor mother has a hundred things to do, and she has little time to spare for her children's amusement. How welcome is the loving aunt or the kind elder sister who rises briskly and says: "Let's all play games." The little faces clear up, smiles and good temper prevail, the game is set going and one after the other of the family is ensnared in its meshes. A very simple game will please a child. What he really values is the time and attention which his elders give up to him, and the pleasant feeling that they are all doing something together. He is on an equality with them for the time being—nay, their superior, if he is better at games than they are. The leader of the games must be endowed with tact and spirit—spirit to propose a game, and to see that it catches on, and tact to drop it if it is a failure, or before it has gone round too often. Very complicated games are not suitable for children; a game which demands a long explanation is never likely to be a success. The games which I have found most successful in my own family circle are all so extremely simple that I doubt very much if they are worthy the dignity of print; but, neverthless, I will give a few of them, in case they may be useful to people who are trying to solve the troublesome query of "What shall we play at next?"

Personally I must confess to a preference for games which can require no hunting for cards, or preparation of any kind, but can be begun in a minute—an instantaneous cure for any little temper or tears which might happen to be on the way. I like these games because they can be played indoors or out of doors and at any moment; they often wile away a dull moment for a child, or distract its attention when it is unhappy.

Games Without Apparatus,

One of these games is the "Parson's Cat." It is played like this. The first player says, "The parson's cat is an amiable cat." The next one says the same words, only substituting another epithet beginning with A. Not a second must elapse between the speakers, and a forfeit is given to the person who gets to the end of the A's and is forced to begin upon B. "I love my love with an A," is another game of the same kind, and can always be made amusing if you first calculate the letters so that someone will get the initial of their sweetheart's name.

A game called "Sausages" is sometimes amusing for a couple of rounds when one is playing with very small children. All sit round in a circle, with the exception of the person who asks questions. Three questions are asked of each player in turn, and "Sausages" must be the invariable reply. No laughter! A forfeit is given for the smallest giggle. You must not laugh, even when you have made out that you breakfasted, lunched and dined off these succulent dainties, and that you would prefer them beyond everything else for Christmas presents.

Digitized by Google

"Coffee-pot" is another game of this kind, and it is a great favourite with the little ones. One player goes out of the room, and the others settle on a word for him to guess. He is to ask a question of each in turn, three rounds being allowed him in which to find out the word. "Coffee-pot" is only the symbol for this word, and it must be introduced into every answer in the place where the right word ought to be. A word with two or more meanings should be chosen, such as bed, box, or ring. Supposing that bed is the selected word; that does for an article of furniture or a flower-bed. Perhaps the questioner begins thus: "Are you tired of playing this game, Teddie?" Teddie replies, "I am. I would much rather be tucked up in my little coffee-pot." "What is your favourite amusement, Mary?" asks the questioner, after a pause, in which he has been trying to unravel the meaning of this oracular reply. "Digging in my coffee-pot" is the answer (a garden-bed being implied this time) or "Coffee-potting out my flowers" (bedding-out my flowers). The player through whom the word is discovered has to go out next time.

"Twenty Questions" is a game which "lasts" very well, and it is an excellent exercise for the mind. With very young children I have always found it best to let them think of something in the room. With older people there need be no limit of this kind. One person thinks of something, and the rest of the company have to find out what it is. He is asked a question by each in turn, "yes" or "no" being the only allowable reply. At large parties this game is played with a difference. Two people go out—a lady and a gentleman, and two little "clubs" are formed—that is to say, the party splits up into two circles, the chairs being arranged in two rings. Each circle chooses a word. The lady and gentlemen return, and one goes into the centre of each group and asks the twenty questions with all possible speed. If the questioner is baffled he has to sit down with the club which has been too clever for him. The club which is the largest in the end is the winning side.

"Adjectives" is an amusing game at which people of all ages can play. One player goes out, the rest sit round in a semi-circle, and each chooses an adjective which he is to act when the questioner comes in. He must not mention its name. He must convey its meaning through the way in which he answers the questioner. Three questions are allowed for each person. The questioner approaches the first player, who promptly bursts into tears. "What is the matter with you?" he asks. "Oh, nothing!" replies the other with increased sobs. "Are you mad?" "No." "Silly?" "No." "Miserable, then?" —as a last resource. "That's it, that's it!" with cheerful nods and smiles that the word has been guessed so soon. "Sulky," "affected," "æsthetic," and "joyful," are all good words to choose. "Silly" is rather a nice one, but "mad" gives the greatest scope for dramatic talent.

"New Novels" is a form of Dumb Crambo, the titles of new books being chosen for representation. No speaking is allowed. Everything must be done in dumb show. Two of the party go out, and come in dressed up in some peculiar way, and making certain actions, so as to represent the title of some popular book. "The Heavenly Twins" may be represented by two people of equal height, dressed exactly alike, with nimbuses on their heads; or "Peg the Rake" may come in with a garden-rake and a clothes-peg.

"Judge and Jury" is another game which makes a good deal of fun. "Judge" is seated in a large arm-chair at the top of the room, "jury" in two rows of chairs, facing one another. There are twelve jurymen—or women, as the case may be—and the Judge sits at the top of the two rows, so that he can be heard at once. He addresses a question to anyone he fancies, and this person must spring up rapidly, say "Certainly, my lud," or words to that effect, and then sit down again. When I say words to that effect, I ought to be more precise. He must not say "Yes," or "No" and he must say "My lud." Also he must rise from his chair. If any of these precautions are omitted the most dire event ensues—he is made the judge! He has to change places with that functionary, and to remain on the bench until one of the jury makes one of the mistakes already enumerated. It is not at all nice to be judge! You feel that the eyes of Europe are on you to the most alarming extent, and that you are responsible for keeping the fun going. You should use the name of the person you address, but you can ask any question you like. "Are you tired of this game, Clorinda?" "Do you think that dress suits you, Gladys?" and anything else that occurs to you.

Digitized by Google

"Drawing Games" are very popular with many young people, and a great deal of amusement may be got out of a few long narrow slips of paper and some pencils. "Heads, Legs, and Bodies" is one of the best of these games. The paper is folded in three. Each player draws a head and then doubles down the paper so that the head cannot be seen, and passes it on to his neighbour. He adds a body to the invisible head, and then passes it on to his neighbour, who adds legs to the body he does not see. The results are most curious. The papers are passed on once more and then unfolded, and the drawings look like the figures on the Egyptian tombs. Oh, my poor lady, whom I started in life with such a pretty face! Has she come back to me with the body of a cat and the rags of a beggar! And this gallant General, with cocked hat and plumes! Can it be possible that he is joined to the body of a goose and wears a ballet-girl's skirt? None of these creations of the pencil carry out the original idea of their inventors; they depart entirely from the principle on which they were planned. When we have had a couple of rounds of this we may try the "Historical Game" next.

Each person draws a scene from history (the worse it is done the better), and it is then passed round to each player in turn, who writes underneath the title of the picture as it occurs to him, doubling it up so that the next neighbour may not see what he has written. Sometimes any ordinary object is chosen for a puzzle-picture (without reference to history), and each member of the circle writes what he imagines is the title of it in turn. The results are often most comic, and the surprise of the artists is often very amusing when they see how their efforts are misconstrued by an inappreciative world. It is often very difficult to distinguish between a cat and a lion, or a fancy portrait and a plum-pudding. I remember one drawing which ran the gamut of a whole family party, being successively labelled by them as a pen-wiper, a garden-bed with a weed in it, a coal-scuttle, an inkstand with a quill pen sticking upright in it, and how it baffled everyone till it came to the owner of the strange object which the artist had so faithfully endeavoured to depict, who instantly recognised it, and wrote down with gay confidence "My bonnet!" Her bonnet it was—that dainty confection of velvet with its single upstanding plume which had been the standing joke of her family ever since she had bought it; and shouts of laughter greeted the caricature as everyone had a look at it the second time. This is not a game that can be played many times running, and the same thing applies to "Consequences," which is always an amusing game.

Forfeits.

At Christmas-time many children's games have forfeits, and I think this is one of the most difficult parts of the evening's entertainment. The "forfeit-holder" has always to call his or her ingenuity to work to find some fresh penalty for the victim to pay. Here are fourteen forfeits which I think will help my readers this festive time:

1. Put yourself through the keyhole.

This is done by writing the word "yourself" on a small piece of paper and passing it through the keyhole.

2. Kiss a book inside and out without opening it.

This is done by kissing a closed book in the room, then opening the door and kissing the book outside the room.

3. Sing in one corner, dance in another, whistle in another, and cry in another.

4. Stand on a chair, and wait till one of the opposite sex comes and kisses you and lifts you down.

5. Lie down on the floor, and get up on your feet without touching the ground with your elbows or hands.

6. If a gentleman, put a chair on its side and hop over it; if a lady, put a footstool on the top of another and hop over it.

Digitized by Google

7. Call your sweetheart's name up the chimney.

8. Bite an inch off the poker.

This is done by biting something an inch away from the poker.

9. Look in a looking-glass, and all the people of the opposite sex pass behind you and look over your shoulder. You frown on all those except the one you like best, and you smile on that one.

10. Say the alphabet backwards quickly.

11. Count up to one hundred, saying the word "Buzz" when a number containing a seven, or a multiple of that number, occurs.

12. Light a candle, blindfold the victim, turn him round three times, and then let him walk up to the candle and blow it out. Each time he fails he must pay another forfeit.

13. Take off your shoes, put two chairs together, and jump over them.

This is done by taking off your shoes, putting two chairs together, and jumping over your shoes, not the chairs.

14. Bow to the wittiest, kneel to the prettiest, and kiss the one you love best.

LUCIE HEATON ARMSTRONG.

THE LOST JOY.

Will it never come? Will it never come?
I have watched for it day by day
Till the voice of hope on my lips is dumb
And has fled from my heart away.

We had dreamed to walk in the moonlight pale
When the Maytime boughs were sweet,
Or to wait by the bank when the path should fail,
With the violets at our feet.

We had dreamed of words that we each would hear,
And each to the other say:
For the tender joy of the glad swift year
Would its crowning wear in May.

But the late July, with her skies aflame,
And her deep, dark nooks is here,
And the wheat has gone to the reaper's claim,
And the autumn months are near.

I have prayed and wept ere I slept at night
And my dreams have been sad to see;
Yet I never wake in the morning's light
To the joy that is lost to me.

Cora A. Dolson.

Digitized by Google

THE UNINVITED GUEST.

By MARY ANGELA DICKENS.

MRS. BROWN cast a last hurried glance about the little basement sitting-room.

"I do 'ope as there won't be no words, to speak of, between them while I'm away," she said. "They'll be comfortable enough, I know that! Sarah——"

"Mrs. Brown! Mrs. Brown!"

Mrs. Brown turned to her companion.

"There!" she said, "that's the drawing-room, Miss Eden. And the dining-room he can't bear to hear her call, and it's my belief as that's why she's always a-doin' of it. He'll ring his bell directly; see if he don't. There!" she concluded triumphantly, as a bell pealed furiously. "And they haven't neither of them got nothing to say, I'll be bound. I won't be a minute, 'Liza."

"Mrs. Brown! Mrs. Brown!"

It was an alert and musical voice; and alertness was perhaps the most prominent characteristic of the woman who awaited Mrs. Brown in the hall. The bright face was full of energy; the glance of the well-opened grey eyes was quick and keen. The colouring was clear pink-and-white, and the hair, under the becoming little hat, was as plentiful and curling as a young girl's. As a matter of fact, Miss Eden was considerably over five-and-thirty.

She was drawing on her gloves; and near her stood Sarah, Mrs. Brown's factotum, holding a smart little valise. At her feet, watching her movements with eager eyes, was a wiry Scotch terrier. Miss Eden met Mrs. Brown with a sunny smile.

"You are just off, Mrs. Brown," she said. "That's right. So am I, you see. I just wanted to wish you a Merry Christmas, you know."

"Thank you, miss, I'm sure," responded Mrs. Brown, casting uneasy glances towards a fast-closed door just beyond Miss Eden. "The same to you, and many of them."

"Oh, and the landing window, Mrs. Brown," continued Miss Eden. Her voice had grown a trifle clearer and more emphatic. "I really must ask you——"

"Mrs. Brown, how often am I to tell you that talking in the passages—— Oh, I beg pardon, Miss Eden. I was not aware who it was."

The fast shut door had flown precipitately open and the first words had been hurled from the threshold. The newcomer's tone had changed to one of icy politeness as he concluded, and Miss Eden flashed round on him on the instant.

"Good-day, Mr. Cunliffe," she said lightly. "I'm sorry to find that your hearing is not sufficiently acute to allow you to recognise voices through a closed door! However, I wanted to speak to you, so it's all right. The landing window, you know. The hall ventilator was to be left to your discretion and the landing window to mine. And you don't play fair!"

"Really!" was the frigid response. "I am at a loss——"

"Oh, no, you're not!" with a light laugh. "You shut my landing window this morning—a sunshiny morning as warm as September. And another thing: I've found your cat in my room several times lately when I've come home in the evening, and I don't like cats. I think I've said so before."

The "dining-room" saw his opportunity and jumped at it.

"The remedy in this case lies in your own hands," he said. "When the landing window is open my cat invariably gets out on to the leads. And when she finds the window of your room open she walks in at it. If you will have the goodness to shut——"

Digitized by Google

But Miss Eden was not so easily to be routed. She changed the subject.

"Take care," she cried warningly. "If you don't shut your door, Nipper will be in, and there will be a scrimmage."

The terrier was, indeed, in the very act of dashing wildly between the "dining-rooms" legs, having just caught a glimpse of a too well-known tabby fur. To Mrs. Brown's indescribable relief, the "dining room" promptly shut the door, and shut himself into the room.

He had not intended this; and when it was done he saw the device of his enemy. But the door being fairly shut, it seemed hardly worth while to reopen it; and he shuffled slowly across to his armchair and his books.

There was no reason why John Cunliffe should shuffle, or why he should adorn his head with the skull-cap of an octogenarian. He was just forty-three. But eighteen years' work in a department of the British Museum, eighteen years' monotony acting upon a too methodical and somewhat circumscribed temperament, had proved the reverse of youth-preserving. John Cunliffe considered himself a distinctly elderly person, and he much preferred that it should be so. He prided himself on being an old-fashioned man—old-fashioned in his manner of life; old-fashioned in the precise neatness of his habits; old-fashioned, above all, in his distaste for all the ways and works of the end of the century. He was well read and much respected in his own line—Egyptian sculpture; but his attitude towards his fellow-creatures—nineteenth-century productions, whether they liked it or no—was not such as to gain him many friends. And the comparative isolation of life into which he had gradually drifted had not tended to widen his views.

It was John Cunliffe's deliberate opinion, at this period of his existence, that fate was using him ill. He had occupied the "dining-room set" in Mrs. Brown's house for ten years; and for nine of these the drawing-room had been tenanted by an elderly invalid, whose habits had never varied, whose face he had never beheld, whose voice he had rarely heard. If there was one type of human being more entirely obnoxious to him than the up-to-date man, it was the up-to-date woman— it may be mentioned, in passing that his acquaintance with both these varieties was entirely theoretical. And he considered that Destiny was not dealing fairly with him when, on the departure of the invalid, the drawing-room was taken by Miss Sedgewick Eden, sanitary inspector, lady journalist, and society woman.

Nor was this all. The position was further complicated by an old aquaintance between himself and Miss Eden.

"Dear me!" she had said when they met for the first time—the meeting having been brought about by an unseemly scuffle between his cat and her dog—"it must be—oh, don't let me say how many years since we met. You hadn't long left college, I remember."

She had looked him over with an odd expression in her eyes as she spoke, and it presented itself to Cunliffe as part of her general "unwomanliness" that she should exhibit no hesitation whatever in thus remembering. She had been a most disappointing girl in those old days, though the fact had not revealed itself to him until somewhat late in their acquaintance; a dreadful young woman, with "views" as to independence, and so forth. And her development, he told himself, was in strict keeping with her early promise.

He had seen no reason to modify this decision during the five months which they had subsequently spent under the roof of the unhappy Mrs. Brown. It seemed, indeed, to rankle in his mind, fertilising the subjects of disagreement which arose between them. Miss Eden, for her part, had shown a cheerful readiness to enter into single combat on all occasions. And the result, as Mrs. Brown truly stated, was that the lodgers were on terms only to be adequately described as "cat and dog."

John Cunliffe established himself once more in his armchair, and took up a book. But he was keenly alive to the sounds in the house, nevertheless. He heard Miss Eden's cab arrive, and he heard her depart. A little later he heard the exit of Mrs. Brown and her niece, who were going together to spend Christmas with the parents of the latter; he heard Sarah return to the kitchen and poke the fire vigorously; and then a profound stillness descended upon the house.

Digitized by Google

This stillness had perhaps lasted a quarter of an hour when John Cunliffe lifted his head and gazed absently before him.

"I wonder whether she has gone away for Christmas," he said to himself. He paused a moment, and then he heaved a deep sigh of relief. "The house is a different place without her," he said. "What a sensation of quiet and repose!"

The next day was Sunday and Christmas Eve; and it was both wet and foggy. John Cunliffe had neither duties nor pleasures which called him from home until the evening, when he was to dine out. The "quiet and repose" of Mrs. Brown's house remained unbroken; and it is possible that their devotee began to find them monotonous, for he sat looking into the fire, as twilight drew on, with an unusual expression of vague dissatisfaction. Sarah, as she removed Cunliffe's tea, expressed herself plainly on the subject.

"The house is that dull and quiet, sir," she said, "that I was thinking I'd run out for an hour this evening, if you didn't see no objection. Mrs. Brown she gave me leave, if so be you was willing."

It was an innovation; and innovations were contrary to all John Cunliffe's principles. But as he looked at the woman, he relented.

"It is an unusual request," he said. "But, on consideration, I have no objection."

It was a deplorable thing, though, he thought, this craving for excitement in the lower classes. In the women particularly it was much to be lamented; and it was doubtless part and parcel of that disastrous deterioration in womanhood which was rapidly depriving the sex of all its charm. He enlarged upon the subject to the lady who fell to his share at dinner, and he looked upon her as quite one of the women of the day when he found that his conversation obviously bored her.

"The same distressing characteristics are to be met with everywhere," he observed to himself as he went home—"frivolity, shallowness, total lack of the

"CUCK-A-CHOO," HE SAID FEEBLY.

Digitized by Google

domestic instinct. Appearance, too, and manner! It is positively improper that a woman of—well, she can't be much younger than I am, should look and behave like a mere girl. Scandalous! Scandalous!"

John Cunliffe was not alluding to his dinner companion. He was approaching Mrs. Brown's house at the moment, and he glanced absently up at the drawing-room windows. They were quite dark. He opened the door with his latch-key, hung up his coat and hat in the hall, and went into his room.

Grave doubts as to the stability of the universe would have arisen in John Cunliffe's mind if he had failed to lay his hand on the matches when he felt in their accustomed home. He did not so fail now. He lighted his lamp, put on his slippers, and then prepared to help himself to a light supper with which he was wont to end each day. But the tray which should have awaited him upon the table was conspicuous by its absence.

Such a lapse in the unalterable sequence of events was for the moment almost too much for John Cunliffe. Was it possible, he asked himself, that Sarah had forgotten? He looked at his watch. It was only half-past ten, and he sternly pulled the bell, and waited. Then he pulled the bell again.

Not even to this second summons, however, was there any response whatever. Moved by a righteous indignation, Cunliffe opened his door and listened. Not a sound met his ear. There could be no doubt that Sarah had gone to bed. The stillness of the house struck him as almost oppressive. He was just going to turn back into his room when he paused abruptly.

He had heard something. It had died into silence almost before he had recognised it as sound. But he had heard something from downstairs. Before he had time to formulate any theory it came again. This time it was by no means momentary, and there was no mistaking it. It was the crowing, gurgling laugh of a baby.

A faint flush of wrath crept over John Cunliffe's face. Obviously Sarah was deliberately neglecting him, while she entertained visitors. He strode back to the bell and pealed it furiously, returning to his position in the doorway.

The only perceptible effect produced was that the baby stopped laughing for an instant, and then broke out again, as if the bell had been rung expressly for its amusement. No other sound of any kind was audible.

John Cunliffe's feelings are not to be described. That Sarah should take advantage of her mistress's absence to defy him thus was a state of things hardly conceivable. He walked to the top of the kitchen stairs and called severely:

"Sarah!"

No answer, except from the baby, who hailed the observation with the greatest glee, and then relapsed into sudden silence.

"Sarah!"

No answer whatever. An extraordinarily dead silence.

It was broken by a faint whimpering. Was the child being coerced into quiet? The vaguest suspicion had gradually been waking in John Cunliffe, and he now walked deliberately down the stairs. A half-open door presented itself as his goal. He pushed it open, and came to a sudden standstill.

He was standing on the threshold of Mrs. Brown's little sitting-room. It was perfectly neat and orderly; the fire was almost out, and the gas was turned low. And the only human being to be seen was seated in the middle of a table which stood under the window, facing the door, wrapped in an old shawl—the baby.

The whimper ceased as John Cunliffe appeared, and the whimperer regarded him steadily and dubiously. It was an exceedingly pretty child, of about two years old, with short golden hair curling tightly over its head, and great dark-blue eyes. Then the baby lip dropped, the blue eyes filled with tears, and the child broke into a dismal wail.

It was not to his dishonour, perhaps, that Cunliffe's first impulse led him to beat a retreat. He leant back against the passage wall and gasped. Where was Sarah? he asked himself wildly. Where had the child come from? Was it even remotely possible that he and—it—were alone together?

The wail from the sitting-room was becoming more pitiful moment by moment; and with the last question the sense that it behoved him to do something thrust itself upon John Cunliffe. With a blind impulse which only a truly kind heart could have originated, he stumbled back to the sitting-room.

Digitized by Google

"Cuck-a-choo!" he said feebly. Where he had heard or read the observation—he hardly thought he could have invented it—he could not remember; but he hoped it was appropriate, and he was proportionately disappointed when its only result was to change the wail into a roar. He reverted to his own language.

"What is the matter?" he inquired desperately. "Who are you? Where's Sarah? Hush-a-bye! Peep-bo! Tick-tick! Good gracious me, what in the world am I to do?"

"You had better turn up the gas first, Mr. Cunliffe."

John Cunliffe remembered afterwards that he was too deeply relieved at the moment even for surprise, as he turned, in the suddenly brightened light, to behold Miss Eden. For her part, she wasted no further time on him. She came quickly up to the table and gathered the screaming child into her arms. Her observations were not articulate, but in two minutes, as it seemed to her bewildered watcher, the roar had subsided into a feeble plaint as the golden head nestled confidingly against her shoulder.

"He's as cold as ice, poor mite," Miss Eden said. "And he's hungry too, I'm sure. Where did he come from? Where is Sarah? There, there!" as the crying showed sounds of breaking out afresh. "Is there a fire in your room? I had better take him there. Look and see if you can find some bread and milk and a saucepan, and bring it up to me."

She was gone as she spoke.

"I had no idea," he said to himself feebly. "I—had no idea!"

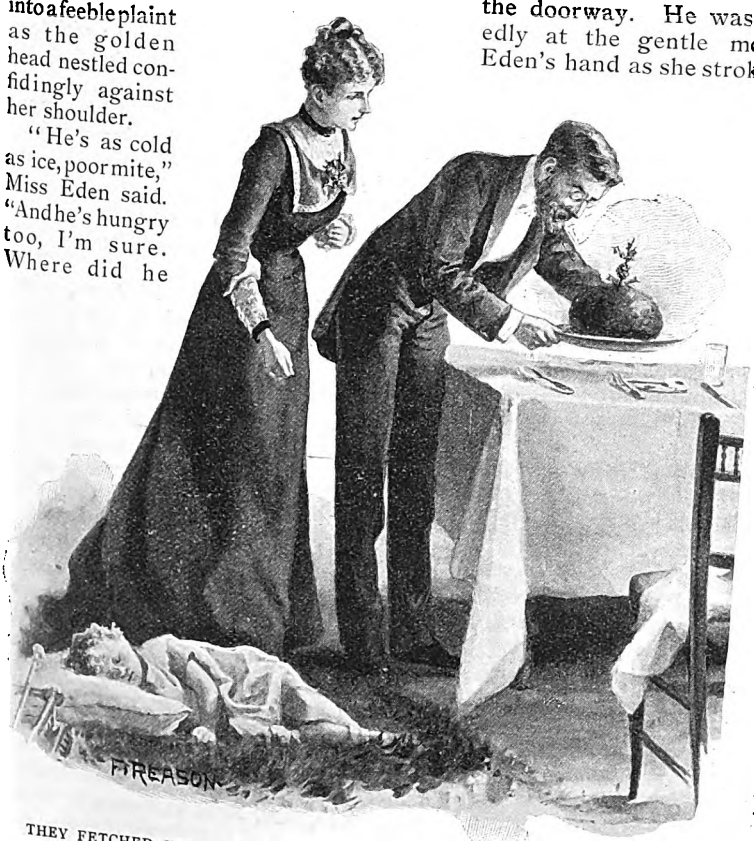
. . . . . .

"Then what is your theory?"

John Cunliffe uttered the words with remarkable meekness, considering to whom they were addressed. It was Christmas morning, and Miss Eden's sitting-room—frequently characterised as "disgracefully untidy" by John Cunliffe as he passed its open door—looked very bright and pretty. Miss Eden herself sat in a low chair by the fire, and on her knees was the little golden-haired child, a picture of content, carrying on an animated conversation, apparently with Nipper. John Cunliffe stood just within the doorway. He was gazing abstractedly at the gentle movement of Miss Eden's hand as she stroked the curly head.

"Well," she answered, gravely, "as far as our guest goes, I'm afraid the explanation is simple. Somebody wanted to get rid of him, and managed to put him in at the window when Sarah was out last night. Perhaps they thought Christmas Eve a good time. And as to Sarah," she continued, "I'm afraid there is no doubt in the main as to what has happened to her—an accident of some sort, poor thing."

A search of the house on the



THEY FETCHED UP THE PUDDING TOGETHER IN EXTRAORDINARY AMITY.

Digitized by Google

previous night had elicited the fact that Sarah was not within it; and she had not returned since. The tone of neutrality observable between the foes this morning was perhaps not wholly surprising. Miss Eden had spent nearly two hours in John Cunliffe's sitting-room the night before, absorbed in her task of feeding and soothing the child; and Cunliffe himself had been kept busily occupied in obeying her behests. They had parted for the night in whispers, because the child lay asleep in Miss Eden's arms; and it is not easy to be frigid in whispers.

There was a moment's pause after Miss Eden spoke, and then John Cunliffe said:

"And—what did you think of doing? About—er—about the child, you know. Would you—should I—shall I take it to the workhouse this morning?"

Miss Eden lifted her head with a start, and looked full at John Cunliffe. The bright, keen eyes absolutely flashed fire.

"The workhouse?" she cried. "Take him to the workhouse, the darling! What an abominable idea! Don't imagine for a moment that I should allow such a thing."

No man likes to find himself suddenly regarded as a monster, even by a woman he detests. John Cunliffe was not, at bottom, at all convinced of the desirability of the step he had proposed. He had assured himself, in considering the subject, that Miss Eden was very certain to range herself on the side of rigid practicality, and that it was desirable, for the preservation of the necessary supremacy of man over woman, that he should take the initiative. Her reception of his suggestion had a singular effect upon him. He flushed angrily, and found himself suddenly hotly in favour of it.

"I fail to see that the idea is in the least abominable," he said stiffly. "It seems to me to be the only reasonable possibility. What are workhouses for in your opinion?"

Miss Eden gathered the child into her arms and covered the rosy face with kisses.

"Not for every poor little child who has the misfortune not to be wanted!" she cried. "Besides, he may have been stolen. He may be traced. What do you think his mother would say to me if she knew I had let him go?"

There is nothing more annoying to the truly methodical mind than inconsistency. Such a burst of sentiment from one whom he knew—he did not ask himself how he knew it—to be essentially hard and unwomanly was more than John Cunliffe could stand.

"May I inquire what alternative you propose?" he inquired with angry sarcasm. "You do not contemplate keeping the child here, I presume?"

With one swift, indignant movement, Miss Eden turned her back upon him.

"Don't be alarmed," she said. "He shan't disturb you in the least, I promise you."

The insinuation stung John Cunliffe to the quick.

"The thing is preposterous!" he said, addressing Miss Eden's back hotly. "There is but one sensible course of action in the matter, and that I have suggested to you. I must beg to wash my hands of any further responsibility in the matter."

"Quite so," responded Miss Eden, frigidly. "And I shall be obliged if you will shut my door at the same time."

There was no alternative. Nothing was left to John Cunliffe, on this acceptance of his ultimatum, but to withdraw as haughtily as might be, shutting the door after him.

He went downstairs to his own room, hot with indignation. The inconsistency of the woman! The unreasonableness! The injustice! It was now past eleven o'clock—too late to go to church. He flung himself into his armchair, and snatched up a book.

John Cunliffe's visit to Miss Eden's room had been inspired by the apparent necessity of comparing notes with her as to the further conduct of the affair and of inquiring after their guest; and also by a desire to express his thanks for the breakfast which he had found in his sitting-room, obviously placed there by her hands. That breakfast had been partaken of at nine o'clock; and as the hours wore on nature began to force upon John Cunliffe the necessity for arranging his plans for the day.

John Cunliffe rose, and walked to the window. A stream of people were flocking home from a late service; family groups, with happy Christmas faces; and the sight annoyed John Cunliffe.

It made him feel that his room was quiet to the point of dreariness. He could hear the quick, light footsteps overhead; and then the sound of the baby's laugh

Digitized by Google

floated faintly down to his ears. John Cunliffe felt more annoyed still. After all, he said to himself indignantly, the child was much more his than hers. He had found it first. Why should he be expected to go off by himself to a dull dinner at a deserted club, not knowing what steps she might choose to take in his absence? And what was she going to do with herself? Was she going to take the child with her to the house of a friend? Or was she going to remain there, dinnerless?

"A cup of tea, I suppose, and some toast!" he said savagely. "Just like a woman!"

It was at this stage of his meditations that a peremptory little rap fell on the door. Before he could respond it was opened, and Miss Eden appeared.

"I wanted to know what you are going to do," she said brusquely. "You were going to dine here, weren't you?"

"I—I—have not decided," answered John Cunliffe distantly. "I was thinking of—the club."

She paused a moment, looking at him.

"That does not sound very cheerful," she returned.

"You—I presume you are engaged to dine out?" inquired Cunliffe.

"I was," she answered. "But of course I can't go. I couldn't take my guest, and I couldn't leave him."

"Of course, it is not of the least consequence," interposed Cunliffe, hastily and stiffly; "but I really cannot see that it is more your guest than mine."

A curious little smile broke over Miss Eden's face.

"Oh!" she said. "Well, I shall be having a Christmas dinner with him myself, and perhaps you would like to join us? There are your provisions in the larder. Suppose I cook them?"

"You are very good," said John Cunliffe. "Really I—shall be—greatly obliged."

"Then I think you had better just go up and entertain my—your—the guest," Miss Eden rejoined. "He doesn't care about solitude. I shan't be long."

It was the strangest Christmas afternoon John Cunliffe had ever passed. He spent it principally on the hearthrug in front of Miss Eden's fire, with "the guest" crawling gaily over him. There were intervals when Miss Eden looked in upon them, notably one when she gave him tea and "the guest" milk-and-water. And at half-past six she appeared with a table cloth and various appliances for dinner.

John Cunliffe rose.

"I wonder whether I couldn't do that," he said awkwardly. "I've seen the club waiter."

Miss Eden cast a quick glance at him.

"You may try," she said brightly. "I want to go and make myself tidy."

Cunliffe became suddenly conscious that "the guest's" attention to himself had not been without dishevelling consequences.

"I too," he said. "If you will excuse me, when I have done this, I will go and—and—dress."

So when they met again they were both in evening dress; hers, very dainty and quiet; his, irreproachably neat. He looked, indeed, younger by many degrees than he usually appeared. There was a boiled turkey before him, with all the desirable accompaniments, and as they sat down his face expressed the feelings which he did not find easy of utterance.

"You didn't think I could cook," said Miss Eden gaily. "I've been wondering what kind of dinner you expected. I did not attack the fish, but I have achieved mince-pies, and there is your plum-pudding, of course."

They fetched up the pudding together in extraordinary amity, and John Cunliffe actually ate a piece, though he shuddered as he thought of the morrow. And as he laid down his fork he looked across at Miss Eden and said reflectively:

"I do not think I have eaten Christmas pudding—no—not since the old Christmasses at Fretton."

"No?" said Miss Eden, easily. "Ah, those were Christmas puddings, weren't they? Some more, Mr. Cunliffe?"

John Cunliffe shook his head absently.

"No, thank you," he said. "Fretton is sold, Miss Eden? You heard of that, I suppose?"

An eloquent gesture from Miss Eden.

"Ah, yes," she said softly. "I was so sorry. I was so fond of them, Mr. Cunliffe—your uncle and aunt."

"They were—good people," he answered. His voice was a trifle husky. "I missed them very much." He paused a moment, and then went on dreamily; "I went there every Christmas until they died, but—you never came again."

Digitized by Google

"No," said Miss Eden; her voice was rather low.

"They used to lament," he said, "that you had so many claims upon your time. That was the reason why you never came, I suppose?".

"Partly."

There was a short silence. Miss Eden was looking at "the guest," fast asleep now, on the rug.

"You told me," said John Cunliffe, "you told me when—you know when—that you wanted to do something to make a place for yourself in the world. You have been successful. I know, I—I hope it has been—satisfactory?"

"Yes," she said. "I—think so." There was another pause, and this time she broke it.

"Things have been satisfactory to you, too, I hope," she said.

John Cunliffe sighed.

"No," he said. "I think—not, Sedgewick."

Miss Eden rose hurriedly, and kneeling down, began to arrange the baby's pillow.

"Do you mind clearing the pudding plates?" she said. "There is——"

But John Cunliffe went on as if she had not spoken.

"I have not proved myself a pleasant neighbour to you," he said. "I have not behaved well. I—must we go on as enemies?"

He also had risen now, and was standing on the other side of the little sleeping child. But Miss Eden did not look up at him.

"Surely not," she said.

He paused a moment.

"I have been—jealous," he said: "that has been at the bottom of it. Jealous that your life should be so sufficient for you. Sedgie, I suppose—it is no more use now than it was eighteen years ago? We can't be—more than friends?"

Miss Eden's head bent yet lower.

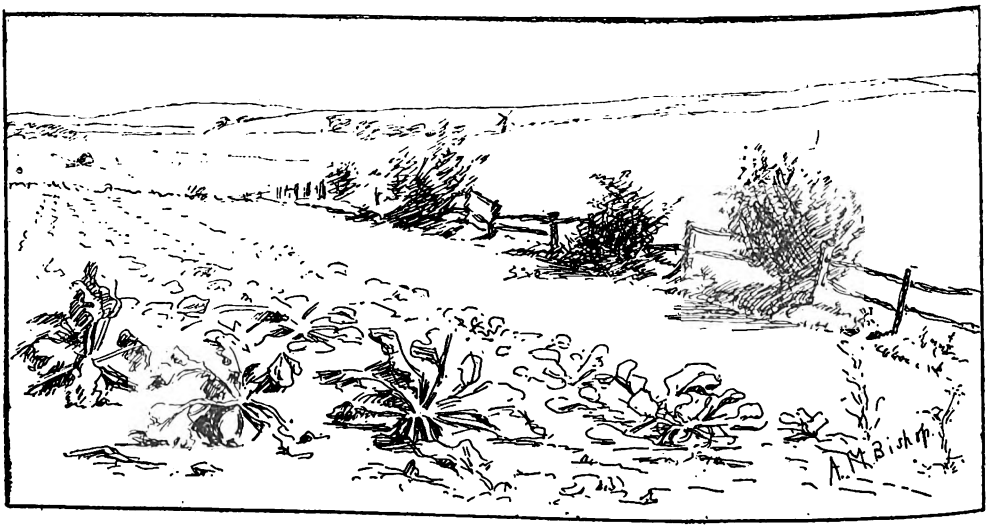
"I am a middle-aged woman now," she murmured. Then quite suddenly she lifted her face. "Oh!" she cried, "I have been so sorry for you. That's why I've been so horrid to you, because I knew you ought to be so different; and I was so sorry, so sorry, because—I think I've always cared."

John Cunliffe knelt incontinently down on the hearthrug; the baby, roused by the voices, opened his eyes at the moment with a little crow, and flinging out both his chubby fists, drew the two faces above him together—at last.

. . . . . .

"The guest" was never claimed, nor was he ever sent to the workhouse. He is the adopted son of Mr. and Mrs. John Cunliffe. And Sarah, limping from the accident which led to a three months' sojourn in a London hospital, is his nurse.

[THE END.]



Digitized by Google

A World-Wide Christian Alliance.

AN INTERVIEW WITH MR. E. P. FIELD.

By JAMES GRANT.

PERSECUTION, persistent and cruel, is still the lot of thousands of Christian worshippers in more than one civilised country, though we in England, who have long enjoyed the blessings of religious freedom, are sometimes apt to forget that such an anachronism exists. The recent records of the Evangelical Alliance—the Society which has for over half a century done so much for oppressed Christians in every quarter of the globe, are sufficient to disturb any such complacency, and the extent and reality of the suffering were brought very vividly to the mind of the writer when he paid a visit to the offices of the Alliance, to learn from its able secretary, Mr. E. P. Field, something of the Society's world-wide operations.

There he met the venerable Dr. Baedeker, who has just returned from Russia—the most persecuting country in Europe—after a long and arduous journey, for the purpose of preaching the Gospel to the prisoners, and visiting the unhappy Stundists in exile. The bronzed and weather-beaten countenance of the old Christian campaigner tells its own tale of hardships endured and perils braved.

When Dr. Baedeker had taken his leave, I asked Mr. Field to describe to me his work for the Alliance.

"He has been for very many years a member of our council," replied Mr. Field, "and has travelled throughout the whole of Russia. He has just now returned from the furthest regions of Tiflis, Batum, and Elizabethpol, having a permit from the Russian Government to visit and preach in all the prisons. Our Council has collected thousands of pounds for the relief of the Stundists, who are simple evangelical believers, of whom, perhaps, one-third would call themselves Baptists, and who have for many years been subject for their faith to most cruel persecution. We continually get letters from Dr. Baedeker, and we have also other correspondents travelling through Russia."

"Have you ever been to Russia yourself?"

"Yes, about two years ago the Council, being anxious to find out if they could possibly do anything more than they were already doing for the Stundists, sent me to travel through the country. I started from St. Petersburg, and I had the opportunity of meeting several of the principal leaders of the Stundists. We had long consultations together, and when I came back I laid all the information I had gathered before the Council. One of the principal results of that visit was the appointment of a new travelling missionary, whose work it is to travel continually all round the convict districts, visiting the exiled Stundists, and also the bereaved and distressed wives and children whom they have left behind them. The Council provide him with all the necessary funds for continually relieving want and distress wherever such occur."

"Is the work attended with any danger to the missionary himself?"

"It is extremely dangerous for him," replied Mr. Field, emphatically, "and he has had one or two narrow escapes; but I am thankful to say he has so far come to no harm. These escapes, however, will give you an idea of the delicacy of his position, and although we receive constantly reports from him full of details of the distress and persecution which he has seen or heard of, we are unable to publish these with any fulness for fear of giving information which may lead to his arrest."

"Is he travelling without the knowledge of the Russian Government?"

"Yes, except so far as it may have been gained from our publication, the Evangelical Alliance Quarterly, which purposely gives very carefully selected

Digitized by Google

LORD KINNAIRD.
Vice-President of the Evangelical Alliance.

particulars. But though he has not sought official sanction, this is only because the Greek Church and the Government are inextricably bound up together in one in the Russian Empire. There is not the slightest suggestion that our Council would ever countenance for a moment the least help to any Socialistic or revolutionary movement. The Stundists are entirely free from such ideas, and are absolutely governed by the New Testament doctrine: 'Obey them that have the rule over you.'"

"How long has this work been going on?"

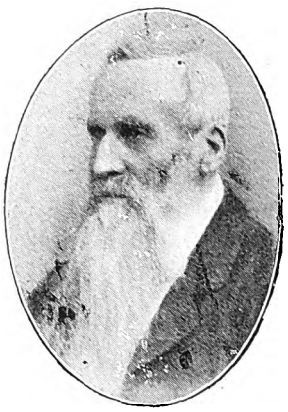
"Our work for the Stundists has been carried on for something like the last twenty years, commencing from the time when these persecutions were first brought to our knowledge, but from the establishment of the Alliance, in 1846, the work for persecuted Christians all over the world has been very dear to us.

"The Alliance was started in that year by such men as Dr. Chalmers, Dr. Guthrie, Angel James, Dr. Bickersteth, Baptist Noel, and others, on the one foundation, that 'all believers are one body in Christ,' and it followed upon this that when any member of that body suffered, others should suffer with it; and so, in 1849, when news reached us of the imprisonment in Tuscany of the Maddai, our Council at once took the matter in hand.

THE REV.
J. MONRO-GIBSON, D.D.
A Prominent Member of the Alliance.

"The Maddai were sentenced to imprisonment for life for possessing copies of the Holy Scriptures. The Council sent over to the King of Tuscany an important deputation of leading English and Continental Christians, and the result was that instead of imprisonment for life, under circumstances of such privation and squalor as would have ensured a speedy termination to their sufferings by death, the sentence was altered to one of mere banishment; and in this way the cruelty of the Roman Catholics was averted. From that time up to the present, a great number of occasions have arisen for work of the same character, which has been carried on in almost every country."

"Coming to the present time, can you give me any instances this year, Mr. Field?"



REV. DR. BAEDEKER.
Who has just returned from his Mission to the exiled Stundists.

"Quite early in the present year," was the reply, "there was a violent outbreak of Roman Catholic bigotry in Portugal, and the seven principal Protestant congregations in Lisbon had their meetings stopped by the police, and the leaders, at least two of them, were imprisoned. Afterwards all were brought up before the magistrates, who ordered them to desist from gathering together in future.

"Our correspondents in Portugal at once telegraphed to this office; a special meeting of the Council took place, and the result was that a deputation, appointed by the Alliance, was received by the King of Portugal at Buckingham Palace, his Majesty having come over to this country to attend our late beloved Queen's funeral."

"What kind of reception did you receive from his Majesty?"

"I was surprised at the graciousness of his welcome," replied Mr. Field. "He thanked us for having brought the matter

Digitized by Google

REV. F. B. MEYER.
Member of the Council.

before him, and he said that as soon as he had received our letter, he had at once sent orders to the police to cease all interference with these Protestant congregations. He went on to promise us that liberty of worship should be continued to them, and I am glad to say that only recently we have had letters, telling us gladly how faithfully the King has kept his promise."

"I suppose this incident attracted a good deal of attention on the Continent?"

"Yes; the newspapers not only in Portugal and Spain, but in France, Germany and Italy, were full of the matter. The action of the King must, I am sure, have had a very great influence in these countries in the direction of securing liberty of worship, and in discouraging Roman Catholic encroachments.

"Is there any other recent matter?"

"We have heard within the last fortnight from the Island of Brava, Cape Verde Islands, and the writer thanks us most heartily because the appeal sent to us by the Protestants in that Island has been granted. 'Yesterday,' he says, 'we were overjoyed by the arrival of the Lisbon Official Gazette, which gives us the liberty you asked for us,' and further on he says, 'Your committee have to be thanked and congratulated, and I will endeavour to obtain all the facts for publication in your magazine.'"

REV. DR. MACEWAN.
Honorary Secretary.

"The Alliance, I understand, is undenominational; but is there a preponderating influence of any particular Church in its Councils?"

"No, none whatever," was Mr. Field's answer. "We are steadfastly keeping before ourselves the definite aim and intention that there shall not be any preponderating influence; and it is a delightful element in our Council meetings and in all our public conferences that no one thinks of asking the question: 'Are you a member of this or that or the other Church?'"

"Do not in some places the Free Church Councils put their name upon the Week of Prayer programmes?"

"I shall always be sorry to hear of this being done, as it would mean an entire departure from the very fundamental idea of that Week of Prayer. It was commenced by us over fifty years ago with the object of bringing all Christians, irrespective of the Church to which they belonged, to kneel together in prayer.

VEN. ARCHDEACON SINCLAIR.
Always a welcome Speaker on the Alliance platforms.

"Of course, if a programme is issued in the name of one Church, it tends to keep the members of the other Churches from joining, and in this way really spoils the whole spirit of fellowship in prayer, because it excludes some of those who love and serve Christ."

"What other meetings do you hold to promote fellowship?"

"We have our annual conferences year by year in Great Britain. Last year it was held at Liverpool, and was attended with much blessing, and this year it will be held at Bournemouth on 26th, 27th, and 28th November.

"Then, again, upon the Continent or in America every seven years we have a great International conference. Since 1851 these have been held in London, Paris, Berlin, Genoa, Amsterdam, New York, Basle, Copenhagen, and Florence, and now we are preparing for our International conference in Hamburg, in August, 1902."

Digitized by Google

"Has the anti-English feeling, so prevalent on the Continent just now, caused you any difficulty?"

"Yes," said Mr. Field, "but the more bitterness of spirit there is upon the Continent the more need there is for such a Society as ours to hold its International conference there.

"The banner of our Evangelical Alliance, wherever it goes, is inscribed with the law of Christian love, and, indeed, I believe that our conference will not only do, with God's blessing, great service to the cause of Christianity, but will promote international amity."

RIGHT REV. DR. BICKERSTETH.
Vice-President.

"Have you personally had much evidence of the bitter spirit to which you allude?"

"I deeply regret to say that some very bitter letters have come to me at this office, not only from the Continent, but even from some few people in England itself. I don't wish, of course, to allude to the details of such correspondence, but I have had one good and sufficient answer which I have sent to all those correspondents. I have told them that the Lord Jesus Christ said, 'A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another,' and I have gone on to point out that, whatever may be the views of such a correspondent as to this unhappy war, the command I have just quoted was binding upon him absolutely.

"I take it that in all our differences we should most earnestly set ourselves to put away bitterness of spirit, and to love each other fervently. Some may say, 'Is this not a hard matter?' It seems, at first sight, harder than it really is. If a man sets himself to seek to practise love, if he determines that he will not put his pen to bitter words or utter them in speech, if he makes it a matter of prayer, he will certainly be able to obey God's commandment. It is an old saying that 'God's commandments are enablings.'

"From a logical standpoint, also," continued Mr. Field, "I should think that there was ample cause for people to suspend their judgment about matters attended with so much difficulty."

"Was not a strongly worded appeal received from the Swiss Branch on behalf of the Boers?"

"Yes, that is quite true," answered Mr. Field, "but it was signed by only three out of the seven branches. We published our answer to it in the October number of the Evangelical Alliance Quarterly, and you will be glad to hear that all our seven Swiss Branches are joining cordially with us in the approaching Week of Prayer, and have signed the invitation which we are sending out to the world for January 6th to 12th, 1902."

JAMES GRANT.

Digitized by Google

KNOWN THROUGH FAILURE.

If you could know that half of all I yearn to be to you,
dear heart!
Each day that dawns I struggle to be strong and do my part,
Yet when at last the night comes softly down I humbly pray,
"Lord, grant me still to prove my tender love just one more day!"

Just one more day to strive to rise above small troubles,
petty care,
That my cramped soul may break its earth-forged bonds, at last to dare
To face the future and to gladly live with courage new,
Loyal and cheerful, facing toward the light for truth
and you.

And yet I feel, in spite of all the heights which I can never scale,
In spite of all the many tests in which I daily fail,
That my deep love, more deep and pure and strong than I can ever show,
You somehow, through my failures, doubts, and fears,
will come to know.

The dreary clouds can't hide the sun for aye; it glimmers through.
The sweet, wet violet, struggling through dead leaves,
still shows its blue,
And so I trust, though oft I strike love's chord with clumsy hand,
You'll feel the melody I tried to play and understand.

Digitized by Google

A CHRISTMAS EVE DREAM.

By ETHEL GLYNNE,
Author of "Alan Haywood," etc.

IT was Christmas Eve. A keen north-east wind and a snow-laden sky were its principal atmospheric features. The minds of young folks and children lightly turned to thoughts of skating and sliding. The rich shiveringly drew their costly furs and wraps more closely around them and hurried impatiently into their trains or carriages; while the poor felt with redoubled force the utter inadequacy of their wretched garments, and the bitter contrast of their lot.

Seated in a luxurious easy-chair in a handsomely-furnished room in his house in South Kensington, before a glowing fire, which leaped and crackled merrily as the light from its flame danced upon the highly-burnished curb and fireirons and up again to add lustre to the costly plate which adorned the massive, handsomely-carved sideboard, and to touch as with a loving hand the pictures and ornaments on the wall, Ralph Grayson gave no thought to rich or poor. The frosts of seventy winters had whitened his still abundant locks, but his portly figure was tolerably erect. His manner was stern and dignified. The world knew him for a cold, hard man. Yet some, to whom charity meant more than a name, pitied him, and not without a cause; for, despite his wealth and luxury, happiness had long been denied him, and he told himself at times that it would never more be his.

Twenty years ago the blow had fallen which had so terribly changed his heart and life. His eldest daughter, a lovely, winsome girl of twenty-two, had married the man of her choice, a young and penniless artist, in defiance of his plans for a more suitable match for her. In his anger he banished her from his heart and home for ever, and, heedless of his wife's entreaties, returned unread the letters she sent asking for forgiveness.

From that time forth sorrow became his portion. His two youngest children were carried off within a few days of each other by scarlet fever. In consequence of this loss he clung more closely to his eldest son and heir and second daughter; but, alas! a few years later a boating accident deprived him of both. Half mad with grief, his heart seemed turned to stone, and he remained as unrelenting as ever towards his eldest child, and it was only when the knowledge that his wife was slowly dying of a broken heart was forced upon him by her physicians that he yielded to her cry of "Bring my Alice back to my arms and I shall live!" and set out to seek, forgive, and restore his wayward daughter to their desolate hearts. But retribution in the shape of failure awaited him. Not the slightest clue as to the whereabouts of Alice, or her husband and children, could be obtained. At last the sickness of hope deferred proved too much for Mrs. Grayson's health, and on Christmas Eve she passed away murmuring, faintly:

"Never cease trying to find our child, Ralph."

But after making several futile efforts the merchant gave up his quest; his former hardness and coldness returned and increased daily, as did also his riches.

Five years had rolled away since his wife's death, and as on this particular Christmas Eve he sat thinking of the past he felt that he would give all he possessed to find his lost Alice. Oh, the heart-hunger which tortured him! Oh, how he longed for the sound of that laughing voice, those softly clinging arms and loving kisses! Was there nothing he could do to bring back the warmth and gladness of heart which had once been his? The demon of Despair seemed to whisper: "Too late!"

Digitized by Google

And while thus sadly musing he fell asleep.

The handsome, cosy room faded from before him, and he found himself in a small, neatly and scantily-furnished but spotless apartment. In a well-worn easy-chair before a meagre fire sat an aged woman. Beneath her silvery hair and broad, deeply-lined brow, beamed a face over which the tempests of trial and sorrow had swept; yet there shone out of the faded eyes a look of patient hope and trustfulness, telling of battles long since fought and won, leaving the spirit chastened and softened but unseared. Just then those eyes, which were fixed upon the door, were filled with a world of love and tenderness, for her listening ear caught the sound of a well-known foot-step, and the next instant in came a tall, good-looking young man, whose clever face bore a bright smile as he came over to her side, and who, laying a small parcel in her lap, said, as he kissed her wrinkled brow: "There, mother dear, is a little present from your John. I wish it had been something better," he added, and there was disappointment in his tones.

"My own kind boy," cried the old lady as she undid the parcel and drew out a neat lace cap. "It is just what I needed. And, darling, were it fifty times more costly I could not value it more, for I know the wealth of love with which it is given. But I am sorry to see you look disappointed, dear."

"Yes," sighed the young man. "Christmas has come again, and although I have worked harder than ever this year, Mr. Grayson made no mention of increasing my salary."

"Well, dear," answered the widow, echoing her son's sigh, "he is a hard man. And for all his wealth I would not change places with him, for we have each other and he has no one."

"True, true, mother mine," cried John. "It's not for my own sake that I desire more money. But as you say, we are richer than he, for we have our love for each other, the love of God in our hearts, and, though poor, the joy of being able to do a little to cheer and soothe the sorrows of others."

"Yes," replied Mrs. Harrison, guessing his thoughts. "I have made a small plum-pudding for those poor children, and some beef-tea for Mrs. Brame."

"God bless you, dear," murmured the son, and again he bent and kissed her.

Then over the countenances of the mother and son came a radiance born of the light that never was on land or sea, which grew in intensity until it literally transfigured them into glorified beings, whose effulgence spread until it filled the room, when suddenly there appeared in their midst a company of angels, and with them a volume of music the like of which has never fallen upon the ear of mortal man since Bethlehem's shepherds while watching their flocks by night the self-same message heard. For the words of which that glorious wave of soul-enrapturing music formed the accompaniment, were those of the old, old proclamation, "Peace, goodwill toward men!" Then, with a final shout of triumphant acclamation, the angels softly raised their wings and disappeared; but there shone out in letters of light, which encircled as with a loving embrace the aged widow and her faithful son, the words: "Peace, perfect peace."

Unable to bear the sight of the dazzling splendour of the rays which emanated from these words the bewildered, awe-stricken merchant covered his face with his hands, and when he ventured to look again the vision had vanished and the scene was changed!

This time he was walking along a squalid street in one of the poorest districts of the city. It was night, and the street was drearily silent. Coming towards him was a poorly-clad boy of about fourteen years of age, with a thin, pinched face. As he came under the light of the street-lamp, Ralph Grayson saw that his cheeks were flushed, his brown eyes bright, as with unshed tears, and that he panted for breath, as though he had been hurrying too fast. At the same moment from out of a dingy doorway stepped a young girl of eighteen or so, who, despite her shabby sailor's hat and ill-fitting jacket, looked a lady; for there was about her a grace and dignity, such as fine clothes can never give. If the thinness of her face and figure detracted somewhat from their beauty the wistfulness in her starlike eyes added to their charm; and naught could rival the loveliness of the luxuriant, sun-kissed curls which clung so softly about her white neck and brow and crowned her head with glory.

Digitized by Google

"Is that you, Teddie?" she cried, in a low, sweet voice.

"Yes, Muriel. But why did you come out to meet me? It is so cold, and you are not well."

"I am all right, dearie; "but—but——"

"Mother! Is she worse?" gasped the boy, his cheeks paling and the light dying out of his eyes.

"No, dear. That is—oh, Teddie, the doctor says there is no hope for her unless she goes into the hospital. She begged of him to let her stay with us until Christmas is over, but after that she must go. Now, darling, don't give way," as an agonised sob broke from Teddie. "I came out to tell you in order that you might be prepared, and so be able to show mother a brave face." Then, as if to cheer him, "Why, what have you in that bag, you extravagant boy?"

"Some grapes, that's all, sis," replied Teddie, wiping his eyes and trying to speak bravely as he added, "And, oh, how I wish I could buy mother something else?"

"But how did you get those?"

"Mr. Harrison gave me two shillings, Muriel. And only think, Mr. Grayson, who is so rich, gave me nothing. And, oh, I was so hoping that he would, just for mother's sake!"

"Never mind, darling! God, who knows all things, will accept your good wishes towards mother; so do not let us harbour unkind thoughts of anyone on Christmas Eve, but rather let us pray for such as he, for the hard-hearted rich are more to be pitied than we are."

As the boy answered "Yes, Mury, you are always right, we should pray for such as he; and so I will," there came again that marvellous radiance. White-robed angels thronged around them, heavenly music filled the air, and once more the merchant saw those vivid characters, and the message they formed. Then, as before, sight failed him, and ere his senses were released from the glamour that overpowered him, the scene was once more changed. He was sitting in his strong-room, which was lit by a single jet of gas above his head, so that the greater portion of it was enveloped in gloom.

Presently over a pile of dusty ledgers lying on the top of a desk in the darkest corner, there appeared, as if written in fire, long rows of figures, while within the huge fireproof safe, the door of which stood open, shone the words, "Gold, gold, gold!" With fascinated eyes, he beheld those figures, for he knew them to be the exact numerical representation of the wealth the safe contained, and that which lay at his bankers; but instantly his interest was averted, for there in the midst of the gloom stood a shining angel, who thus addressed him:

"O man! What avails this wealth, when thou art dead? Wouldst thou the full joy of living know, go forth, and on the poor and needy, this thy gold bestow! Then shall there be yours, that which the wealth of nations cannot buy, for it belongeth up on high!"

And then the merchant, in trembling accents, cried:

"Oh, angel, tell me of this bliss!"

The angel softly and gently answered:

"Go forth and seek it; its name is Peace!"

With those sweetly thrilling tones still filling his ears, Ralph Grayson awoke. The fire was still blazing cheerily, and though the twilight was fast deepening into darkness, he could clearly distinguish the familiar objects around him. The scent of the cigar and aroma of the wine, in which he had recently indulged, still lingered in the air. Yet it was several seconds before he could fully comprehend that he was awake, and that the wondrous scenes he had just witnessed with his spiritual eyes were not a reality, but a God-sent vision. Like one still under a spell, he sat and reviewed each incident of the vision which had enabled him to see himself as others saw him; and as he thought of his hardness and meanness towards his faithful clerk, John Harrison, the self-sacrificing son of a widowed mother, his careless indifference with regard to the fatherless lad to whom a little of his wealth would have meant so much joy, he loathed himself. Then, as other thoughts came to him, he buried his face in his hands, and the strong man wept bitter tears of mingled sorrow and repentance, while from the depths of his soul, he cried: "O God, be merciful to me a sinner!" Then suddenly rising to his feet, he exclaimed: "Yes; I will earn their pity and their prayers! This very night shall they bless Ralph Grayson's name!"

Digitized by Google

Ten minutes later he was speeding along in a hansom to his office, ashamed in his heart to think he did not even know where either clerk or office-boy lived. On arriving at the office, he found that the Harrisons lived in Shepherd's Bush, but Teddie's address was not down. He remembered that he had engaged the boy through John Harrison saying he was in his class at Sunday-school; so, of course, the latter would know all about him. Thinking thus, he seated himself at his desk and wrote a letter to his clerk, expressing in a few well-chosen terms his appreciation of his long and faithful services, and enclosing a cheque for such a sum as should amply atone for all past insufficiency of salary. Then, with a warmer feeling at his heart than he had known for years, he set out again to do the angel's bidding.

By-and-bye the hansom stopped before a tall, smoke-blackened lodging-house, and, mounting the well-worn steps, he knocked somewhat cautiously at the door. It was opened by a slatternly-looking servant-girl, who, in answer to his inquiry if Mr. Harrison lived there, replied:

"Yes, sir, 'e do; but 'e ain't in hat present. But Mrs. 'Arrison's hin, cos she don't never go hout 'ardly."

"Then will you ask her if she will kindly let me see her for a few minutes?" asked the merchant, and he put his card into her grimy paw.

"Yes, certingly, sir; please come inside," replied the girl.

As Ralph Grayson stood in that dingy hall, with its shabby, tattered floorcloth and smoky, evil-smelling lamp, his heart suddenly filled with a feeling of the deepest pity for the many refined and cultured people whose lack of means compels them to live amid such surroundings. He was aroused from those reflections by the return of the servant girl, who intimated that Mrs. Harrison would be pleased to see him if he would kindly come upstairs. With cautious step he ascended in the wake of the girl, who paused several times to clear from their course sundry hindrances, such as brushes, dust-pans, etc., till they reached the third landing, when, as she threw open a door on the right and announced him, he gave a short, quick, gasp of surprise, for there was the aged, placid-faced woman, the spotless room, the meagre fire; yes, even the cardboard box on the table, containing, he felt sure, the much-prized cap her loving son had bought her.

Mrs. Harrison rose with some difficulty and greeted her visitor with an old-world courtesy—fast dying out—then nervously faltered: "You wish to see my son, sir. I am sorry he is not at home," for inwardly she wondered whether the visit of her son's master at such a time boded good or ill.

Still less at ease felt the merchant; but, pulling himself together, he said: "I came, Mrs. Harrison, to ask your son for our office-boy's address."

"Oh, sir, I hope there is nothing wrong!" cried the old lady. "Teddie is such a bright, honest little fellow."

"Nothing, I assure you," returned Mr. Grayson, taking the chair she had set for him. "But why should you think so?"

"Well, sir, I can scarcely tell; but I know boys are often entrusted with money, which is a sore temptation to them, when they are placed as Teddie is at present."

"By which you mean," put in the merchant, with eager expectancy, as he recollected the troubled face of the boy in his dream, "that he is in trouble and want?"

"Indeed, sir, he is," answered the old lady, and her eyes glistened with sympathetic tears as she forthwith acquainted her visitor with the story of the sick mother and the frail young girl and boy doing their utmost to stave off the blow of parting with the former, whose malady had so increased that a critical operation was necessary to save her life.

Many and varied were the emotions that passed through her listener's breast; and as the old lady noted each change in his countenance, she marvelled greatly as to how one who evinced such interest in her story could ever have acted in such a wise as to earn the name by which even her own charity-loving son called him, while Ralph Grayson, as he looked at that sweet, placid old face, could almost fancy he saw again those shining letters of light, and felt the angel's presence.

Presently he rose, and, without making any comment on the Brames' case except: "Thank you, Mrs. Harrison, I will go at once and see what I can do," he drew from his pocket the note intended for her son, saying carelessly: "And oh, may I trouble you to give this to John as soon as he comes in?" And, almost before the wondering Mrs. Harrison could reply, he was gone.

Digitized by Google

Jumping into the hansom again, he bade the driver drive quickly, and before long they were rattling up the dreary, squalid street, to which he felt no stranger. Soon the hansom stopped before the self-same dingy-looking doorway out of which had stepped the girl whom, with a wild, vague, undefinable longing, he now hoped to see. But who was that just coming out? Why, surely it was John Harrison!

"Mr. Grayson! You, sir!" cried the astonished clerk.

"Yes, Harrison, it is I. But is this where Teddie Brame lives?"

"Yes sir; I am fresh from seeing them," was the reply.

"Then as you know them so well, do you mind going and asking if they will see me?"

Filled with amazement, but without a word, John Harrison obeyed, leaving his master standing in the dilapidated porch.

Then, indeed, did Ralph Grayson seem to himself to have lost his own identity. Why, he asked himself, should his heart beat so furiously, and wherefore should he tremble like a culprit, as a few seconds later he mounted the rickety staircase, and followed his clerk into that room, so clean and neat, yet cruelly bare and comfortless. He soon knew why! There stood the boy, with the pinched, eager face; there the fragile girl, with the lovely sun-kissed hair and wistful, starlike eyes. But who was that with a frame so painfully emaciated, fever-dyed cheeks, glittering eyes, panting breath, and skeleton-like hands, grasping the table for support? For an instant the merchant stood as if turned to stone, then, with a thrilling cry—in which mingled horror, shame, and remorse—of "Alice, my child! Forgive me! oh, forgive!" he sprang forward to clasp to his heart the long-lost daughter, whose pent-up agony of years spent itself in the words: "My father! At last!" which she uttered ere she fell senseless on his breast.

In utter bewilderment Muriel and Teddie clung to John Harrison, asking what it all meant.

Tenderly kissing his daughter's death-like face, Ralph Grayson placed her in her chair, and then, turning towards them with outstretched arms, exclaimed:

"It means that for years you have been the victims of a sin of which I have long since repented. For years have I sought you, but in vain until to-night, when God in His mercy heard my prayer and sent me here. Come to the heart that craves for your love and forgiveness, my darlings," he added.

And the next moment Muriel and Teddie, with a wondering, half-dazed, yet suddenly joyous sense of well-being, crept into their grandfather's arms for the first time in their lives.

Joy seldom kills, and soon the mother opened her eyes upon a scene which set her pulses beating with a strange happiness too deep for words. Meanwhile, John Harrison, with innate delicacy of feeling, had stolen quietly away ere she found strength to recount to her father the story of her husband's death in the midst of a promising career, followed by her gradual social descent which caused her to change her name, thus baffling his attempts to find her; of her proud determination, after the rebuffs she had received, even when fate led Teddie to his grandfather's office, never to reveal her history to the world or her children until death came, when she had intended leaving with their faithful friend, John Harrison, a letter directed to her father.

Before midnight Mrs. Chaucer, as we must now call her, and her children were transported from their wretched dwelling to their rightful place in Ralph Grayson's luxurious home.

The next day a snug brougham was despatched to bring the clerk and his aged mother to dine with the merchant and his kin, whom they out of their penury had befriended.

After dinner, when the merchant and John were alone, the former recited the story of his soul's awakening. Then, holding out his hand, he said:

"What can I do, John, to repay the debt of gratitude I owe you?"

"Speak not of it, sir. God knows it was but little I could do; and I am already amply repaid in seeing their joy and yours."

Yet he sighed, and hearing him the old gentleman said:

"Harrison, am I wrong in thinking that you care for Muriel?"

"I will not deny the truth, sir. When ignorant of her true position I learnt to love her, and fondly hoped to one day win her. But now the very thought of such a thing is presumption."

Digitized by Google

"Once I made a mistake," faltered the other. "It shall not be so again. If Muriel loves you, she shall marry you. I am growing old, Teddie is but a youth, why should you not be my partner? Then who shall cavil at my granddaughter's marriage?"

So, his brain in a mad whirl of love and joy, John Harrison sought the girl he loved, and found her heart was all his own.

When the New Year came Teddie was sent to Eton. The operation which was to prolong his mother's life was successfully performed, and she lived to gladden her father's heart as mistress of his home and to rejoice in her children's welfare.

Soon after, old Mrs. Harrison ended her days amid joy, peace and plenty.

The firm of Grayson and Harrison continued to flourish. And while to many the marvellous change in its chief is still a mystery, the poor and friendless have had abundant cause to rejoice in the bountiful harvest of good deeds resulting from the God-sown seed of Ralph Grayson's dream.

[THE END.]

GOD'S WITNESSES.

The star-lit sky above, the law within—
  These are of truth the witnesses sublime,
  To which man's heart has hearkened in all time,
As to deep voice heard 'mid the battle's din.

Unchangeable while ages onward spin,
  Ringing of life and death the equal rhyme;
  Through all the centuries and every clime,
They utter God, despite all doubt and sin.

Beneath the stars, in presence of the soul,
  Far from the whirl, the noise, the strife, the glare
Of the vain world, come visions of the whole,
  Which His eternal hands make and upbear:
We read the writing of the mystic scroll,
  And know that life means hope, and not despair.

Bishop Spalding.

Digitized by Google

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

AMONG those Army chaplains who specially distinguished themselves at the front was the Wesleyan chaplain, the Rev. O. S. Watkins, who has been four times mentioned in despatches, the last time by Earl Roberts.

Mr. Watkins has recently been appointed Wesleyan chaplain at Aldershot, and right glad he must be to enjoy such a respite from war's alarms after all the sad sights he has witnessed in the field and in the hospitals.

Although quite a young man few have done more to give comfort and consolation to the wounded and dying. He went right through the Natal campaign, being present at Lombard's Kop and Nicholson's Nek, and it was in connection with his work in the recovery and burial of the British soldiers after that latter disaster that Sir George White mentioned his name to the home authorities.

He shared the fortunes of the Division inside the walls of Ladysmith, doing his best to lighten the tedious hours of the sick and wounded, performing burial services over those who had perished in the desperate encounters on the outskirts of the town, and rendering the same sad offices on behalf of those who had succumbed to that still more dreaded foe—enteric fever. When relief at last arrived, Mr. Watkins' name again received honourable mention in Sir George White's despatches.

He continued on active service throughout the operations undertaken to clear Natal of the enemy, and he accompanied General Buller's force when it carried out one of the most difficult undertakings of the war—the clearing of

THE REV. O. S. WATKINS,
The Wesleyan Chaplain who has been four times mentioned in Despatches.
Photograph by Slatery, Llandudno.

Digitized by Google

the Eastern Transvaal, and his work done on the field was again specially mentioned.

Mr. Watkins knew the meaning of war from personal experience before the outbreak of hostilities in South Africa. In 1896 he was Wesleyan chaplain in Malta, and when trouble broke out in Crete, he accompanied the 23rd Welsh Fusiliers to that island, and saw some hard fighting. He was present on the field when the Highland Light Infantry suffered so severely.

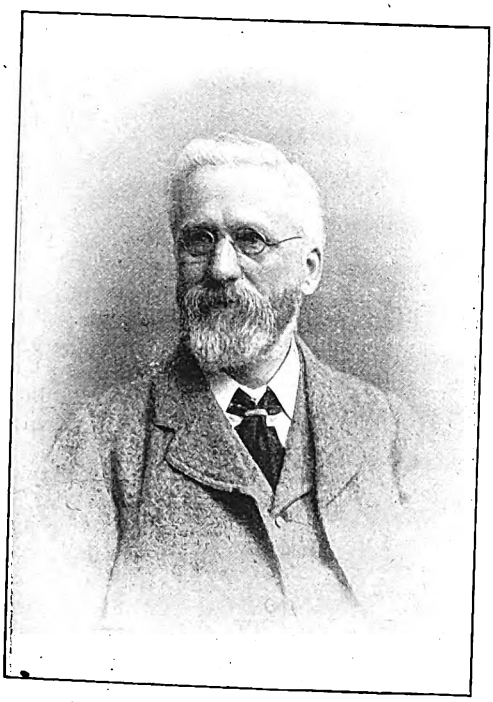
His initial experience was shortly to be followed by others of a more thrilling and important character. In March, 1898, he received orders to accompany the Sirdar's force, and was present at the final overthrow of the Dervishes at Omdurman. He took part in the Gordon Memorial Service with other ministers, and was mentioned in despatches.

THE name of Mr. E. Wilson Gates is one that is widely known in connection with philanthropic work. He began his connection with the Congregational Union in 1884, and his sympathies from the beginning have been with the philanthropic section, and by varied experiences he has become intimately acquainted with the condition and needs of the poor of London.

For several years he was accustomed to walk the streets of London at night, in company with a few kindred spirits, in order to come into touch with the homeless and destitute. The practice then was to invite night wayfarers to a short rest, early breakfast, and a brief service at Colliers Rents. Rather more than ten years ago a new departure was made by the Union in opening Medland Hall as a free shelter, and to this scheme Mr. Gates devoted himself with intense earnestness. The success of the work is a splendid testimony to what can be done towards ameliorating the hardships of the homeless by careful management and kindly sympathy.

At Medland Hall, on a Sunday evening, Mr. Gates is perhaps seen at his best. Usually, about 600 homeless men are under the spell of his personality. His management of an audience is remarkable.

The whole of the philanthropic work of the Union is under Mr. Gates's superintendence.



MR. E. WILSON GATES,
Who directs the whole of the philanthropic work of the London Congregational Union.

The Mission at Colliers Rents is far-reaching in its influence. Little children are taught to play, older ones are encouraged to work, fathers and mothers are provided with healthy entertainment, and to all the Christ of the Gospel is presented as a human brother and a Divine Saviour.

At Wapping there is another Mission, and yet another in Banner-street, St. Luke's. The distribution of clothing reaches to some 30,000 garments a year, a larger output than some of London's business men can boast of.

Country holidays for children run through the summer months, and, as Mr. Gates puts it, providing these holidays adds very greatly to his own enjoyment as well as helping to brighten the lives of poor little ones.

In the winter, country holidays give place to hot nourishing breakfasts. Tables are spread in various parts of London, and milk porridge, bread and jam and other good things help to maintain a temperature above freezing point.

With all this work on his hands it will be easily understood that Mr. Gates has not much time to spare. His leisure moments are devoted to "ways and means"—how to provide the £3,000 a year required for carrying on the work.

Digitized by Google

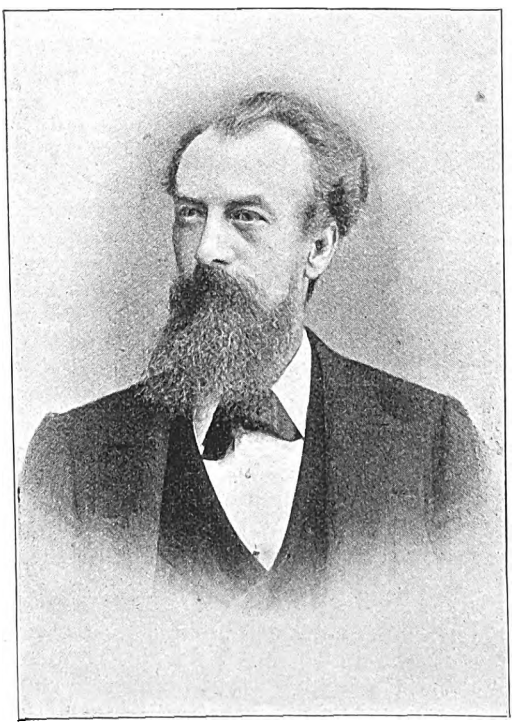
AS a tapestry painter Miss Pauline Grayson holds a great place in the art world of America, many of the finest houses possessing works from her brush. Gifted with almost unusual talent, she studied for years under the best masters with untiring diligence and perseverance, learning the minutest details of technique and colouring, and gaining well nigh perfection in her art; while now, with the true generosity of the real artist, and in her enthusiastic love for her work, she is willing to impart some of the invaluable hints she has gained by experience to others less gifted or fortunately circumstanced than herself, and more than one useful article, of advice as to colouring and mode of treatment, has issued from her pen.

Born in Brooklyn, Miss Grayson, who comes of an old American family, is possessed of a very charming personality,

MISS PAULINE GRAYSON,
The noted American Tapestry Painter.

and this, combined with her great artistic abilities, has gained her many friends and admirers. As a writer of books, she is well known in her own country, and in a lesser degree in this, one book in especial, "The Kreutzer Sonata Bearing Fruit," eliciting letters of warm appreciation from the late Mr. Gladstone and other well-known people on this side of the water.

Now, as a playwright she is likely to be as successful, for a musical farcical comedy —which she has just finished, and to which Herr Meyer Lutz has set the music—is said to be extremely clever and abounds in bright sayings and unique situations. She has other works in hand which will see the light in course of time, and, considering her artistic temperament and inborn love for art and literature, it is likely that they will prove her to be above the ordinary as a dramatic writer.



THE REV. H. E. STONE,
Originator of a happy idea for brightening the lives of village workers.
Photo by Andrew W. Dron, Dyne Road, Brondesbury.

THE REV. H. E. STONE, pastor of Abbey Road Baptist Church, London, has introduced a happy idea for brightening the lives of secluded village workers who are preaching the gospel in the lonely places.

For the past seven or eight years in every autumn between thirty and forty village pastors and their wives are invited to a three days' conference.

Those who are in very poor pastorates have their fares paid, and in other ways are remembered by gifts of clothing, the glad labour of ladies connected with the church under the auspices of the Village Pastor's Aid Society.

Digitized by Google

Members of the Church cheerfully give the hospitality and also subscribe to the expenses incurred.

Conferences on topics connected with village work are held each day in the morning and afternoon, the evening meetings being reserved for the pastors to give reports of their work and the difficulties attending the same.

The three days pass all too quickly, but in the memory linger long the recollection of them. As one pastor said at a concluding gathering:—

"They would go back with cheered and gladdened hearts, with all remembrances of love and kindness so liberally shown."

Who can tell how much London benefits, with its yearly influx of village life, from these hand and heart touches of sympathy given out to those who hold the fort in these quiet country places?

THE REV. J. GREGORY MANTLE,
Who has succeeded the Rev. Mark Guy Pearse at St. James's Hall.
Photograph by Pannell & Holden, Brighton.

THE Rev. J. Gregory Mantle, who has been appointed successor to the Rev. Mark Guy Pearse as colleague to the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes in the work of the West London Wesleyan Mission, has had a brilliant career. But great as are Mr. Mantle's capacities they are just now under an exceptionally severe test, for until Mr. Hughes' health improves the new comer must perforce do the work of two men. In the ordinary course Mr. Mantle would have to only conduct the morning services at St. James's Hall, but under the present circumstances he undertakes the evening services also.

The conditions of life in West London call for able and energetic religious workers, and, above all, those who have the welfare of young men and women at heart. The past experience of Mr. Mantle has been precisely of the kind most needed in his new sphere. During his pastorate at Norfolk-road, Brighton, it was always one of his chief aims to win over the young life of the town. In this connection, it was his custom to hold an "at home" every Thursday to which the young townspeople were welcome, and by this means alone 150 members were added to the church.

His next step was to hire the Alhambra, Theatre, at a cost of £20 a night, and for two winters he drew large audiences. The financial burden of this undertaking was considerably lightened by the spontaneous gift of £200 by a lady who, though she had no connection with the church, was an admirer of Mr. Mantle's evangelistic work. From his congregations at the theatre, Mr. Mantle formed a Young Men's Bible Class of 80 members.

All this pioneer work had a splendid effect upon the attendances at the ordinary services at Norfolk-road, and the congregation were enabled to contribute the large sum of 1,100 guineas to the Centenary Fund.

Digitized by Google

The invitation to take Mr. Pearse's place came as a great surprise to Mr. Mantle, for when his wife, who had at the moment Mr. Hughes' letter in her pocket, asked her husband if he would care to fill the vacant position he replied, "Don't be absurd. I am the last person in the world they would ask to go." But Mr. Hughes, who himself was a former pastor of Norfolk Road, had recently paid a visit to his old church to conduct anniversary services, and there is no doubt that what he then saw of the healthy vitality of the place under Mr. Mantle was no small factor in the making of the London appointment.

THOUGH one of the younger generation of writers, the name of Miss Winifred Graham has become well known to the reading public.

She is a charming and versatile writer of fiction, and has been a frequent contributor to religious magazines and papers. One of her books, entitled "The Star Child," received the warm commendation of the late Dr. Mandell Creighton, when Bishop of London, and he was so struck with the beauty of the writing and the elevating tone of the story that he expressed a wish to see it published serially.

There is a freshness and originality about all Miss Graham's work. She is an enemy to everything hackneyed or commonplace either in thought or expression, and her plots have no resemblance to the worn-out pieces of mechanism which form the stock-in-trade of so many writers.

These plots, she says, come to her at odd moments. Sometimes they are suggested by something in the newspaper, sometimes by the conversation of friends, but often it is impossible to trace any source of suggestion and they are evolved from her own consciousness. Miss Graham is passionately fond of her work, and when in the mood writes on for hours at a stretch regardless of time. She composes with great rapidity—the ideas flowing so fast that the difficulty is to put them down on paper quickly enough.

The charm of Miss Graham's personality can only be appreciated by those who know her; she is bright and vivacious, and seems to have an inexhaustible fund of energy and "go."

Authors, especially lady authors, are often credited with an appearance dowdy and bespectacled, but the charming subject of this sketch quite dispels the idea that personal attraction and cleverness are not to be found together.

MISS WINIFRED GRAHAM,
A Popular Story Writer.

THE REV. ROBERT E. WELSH, M.A., the popular and gifted minister of St. George's Presbyterian Church, Brondesbury, is one of the most versatile, as he is one of the most engaging of men. By birth an Ayrshire man, he has all the fine poetic instinct in the choice of language which is, in Scotland at least, regarded as the peculiar endowment of Burns's region, and, coming of the stock of Welsh — name of note and honour in Covenanting story —he has the keen spiritual insight which makes his preaching so helpful to thoughtful men. After the Grammar School of Ayr, he spent four years at the Glasgow University, matriculating in 1876. For three years more he studied in the United Presbyterian Theological College, Edinburgh. It is little to be wondered at that the Presbyterian should be regarded as the most educated of ministries, seeing that every man must give from seven to eight years by way of preparation. In 1880 the great desire of Mr. Welsh's heart was accomplished; he was ordained a missionary, the field assigned him being Tokio, Japan; and thither, with his bride of a week, he set out. It was not long, however, before the health of the young wife utterly broke down, necessitating their return. Mr. Welsh then took up work at Harrogate, where he remained about five years, leaving good proof of his hard but successful labours there in the beautiful church he built. Several tempting offers were made him at this time, from fields as wide apart as Chicago, Kimberley, and Wolverhampton, but these he set aside in favour of Brondesbury — with the good results that are so conspicuous to-day, the handful of people he found when he came having grown to a great congregation, abounding in all forms of religious and philanthropic work, and the little hall which held them at the start having now grown to a large and beautiful church, built at a cost of £7,000. It was entirely cleared of debt a few months ago, the congregation giving a token of their gladness and appreciation in the shape of a cheque, with insistence that Mr. and Mrs. Welsh should take a good holiday abroad.

Digitized by Google

But Mr. Welsh, like one or two other Presbyterians of note, has a far larger congregation than could be contained by the walls of St. George's, or any existing cathedral, for by his pen he reaches men and women wherever the English language is known. After travelling in South Africa—over much of the ground since made historic by the war—Mr. Welsh came home in the same ship with Olive Schreiner. A sketch which he wrote of that lady was quickly seized by Mr. Atkins—he who has "found" and helped so many young writers—and appeared in the Young Woman. By this attention was drawn to Mr. Welsh as a writer, and the reading world has benefited by the discovery largely since. From his pen has come "The Romance of Psalter and Hymnal," an interesting account of the making, and the makers, of our best known hymns. "In Relief of Doubt" soon followed, winning the distinction of highest public praise, and afterwards of a written introduction from the pen of Canon Ingram, now Bishop of London. Succeeding this came "The People and the Priest"—a clear, temperate and scriptural warning against the evils of ritualism. Perhaps, however, one of Mr. Welsh's happiest works—one, at all events, which has done grandest service among young men — is "God's Gentlemen," a series of lectures or articles on life and conduct, set forth in the finest literary vein. Contributing, as he constantly is, to many magazines, it is no small proof of his nervous energy and ability to note that Mr. Welsh is at present editing the series of "Christian Study Manuals" which Hodder and Stoughton are bringing out. Of a happy, bright, and sympathetic disposition, it may be fairly augured that great as Mr.

REV. ROBERT E. WELSH,
A Brilliant Preacher and Writer, and Editor of the "Christian Study Manuals."
Photo by Bernard Alfieri, Willesden Green, N.W.

Digitized by Google

Welsh's work has been in the past, it is destined to be greater still.

MR. W. H. GROSER, the Literary Secretary of the Sunday School Union, is a business man who for the greater part of his life has devoted his leisure to the cause of religious education. It may safely be said there exists no more important institution than the Sunday School Union, which year by year adds tens of thousands of scholars to the millions it has already under its control.

MR. W. H. GROSER,
Literary Secretary of the Sunday School Union.
Photo by T. C. Turner & Co., 12, Upper Street, N.

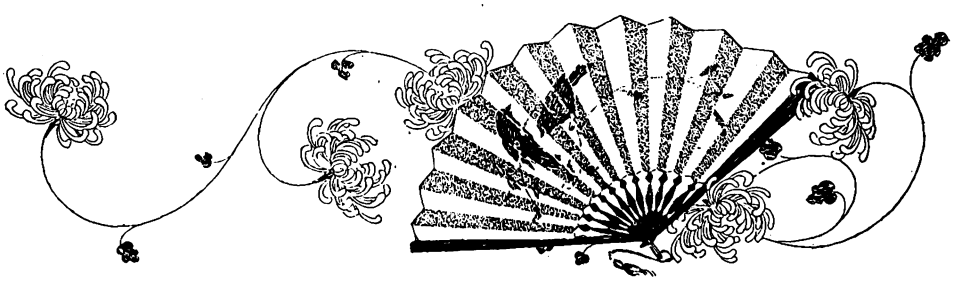
Much of the active work of the society devolves upon its four honorary secretaries, and upon its chairman Mr. F. F. Belsey, J.P. Connected with the Union are numerous publications of a religious and educational character, and this important department is under the control of Mr. Groser in his capacity of Literary Secretary.

Through his means, Sunday School teachers all over the Kingdom have been provided with much material to aid them in their work. He is the author of "The Teacher's Manual," which has run into seventeen editions; "The Young Teacher," "Illustrative Teaching," "The Art of Picturing," and many others equally valuable. For twelve years he was editor of "The Bible Class Magazine," of "The Sunday School Teacher" for four years, and of the "Excelsior" for a similar period, and as chairman of the Publications Committee he did much to enhance the value of the literary output of the Union.

He was one of the originators of the movement under which the training and examination of teachers and senior scholars were instituted, being first chairman of the committee in charge of this work, a position which he still retains.

Mr. Groser graduated Bachelor of Science at the London University when a young man, and he has always done all in his power to encourage young people to acquire scientific knowledge. His favourite subjects are Natural Science and Biblical Archæology.

THE ONLOOKER.



Digitized by Google

Conducted by
THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.

"MY FAIRY TALE."

(PRIZE COMPETITION.)

Here is a choice little collection of tales I have selected from those sent in. No one who reads them will deny that imagination still lives, in spite of the Education Board and the relentless logic-chopper of this so-called very practical age. And here (bless 'em !), are our old friends again—the bold, bad Baron, the beauteous Princess, the brave Prince, the wicked Witch—and others, with whom, perhaps, we have not had the pleasure of shaking hands this many a year. I should dearly like to make comments on each tale, but I fear, if I began, I would soon run beyond my space, so must let each story remain unedited. One writer—Kathleen Simpson—has, I fear, forgotten a sheet or two of writing, for her letter reads like the end of a story. Perhaps this is the work of some witch. But now for the specimens.

GLENORA AND THE WAND.

Many years ago there lived a fairy who had a magic wand. She was a very wicked fairy, and did all she could to make her sister, Glenora, unhappy. Soon Glenora wished to marry, and found a nice young prince for her husband, whose name was Marcassin. Now, the other wicked fairy was very jealous, and so she made a plan of revenge. She asked them to celebrate their wedding feast with her and stop there for the night. This they did. When night came she took them unthinkingly to the room where the magic wand was. In the night she came in to kill the prince, but Glenora, who had heard her come upstairs, had hidden under the bed, taking the wand with her, and placing a large doll in bed. When the fairy came in, Glenora jumped out, touching her sister with the wand changed her into a sow. The prince, hearing the sow grunt, woke up, and, taking his sword, killed it. Glenora told him he had killed their enemy, and they went to their castle, taking the wand with them, and they lived for many, many years after that, without any enemies, in Glenorio Castle.

ANNIE TAYLER.
(Age 12 years.)
3, Wellington Road, Cowley Road,
Uxbridge.

THE PRINCESS WHO SAID "DON'T CARE!"

There lived many years ago a lovely princess and she was called Spanglewings, and her name suited her so well that she was called nothing else. She had lovely golden hair that came down below her waist, and she was very beautiful. Her father was a King and had a magnificent castle ; but it was under enchantment, and the spell could only be broken by the Princess Spanglewings marrying an ugly little dwarf, with a beard that reached down to the ground. But Princess Spanglewings disliked him so much that she said she would not marry him. So she became engaged to a handsome Prince, who came from a distant country. But the wicked dwarf Deba said that if she married him he would avenge himself upon her, and she would not be happy any more. But she said she did not care if the wicked Deba did do anything. And as they were going to be married, a man stabbed the Prince, but the man was really the dwarf, who had changed himself. Princess Spanglewings was so unhappy that she went into a nunnery and was never heard of again. This is how the wicked Deba avenged himself on Princess Spanglewings.

GEORGINA MARY JOAN JACKSON.
(Age 11¾ years.)
The Green,
Kirbymoorside, Yorks.

Digitized by Google

The Fairies' Reception.

In a poor part of a city there sat a little child on the doorstep in a dirty alley. "Little Midge," as she was called, suddenly started as she heard a little voice saying, "This way, please, Miss," and she beheld a little man in funny clothes standing by her. Without thinking, she followed him, and stepped at his bidding into a dear little coach. Soon they came to a stop, and she stepped out and would have gazed in wonder, but the little man again spoke, and she followed him to a broad staircase and looking up she saw the loveliest creature imaginable and around her sat all sorts of people. There were a group of fairies, Cinderella and her Prince, Beauty and the Beast, Red Riding Hood, Jack of the Beanstalk, and all the other fairy characters that most children are acquainted with. They all went up in turn to do homage to their Queen. Then they passed down singing beautiful songs. Midge went up after Cinderella, and the Queen gave her the best smile of all. The coach then drove her back and she walked slowly to her alley. But she never will forget her visit to Fairyland.

Winnie Nerney.
(Age 15¼ Years.)
13, Westover-road,
Wandsworth Common, S.W.

The Magic Mouse.

Once upon a time, in a thick forest, lived two fairy sisters. One was very ugly and had a hump on her back and a crooked nose, the other was very beautiful. The pretty one's name was Marcella, the ugly one's Drognon. Now Marcella was as wicked as she was beautiful, and Drognon as good as she was ugly. Drognon had a pretty little pet mouse. It was a magic one, and it went about with her everywhere. Marcella had a spite against Drognon because once when they were out for a walk she protected a little child whom Marcella was trying to torment. This spite soon turned to hatred. One night after they had gone to bed, Marcella got very quietly out, went downstairs and fetched a hatchet. She was just going to chop off Drognon's head when the little mouse turned itself into a lion and ate Marcella up. Ever since the dear little mouse has been a greater favourite than ever. Drognon, soon after, met a very, very handsome prince. The sight of him made Drognon forget her ugliness and she became as he was. She married him and the wedding festivities lasted three days. Good little mouse!

Olive Cherry.
(Age 12 years.)
8, Belmont-road, Uxbridge.

The Princess Elsa.

Long, long ago, there lived a young girl who was so beautiful that every living thing that saw her loved her. She lived in a wood with an old woman who called herself her grandmother, but who was really a witch. The child Elsa had been stolen from her father's castle when she was very young, but she still remembered that she was a princess. One day when she was wandering in the forest, a knight, riding upon a white horse, stopped her and said, "Do you know anything of the beautiful Princess Elsa, who is imprisoned in this forest? I have not seen one house since I entered it." "I am the Princess Elsa, and I thank you for coming to release me; come, I will give you food." He followed her into the cottage, and ate and drank what she gave him. She then called the witch, who, when she saw the Prince, ran out of the house and disappeared. The Prince and Princess then left the cottage, which sank into the earth and was never seen again. They were married soon after, and lived happily until their life's end.

Ruby Hine.
(Age 15 years.)
Falcon Hotel,
Waltham Cross,
Herts.

The Lost Slipper.

She slid down a slippery silver leaf on to a toadstool, and jumping from it alighted on the ground. She was a little fairy, and her name was "Sharp-eyes," because she had such wonderfully sharp eyes for finding out people in trouble, or for turning over insects who lay struggling on their backs. Sharp-eyes was dressed in a little gossamer dress. Walking quickly through a wood she ran along a path till she came to a little hut. She went in and saw a little old woman, who was in great trouble, for she had lost her slipper. Sharp-eyes hesitated for a moment, then she pulled off her own shoe (which was the same as the woman's) and ran quickly out. This was a great sacrifice to her, for the slippers had been a present from her dead grandmother. But she was rewarded, for, when she reached her home, she found a parcel waiting for her. In it was a pair of slippers of pure gold with an inscription, "From a friend to a friend," but Sharp-eyes never found out who sent them to her, so I cannot tell you.

Evelyn Mary Wallen.
(Age 13 years.)
Roselea, Moreton Road,
South Croydon.

What Came of Cracking It.

In Turkey, ages ago, there lived a wicked magician called Canteon. He would carry away princesses, and the daughters of noblemen, to his castle at night while they slept, and then change them into doves or young deer, but if ever their lovers came to rescue them they were changed into venomous reptiles.

One night the King's favourite daughter, Princess Ruby, was stolen away. Two brothers, Ali and Bornuga, were determined to rescue her. Bornuga was the first to try his luck, and as he walked along he met an old woman, who gave him a walnut and a little black bread, which he threw away. When he reached the castle he was turned into a poisonous toad. Soon Ali set after Bornuga. The old woman met him and gave him the walnut and bread. He thanked her for them, and cracked the former; in it he found a cloak, which he put on. He reached the castle without mishap, ate his bread, raised the knocker, and let it fall. Instantly all the creatures were changed into their proper forms; the castle and Canteon were carried away. Ali married Princess Ruby and lived happily ever afterwards.

Digitized by Google

EDWARD P. SMITH.

(Aged 10.)

"Hetherset," Leigham Court Road,
Streatham, S.W.

Edward P. Smith's tale has been judged the best, and a handsome book has accordingly been sent him.

I fancy there is a mine of imagination in this field, which has only been sampled, as it were, by these specimens, so instead of appointing a competition on new ground, I shall give my young readers another chance of telling

"MY FAIRY TALE."

They will have the advantage of reading those given this month, so should be able to make theirs better, and some that have arrived too late will have a chance to appear. All stories (not exceeding 200 words and written on one side of the paper only) to be sent not later (better if earlier) than the 20th of this month, with name, age (under 16) and address of writer, to Rev. J. Reid Howatt, the Crescent, Camberwell Grove, Denmark Hill, London, S.E., and a beautiful book will be given for the best tale.

This speaks for itself:—

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—Thank you very much indeed for the lovely book you sent me. It is exactly the kind of book I like, and L. T. Meade is one of my favourite authors. One of my friends, seeing I was successful, has just gone in for the latest competition. Thanking you again very much,

I am, yours sincerely,

CONNIE FOOT.

14, Melody Road,
Wandsworth.

THE CRUTCH-AND-KINDNESS LEAGUE.

The pressure of life has become so great in these days that the uppermost desire of most people is—to save time. We have telephones in our houses, so that where, a few years ago, we had to waste an hour or two to get certain things done, we achieve them now in a minute. So with the shorthand amanuensis, with shopping by post, and much else; apart altogether from the great time-saving inventions of the age, everybody is using or longing for something that might help to slacken the pressure on himself.

It has been for the Crutch-and-Kindness League to claim the distinction of being amongst the first to bring time-saving methods into operation in connection with philanthropy in one of its tenderest forms—that of mitigating by post the sad lot of the thousands of poor, crippled children in London. There is many a sympathetic heart in the country that fain would do something on behalf of these lonely little sufferers, but personal visitation is out of the question, both on the ground of distance and of time. The Crutch-and-Kindness League supplies the needful link by bringing the crippled child and the sympathetic heart together through the medium of the post-office. All particulars, for instance, concerning one of these patient little suffering ones, are given to a member of the League; this member then writes a letter once a month or so to his or her little charge; if the cripple can write, and is strong enough to do so, there comes the reply—and so the interest is sustained on both sides. How intense this interest can be is evident by the fact that since I started the League five or six years ago, five thousand members have joined it from every part of the world, but there are more than a thousand poor crippled children, in London alone, for whom such friendly pens are still needed. Something of the pleasure which kindly hearts find in this, may be gathered from the following letters:—

"It is nearly eighteen months ago that I became a member of the Crutch-and-Kindness League, in connection with the Ragged School Union. I think you might like to know what pleasure I have derived from it, and what sunshine it has brought into my life, and more so because I myself suffer and so can sympathise with the poor, unfortunate little cripples. I love my little cripple (No. 1128) very much, and I am sure my love is returned. During the eighteen months I have written her regularly once a month, and sometimes more often; and sent her eight parcels. I am in very poor circumstances myself, owing to my ill-health, but I try very hard to do the little I can to make the child's life brighter and happier. Every letter I receive, both from herself and mother, is full of expressions of gratitude, which make me feel how much more 'blessed it is to give than to receive.' I do wish many more would join this League, not only to brighten the lives of others, but to make their own lives happier, as it has made mine. I have asked several to join, but they all say, 'I haven't time.' Oh, I am sure they would make time if they only knew what joy it would bring them. Will you kindly accept the postal order and stamps, which I am sorry to say is only the 'mite,' with my best wishes and prayers for the success of your good work.—Believe me, yours very sincerely, H. M. S."

Digitized by Google

Yet another: "For a very long time I have wanted to write to you, to tell you how much I enjoy writing to my little charge, F. M. S. (No. 115B), but have wanted very much at the same time to send just a little money to help you in the glorious work of the Ragged School Union. We should so much have liked to have sent more, but are unable; even this small offering has taken us some little time to save up. Will you please accept the 3s. 6d., with our best wishes for your success. It is almost eighteen months ago that I joined the Crutch-and-Kindness League, and since then I have not missed writing regularly to my little charge once a month. I am quite sure that I enjoy writing to her just as much as she likes to receive my letters. I always enclose a stamped addressed envelope, and so hear regularly from her, and they are such very nice letters! It really does me good to read them, and each time makes me feel how glad I am I heard of this League and joined it. I have sent her five very nice parcels. I make it a rule to send three a year—Easter, her birthday (August 11th), and at Christmas. Of course, I often send an extra one. Before very long I have made up my mind to ask you the name, address, etc., of another poor little girl (rather worse than my present one is in health) to write monthly to as well, for I do think it is so nice to be able to do so much good in such a simple way.—D.F.S."

Such kindly work as this, it will be seen, can be done by invalids, folk living in lonely parts, very busy people, and by children—schooling all in the grace of sympathy.

All particulars concerning the League may be had for a stamp from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary, Ragged School Union, 32, John-street, Theobald's-road, London, W.C.

NEW MEMBERS FOR THE MONTH.

Miss Nora Fell, Natal; Miss C. A. Garrett, Cape Colony; Mr. P. R Evans, South Australia; Miss Helen Brooker, South Australia; Miss Annie Rash, Suffolk; Miss Shaw, Brixton; Misses Matthew, Reigate; Miss Lily Durrant, Luton; Miss Laura Crocker, Devon; Miss Macfarland, Streatham; Miss Hilda Batson per Miss Weaver, Bath; Miss Kathleen Miles per Miss Freeman, Ealing; Miss Nancy W. Wood and friend, Paris; Miss Cork, Wood Green; Miss Bessie Cross, Montgomeryshire; Miss R. Gittins, Brixton-hill; Miss Stirling, Highbury; Miss Edith G. Jecks, Bristol; Miss Jessie Palmer, Devon; Master Bernard and George Gregg, Manchester; Miss Scriven, Oswestry; Miss Madeline Glazier, Wimbledon Park; Mrs. Park, Croydon; Mrs. A. A. Kent, Croydon; Miss A. Park, Croydon; Mr. H. B. John and Misses John, Haverfordwest; Miss Blundell, Andover; Miss Elspeth Macpherson, Miss Mildred Barton, (per Mrs. Wright), Westgate-on-Sea; Miss E. Lumgair, Melrose; Miss Helen Wallace, Canonbury; Miss Couch, Launceston; Miss Shergold, Sunday School Class, Chesterfield; Miss Natalie Champion, Natal.

Digitized by Google

FRIENDLESS AND FALLEN.

London Female Preventive & Reformatory Institution.

Office: 200, EUSTON ROAD, N.W.

ENTIRELY SUPPORTED BY VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS.

TRAINING HOME, FOUR RESCUE HOMES, AND AN OPEN-ALL-NIGHT REFUGE FOR 180 INMATES.

Many Thousands of Young Women and Girls who were once

FRIENDLESS! HOMELESS! OUTCAST!

Have been permanently benefited by these Homes.

Upwards of 5,000 Meals are provided every Week. The Training imparted is both Christian and Industrial.

. . CONTRIBUTIONS ARE EARNESTLY NEEDED. . .

Bankers: Lloyd's Bank, Limited, 16, St. James's Street, S.W.

WILLIAM J. TAYLOR, Sec., 200, EUSTON ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

Royal Hospital for Incurables,

PUTNEY HEATH.

Patron:

HIS MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII.

President:

The Most Honorable the Marquess of Northampton.

Treasurer:

Herbert John Allcroft, Esq., F.R.G.S.

This Institution maintains 220 Inmates and 663 Pensioners for Life at a cost of £32,000 yearly, of which only £3,500 are guaranteed. Funds are urgently required to meet present liabilities, and New Subscriptions and Donations will be thankfully received.

W. DAVID NEWTON, Secretary.

Office: 106, Queen Victoria-street, E.C.

The Children's Home - and Orphanage,

Chief Office—

BONNER ROAD, LONDON, N.E.

Branches—LONDON, LANCASHIRE, BIRMINGHAM, CANADA, etc.

Principal—Rev. Arthur E. GREGORY, D.D.

Vice-Principal—Rev. R. Bevan SHEPHERD, M.A.

*

1,200 children in residence.

5,000 rescued.

£60 PER DAY NEEDED FOR SUPPORT OF THE HOME.

Many are crippled, epileptic, infirm.

No Election by Subscribers.

NEED not CREED is considered in receiving cases.

*

Contributions should be sent to Rev. Arthur E. Gregory, The Children's Home, Bonner Rd., N.E.

Cheques crossed London, City and Midland.

"The world has seen nothing like it since St. Francis preached his crusade of self-renunciation many hundred years ago."—Windsor Magazine.

The Social Work of the Salvation Army

is in Urgent need of Financial Assistance.

By means of Shelters, Lodgings-Homes, Food Depots, Workshops, Rescue Homes, Children's Homes, Slum Stations, Inebriates' Homes, Farm Colonies, Ex-Criminals' Homes, etc., etc., many hundreds of thousands of the Outcast and Poorest are helped to help themselves annually.

"I Heartily wish success to the Social Work of the Salvation Army."
—The Right Hon. Jesse Collings, M.P., Home Office.

The work is highly commended by persons of all grades of society. See pamphlet giving their opinions, annual reports, etc., sent gratis on application to Mrs. BOOTH, 101, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., to whom Cheques should be addressed. Clothing much needed. The Homes can be inspected at any time.

"I can distinctly declare the work is a blessed one. I wish it from my heart God's blessing."—The Very Rev. The Dean of Canterbury.

Digitized by Google

Needham's Paste

METAL POLISHING

FREE FROM GREASE ACID AND GRIT.

Over 75 years reputation as the best and most economical preparation for producing a perfect polish on Brass, Copper, Tin, Britannia-Metal, &c.&c.

Sole Manufacturers: JOSEPH PICKERING & SONS, SHEFFIELD.

SCRIVEN

METROPOLITAN CREAM

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS FOR BOOTS AND SHOES

W. CLARK, 528, Oxford St., London, W.
(Near the Marble Arch.)

Over 70 years' Established Reputation.

NEAVE'S FOOD

"Highly Nutritious." Lancet.

FOR INFANTS & INVALIDS.

Used in the Russian Imperial Nursery.

Gold Medal awarded, Woman's Exhibition, 1900.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS, AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

BENGER'S FOOD FOR INFANTS,

INVALIDS and the AGED.

DELICIOUS, NUTRITIVE, AND DIGESTIBLE.

GOLD MEDAL,

Health Exhibition, London.

Benger's Food is not only highly nutritious, but is most easily digested, and is so delicious that it is enjoyed by the youngest Infant or the most delicate Invalid.

Benger's Food is sold in TINS by Chemists, &c., everywhere.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. Thompson & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

FOR HOME AND SUNDAY READING.

VOL. 6. JANUARY, 1902. No. 4.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS.

The Young King of Spain.

Dickens's London.

John Clifford, D.D.:
A Sketch and Interview.

On Doing a Good Day's Work.
By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

Royalty Working for the Poor.

Numerous Stories
By the Best Writers,
AND OTHER INTERESTING ARTICLES.

Beautifully Illustrated,

PRICE SIXPENCE.

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.
"The Standard of Highest Purity."
—The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

INVALUABLE FOR NURSING MOTHERS.

A Delicious and Wholesome Tonic—Refreshing, Invigorating, and Sustaining.

EASILY DIGESTED BY THE MOST DELICATE.

Brewed by Messrs. BEAMISH & CRAWFORD, Ltd., Cork, from the Finest Malt and Hops, and Guaranteed by them to be ABSOLUTELY PURE.

An EMINENT DOCTOR says:—

"I can strongly recommend BEAMISH'S STOUT. I have prescribed it for many of my patients with excellent results."

LABORATORY, 24, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.
March 4th, 1901.

A careful analysis has been made of this sample of Beamish's Stout, as a result of which I am able to state that it is an excellent one. It is good in flavour, high in extractive matters, rich in albuminoids, yet contains only a very moderate amount of alcohol, and is very low in acidity. Although I understand the sample which I have received has been in bottle for two years, no active fermentation is taking place.

LAWRENCE BRIANT, F.C.S., F.R.M.S.

Agents Wanted Everywhere.

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

This is the only Stout which will not introduce into the system unfermented yeast cells, and consequently it can be taken by the most delicate without fear of indigestion.

Delivered carriage free to any address in the United Kingdom in Cases containing 3 dozen reputed pints, Price 18/- per case.

Wholesale Agents to whom all communications should be addressed—

GENDALL & CO., 34, Norfolk St., Strand, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

ADVERTISEMENTS for the February No. must be sent not later than Jan. 4th to H. DAWSON & Co., 34, Norfolk Street, STRAND, W.C.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

AMERICA'S PERFECTION in Ladies Boots and Shoes is named

SOROSIS

TRADE MARK REGISTERED

In every size that can be desired, and every style that fashion requires or experience can devise.

ONLY AND ALWAYS AT ONE PRICE. 15/-

Mothers already wearing "SOROSIS" and know of their comfort and durability will be glad to learn that our assortment of Boots and Shoes for children's wear are just as complete in styles and widths as our Ladies' Stock. They are built on Hygienic principles for preserving the natural shape of the foot.

Children's Boots, In sizes from 8 to 10½. 10/6

Misses Boots and Shoes, In sizes 11 to 2. 12/6

SOROSIS SHOE Co., Regent House, Regent St., LONDON, W.

(Few doors below Oxford Circus.)

Please send for Art Catalogue, Vol. I., post free on application.

HALL'S WINE

THE MARVELLOUS RESTORATIVE.

AFTER TYPHOID, INFLUENZA, SCARLET FEVER,

or any illness, when your patient is exhausted and wasted, a few glasses of HALL'S WINE will be sufficient to effect that change which will bring back health and strength.

ONE TRIAL IS ALL WE ASK. YOU WILL BE WELL SATISFIED WITH THE RESULT.

IT CURES Neuralgia, Nervous Debility, Sleeplessness, Anæmia and Physical Breakdown.

A Member of the Royal College of Physicians writes:—"Gentlemen,—I feel it my duty to let you know how satisfactory Hall's Wine has proved in the many cases in which I have used it. I have prescribed it in Influenza, Phthisis, Neurasthenia, etc., and always with benefit.

Sold by most Licensed Grocers, Chemists, and Wine Merchants. 3s. and 1s. 9d. per bottle.

Name and address of nearest Agent sent by return of post. STEPHEN SMITH & Co., Ltd., Bow, London, E.

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

RETURNS.

Returns are what we are looking and working for—the man in business, the man on the farm, in the mill, office, or mine—and so we invest our labour or our money according to the sense or wisdom which is given to us and await the returns. One man speculates, another follows a hobby, another digs and labours without intelligence, another follows in the steps of his grandfather, many sow poor seed on ill-prepared soil, and the few only reap an abundant harvest. One man tries dairying with poor cows given poor care and gets poor returns; another can't or won't see that forty acres and not two hundred is the size of the farm he should work, and his returns are a poor living after the rent, hired help, and bills are paid; another treats his boys as though he had bought them at so much per head for the work he could get out of them, and his returns are the privilege of ending his days unloved and uncared for; another, loved by his family and respected by all who know him, lives not wholly for himself, and his returns, perhaps not to be measured by money, are a perpetual and splendid income for him so long as he lives. The sort of returns you may look for depends wholly upon the nature of the investment.

It is a great satisfaction at the close of life to be able to look back on the years that are past and to feel that you have lived not for yourself alone but that you have been useful to others. You may be assured, also, that the same feeling is a source of comfort and happiness at any period of life. Nothing in this world is so good as usefulness. It binds your fellow-creatures to you and you to them; it tends to the improvement of your own character; and it gives you a real importance in society, much beyond what any artificial station can bestow.

SOFT SILK DRESS.

The evening dress sketched in this column is made of soft silk in blush pink. Bands of biscuit-coloured lace trim the skirt, and from under the lowest band falls a deep, full flounce of similar lace. The cutaway coat is also made of lace, and has a berthe and sleeves to match. The latter can be worn with or without the pink silk muslin undersleeves with their wristbands of lace. Drooping folds of pink silk muslin fill the interval between the fronts of the lace coat and end under a pointed black velvet belt. A cluster of roses is tied on with black velvet ribbon.

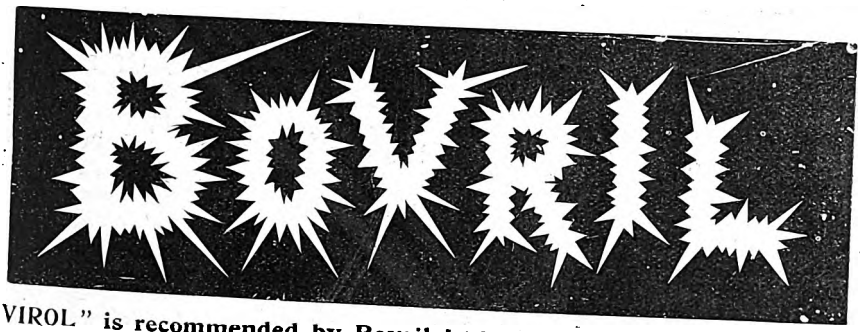
Digitized by Google

Remember the Prince of Wales's Hospital Fund, Bank of England, E.C.

There are more strength-giving, disease-resisting, system-nourishing properties in Bovril than in any other preparation purporting to be something similar.



"VIROL" is recommended by Bovril Ltd. as a fat food for the young.

Broome's Music.

1025 Cock-a-Doodle, Schottische. C. Denton.
1028 Won't yer let me kiss yer? (Coon Song.) W. H. Bennett.
1036 Return of the Troops. A. Chambers.
1037 Sleep Baby Sleep. A. Berridge.
1038-9-0 Lotus Land, Waltz. Post Free, 7d.
1041 Ivy Leaves, Intermezzo. Fabian Scott.
1042 Festive Season, Lancers. Leslie Lyle.
1043 Moonlight Dreams, Chanson Sans Parole. F. Scott.
1044 La Belle Otero, Spanish Waltz. F. Scott.
1045 Within the Minster, March. Leslie Lyle.
1046 Queen Mab. No. 1. Fabian Scott.
1047 Courante, pf. Fabian Scott.
1048 Ophir Waltz. Fabian Scott.
1049 City Glorious. (Sacred Song.) Noel Thayne.
1050 Festival Barn Dance. A. Macey.
1051 His Majesty, Court Dance. A. Macey.
1052 Le Carnival Waltz. A. Chambers.
1059 Danse des Sirenes. A. Chambers.
1072 Ratapian Morceau Characteristique. A. Chambers.

2D. EACH.

By Post 3d., or Thirteen Copies sent flat, per Parcel Post, 2/6.

1073 Ping Pong Polka. A. Chambers.
1074 Plantation Dance. "
1075 Zerita Mazurka "
1076 Orange Blossom Schottische. A. Chambers.
1077 Allemande No. 3 Series "Queen Mab." A. Chambers.
1078 Heroes All. F. Williams.
1079 Ida Waltz. E. Read.
1080 Thelma. E. Earle.
1081 A Night in Fairyland. L. Gautier.
1082 Gavotte. No. 4. Queen Mab. F. Scott.
1083 Chromatic Barn Dance. C. Denton.
1084-5-6 Our Colonies, Descriptive Fantasia. Post Free, 7d.
1087 Sarabande. No. 5. Queen Mab. Fabian Scott.
1088 The Rose. Elf Waltz. Ezra Read.
1089 Invaders. March. Alan Macey.
1090 A Woodland Song. (Pianoforte Solo.) Noel Thayne.
1091 Cavalier's Song. E. Duncan.
1092 Doll's Serenade. Edward Earle.
1093-4-5 "Ever to Thee, Love." (Song.) Clifton Bingham.

Buy of your Local Agent or W. H. BROOME, 15, HOLBORN, LONDON, E.C.

Every meal is made more attractive by a tasty-looking and appetising Hovis Loaf. Its exceedingly nice flavour tempts one when tired, or when the appetite is poor, and its great nutritive properties ensure nourishment for the body in the most easy form for complete digestion.

Most Family Bakers make and deliver it daily. If not known, Agents' Addresses will be sent on application, HOVIS, LTD., Macclesfield.

Digitized by Google

A BRAVE WOMAN.

With the examples of war heroines so constantly before us, it may not be amiss to recall the story of Jennie Wade at the battle of Gettysburg, to whom there has recently been erected a monument in the cemetery at that place. The home of Miss Wade was a little farmhouse on the battlefield, and while the conflict raged around she had remained bravely at her accustomed round of household duties, adding thereto, as occasion offered, the care of the sick and wounded. It was while engaged at home in domestic duty that she fell a victim to a stray bullet of a Confederate sharpshooter. The ball passed through two doors and pierced her breast, killing her instantly. The dead girl was laid away in a rudely constructed coffin intended for a Confederate colonel, but which had fallen into the hands of the Union soldiers. Miss Wade had a lover in the Union ranks, Corporal Skelly, who was killed at Winchester (Va.) a few days before her own death, and the news had not reached her. They were to have been married when the war was over.

PRINCESS CLEMENTINE OF BELGIUM.

Princess Clementine, like her august mother, the Queen of the Belgians, is a keen lover of horses. Indeed, we might say more, for it is a well-known fact that she perfectly adores the animals in her possession—an affection that the beautiful creatures return in their own particular way. Coo and Spa are the two favourite horses of this popular princess. It is interesting to recall the fact that the pair originated from the Prince of Wales's stud, and were presented to his daughter by the King of the Belgians. They are nine years old. Princess Clementine is loved and admired by the whole of the Belgian people. She has passed the greater part of her life at the Palace of Laeken, where her principal recreation is driving, and is frequently to be seen in the Bois de la Cambre at Tervueren, and in the Forest of Soignies. The Princess evinces great interest in military matters, and never misses an opportunity of witnessing the manœuvres in the environs of Laeken.

One has always enough strength to bear the misfortunes of one's friends.

Buyers and Sellers.

Our business is to introduce buyers to sellers.

We have been engaged in doing this successfully for many years. Our friends admit that the results of our efforts on their behalf have been a large accession of buyers for their goods. They say, in short, that they are better off to-day than they were when first they made our acquaintance.

We should like you to be in their position. If you have an article of merit that people want, we should be glad to discuss with you our system of creating a demand for it by means of advertising, &c. It saves our clients' time, worry, and money.

The advertiser has a greater opportunity of selling his goods than a non-advertiser.

H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Damp and Fog . .

quickly mar the appearance of Furniture and Metal Work, unless they are constantly cleaned with Polishes which are not affected by climatic changes. Everyone who has tried the knows that they alone fulfil these conditions, and those who have not yet tried them should do so to-day. Polishes which command the largest sale in the World must possess merit.

"GLOBE" POLISHES

THESE POLISHES ARE OBTAINABLE AT ALL GROCERS, STORES, &c.

If any difficulty in obtaining them, write to us and we will see you are supplied.

RAIMES & CO., LTD.,
STOCKTON-ON-TEES, and BOW, LONDON, E.

Digitized by Google

READ OUR STARTLING OFFER!

A Complete Outfit of Genuine Sheffield Cutlery.

41 PIECES FOR 27/6

INCLUDING A HANDSOME SET OF CARVERS AND STEEL.

WELL WORTH DOUBLE.

SEND ONLY 5/-

CUTLERY

7 DAYS' FREE TRIAL.

Nothing can be fairer than this offer. We will send you one of our Famous Sheffield Parcels on receipt of 5/-, and your promise to complete purchase in three monthly payments of 5/- each and one of 7/6. Cash with order 26/- Money returned at once if parcel does not give entire satisfaction.

CONTENTS OF OUR SHEFFIELD PARCEL:

1 Real Stag-Handled Carving Knife.
1 ,, ,, ,, ,, Fork.
1 ,, ,, ,, Steel.
Note—The Carvers and Steel alone worth 15/-
6 Best White Handled Table Knives.
6 ,, ,, ,, Dessert ,,
6 Pure Nickel Silver Table Forks.
6 ,, ,, ,, Dessert ,,
6 ,, ,, ,, Tea Spoons.
2 ,, ,, ,, Table ,,

The blades are Genuine Sheffield Steel, and of fine temper and finish. The Handles are specially selected and fitted. The Spoons and Forks are of Pure Nickel Silver, highest quality (and not brass or white metal), and warranted to wear as white as Sterling Silver throughout.

BE SURE TO READ THIS.

We are daily receiving hundreds of unsolicited testimonials from all parts of the United Kingdom, and we are proud to be in a position to say that we have not had to return a single customer's money through our parcels not giving satisfaction. This fact alone proves the value of our Parcels.

All classes of Cutlery on the Easy Payment System. Write for Catalogues and Book of Unsolicited Testimonials.

BUY DIRECT FROM WAREHOUSE AND SAVE MIDDLE PROFITS.

BURNAND BOOTH & CO. Ltd.,

Westminster Works, SHEFFIELD.

Digitized by Google

Best Articles. Best Stories. Best Pictures.

That is what . . .
EVERYONE IS SAYING OF

Volume V. OF THE Temple Magazine

NOW READY.
(HANDSOMELY BOUND IN RED AND GREEN CLOTH.)

TWELVE MONTHS' READING for 7s. 6d.

The most interesting and varied Magazine published.

Over Eleven Hundred Pages and not a dull one.

The Volume Contains—

TWO SPLENDID SERIAL STORIES

By DORA LANGLOIS and Mrs. BAGOT HARTE.

Scores of Short Stories and Special Articles.

Illustrated by some 700 Beautiful Pictures.

OUR CONTRIBUTORS INCLUDE Dr. Joseph Parker, Ian Maclaren, Rev. Silas K. Hocking, George Manville Fenn, Joseph Hatton, Adeline Sergeant, Mary E. Wilkins, Clive Holland, J. A. Hammerton, Leonard Graham, Lady Violet Greville, late Rev. H. R. Haweis, Lady Henry Somerset, Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, Rev. E. J. Hardy, Thekla Bowser, Rev. Joseph Hocking, Mrs. Hirst Alexander, Mary Angela Dickens, Hugh W. Strong, and many other well-known writers.

Of all booksellers or the Publishers, Messrs. HORACE MARSHALL & SONS, Temple House, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

Price 7/6. ✻ Price 7/6.

Digitized by Google

EVENING CLOAK.

Evening cloaks are various enough in kind and in character. Some are so short as to barely pass the waist, a sort that is very unsuitable for winter wear. Others are long enough to trail several inches on the ground at the sides and back. The materials are of as "infinite variety" as Cleopatra herself. The favourite for those who can command every luxury is fur. The sable coat is long and full, with rather wide sleeves. The ermine coat flows out as amply as a tea-gown, and is as costly as it is easily soiled. Then come the chiffon coats, all frills and tucks, with a warm lining of quilted satin or brocade. Black satin follows on, also warmly quilted underneath, and usually richly finished with lace about the neck and shoulders. Fancy materials, usually broché or stamped or crushed velvet, come before the cloth coats, like that represented above. It is made of pink cloth and trimmed with écru lace and black velvet. The lace yoke and collar are bordered with frills of the pink cloth, and the sleeves, long and loose, are finished with frills and lace. Cashmere and kindred textures are also used for making these long cloaks, some of which are lined with brightly-tinted foulé or veiling, others with silk or woollen broché. Many are furnished with fur collars, and a few are lined throughout with fur. An ideal coat is black silk of the grosgrain type, lined with dark mink, and with a collar to match; but this is very costly, and besides, the dark fur is almost always worn outside this winter.

LONG WALKING COAT.

The long walking coat is once more most generally worn. The material may be almost what we will, so long as it is not too heavy. The great point in these cloaks or coats seems to me that they should be as loose as possible. For this effect we must go to a really first-class tailor, as it is far more difficult to make a good appearance with a loose garment than with a tight-fitting one. However, these loose coats are so charming that doubtless most of us will afford ourselves a garment of the kind during the dull and dark months ahead. Greys, fawns, dark greens, and biscuit tints are the most fashionable colourings, while some folks allow themselves the extravagance of a really handsome lining; and for driving, travelling, and motoring this lining is dainty and successful, but for walking in muddy weather I should strongly advise a plain silk or Italian cloth being employed. With a cloak of the kind a small hat or toque must be worn. Large picture hats with such severe outlines are very much out of place. Instead, a fairly full toque of folded velvet, chiffon, or silk will look charming; and if further decoration is needed a bow and ends of tulle or net can be added, and tied under the left ear.

HAIR-DRESSING AND THE CORONATION.

Coronation matters begin to bulk more and more largely as time goes by. One of the quaintest outcomes of the absorbing interest which the subject possesses is the doll exhibition at Norfolk House to exemplify the exact dress which each section of the nobility who are called upon to attend the ceremony in the Abbey will have to wear. The dressmakers are in despair over the unbecomingness of the peeresses' costumes, with the crimson velvet over-dress opening its scalloped edges over a wide expanse of white satin petticoat. The greatest heart burnings, however, are those of the hair-dressers. What coiffure can they design which will admit of a heavy coronet of silver gilt and velvet being put on and off the head with facility and becomingness?

So give to-day that thou shalt be able to give to-morrow.

Digitized by Google

FED ON "FRAME-FOOD" FROM THREE MONTHS.

"FRAME-FOOD"

is especially suitable for INFANTS, however young, who are

DEPRIVED OF MOTHERS' MILK,

and for Invalids, as it is the MOST EASILY DIGESTED as well as the MOST NOURISHING FOOD on the Market.

Sold in 16-oz. Tins, 1s.

FREE TEST. ¼-lb. Sample Tin of "FRAME-FOOD," or 5-oz. Sample Jar "FRAME-FOOD JELLY," sent free on receipt of 3d. to pay postage; both samples sent for 4d. postage.

Please mention "Temple Magazine."

FRAME-FOOD CO. LTD., Battersea, London, S.W.

Have you tried Osman Turkish Towels?

HIGHEST AWARD: "Grand Prix," Paris Exhibition, 1900, Two other Medals, and 15 Awards.

HIGHEST QUALITY!
PRICE MODERATE!!
WEAR GUARANTEED!!!

The "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWELS are made in small sizes for Face Towels and in larger sizes for the Bath-room, with knotted fringe or hem-stitched ends. Once you have used "OSMAN" Towels you will buy no others. The wear is guaranteed by the manufacturers.

BARLOW AND JONES, LIMITED,
MANCHESTER.

SOLD BY ALL THE PRINCIPAL DRAPERS AND HOUSE FURNISHERS THROUGHOUT THE EMPIRE.

VERY NICE.

COOK'S "RIVIERA" (REGD.) SOAP

For Delicate Skins.

EDWARD COOK & CO., LTD., The Soap Specialists, LONDON.

METROPOLITAN CREAM

FOR BOOTS AND SHOES

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS

W. CLARK, 528, Oxford St., London, W.
(Near the Marble Arch.)

Digitized by Google

A SMART BODICE.

The model illustrated shows an over-bodice, or boléro bodice with sleeves, of very thin black-faced cloth, handsomely adorned with coarse string-coloured lace, set round the shoulders and down the fronts and round the vandyked edges. The sleeves are made en suite, and finished with a string-coloured guipure cuff arranged to fall over the hand. Many are the varieties which we see in the loose silk shirts for house wear. Some of these are finished with the most exquisite but barbaric-like embroidery, coloured sequins and jewels of all kinds being worked into the yokepiece and wristlets. The only part, indeed, which is allowed no trimming is the upper part of the sleeve, it being formed simply of the crêpe, or silk, or voile, or whatever it is that is employed. The high collar, too, is gradually disappearing. Those who usually wear their collar very high add a wisp of lace, or tulle, or a lace scarf crossed at the back and knotted loosely in the front or at one side. Others prefer quite a low collar—no band whatever, but merely an edge of lace against the skin and a string of pearls or a tiny gold chain worn above.

A poor Indian was asked one time what his conscience was. Putting his hand over his heart, he said: "It is a little three-cornered thing in here. When I do wrong it turns around and hurts very much. If I keep on doing wrong, it will turn until it wears the edges all off, and then it will not hurt any more."

FUR JACKET.

Ermine and chinchilla are the leading furs of the season. Broadtail in both black and white is much seen, but this is generally recognised as being too costly for everyday wear. Instead, the handsome Persian paw and caracul skins are being pressed into the service, and thus, saving upon the large surface of cape or jacket, we can, many of us, afford to present ourselves with a set of ermine or chinchilla of sufficient size to form revers and collar. The question of whether the collar shall be of the stand-up order or of the more elegant-looking lay-down shape must be one which each individual must decide for herself. There are some women who will look elegant and charming if their coat is supplied with a broad cape-like collar reaching as far as or even beyond the shoulders, and allowing their neck and throat free play, but would look short and stumpy if the same coat were provided with a high and stiff stand-up collar. Doubtless, however, the tall and elegant woman would prefer to provide herself with a collar of the last-named shape. Luckily, this season, both shapes will be equally fashionable, so we may please ourselves, and be certain of looking well all the time. Folks who own a very long neck, and who yet prefer a collar of the turn-down variety, should add to their toilet a big rosette or bow of white tulle, tied either at the centre of the front, at the back, or under the left ear. Either will soften the long and rather bare effect, while the tulle is so becoming that no one need hestiate to adopt the fashion. Very short coats and very long coats are equally fashionable, while the three-quarter tight-fitting coat is certainly catching on.

TOLERANCE.

Tolerance has to tolerate the *un*essential, and to see well what that is. Tolerance has to be noble measured, just in its very wrath, when it can tolerate no longer. But, on the whole, we are not here to tolerate! We are here to resist, to control and vanquish withal. We do not tolerate falsehoods, thieveries, iniquities, when they fasten on us; we say to them: Thou art false, thou art not tolerable! We are here to extinguish falsehoods, and put an end to them.—THOMAS CARLYLE.

Don't allow people to tell you evil or unpleasant stories. When you accept the keeping of a dangerous secret you become responsible for some of its consequences, though others are also entrusted with it.

Digitized by Google

GREGORIAN
Church & Chapel Organs

The method of tone production is radically different from all others.

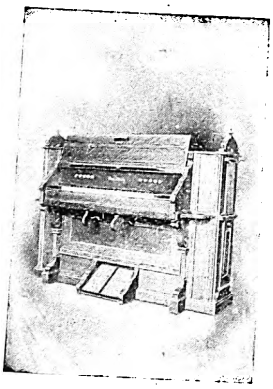
Its Distinctive Features are :

Tonal superiority.

Compactness of form in proportion to capacity,

Variety of registration, and

Price.



Style 35.

A SPECIAL WORD to the Church having Cathedral Organ desires with limited funds.

THE GREGORIAN system of organ-building enables us to build in compact form and at small cost organs which are veritable reproductions of the cathedral organ. Write us for catalogue and information as to where our instruments may be seen in your vicinity. Even should the outlook for an organ-fund not be encouraging, if you need a new organ, write us.

The Orchestrelle Co., 225 Regent St., London, W.

Sent for Catalogue A2.

By Royal Appointment.

THOMAS TURNER & CO. MAKE THEIR OWN STEEL.

Hand Forged. Extra Hollow Ground. Carefully Set. Guaranteed Perfect. See "Encore" on Shank.

IVORY ... 6s. 6d. | BLACK ... 4. 6d.

Send for Free List of Cases. From all Dealers, or write direct to Makers, T. TURNER & CO., Suffolk Works, Sheffield, who will supply through nearest Agent. Ask for "Encore" Pocket and Table Cutlery.

TO ASTHMA SUFFERERS

INSTANT RELIEF is gained in all cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, CROUP, and WHOOPING COUGH by the use of

POTTER'S DATURA ASTHMA CURE

Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists, in Tins at 1s. each Free Sample sent on receipt of Post Card to POTTER AND CLARKE, Artillery Lane, London, E.

TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

Messrs. H. DAWSON & Co.,

34, NORFOLK ST., STRAND. LONDON, W.C.

FASCINATING FLOWERS!

To make A PERFECT PICTURE IN YOUR GARDEN, to last for years.

Now is Time to Plant

Kelway's Lovely New Paeonies

The Fashionable Flower; in an almost endless variety of lovely tints, and, in many cases, with the fragrance of the Tea Rose; Kelway & Son's celebrated improved kinds certificated by the Royal Horticultural Society. Strong country grown plants for flowering next and many succeeding seasons in the hardy perennial border or bed, or in shrubberies, drives, grass, park or woodland. The cut flowers are gloriously decorative.

Collection C ... 30/- per dozen. Collection D (extra fine kinds) ... 42/- per dozen.

Carriage paid for cheque with order to those mentioning "Temple Magazine."

137 Gold and Silver Medals.—London, Paris, Chicago, &c.

KELWAY & SON, ..THE.. ROYAL HORTICULTURISTS, LANGPORT, SOMERSET.

Digitized by Google

LADY ABERDEEN AS DOG-LOVER.

Lady Aberdeen is, perhaps, the most many-sided Englishwoman living. Besides being an active religious worker, she is interested in politics, in society, and in animals and lately she has been a successful exhibitor at several of the leading dog shows, notably those organised by the "L.K.A." Lady Aberdeen, as is natural in the mistress of Haddo House, is particularly devoted to the true-hearted Scotch terriers of every breed, and her affection for these shaggy pets is shared by her young daughter, Lady Marjorie Gordon, who bids fair to become in time as many-sided as is her popular mother. Even as a child Lady Marjorie edited a little magazine, the now defunct Wee Willie Winkie, which had a quite imposing list of contributors, ranging from Mr. Arthur Balfour to Mr. Rudyard Kipling! She now helps her mother to do the honours of their beautiful Scottish home to friends of every rank.

A writer tells an amusing anecdote of a clergyman who, when in Scotland, once visited a Free Church elder. The minister met with a very cold reception. At length he drew his snuffbox from his pocket, and invited the elder to make a trial of its contents. "Ah, ye take snuff, do ye?" said the elder, yielding to a smile. "Weel, it's the first sign of grace I've seen about ye." "Sign of grace! Why how do you make out that snuff-taking is a sign of grace?" "Nothing easier," said the elder, with a knowing twinkle in his eye. "Don't you remember that in the ancient Temple all the snuffers were of pure gold? That denotes the best of all qualities."

"The younger members of a congregation sometimes ask shrewd questions," says a parson. "I once told a very young class that there were as many commandments as there were fingers and thumbs on the two hands. Once of my listeners introduced a small friend to me a day or so after, with the question: 'Please, sir, here's Jim. He's only got three fingers on his left hand, on account of an accident, an' me an' him's been talkin' it over ever since last Sunday which of them commandments wouldn't belong to him.'"

Self-respect is a clean and gracious well-fitting garment wherein we can move at ease among our fellows, passing quietly beyond the tawdry little platform where Self-esteem is forever making its bow and acting its lines to an indifferent and inattentive audience.

CLOTH GOWN.

Brown is getting more and more in favour for outdoor gowns and costumes. In cloth, serge, Irish frieze, and fancy materials, with a little silk woven in, it is gaining fast in the general taste. The illustration shows a visiting or reception dress made of beaver-brown cloth strapped with silk of the same shade, outlined with gold braid. The large guipure collar is of new shape, and is laid on over black silk edged with the gold braid.

The boléro, sleeves, and three flounces are all trimmed to match each other with stitchings and strappings. The inner vest and under-sleeves are in green velvet, with cuffs and outer vest of pale putty-coloured cloth embroidered in pale colours. The swathed collar and tie are lace, and the belt is green velvet.

If one is to be large minded one must think large thoughts, and the greatest ideas that can enter the mind are the religious ideas. He who calmly, studiously ponders the person and work of Christ, or any of the problems of life and destiny and eternity and God, in that exercise gains spiritual grasp and expansion of spiritual capacity and clearness of spiritual sight.

Digitized by Google

27
YEARS' SUCCESS.
THE UNIVERSAL REMEDY FOR Coughs, Colds,
Asthma, Bronchitis,
Influenza, Whooping-Cough, Hoarseness, &c.

Owbridge's Lung Tonic

IMPORTANT NOTICE:
SUBSTITUTION. — There are so many imitations of this successful, and therefore popular, remedy that it is of the utmost importance you should use the word "OWBRIDGE" when buying Lung Tonic, and TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

Sold everywhere in bottles at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s 6d., & 11s.

COPYRIGHT.

NOW READY, OF ALL BOOKSELLERS AND NEWSAGENTS.

Myra's Journal

The Leader of Fashion.

JANUARY.

PRICE THREEPENCE. 48 PAGES PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

Winter Toilets.

CUT-OUT PATTERN OF HANDSOME RUSSIAN COAT.

BEAUTIFUL COLOURED FASHION PLATE.

Dress for all Ages of Womankind, over 100 illustrations all fully described.

Children's Costumes, Pinafores, Tunics, &c.

PALMISTRY. FREE BARGAINS.

Shirts, Blouses, Tailor Gowns, Capes, Coats, and Skirts. News from all the Fashion Centres. Lessons in Dressmaking and Millinery.

WINNERS OF THE CHRISTMAS PRIZES.

THE CHEAPEST AND BEST FASHION JOURNAL.

Price Threepence, Postage 2d. extra.

BEETON & Co., LTD., 10 & 11, Fetter Lane. London.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

A STUMBLE BY THE WAY. By L. T. MEADE.

THE GRAND BABYLON HOTEL. By ARNOLD BENNETT.

JUDAH PYECROFT, PURITAN. By HARRY LINDSAY.

DUMB. By the HON. MRS. WALTER R. D. FORBES, Author of "A Gentleman."

DESPAIR'S LAST JOURNEY. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "Joseph's Coat."

THE TRIUMPH OF HILARY BLACHLAND. By BERTRAM MITFORD, Author of "The Gunrunner," &c.

THE PURPLE CLOUD. By M. P. SHIEL, Author of "The Yellow Danger," &c.

THE LOVER'S PROGRESS. Told by HIMSELF, and Dedicated "to all who Love."

THE LADY OF LYNN. By Sir WALTER BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl," &c. With 12 Illustrations by G. DEMAIN-HAMMOND.

A SOWER OF WHEAT. By HAROLD BINDLOSS, Author of "Ainslie's Ju-ju."

THE CANKERWORM: Being Episodes of a Woman's Life. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN, Author of "Double Cunning," &c.

A FIGHT TO A FINISH. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "Joan, the Curate," &c.

THE HOUSE ON THE SCAR: a Tale of South Devon. By BERTHA THOMAS. Author of "In a Cathedral City," &c. SECOND EDITION.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS—Continued.

THE WEALTH OF MALLERSTANG: an Upland Tale. By ALGERNON GISSING, Author of "A Secret of the North Sea," &c.

THREE MEN OF MARK. By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "St. Mungo's City," &c.

ONLY A NIGGER. By EDMUND MITCHELL, Author of "The Lone Star Rush," &c.

POCKET VOLUMES, printed upon fine and very thin paper. Post 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each; leather, gilt edges, with marker, 3s. net each.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. By CHARLES READE.

"IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND." By CHARLES READE.

THE DEEMSTER. By HALL CAINE.

FAMILIAR STUDIES OF MEN AND BOOKS. By R. L. STEVENSON.

LOVE, COURTSHIP, AND MARRIAGE. By the REV. E. J. HARDY, Author of "How to be Happy though Married." Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

A VERSAILLES CHRISTMAS-TIDE. By MARY STUART BOYD. With 53 Illustrations by A. S. Boyd. Fcap. 4to. cloth gilt and gilt top, 6s.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF ROBERT BUCHANAN. With Portrait in each Volume. Two vols. crown 8vo. buckram, 12s.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. By CHARLES READE. A New Edition, set in handsome type, and illustrated by 16 Photogravures and 84 half-tone Illustrations by Matt B. Hewerdine. Small 4to. cloth gilt and gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

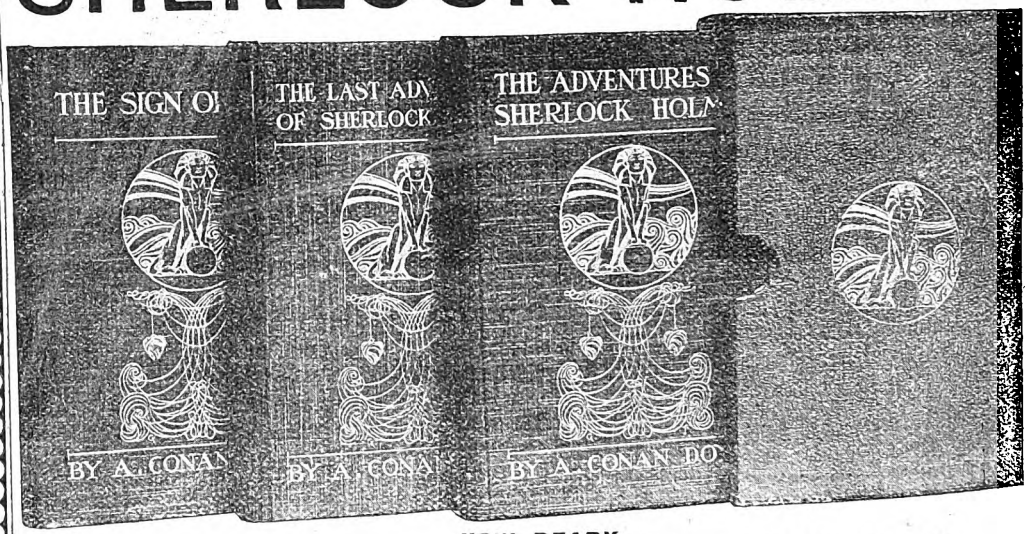
London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE BEST NEW YEAR'S PRESENT IS A COPY OF

The Souvenir Edition of CONAN DOYLE'S Great Detective Stories

SHERLOCK HOLMES



NOW READY.

Three Volumes with specially designed binding, in a handsome case, Price 10s. 6d.

The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes. Illustrated by SIDNEY PAGET. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt.

The Last Adventures of Sherlock Holmes. Illustrated by SIDNEY PAGET. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt.

The Sign of Four: An Early Adventure of Sherlock Holmes. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt.

Or, each Volume sold separately at 3s. 6d. each.

WORLD - TRAVEL

Organised by

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., F.R.G.S.,

W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,

AND

CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

CRUISES

on the Magnificent Ocean Yacht "ARGONAUT."

Tonnage 3,273, H.P. 4,000. Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

Sailing as follows to* THE MEDITERRANEAN:—

January 18th to February 10th.—From Marseilles to Palermo, Jaffa (for Jerusalem), Alexandria (for Cairo), Malta and back to Marseilles. A Twenty-four days Cruise for £27 6s. and upwards. Return Ticket London, Calais, Paris, Marseilles included.

February 15th to March 31st.—From Marseilles to Naples, Alexandria (for Cairo), Jaffa (for Jerusalem), Beyrout (for Damascus and Baalbec), Constantinople, Piraeus (for Athens), Nauplia (for Mycenae), Katakolo (for Olympia), Naples, Ajaccio, and back to Marseilles. A Forty-five days Cruise for £49 7s. and upwards. Return Ticket London, Calais, Paris, Marseilles included.

These Cruises are under the auspices of the Co-operative Cruising Co., Ltd.

£10 10s. and £13 13s. TOURS to ROME, viâ the Mont Cenis Route. With Optional Extensions to Naples, Assisi, Perugia, Siena, Florence, Venice, and the Riviera.

£12 12s. 6d. TOURS to FLORENCE and VENICE.

£10 10s. Winter Skating and Tobogganing Parties to CHAMONIX and to GRINDELWALD.

Full Particulars from the Secretary—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR JANUARY, 1902.

			PAGE
I.	"My Mandoline"		Frontispiece
II.	The Young King of Spain. Illustrated.	John Bell	283
III.	That Dawg Sly. Story	S. Baring-Gould	288
IV.	In the Public Eye. Illustrated.	The Onlooker	294
V.	The Land of Many Waters: Finland, the Country of Legendary Charm. Illustrated.	Edgcumbe Staley	301
VI.	The Scotch Express. Story	Mrs. Walford	308
VII.	The Tenant of Grove Cottage. Serial Story. Chapters XV.-XVIII. Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Adam Lilburn	313
VIII.	John Clifford, D.D.: A Sketch and an Interview. Illustrated.	Charles Spence.	329
IX.	A Home for the Hopeless: The Royal Hospital for Incurables at Putney Heath. Illustrated.	Robert Vincent.	335
X.	Literary Jottings	J. Cuthbert Hadden	339
XI.	Spoils of the Sea		342
XII.	On Doing a Good Day's Work	Rev. F. B. Meyer, BA.	343
XIII.	Dickens's London. Illustrated.	Sidney E. Jackson.	345
XIV.	Mrs. Weston's Grandchild. Story.	Lady Violet Greville	351
XV.	Social Life in France	Mrs. Crawford.	357
XVI.	Royalty Working for the Poor: What the London Needlework Guild is Doing. Illustrated.	Mrs Hirst Alexander	361
XVII.	The Confession. Story	A. Conan Doyle	365
XVIII.	Dogs in Harness. Illustrated.	Charles Horner	368
XIX.	Common Sense for Mothers and Nurses	Dr. Julia Holmes Smith	370
XX.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	373

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

INSIST ON HAVING

PETER'S

THE ORIGINAL

MILK-CHOCOLATE

IMITATIONS LACK THE CHARM AND DELICACY OF PETER'S.

A SWEETMEAT AND A FOOD

Sold Everywhere in 1d., 2d., 3d., 6d. and 1s. Tablets; 6d. and 1s. Croquettes.

Sole Agents: S. J. MACKENZIE & CO., LTD., London.

No More Chapped or Rough Skin!

"BEETHAM'S Regd Larola"

will very soon remove all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, CHAPS, IRRITATION, &c., and render THE SKIN delicately SOFT, SMOOTH, and WHITE. Try a 6d. bottle. Its effect will delight you! Bottles, 6d., 1/-, 2/6, of all chemists.

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

THE QUIVER

For . . JANUARY.

Ready Dec. 30th, Price 6d.

Opens with an interview with Mr. Frederic Goodall, R.A., under the title of "A Painter of Bible Stories," and, in addition to serial stories by offers its readers five complete stories suitable for family reading.

S. Baring-Gould and David Lyall,

THE DEAN OF GLOUCESTER writes upon "What I Saw in the Catacombs," and DR. R. F. HORTON on "The Decian Persecution."

THE REV. H. B. FREEMAN is the author of an anecdotal paper on "Martyrs of Money-Making," and devotional papers are contributed by CANON HAY AITKEN and the REV. MARK GUY PEARSE.

A New Hymn Tune by the Organist of York Minster, an Article on Cripple Children at Work and Play, illustrated with reproductions of their drawings, some illustrated pages of Temperance Notes and News, and Short Arrows are among the other contents of the Number.

CASSELL & COMPANY Ltd., LONDON; and all Booksellers.

SERIAL ISSUE,

IN MONTHLY PARTS, PRICE 6d., OF

The Story of Our Planet.

By Prof. T. G. BONNEY, D.Sc., LL.D., F.R.S., F.S.A., F.G.S.

With Coloured Plates, Maps, and Numerous Illustrations.

PART 1 ready December 30th. (To be completed in 12 PARTS.)

"As readable as a fairy tale."—DAILY NEWS.

CASSELL & COMPANY Ltd., LONDON; and all Booksellers.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

The Young King of Spain.

By JOHN BELL.

KING ALFONSO XIII. will very shortly loom large in the public eye. In a few months he will become a King in earnest, and so that he may better understand his position and the heavy responsibilities which surround it, he is to take a tour of the Courts of Europe. This will, as it were, round off his education—complete his royal studies, which have been arduous, incessant, and at times very tedious.

For Alfonso had the rare distinction of being born a King, and in virtue of this fact much was expected of him, and consequently much has been imposed upon him.

His birth, six months after his beloved father died in the Palace of the Prado, marked a new epoch for Spain which had long been regarded as the Niobe of nations—a characteristic which, it seems, has more or less clung to the Peninsula since that event. It was on May 17th, 1886, that Señor Sagasta, the Grand Old Man of Spanish politics, made known the birth to an anxious country. Spain wanted a King; she had had enough of queens; she wanted a continuation of Alfonso XII's rule; and if the new-born monarch in any way followed in the footsteps of his father—that brave, sunny-tempered, though at times wayward ruler, who was removed from this scene of things before he had an opportunity of shaping the destinies of his country—she would be satisfied. And therefore the news of the birth of a new King of Spain was received as glad tidings.

While the Spanish people wanted another Alfonso, they appeared to forget for the moment that the little King would be the thirteenth of that name; and when, after the baptism, this fact was borne in upon them, the superstitious element in the country began to make all sorts of prophecies of ill-luck for the dynasty.

But Queen Maria Christina heeded not the prophets of evil; she applied herself to the duties of Regent with a devotion and whole-heartedness which, if they did not serve to win the hearts of the Spanish people, at least commanded their respect. And in all that is written about King Alfonso XIII., his mother must necessarily receive

H.M. KING ALFONSO XIII.
Who, in a few months, will become the Ruler of Spain.
Photo by Valentin, Madrid.

Digitized by Google

THE SPANISH ROYAL FAMILY.

Photo by Valentin, Madrid.

honourable mention. Her position in Spain was an unenviable one from the first. She was a foreigner, a princess of Austria, daughter of the late Archduke Charles; and so little did she commend herself to her husband's subjects that the title of "the Austrian" was thought good enough for her. But she has lived down all the sneering and distrust; she is no longer "the Austrian"; it is remembered that she is the mother of the little King, the hope of Spain, and that she has done her duty by her son and her adopted country faithfully and well.

The characteristic of the Spanish Court is its exclusiveness, and the Queen Regent is credited with having so fashioned it. But those who have been privileged to peep behind the scenes have been impressed with the constant care which the Queen-mother bestows on the little King. He was a delicate child from the first, and needed, and, indeed, still requires, the utmost attention. It was thought that he would not survive his fourth year, for he was at death's door. The worst was expected, but he rallied rapidly, and then his mother, mindful of the disease to which his father succumbed, pinned her faith in the boy's future strength to fresh air and plenty of it. Accordingly she made a practice of taking him out daily with his two sisters in the Palace Park. Strength came to him and then began his studies.

After his mother, a Basque nurse was Alfonso's first teacher. Then an English governess was secured for him. He liked his English governess, and applied himself sedulously to learn her language, which he speaks and writes with facility. The acquisition of foreign languages is a strong point with Alfonso. Besides his knowledge of English he can also speak French, German and Italian; so that when he goes the round of the Courts he will be able to feel at home with the numerous Royal personages and great statesmen he meets.

As befitted a King of Spain, it was necessary that Alfonso should know everything about her military system. He began to soldier early. At the age of ten he was placed under the charge of a military governor. He has had several military instructors, and there is a story that one, at least, endeavoured to teach the boy something that was not in the army books—he wanted his royal pupil to share his political views as to how Spain should be ruled. The story runs that this came to the ears of the Queen Regent, with the result that the services of this particular military instructor were no longer required.

The better to enable the young King to understand soldiering, a regiment of boys was raised at San Sebastian for his special benefit. These youthful warriors were equipped in every way like full-grown soldiers. They even had their own special band. Naturally the young King took a great interest in this boy regiment. Mounted on his pony he attended drill, and he was particular about the band and the music it played. He has grown too big for this little regiment now; he now mixes with soldiers of a larger growth, rides a fine chestnut horse, and is so certain of the correctness of his military education (for he was a pupil at the military school) that he never hesitates to give commands to grisled officers who were even turning grey while in his father's service.

Digitized by Google

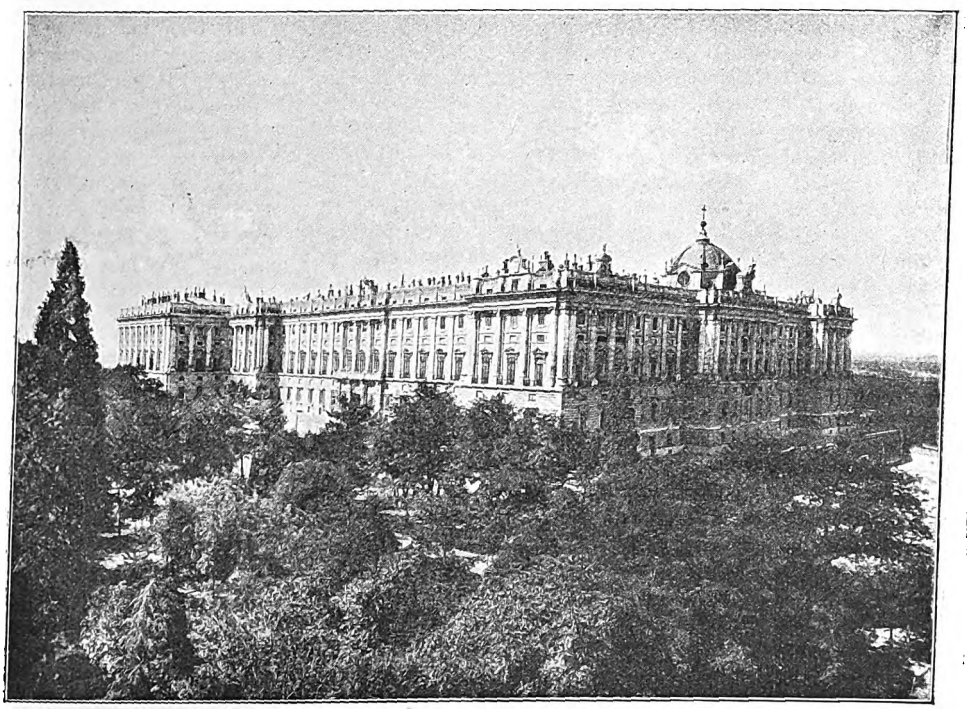
He was not quite fourteen when he took charge of tactical movements. Accompanied by his mother, the Minister for War, and his professors, he went to the quarters of the first regiment of the line, which is the King's Own, and put the soldiers through their movements. His visit came as a surprise to the regiment, and when, with drawn sword, he gave the word of command in a ringing voice, both officers and men were delighted. His military education has still been further perfected by attendance at the Infantry Cadet Academy Corps at Toledo, and at recent military manœuvres at Carabanebel he surprised everybody by remaining seven hours in the saddle.

One officer, a favourite with the King, ventured to ask whether his Majesty was not tired and would rather dismount. "Not at all," replied Alfonso; "I'll stick on to the end." And he galloped here, there, and everywhere; and though there are few officers in the Spanish army who do not believe that the King, like his father, is consumptive, yet all were surprised that after the exertions of the day he was as fresh as paint, and spoke in clear tones of voice, showing that he possessed that stamina not usually associated with consumptives.

He loves the army. Those who saw him in the palace during the dark days of the Spanish-American war had abundant evidence of this fact. Efforts were made to keep bad news from him, but he insisted on learning the truth; and when disaster after disaster shattered the Spanish army, he grew sad and despondent and never slept at nights. He pleaded often to be allowed to visit his wounded soldiers in the hospitals, and his mother took care that his anxiety for their comfort should be allayed.

There is an interesting story which, while it shows his interest in his officers and their duties, also demonstrates his tact in administering reproof. Walking



THE ROYAL PALACE AT MADRID.

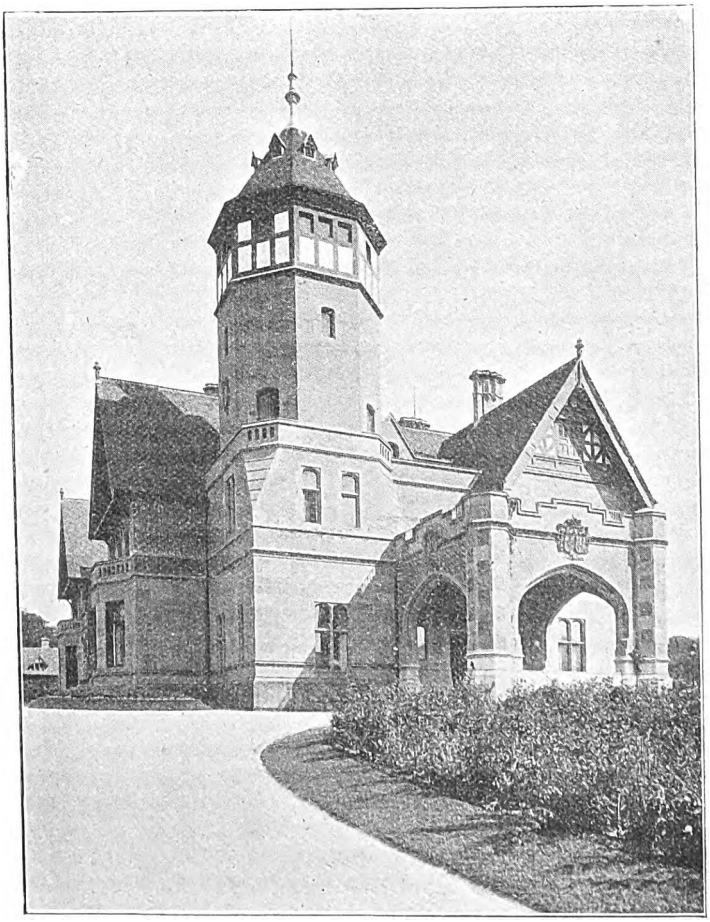
Photograph by Hauser y Menet, Madrid.

Digitized by Google

is his favourite exercise. Sometimes his two sisters, to whom he is much attached, accompany him, but often he goes out alone. And it was while returning from a walk one day that he missed the officer who should have been in command of the guard. Calling the adjutant, Alfonso said, "Who is the officer on duty for the day?" The adjutant gave the officer's name. "Then will you kindly remember me to him," said his Majesty, "and tell him that he is often in my thoughts, but that I have not had the pleasure of seeing him for quite a long time." So long as the little King of Spain can handle his officers in this way, there is no likelihood of any wavering in their allegiance to him.

While Alfonso takes great pride in his army he does not neglect his navy. It is true that Spain makes a poor naval show now, after her war with the United States, but the little King is credited with a desire to build up his navy. He is proud of Spain's naval history, in spite of past historic eclipses and the débâcle in the late conflict, and after watching the naval manœuvres last year he told his mother that if Spain was powerful on the seas once, there is no reason why she should not be great again. Optimistic Alfonso! When he takes his mother's place he will find his burden on land sufficiently heavy without seeking another on the sea.

In spite of the seclusion in which he has been kept from his childhood, when he considered it a positive treat to be allowed to throw away handfuls of money to the Madrid poor, he has given evidence of a genius for statesmanship. He has practically said farewell to languages and mathematics, and has turned his attention to the study of constitutional history. He is an apt student, as Señor Segasta, Señor Silvela and other Spanish statesmen can testify. With his mother he is now present at all Cabinet Councils, and the way in which he has comported himself at these meetings has been a matter of great gratification to the Queen Regent and her ministers.



CASTLE MIRAMAR.

The Residence of the Spanish Royal Family at San Sebastian.

Whatever reproaches may have been heaped upon her by the Spanish people, Queen Christina can safely say that no pains have been spared in equipping her son for his high destiny. And now that he is about to pass out of her hands and ascend his father's throne, which has been kept for him for sixteen years, it is opportune to survey the young King as he is to-day and indicate the burden he will have to bear.

Alfonso does not belie his appearance; he is not robust. He is narrow-chested, and it is openly suggested that he is consumptive—a disease to which the climate of

Digitized by Google

Madrid, cold and gusty as it is for several months of the year, is not favourable. A large section of the Spanish people who think that the boy King stands between them and a revolution, do not associate him with a short life. If it be true that he has his father's complaint, they would have been better pleased if he had resembled their late Monarch in other respects.

"He is no Spaniard," say some, and they point to his pale face and blue eyes—the face and eyes of his mother. But if the lineaments of his father have been denied him, he possesses Alfonso XII.'s high spirit, bright nature, and great love for Spain; and these characteristics will go far with Alfonso XIII.

Meanwhile the condition of Spain is not such as to inspire the young King with hope and courage. Spain is a country of discordant elements. Alfonso's chief duty will be to placate all these factions. He will not have much trouble with the great constitutional parties, for even if the Liberals and Conservatives follow each other into office with a rapidity that is not consistent with stable government, their loyalty to the throne is unquestioned. The influence of the clerics, too, which is not to be despised, is on the side of the throne; the Vatican manifesting a benign interest in the monarchy.

The two elements of danger are the Carlists and the Republicans. It has been said that Carlism as a political system is dead. It is not likely to die so long as Don Carlos is a name to conjure with; and in the event of the King's death, the Carlists would show their hand.

It is true that Queen Christina, with as much boldness as tact, has made concessions to the Carlists by giving her eldest daughter Mercedes (who is called after Alfonso XII.'s first wife and first cousin, daughter of the Duke of Montpensier) to the son of the Count of Caserta, one of the greatest names in Carlism. The Count of Caserta has a past; terrible things are ascribed to him during the Carlist war, and these were remembered at Madrid at the time of his son's marriage with the Princess of the Asturias. The Princess was Queen until her brother was born, and she is his heir, and his death would make her husband, Charles de Bourbon, the Queen of Spain's Consort—a contingency which, it is feared, would set the country ablaze.

H.M. QUEEN CHRISTINA,
Who has been Queen Regent of Spain for Sixteen years.
Photograph by Valentin, Madrid.

It would then be the opportunity of the Catalanists. The Republicans are more to be feared than the Carlists. In a large degree they represent the brain and the energy of Spain. They have never taken kindly to the present monarchy; they keep their ideal ever before them. The Government is impotent to deal with them because of their strength and the great names amongst them.

The Republicans are waiting, watching and working. General Weyler, whose bad record in Cuba is not likely to be forgotten, is acclaimed a great hero by them, and this egregious military failure is credited with possessing deep Republican sentiments and an ambition to play the rôle of dictator should the Republicans have their way. General Weyler is at present War Minister—a responsible position, but not sufficiently great for him.

The little King of Spain has his eye on Weyler, as his mother always has had, and he will do well to imitate the Queen Regent and keep the General high in the service of the monarchy, and so offer no opportunity for the growth of his Republican aspirations.

JOHN BELL.

Digitized by Google

THAT DAWG SLY.

By S. BARING-GOULD.

THOMAS DE VERE WINTERBOTTOM was a clerk in the office of a chartered accountant, named Sloggett. He had lodged in Norfolk Street, Strand, but was compelled precipitately to change his place of abode. The landlady, Mrs. Fish, had scarlet fever, but kept the matter close till she was peeling, when she deemed herself sufficiently recovered to attend to the cooking and bed-making for her several lodgers. The result was that three of them sickened from scarlet fever.

Thomas De Vere Winterbottom at once resolved on shifting his quarters.

The reason for this had got wind, and Mr. Sloggett said to him:

"Look here, Winter, I'm not going to have you infect the rest of my clerks. We are likely to have a busy time next month, and if my clerks are going to be prostrate and tucked in with scarlatina, I shall be up a taller tree than the ailanthus glandulosus, which is called the Tree of Heaven, because it reaches to the clouds. So you just keep away for a fortnight, till all risk of infection is over; and do not return till you have been put into an oven raised to 212 deg. Fahrenheit, or else have been shut up for forty-eight hours in a room, hermetically sealed, full of sulphur fumes. In such cases one cannot make too sure. Ta-ta!"

So Thomas De Vere Winterbottom had to shift his quarters, and was given a holiday of a fortnight. He looked about for suitable rooms, and found them in a street near Oxford Street.

The landlady said: "Oh, yes! I can take you, but I expect two weeks paid in advance. I have been done by a man named Price, who has gone. He disappeared the night before last, without leaving a trace; and, what is worse, he has not taken his dawg with him. I'm not going to pay a tax—seven-and-six—and have to feed the nasty brute as well. He eats as much as a Christian."

"Where is he?"

"There, behind you. He's that sort of dawg as always is behind your back."

Mr. Winterbottom turned and saw a little mongrel under the table looking at him with remarkably intelligent eyes. Being fond of animals, the clerk stooped and patted him, and addressed him caressingly. The beast winked an eye, and accepted the endearments as his due.

"I think I will retain the dog till his master returns to claim him," said the clerk.

"It's my belief you'll have to keep him a pretty long time then," said Mrs. Giles, the landlady. "And, what is more, I'm not sure as you'll like his tricks. I can't say nothin' for certain, but I misdoubts that there dawg."

The beast looked at the clerk and winked again.

"What is his name?"

"Well," said the landlady, "his owner used sometimes to call him Sly, and sometimes Slyboots, as the fancy took him."

Then said Mr. Winterbottom, coaxingly: "Sly, will you be friends?"

The dog, who had seemed perfectly to understand what was going on, responded by putting his wet nose into the clerk's hand, and then, at once, without another word, satisfied at the concordat, left the house and vanished up the street.

Thomas De Vere paid his rent for two weeks in advance, and then revisited his former lodgings to remove thence such of his property as was there.

On his return, he took a chair and seated himself by the fireplace, with his feet on the black sheepskin rug, when he noticed something lying there, half-covered by the flocks of wool. He picked it up, and found it was a leather purse. On opening it, some silver fell out, and in an inner compartment were three sovereigns in gold. Mr. Winterbottom at once summoned the landlady.

Digitized by Google

"Look here, Mrs. Giles," said he, "your former tenant was not so unjust as you supposed. He left his purse behind him to defray your charges."

"I don't think he did that," was the reply.

"But," said the tenant, "has anyone else been in the apartment since he left?"

"No, mister, no one."

"Then it must be his."

"Well, I don't hold that it is. Howsomdever, as he owes me three pun' six and eightpence ha'penny, I don't mind if I do take the money."

"That is within a few pence the sum in the purse. You see how wrong it is to judge men prematurely. He was honest, after all. You may as well take the purse likewise, Mrs. Giles."

"No, thank you, sir. I'll content myself with the money. There is still fivepence ha'penny short."

"I'll put the purse on the mantelshelf till he returns," said the clerk.

"I don't think he will return," said Mrs. Giles. "And, sir, if I was you, I'd get rid of that dawg."

"What has the dog to do with it? Sly!" Mr. Winterbottom saw the beast under the table watching him with an eye shut, and called to him. He caressed him. "Good dog! Brave old Sly! Honest old Slyboots!"

Mr. Winterbottom was not a man to care greatly for outside amusements He spent his evenings in his lodgings cultivating his mind.

He may have felt lonely at times, but he had now a dog to keep him company, an entertaining little creature, as he soon discovered, full of tricks; and the first evening spent in the new apartments passed most agreeably; it was one of the pleasantest in his recollection. For he could talk to and fondle the dog, and make it sit up and beg, pretend to be dead, and jump over his hands.

Next day, having nothing particular to engage him, he resolved on a stroll in one of the parks, and on taking his canine companion with him.

Sly trotted demurely to heel for some time, and then, in the most thronged portion of Oxford Street, Mr. Winterbottom missed him. He was greatly annoyed, for he feared he had lost Sly and his engaging society wholly.

However, on his return to his lodgings, he found that the brute had retraced his steps, had waited at the door till it was opened for a lodger, or to take in meat, had dashed within and was lying under the table, with his snout on his paws, wagging his tail and with his intelligent eyes full of observation.

Thomas De Vere knelt on the hearthrug, and took out his match-box to put a light to the fire, when to his astonishment, he found on the sheepskin a brown-paper parcel, neatly tied up.

Without further considering his fire, he took this up, untied it, and found that it contained a gold bracelet, set with brilliants and turquoises, of which latter one had fallen out of its setting, and was tied up in a separate piece of paper. The armlet was of no great value intrinsically, but was handsome, of Indian make. Mr. Winterbottom turned the article about, greatly wondering, and then rang for the landlady.

"Mrs. Giles," said the lodger, "I have found a parcel without address in my room. It contains a gold Oriental bracelet set with jewels. Has anyone been in my room since I left this morning?"

"No one that I know of, sir, except the dawg."

"But how came this here? I can hardly have omitted seeing it last night, and the slavey is not likely to have dropped it when cleaning the grate. She does not wear bracelets?"

"Hardly, sir."

"Is this house bewitched?"

"No, sir. There is something written inside the bracelet."

"Is there?"

The clerk took the bracelet to the window. "By Jove! There is. 'Henrietta Fraisne, 16, Cardigan Square. From her dear friend Adela.' There now! I have an address. I can find out about this. You are sure no lady was here who could have dropped this?

"Quite sure. And, sir, I think if I was you I wouldn't keep that there dawg."

"By Jove!" exclaimed Mr. Winterbottom. "I'll get at the bottom of this mystery at once. I can but call this afternoon at Cardigan Square. Come along,

Digitized by Google

Sly, old boy, come along my honest fellow, for a little walk."

Sly at once rose and accompanied his new master, trotting at his heels a little way down the street, and then—presto! he was gone. Nor did Mr. Winterbottom see any more of him till his return home.

He took his way to the square, found No. 16, and knocked at the door. To the servant who answered he gave his card, and asked to be allowed to speak to Miss Fraisne.

The servant ascended the stairs and left Mr. Winterbottom in the hall. He returned presently and said that Miss Fraisne was particularly engaged, but that if Mr. Winterbottom would state the purpose of his call she might perhaps manage to give him a minute of her time.

"Will you be good enough to say that I have found something of value which I suspect the lady has lost."

The man went again upstairs, and next moment a charming young lady tripped down. "I beg a thousand pardons. I was holding a skein of silk for my mother, who was winding it off. Will you kindly walk into the breakfast room?"

She led the way. When Mr. Winterbottom was in the apartment with her he brought out the bracelet.

"It is mine," she said. "It was given me by a dear friend, married in India. How did you come by it? I was taking it to a goldsmith to have the clasp put to rights—it catches—and a loose turquoise set, and somehow on my way I lost it; how, I cannot for my life, imagine."

"And I," replied the clerk, "I, for the life of me, cannot imagine how it came upon the hearthrug in my humble lodgings."

Then he informed her of his discoveries. He proceed to tell her of the purse found the previous evening in the same place.

"I do not believe in the supernatural, tricksy spirits," said he; "but upon my soul I cannot conceive how else these tricks can have been played on me unless there be a Puck or Pixie in the house."

"Really," said Miss Fraisne, colouring, "you have done me an immense favour. I was about to offer a reward for its recovery. I do not know what to say—how to make an acknowledgment for what you have done, Mr. Winterbottom, but if you would kindly mention——"

"There is but one acknowledgment I will hear of," said the clerk, "and that is, to be allowed permission to call again, once only, to tell you how this maddening mystery clears itself up."

"You are heartily welcome," she answered. "But do come upstairs and see my mother. She has been so distressed about the loss of the bracelet, and will be vastly interested with your story. Will you oblige me by telling it to her yourself?

Mr. Winterbottom could not refuse.

When he left, it was with the old lady's entreaty, united with that of her daughter, that Mr. Winterbottom would call again when he was able to explain how the bracelet had got into his possession, or, rather, found its way to his hearthrug. The clerk walked home as though treading on air. So charming, so beautiful a girl as Henrietta Fraisne he had never met before.

What her circumstances were he had no other means of judging than by estimating the character of the house and household. He judged that the family was very comfortably off, but not wealthy. Oh, that he could solve the mystery! The sooner it was solved the better pleased he would be, for then he would rush back to Cardigan Square and see Miss Fraisne once more, and hear her pleasant voice for the last time.

On his way home he looked on all sides for Sly but could not see him. However, on reaching his lodgings the dog was there. Mr. Winterbottom was angry.

"Sly," said he, in a tone of reproach, "I am not pleased with you. You are idle, sir, idle and lazy. You shirk a walk, and yet exercise is necessary for the health. We shall have you suffering from some disorder if you avoid taking constitutionals. Hallo! Good gracious! What is that?"

On his hearthrug lay a letter.

He knelt and picked it up. It was not in an envelope, consequently had no address. He unfolded it. There was no address at the head of the letter, that ran thus:—

"MY DARLING, EVER DEAREST EDWARD,—I have not seen you for many—too many—days, having been away by the seaside. Oh, how I have pined for you! How many pocket-handkerchiefs I have moistened with tears, longing, sighing, aching for your dearest face. And now I insist on our meeting at once. The 6th of this month, at half-past five. I shall be at the pastry-cook's at the corner, where we eat cheese-cakes together; after that we will stroll together in the Park. Do not fail me at the pastry-cook's, at the corner of Oxford-street, at half-past five, to-morrow the 6th.—Ever and eternally yours.

Digitized by Google

"SELINA."

"Good gracious me!" exclaimed Mr. Winterbottom. "I'm glad my name is not Edward. But oh, if it had been addressed to Thomas De Vere and signed Henrietta, it would have been another matter altogether. Bless my soul! To-day is the 6th, and in another hour it will be half-past five. I am certain to find the confectioner's shop—at a corner. Come along, Slyboots. I am not going to put up with your laziness. Out you shall come, aërate your lungs and circulate your blood. This time you shall not desert."

So saying, Thomas De Vere took a piece of twine and attached it to the collar of the dog. Then he went forth, Sly attending him, but much out of humour at being deprived of his liberty, and inclined to drop sulkily into the rear.

The clerk looked about him as he walked along Oxford Street. It is a long thoroughfare, and no indications were given in the letter as to the side on which the place of rendezvous was.

"Oh, those mad, passionate lovers!" thought he. "How youth will surmount all prudential barriers. They are certain to be punctual. I should be so if I had received such a letter from Henrietta." At that moment he heard a clock strike the half-hour, and simultaneously two persons, the one a gentleman and the other a lady, entered a pastrycook's at a street corner opening into Oxford Street.

Mr. Winterbottom followed, full of confidence, and, passing within, heard the gentleman address his companion with the query: "What will you have, my dear?"

"Cheese-cakes," replied the lady.

Instantly the clerk laid his hand on the sleeve of the gentleman and asked: "Is your Christian name Edward?"

The person addressed turned round. He was a heavy, stout man, well advanced in years, with drooping cheeks, and dark whiskers turning grey. There was the commercial look about him strong. He was either a stockjobber or a shipbroker. The lady was middle-aged, by no means elegant in shape, or beautiful in feature. Her complexion was choleric and her eye volcanic.

"My name is Edward," answered the gentleman. "But, pray, what is that to you?"

"It is now half-past five," said Winterbottom solemnly.

"If you desire to know the precise time," said the stranger, looking at his watch, "it is 5.38."

"And she asked for cheese-cakes," said Winterbottom, gravely and impressively."

"She—sir! What do you mean by she?"

"She—why, Selina."

"Edward, is this man mad?" asked the lady. "How dare he call me Selina when my name is Maria Antoinette."

"I beg your pardon," said Mr. Winterbottom. "There has been some extraordinary mistake. And yet, this is a corner shop. I must justify myself."

He dropped the string by which he held the dog and produced the letter from his pocket. "Look, sir! Look, madam! Here you have it all. Edward—half-past five o'clock—cheese-cakes—a confectioner's at a corner shop."

"Edward!" exclaimed the lady, bridling up. "This does, indeed, demand an explanation. Am I your true and long-suffering wife, and you—you go making appointments with young ladies—ladies, indeed!—at pastry-cooks'."

"I beg pardon," explained the clerk. "It is the lady who makes the appointment."

"The point is immaterial. Oh, you Don Juan! You Lothario! Sighing and aching for the sight of your flabby face, indeed!"

"I know nothing about this. I never met any Selina in my life," protested the frightened man, breaking into globules of perspiration.

"A corner shop. Oh, how cunning. Moistening a thousand pocket-handkerchiefs with sentimental tears. Gah!"

"There are other corner shops," he retorted, in a trembling voice. "I vow and protest——Oh, this is insupportable," gasped the commercial man. And, turning on Mr. Winterbottom, he demanded, in an agitated voice: "What is the meaning of this? I know not a word about this. It is an insult, an outrage. Why have you done this? What is your name? Where do you live? Who the dickens are you? Why is this abominable trick played on me?"

Digitized by Google

"Here is my card," said Mr. Winterbottom. "I am extremely embarrassed and distressed that I should have fallen into so ghastly a mistake."

"Oh, this is no mistake. He is capable of everything, stout and elderly though he be," exclaimed the lady.

Alarmed lest he should be further involved in the conjugal tempest he had inadvertently roused, Mr. Winterbottom fled the confectioner's, and hastened home.

But the dog had preceded him, and when he entered his room was lying under the table, licking his lips and winking.

On the hearthrug reposed a silver card-case!

"Here's a go!" exclaimed the clerk, and stood and contemplated this last deposit in consternation. He at once lighted the gas, and the silver case glittered as it reflected the jet. "Was there ever such a diablerie as this enacted before? I'll be hanged if I touch it! I shall go off my head."

He retreated to his bedroom, where he washed his hands. On his return, the case was still on the rug. He stopped, picked it up, and placed it on his table. At the same moment the door opened, and the gentleman, whom he took to be a stockbroker, entered, heated and angry.

"I have come to know the meaning of this, Mr. Winter—Winter"—he referred to the card, and concluded—"bottom." Then, after stertorous breathing, he resumed: "You have caused unpleasantness—to use a mild expression—between me and my wife. I am as innocent as a babe unborn. I never knew a Selina. Be blowed to them! Selinas, indeed! Halloo! What have you here? My wife's card-case! A silver family heirloom. What is the meaning of this?"

He opened it, and drew out—not a card, but a photograph of his wife.

"Hah!" he shouted, and stamped about the room. "I see it all, in its hideous wickedness. She has been here. She—involved in a miserable intrigue with you. She has given to you her carte-de-visite and this silver family heirloom. Oh, nothing is too good for her inamorato and that affair of the letter was a basely contrived plot, a diabolical plot, devised against me, me innocent as the saints in light, so as to throw me off my guard. Hah! hah! hah!" He twisted about the room stamping. "I will dash this photograph into her face; I will hurl at her my denunciation of a vile intrigue with a Winter—Winter"—he referred again to the card, and concluded with—"bottom."

"Sir," said the clerk, with dignity, "you are most unreasonable. I absolutely deny the charge."

"How then came this card-case and photograph in your possession? I pause for a reply."

Mr. Winterbottom was silent. He could not answer the question.

At this juncture steps were heard on the stairs, the door was opened, and a couple of policemen entered, followed by Mrs. Giles. "There's the dawg," said the landlady, "under the table, with his tail between his legs, and both eyes shut and snoring. I knew he was a bad 'un, and up to mischief."

"And Price lodged here?" asked the chief of the two constables.

"Yes," answered Mrs. Giles, "till two nights agone, when he decamped."

"And who may these gentlemen be?"

Mr. Winterbottom gave his name. "I have but just engaged the rooms," he said.

"Sir," said the policeman, "a notorious thief called—it is one of his aliases—Price, has been arrested. He has been in the habit of employing a dog—that dog there, sleeping so sweetly—no, hang me! he has one eye open—employing that dog to pick pockets for him. Have you noticed any signs of roguery in the brute?"

"Four," Mr. Winterbottom replied. "The last—this card-case, stolen in a pastry-cook's shop, whilst the lady was addressing her husband."

Then the clerk told his tale.

The stockbroker grew cool and collected, and wiped himself down with his silk pocket-handkerchief. "My good fellows," said he to the constables, "if you will step round to my house with the dog and tell the story to my wife—she wouldn't believe me if I were to tell it, and were not corroborated by you—I will give you each a sovereign and a couple of glasses of my best port. And you, sir," —to Mr. Winterbottom—"will you do me the favor of dining with me?"

"I should be most happy," the clerk replied, "but that I am due at No. 16, Cardigan Square."

"Well—dine with me to-morow."

Mr. Winterbottom sped to the house in the square, sent up his card, and, notwithstanding the hour, was readily admitted.

Digitized by Google

He was now able to give the entire story and solve the mystery. He was invited to stay for dinner by Colonel Fraisne, a merry old Indian officer.

That was but the first of several visits, and his dinner next day was also the first of several with the ship-broker and his wife, who both took a fancy to him.

The old gentleman presently offered Thomas De Vere a situation in his office, at much better pay than he had received at Sloggett's, and without exacting of him that he should be doubly disinfected.

It is not improbable that eventually he may become a partner.

It is not improbable that his visits to No. 16, Cardigan Square may also lead to a partnership, but of another kind. And all this was brought about by That Dawg Sly.

[THE END.]

COWSLIPS.

Into all the city tumult,
Cloud and dust and smoke so drear,
Come these bright-eyed country blossoms
With their note of gracious cheer.

Silken petals, drenched with sunshine,
Opening wide to greet the day;
Crisp, broad leaves, so strong and restful;
Graceful stems with willowy sway.

Cups of fairy gold uplifted,
Holding still the morning dew,
Offering Nature's sweet refreshment,
Giving strength for duties new.

Breath of fragrant, breeze-swept meadows,
Comes from out each stamened heart,
Where the first rays of the sunshine
O'er the grasses gleam and dart.

Sound of water flowing softly,
Tinkling o'er the pebbles bright,
Slipping down 'mid tall, dark sedges,
Dancing out to meet the light.

Notes of joyous, warbling songsters,
Floating, tumbling down the air;
Bluebirds, robins, larks and orioles,
Singing matins clear and fair.

Thanks, dear blossoms, for your message,
Sunshine, freshness, music, joy,
Thoughts of calmer, sweeter living,
Pure and true without alloy.

Lydia K. Foster.

Digitized by Google

In the Public Eye

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

THE name of Miss Charlotte Mason will go down to posterity as the pioneer of a great educational movement. An only child, her father, who was a highly educated and refined man, decided, in his desire to expand his daughter's intellectual faculties to their highest extent, to entirely undertake her early education himself.

Circumstances, combined with the philosophical trend of her own education, led to her taking up educational work. Space will not permit of details, but probably her work as teacher of Mental and Moral Science at the Bishop Otter College, Chichester, helped most to originate and fix the educational thought she has since given to the world.

For several years the idea of the Parents' National Educational Union, by which she hoped to propagate certain educational principles which were very dear to her, was forming in her mind, and the opportunity to give a course of lectures on home education at Bradford was its preliminary start. The great interest aroused by these practical lectures induced her to write a book on "Home Education," which was published by Kegan Paul, another entitled "Parents and Children" following later. Both these books have had much and widespread influence; and it is really through them and the interest they have excited that the P.N.E.U. and the House of Education; the "Parents' Review," the "Mothers' Educational Course," and the "Parents' Review School" (worked by correspondence) have continued for about a dozen years to prosper and do good work.

Soon after the publication of "Home Education," the Parents' National Educational Union was formed, its principal objects being to assist parents of all classes to understand the best principles and methods of education in all its aspects, and especially in those which concern the formation of habits and character.

Lectures, etc., were arranged, and soon the Union was fixed on that steady basis which it has maintained with increasing usefulness ever since. The Union has many local branches throughout the Kingdom and exerts widespread influence on the Continent and in the Colonies. Its organ is the "Parents' Review," a monthly magazine edited by Miss Mason.

Letters from Lady Aberdeen and others, asking Miss Mason if she could find them governesses trained on her principles, showed her the need there was for some House of Education; and she opened the present College at Ambleside. Its numbers are at present limited to thirty students, and it is always full. The students are in great request in families as governesses (not nursery governesses), as in the College they have learnt all the truest principles of real healthy, moral and mental education, fixed on a sound religious basis.

Digitized by Google

IF the boy is, indeed, the father of the man, then the work carried on by Miss Rosalie Pope amongst the Brighton telegraph boys, is one of the most important and worthy of support. Miss Pope has now for some ten years devoted her time and thought to the Postal Telegraph Christian Association in that important centre, and to say that she is popular amongst her young friends would be but a feeble way of expressing their feelings towards her.

The great danger of the telegraph boy is that he acquires a love for roaming the streets and a distaste for steady effort, and just at a period when he is peculiarly susceptible to outside influences, he is turned loose by the Department which does not display any great enthusiasm in encouraging him to qualify for more prominent posts at its disposal. Here the P.T.C.A. steps in with evening classes, which Miss Pope, along with her helpers, holds for preparing boys to pass the examinations that open up further employment for them, and in the case of especially backward lads, she invites them to her own house for private coaching, and for many others who have no inclination for this branch of the service, she has found openings in Canada, or helped them to enter the Royal Navy.

MISS ROSALIE POPE,
Who has devoted herself to the work of the Postal Telegraph Christian Association.
Photo by Chas. B. Tayler, Brixton Rise, S.W.

Her Sunday Bible class is very successful, and every Sunday afternoon she is ready to welcome as many as will come, or can be spared from duty, to listen to her bright address. Nor does she forget their creature comforts, as tea and cakes are always provided.

The boys' lighter moments are also catered for in the bright little magazine published for the Association. Miss Pope's stories are all about the life, trials and temptations of the telegraph messengers, and are so able and interestingly written that her friends often wonder she does not seek a wider public for her pen. Even her summer holidays are mostly devoted to her boys. She has travelled all over the Kingdom trying to arouse interest in the P.T.C.A, and to induce others to start branches for the same good work, not forgetting when opportunity offers to gather other telegraph boys together at pleasant picnics and outings, when the good seed can often be deftly dropped into ready ears.

TO take up lace making as a hobby is a pretty occupation open to anybody with time and inclination, but to turn that hobby to account, and to found an industry for poor women has been reserved for Miss Emily Barnes alone. This lady — who took the gold medal at the "Woman's Exhibition" at Earl's Court last year as a teacher and worker — is Irish by birth, with all the bright, sparkling vivacity of her native land. She is a daughter of the late Mr. J. R. Barnes, of Westland, Maynolty, Meath; and four years ago, she took up lace as a hobby, and later as a profession, when she was asked by the Royal School of Needlework to teach some of their pupils.

Afterwards, although warned that this was an impossibility, she determined to try teaching by correspondence, with such success that her reputation as a teacher was made, and now she has many pupils at her house in Earl's Court.

The origin of the industry was as follows: Happening to mention to a pupil during the progress of a lesson that she saw great possibilities for poor women in lace making, she heard that the only industry for women at Diss, in Norfolk, was brushmaking, which was worse than oakum picking. Here was Miss Barnes' chance, and asking this lady to do her best to get together a class of about twenty to start with, she journeyed to Norfolk and took them in hand. She found these rough girls apt pupils, and soon taught them how to make Honiton lace. The success of this industry has been so great that now she is anxious to start others near London, where she can have them constantly under her own supervision. She does all her work herself, designing patterns, and making them up from the separate portions sent her by the workers, afterwards disposing of the finished articles for them. The only expenditure, therefore, is the cotton. As she justly remarks, Honiton lace can never be well copied by machinery, and there is, therefore, a good market for the real article.

Digitized by Google

She can herself make seven different kinds of lace, including Brussels, Milanese,

HON. EMILY KINNAIRD,
Honorary Secretary of the Y.W.C.A.
Photo by Maull & Fox, 187a, Piccadilly, W.

MISS EMILY BARNES.
Miss Barnes is an Expert Lace Maker, and has taught numbers of poor women the art.
Photo by Alfred Ellis & Walery, 51, Baker Street, W.

Honiton, Russian and Venetian. Miss Barnes says this work is particularly adapted for delicate women and cripples, as in two or three terribly sad cases whom she has been able to teach, she has found that lace work has brought a little brightness into their lives, by giving them something they are able to do, and in this way helping the weary days and hours to pass more profitably and pleasantly.

She is now thinking of turning her attention to the blind. For herself she is a very rapid and beautiful worker; some of the bobbins which she uses are quite historical and more than two hundred years old. She is also a lace expert, and has more than once been asked to value lace for probate and other purposes.

THE name of Kinnaird is one associated in all Englishmen's minds with good works, and the Hon. Emily Kinnaird, sister of the present Lord Kinnaird, is worthily carrying on the traditions of her name.

It is by her work as Hon. Secretary of that widespread organisation known as the "Young Women's Christian Association" that she is perhaps best known, for in this she labours untiringly and unselfishly, literally devoting her whole life to its well-being.

Digitized by Google

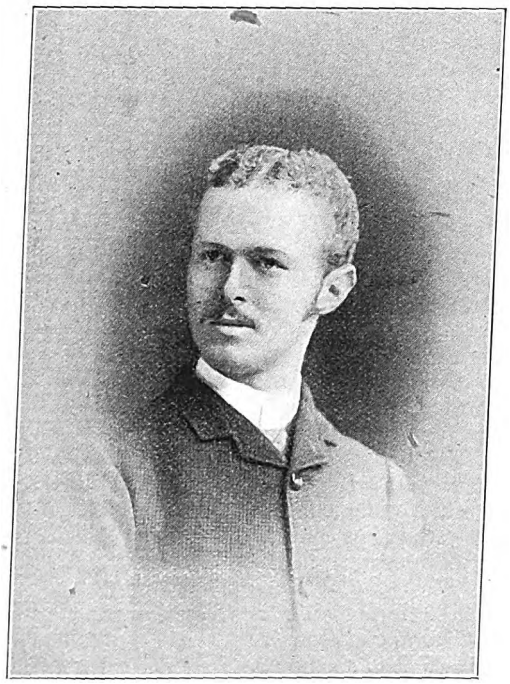
Some fifty years ago this Association was started by the late Lady Kinnaird with the object of establishing institutions and homes for young women engaged in business, domestic and other service, and now branches are to be found all over the world.

The field which it covers is marvellously wide, there being, in connection with the London branches alone, some twenty-two departments devoted to the social, moral, intellectual and spiritual well-being of girls and women, while all manner of classes on useful subjects which are available to members for a small fee, are held during the week at head-quarters. Lectures are given on English history and literature, and parties are arranged to visit places of interest, thus opening a new field of ideas to many of the girls. An excellent agency finds work for women of good character, while in connection is one to look after foreigners coming to England in search of work.

Then there is a Convalescent and Holiday Department and a Committee to arrange for Saturday afternoon outings for City workers; a Park Mission, in which the workers speak to the girls and women who frequent the parks, and comfort the most hopeless; a Travellers' Protective Department, which looks after girls coming from the country to London; and numerous homes, boarding-houses, clubs, and restaurants, where members can be assured of good and respectable entertainment. At the present time the need of extending restaurant accommodation is occupying Miss Kinnaird's attention, as she feels the necessity there is for working girls to be able to obtain cheap, wholesome meals in place of the tea and buns which are the staple fare at so many of these places. She would be very glad to communicate with any who would help her in this direction, for the consequences of this meagre diet, which has, of necessity, become so prevalent, are sure to make themselves felt in later years in an impoverished system. The extent to which these light repasts have taken the place of more substantial meals is a serious evil.

Finally, though much has had to be omitted of the varied ramifications of this Association, it must not be forgotten that the physical well-being of the members has also been considered, and there is a well-fitted gymnasium at the head-quarters, 26, George-street, Hanover-square, where exercises and musical drill are taught; while a bicycle club provides healthy recreation for those who are able to avail themselves of it.

In all this work the Hon. Emily Kinnaird takes the keenest interest, and it is rarely that she is not to be found at her post with ready sympathy, advice, and help.



MR. NINIAN HILL,
Organising Secretary of the Scottish Temperance Legislation Board.
Photograph by Fergus, Greenock.

MR. NINIAN HILL, who has been for many years an active worker in numerous good causes, is at present engaged as organising Secretary of the Scottish Temperance Legislation Board; the object of whose existence is to promote legislation on the lines of Lord Peel's Minority Report on the licensing question.

Mr. Hill has just issued his first quarterly report with a very satisfactory account of work done. He has travelled during the summer to a great many towns in Scotland, addressing meetings and endeavouring to arouse public opinion on the subject he has at heart.

Digitized by Google

"The 'Superior Person' asks," says Mr. Hill, "'Can you make a man sober by Act of Parliament?' We, being reformers of the Scottish pattern, answer him by asking another question, 'Can you make a man honest by the same means?' 'No, you cannot,' is the reply, 'but you can make rascality more difficult. If Lord Peel's proposals passed into law, much would be done that would make it easier for men to remain sober.'"

MISS HELEN THORNYCROFT,
The Well-known Artist.

A diminution in the number of licences is, of course, one of the first aids to temperance recommended by the Scottish Board. Mr. Hill points out how the result of the great Temperance Crusade of Father Mathew in the forties was lost through lack of legislative support. Ireland to-day stands, we fear, little the better for that good man's labours. Norway, on the other hand, once the most drunken country in Europe, is now the most sober, though "enjoying" the worst climate. This remarkable change was brought about by the Legislature giving effect to the Temperance sentiments of the country.

Mr. Hill finds that the impression is widely prevalent that compensation to publicans is part of Lord Peel's scheme. This has caused much heart-burning amongst temperance people. Mr. Hill tries to reassure his anxious friends by selecting a good story :—

A certain retired Indian colonel had a gamekeeper who was wont to greet the report of any misfortune with the stock phrase: "It micht be waur" (It might be worse). One day his master laid a trap for the optimist. "Do you know, Sandy, I dreamed last night that you were dead" — and solemnly—"gone to the bad place?" "It micht be waur" came the never-failing response. "What," exclaimed the colonel, "could be worse than that?" "It micht have been true," retorted Sandy with a twinkle.

That is just where this supposition resembles the colonel's dream: it is not true. The solution of the problem suggested by Lord Peel is, where it is deemed desirable to withdraw a license from a holder, who has committed no fault, a notice of five years should be given as a mere matter of grace, and should he be removed sooner, compensation to be calculated on the basis of the number of years' notice lost; and this is the important part, the funds to meet this payment to be raised by a tax on those license holders who will benefit by the withdrawal.

Mr. Hill is an enthusiastic believer in the good that will follow on the carrying out of the Minority Report, and the Board may be congratulated on securing the services of so able and conscientious a Secretary.

MISS HELEN THORNYCROFT, the well-known artist, comes of a highly distinguished family in the annals of art. She is the fourth daughter of the late Thomas and Mary Thornycroft, both of whom were able sculptors, her mother working for many years at Windsor for the late Queen Victoria. She has two brothers, the elder of whom is an engineer, while the younger is the eminent sculptor, Mr. Hamo Thornycroft. From her earliest years she has been devoted to art; her first work, a piece of sculpture, being exhibited when she was only thirteen years old, and exciting a good deal of attention. She received her art education at the Royal Academy Schools, and worked for the first few years at sculpture, afterwards turning her attention to the brush, and using water colours as her medium.

Digitized by Google

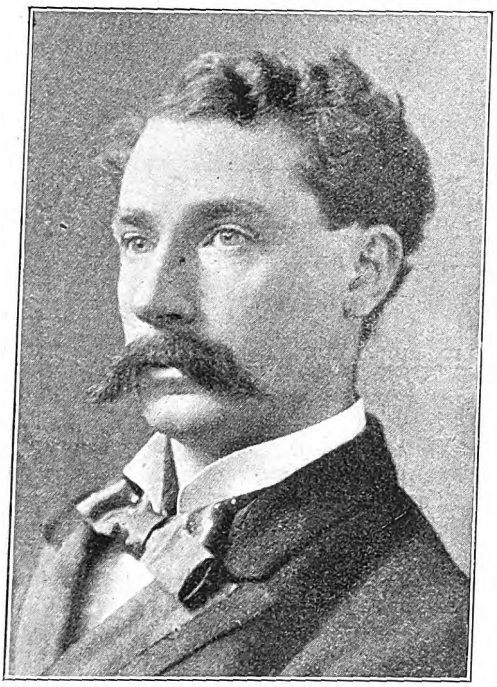
Miss Thornycroft's special penchant seems to be painting orchids and quaint tangled old gardens, and some very beautiful pictures on these subjects may be seen on the walls of her charming studio in Kensington—that delightfully artistic world of artists—but she herself owns to having an equal love for snow scenes in picturesque parts of Western and Northern England.

She occasionally holds an exhibition in her studio, and these are always thronged by members of the profession and art-loving amateurs, for her works, whether they be flowers, snow scenes or delicious bits of Cornish scenery, are of the most delicate and dainty description. Each is a gem in its way, and bears the closest and most minute inspection. Miss Thornycroft exhibits nearly every year at the Royal Academy and other galleries at home and abroad, and is a most prolific and rapid worker.

Several weeks of each year she spends at her pretty place, Yew Tree Cottage, near Monmouth, where she finds much in the surrounding scenery to harmonise with her own feelings and furnish her with material for work. To her artistic tastes she also adds the love of music, and occupies some of her leisure hours with the violin, this being her favourite instrument. A pleasant companion and a true friend, Miss Thornycroft has a host of admirers and friends.

NOWADAYS, when the almost universal aim in literature seems to be merely to amuse, it is of peculiar interest to turn to the contemplation of such a writer as Mr. Coulson Kernahan, the author of "A Dead Man's Diary." It is now some eleven years since Mr. Kernahan penned this his first work under a veil of anonymity, a veil which was destined to be rudely flung aside by the hand of a would-be literary-spoiler.



MR. COULSON KERNAHAN,
Author of "The Child, the Wise Man, and the Devil."
Photo by Russell & Sons, 17, Baker Street, W.

Under the impression that the book was of American origin, and unprotected by the English copyright laws, a certain writer claimed the authorship, and on the strength of the assumption, caused an MS. of his own to be accepted and published, containing in the preface the false statement that the author was also author of "A Dead Man's Diary." The Courts granted Mr. Kernahan's publishers an injunction, and ordered the entire edition of the work to be destroyed.

Since that eventful occasion, Mr. Kernahan has written a succession of books of an uncommonly original cast, the widest circulation being attained by "The Child, the Wise Man, and the Devil," of which a quarter of a million copies have been sold, and which has been translated into nearly every language in Europe. Among his other best known works are, "A Book of Strange Sins;" "A Literary Gent," in which the corroding influence of alcohol in modern life is powerfully realised; and "God and the Ant," which also enjoyed wide popularity.

Digitized by Google

There can be no doubt that these beautifully written works are calculated to arouse serious reflections in the minds of readers upon the vital problems of life, and that in stirring up the moral and intellectual lethargy of the times they have done a great deal of good.

It is given to few writers to attain widespread popularity in their own lifetime and at the same time to appeal to the most cultured literary taste, yet this is what Mr. Kernahan has done. Lovers of good literature have a feast of good things in Mr. Kernahan's essays, gathered together under the title of "Sorrow and Song," which, though in the form of prose, frequently display the attributes of true poetry. Personally Mr. Kernahan is one of the kindest and most lovable of men, one of those, unhappily, too rare characters who find delight in looking for good in their fellow-men, and cherish it as a treasure when found—the very reverse of the nil admirari idea cynically advocated as the short cut to content in this world. As reader to a great publishing firm it has been his pleasant duty to extend a helping hand to many struggling young writers, some of whom, for instance, Guy Boothby, have attained considerable eminence.

THE ONLOOKER

THE LIGHT ON THE DEEP.

With nothing but waves to seaward
And the grim rocks toward the land,
The roll of the black clouds over,
And the breakers on every hand:
The night comes down on the ocean,
And we climb the winding stair
To see that our lights are piercing
The thick'ning, foggy air.

Alone on a rock in the desert
Of tumbling and tossing tide;
The nation's outer signal
To wanderers far and wide.
Alone, and we wonder dimly
If the foghorn reaches the shore
Or pierces the outer stretches
That tumble and toss evermore.

Perchance in the little village
Some fisherwife wakes in fright,
And peers from her smoky window
To see if we're shining bright,
Or out on the tossing billows
A helmsman watches our light,
A thousand souls in his keeping
As they rush through the pathless night.

J. O. Swift.

Digitized by Google

CLEARING THE FOREST LAND—THE WOMEN ARE EMPLOYED IN THE HARDEST MANUAL LABOUR, AS WELL AS THE MEN.

The Land of Many Waters.

FINLAND, THE COUNTRY OF LEGENDARY CHARM.

By EDGCUMBE STALEY.

IN the charm which is peculiarly her own, Finland, "the land of many waters," has no rival. Wearing her ermine mantle of snow, as she does, seven months or more each year, her rolling uplands and her forests display her charms reflected in the icy mirrors of her lakes. From gable, thatch, and tree depend opalescent icicles. Her rapids and her cateracts are dreams of fairyland in white. The winter storms expend their fury upon the rock-bound coast. If the deadly blizzard tears away the giants of the forests, it clothes its course with a shroud of purest crystal. The cold is keen, but it is healthy and it is clean. Above all, the great horizon, with its dazzling Northern Light, gives hope and verve to life and work.

The brief summer is summer indeed; the flowers spring, as by magic, right out of the melting snow, and, with one ecstatic bound, perfume the air and brighten the smiling landscape.

The tumbling waters, no longer spell-bound, project spray-screens whereon the brilliant sunshine paints the rainbows. The greenery of the trees and the rich fruit blossoms have to hurry along in the year's march for ingatherings, and autumnal tints and gold quickly work a transformation. Sowing time and harvest-home are linked together in close embrace. Whichever way you look, charming vistas and glorious panoramas greet your eyes. Sturdy pine-trees decked with Nature's dew-diamonds jostle silver birches and red-gemmed willows.

Digitized by Google

The greenest of green moss spreads a soft carpet under your feet. Bees, and birds, and creeping things are as merry and as busy as the day is bright and long. The fruitful valleys are interspersed by waterways of every kind and sort—lakes, rivers, and canals.

Physically the Finlanders are tall, well-developed, and vigorous. If their faces lack some of the vivacity and contour of the features of the sunnier south, they are marked by intelligence and determination. In the extreme north there is quite an extraordinary absence of hirsute adornment among the men; possibly this is due to their diet, in which meat and vegetables rarely figure. The women, also—that is the poorer class—have little time to spare for feminine elegancies; they have to toil, day in, day out, with the men, manning boats, doing forest work, tending cattle and horses, and even making bricks.

The children, if somewhat staid and undemonstrative, are winsome in their archness and their love of home.

The Finns originally came from the Altai mountains, and took possession of the country early in the seventh century. The Mongolian type—thick lips, projecting cheek bones, and slit-like eyes—is still clearly seen in the north-eastern province. The language, too, spoken by the poorer classes has a similar origin: it is Ural-Altaic—an unique tongue, soft and sonorous, and not unlike Italian.

The people of the South-Western provinces are mostly of Swedish descent, and, along with Scandinavian characteristics, speak the language of Sweden. This is markedly the case in the towns, and especially in Helsingfors, the capital. The upper classes are distinctly Swedish in their sentiments and ambitions.

A BEAUTIFUL LAKE IN THE "LAND OF MANY WATERS.

Though Finland is in many respects one of the most civilised of European countries, the people cling very tenaciously to their ancient customs. Land tenure and land service in Finland present many interesting features, and the more salient points are actual survivals of feudal times.

The class of peasants, which we may call "labourer-farmers," consists of men who receive no wages. They occupy buildings belonging to the landowner,

Digitized by Google

A FINNISH WAKE.

which they have to keep in repair. The landowner makes them grants of seed and other things, and assigns them certain lands, which they may cultivate for their own benefit.

They have free access to the forests for timber and for fuel. On holdings where there is clay, the "labourer-farmers" are allowed to make bricks, paying the landowner so much per cent. upon sales. In return these peasants have to do work for the landowner, with their families, and with their cattle.

Many of these men are really quite well off; and, whilst they retain their status as "labourer-farmers," their sons, and their daughters too, are sent to the best schools, and enter Government and commercial employments.

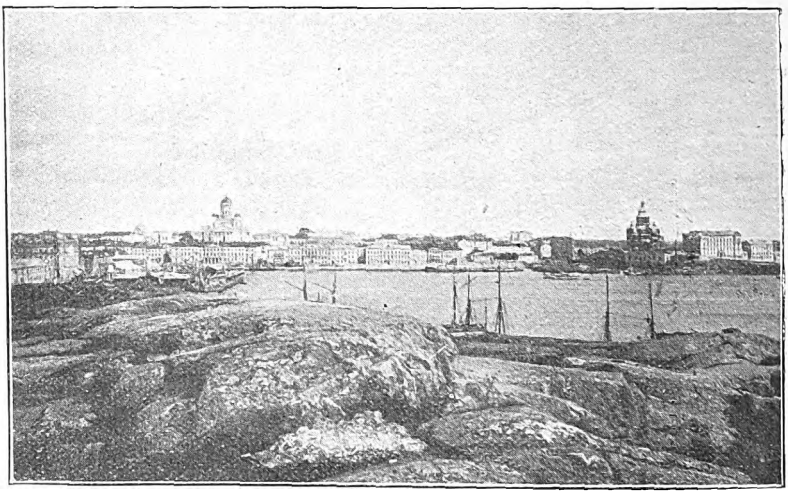
The breeding of cattle and horses is much encouraged by the Government, which offers premiums, and this practice has had a very stimulating effect on stock-raising. The country roads are good, and are traversed in summer time by light post carriages; whilst the unrivalled facilities for water transit are also in full operation.

Fish abounds, especially trout and crayfish, of large size, and fresh-water, pearl-bearing, dark grey oysters. The commonest game birds are the gelinotte or hazel-

"PETER AND TOMMY."
Types of Young Finland in the Far North-East.

Digitized by Google

grouse, the capercailzie, and the black-cock. But if the sportsman requires prey more worthy of his prowess, he may enjoy the excitement of a bear hunt in the far north, while wolves and other wild creatures abound also.



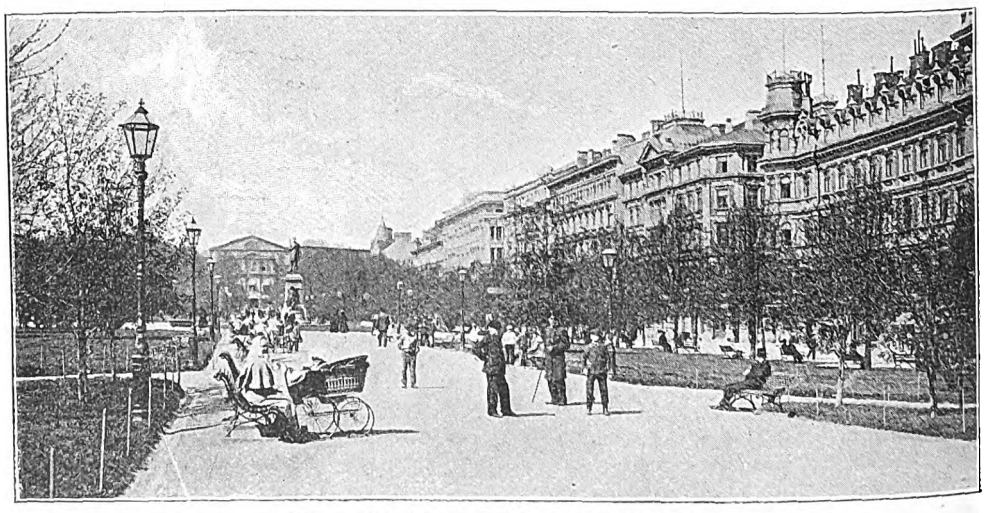
THE HARBOUR, HELSINGFORS.

The countryman's diet consists chiefly of talkkuma, a hard sort of porridge made of oatmeal and rye, and carried in birch-bark knapsacks. In the houses are thin black-bread cakes, with holes in the centre, through which long poles are run, and then slung from the ceiling. The favourite beverage of all classes is coffee, and corn-brandy, distilled from fresh grain, is also popular.

In England many time-honoured celebrations have been allowed to fall into disuse, until Christmas is now the only festival kept with much enthusiasm among us. But by the Finlanders, inspired with the vivid imagination of the North to whom life is full of poetry, no such indifference is displayed, and the various seasons of the year are marked by many quaint observances in which the people indulge with a whole-heartedness reminiscent of the gay frolics of our own forefathers.

Midsummer Day is a festival of universal observance throughout Finland. Birch trees are placed at all doors, and twigs of birch are stuck upon the ceilings and walls of the rooms. The sun sets, in the eve, at eleven o'clock, and rises, in the day, at two. During these hours the young people and children light big fires on every elevated place, and enjoy themselves with dancing and singing during the short light night. These fires are known by the name of Kokko.

Rye harvest is a very important event. On the day fixed for cutting the crop the



THE RUNIBERG ESPLANADE, HELSINGFORS.

Digitized by Google

"labourer-farmers" foregather with their wives and children at the mansion of the landowner. They are divided into squads—one man, two women, and three or four children—and to each is assigned a certain area of operations. The man cuts, the women shock, and the children glean up and down. They work from four in the morning until eight at night, with intervals for breakfast and dinner. These substantial meals are provided by the landowner, and are served at long tables in front of the mansion.

The rye crop, which furnishes the Finns with their staff of life, does not dry in ordinary seasons in the open. It is therefore carried into Rias, or barns, and laid upon racks and rafters.

Fires are kindled in each corner, and the smoke is allowed to permeate the crop; this imparts a peculiar flavour, which is much esteemed. After supper, on their harvest days all indulge in games and dances and songs, until nearly midnight. These songs are traditional, and are from the Kalewala—an ancient Epic poem. They have been collected by Dr. Topelius and Dr. Löunrot, and are remarkable for vigour and tunefulness.

A river trip in Finland is one of the most delightful experiences imaginable. Light boats—too frail they look—are manned by sturdy fellows, in red cotton shirts and slouched felt hats. With leathern boots, reaching high up the thighs, and the everlasting cigarette between their teeth, they push off into the rapid stream.

OYSTER FISHING ON LAKE SAIMAN.

The oarsmen dash showers of brilliant spray over you as the helmsman deftly steers his craft amid sharp rocks and smooth water-covered boulders. Many a bump and squeeze you have as you struggle through the cataract, waving your hand, as you are whirled along, to white-kerchiefed women knitting or labouring on the banks, while barefooted children toss up their woollen caps into the air and shrilly hail the adventurous voyager.

There are, all over the country, many splendid cascades and waterfalls. Imatra, which has the greatest body of water of any European cataract, is 875 metres long, but so narrow that a stone can very easily be thrown from side to side.

But in the winter all such pursuits and sights are changed. The real social life of the country begins when the ground is feet deep in alabaster snow and the waterways are transparent ice. There is animation on all sides, and it is quite delightful to watch the children rushing off to the schools on skates and ski. The merry bells of sleighs mingle music with the crisp cries of wayfarers. School and church and hospitable homestead are thronged with all and sundry kinds of folk.

Forest work has ceased, the harvest is gathered in, and, the short day over, young and old collect in the long winter rooms which are attached to every farmhouse. There they spin and weave, they romp and sing, they read, they smoke and chatter; while the young people make love, and play till sleep overtakes them.

Digitized by Google

In Finland, as in most countries, Christmas is the greatest festival of the year. Long before Christmas-eve the shops are crowded with people buying klapps or gifts. Every house has its Christmas-tree. On Christmas-eve each house and cottage exhibits a burning candle, the peasants' dwellings are littered with fresh straw, whilst the cattle in the stable have extra supplies of food.

A standing Christmas dish is lutfisk—dried cod, soaked in brine and boiled to a jelly. This is eaten with a sort of pease-pudding; smoked roast pork, and rice-pudding full of almonds, and plum tarts with clotted cream have, too, their places. Should your helping of rice-pudding yield you an almond, it is a sign that you will be married before the next Christmas-day comes round!

The Christmas "Buck" visits every house, dressed like an old man, with a long white beard; he drives his team of reindeer over mountains, lakes, church-spires and housetops. He enters the family circle, and enquires whether the children have been good or bad. Then he throws down his klapps, and resumes his journey.

On Twelfth Night the "Star Boys" make their appearance—five young men in fancy dress. Three represent the Holy Three Kings, one is King Herod, and the fifth is a goat with hoofs and horns! They enact a play, which has for its dénouement the death of Herod—for his crime of seeking to put Christ to death. The goat has reference to Christ's birth in a stable. As they go they carry a brilliant star and collect alms for poor folks who have had no Christmas cheer.

At mid-Lent a fish called laké is eaten, boiled in milk. This is a fresh-water fish, which is caught in nets sunk through holes bored in the ice of the lake and rivers.

THE CATARACT OF IMATRA, THE GREATEST WATERFALL IN EUROPE.

Blinés, too—large thick pancakes—are prepared, and are eaten with butter, sour cream and caviar.

At Easter another very popular dish is served—mêmma—the principal ingredients of which are malt and syrup. This is made into a sort of dough of a brownish color. After being boiled, it is put to stiffen in a box or case, made of birch-bark. With it is taken fine sugar and thick cream.

The First of May is an ancient festival of general observance, especially by the students, who meet in one of the public parks and sing old songs to the spirit of Spring—though it often happens that the ground is still covered deep in snow, and winter has not yet loosened his hold. The traditional drink on May-day is mead, whilst a sort of pastry, called struvor, is in great request.

Very numerous are the legends and traditions of the Finlanders. The very word "Finn" means wizard. Among presiding Genii the most famous are:—Ukko, the Spirit of the Air; Tapio, the Spirit of the Forest; and Ahté, the Spirit of the Lake. Frogs and swallows are regarded by country-folk as sacred; the former was once a man—Adam; the latter, a woman—Eve! The Mountain Ash, too, is sacred; its ashes, after burning, are carefully preserved, for, in strewing them about, luck, or the reverse, is said to be indicated!

Digitized by Google

The most cherished refreshment of the Finns is the bath. Every house, however small or poor, has its bath-house. Here they find their dearest evening pleasure in health, and their unfailing remedy in sickness. "If Bath and Brandy fail, then comes Death," is a common saying!

Within the houses are ovens built of rough flat stones; these are highly heated. When the fire has burnt itself out, and the smoke has escaped, several buckets of ice-cold water are thrown upon the embers. Dense clouds of steam arise, and in them the bathers, of both sexes and all ages, lie upon wooden shelves arranged at various heights above the floor. Then the whole body is switched all over with small bundles of birch twigs, veritable birch rods! A thorough shampoo with soap is followed by sousings of cold water, which are administered as the bather leaves the bath. In winter time a plunge into deep snow is substituted. The bathers then seat themselves in a row to rest and to cool, upon wooden benches in the open air. It is an extraordinary sight for the traveller who chances upon a farmstead in the evening, but the virtuous Finns respect the rule "Honi soit qui mal y pense."

During harvest and threshing-time, the baths are frequented every evening, but in the winter, the "Saturday-night tub" is considered sufficient.

In one respect, at least, Finland is far ahead of Great Britain. In every hamlet, generally at the Post Office or the Store, there is telephonic communication with the nearest considerable town—sometimes this is nearly a hundred miles away! For the modest sum of £5 any householder is supplied by the Government with the necessary apparatus.

One of the most important towns is Abo. Here the first crusaders landed; here the first Christians were baptised; here the first church was built; here began the lines of famous bishops, warriors, statesmen, scholars, and poets. From 1157 to 1827 Abo was the great eyewitness to the history of the country; it is still the traditional centre of Finland. Under Swedish rule Abo was the capital, but the Russians removed the seat of government to Helsingfors—the present metropolis. The city, founded in 1550, is beautifully situated, and contains many splendid buildings. It has a population of nearly 100,000.

The Russianising of the Grand Duchy is proceeding apace. In 1872 Russian was established as the official language, and the rule of the Governors, sent by the White Tsar, has become more and more subversive of Finnish laws, liberties, and customs. Russian officials fill most of the public posts. Russian troops have lately been introduced into the country, whilst the Finnish Guard has been ordered to distant parts of Russia.

The freedom of speech and of public meeting have been greatly curtailed. The powers of the Seim or local Parliament, have been restricted. The administration of law and order has been taken out of the hands of Finnish magistrates. Appeals, earnest and reiterated, have failed to gain any attention.

A feeling of disquietude and of resentment is creeping rapidly over the people. The peaceful, harmless Finlander is becoming sullen and unhappy. A recent letter received by the writer of this article from a Finnish gentleman of good position, concluded as follows:—"We don't at all expect any improvement in our position during the reign of the present Tsar; he seems to be absolutely unable to take a reasonable resolution in any way. The state of things has never been so sad . . . Still we hope there will be a change, but when we don't know. What changes have taken place are very significant, and the resistance, though not violent, is very strong and active."

Among no people is national sentiment stronger and healthier, and the attempt of Russia to crush out the life of this once free people, and reduce the country to the condition of a second Poland is a crime which it is to be hoped will be averted.

EDGCUMBE STALEY.

Digitized by Google

THE SCOTCH EXPRESS.*

By MRS. WALFORD.

THERE were three of them, and they had written beforehand to secure three corner seats in a third class corridor compartment of the Scotch express, which, luck befriending them, they had to themselves as far as Preston.

"Knew it was the tip to go by this line," quoth George, with a knowing chuckle, whereat his companions chuckled back and thought what a fine fellow they had got for a George and how splendid a thing it was to belong to him.

At Preston they got out and lunched, and anyone who had the felicity of knowing Mr. George Triggs and his jolly little wife and jollier still little sister, may be sure they "did" themselves handsomely in this respect, and returned with satisfied, shining countenances to the compartment which by this time they had come to look upon as their own.

They had indeed littered it freely, and the ladies had taken off their hats, while Mr. Triggs stretched his full length on the opposite seat preparatory to a snooze, when "Confound it all!" mutters he, staring angrily round, for a porter, stupid ass! has opened the door and is looking interrogatively within. "This carriage is engaged," said Mr. Triggs, loftily.

But the porter looks over his shoulder, and behind him stands the guard.

"Tickets, please." They have only three tickets. "Can't engage a compartment for three tickets. Train's full," observed the guard, curtly. "Get in here, ma'am," and, despite the reluctance with which the knickerbockered legs are withdrawn from their resting-place, and the united scowls of the trio, two other passengers are almost flung in upon them, for the Scotch express has no time to waste, and its guard no temper to lose in bandying words, during the early days of August.

A whistle and the train is off. The intruders have scarcely seated themselves, scanty space being accorded them to do so; and it is as well they have brought no paraphernalia, nothing beyond a small handbag which the lady places upon her knee, and a doll which the child who nestles beside her hugs in her arms, for not an inch of room beyond what is absolutely required do they get. Mr. and Miss Triggs overhaul the new-comers disdainfully. A tiresome woman with a still more tiresome child. How odious, how disgusting! Couldn't they have got in anywhere else? There must be compartments with other children in them. Under pretence of altering the window blind, Mrs. Triggs murmurs a suggestion to her husband:

"Why shouldn't he go along the passage and find out?"

"No good," mutters he, audibly. "Didn't you hear the beastly place was full?"

Whereupon she subsides, as he does, with sullen resignation and scornful looks. There are still many hours of this forced companionship before them, and it is one of the hottest days of the year. All the elation with which they had set out seems to have evanesced, for how can they be free and jolly, joke and laugh, and play their game of three-handed cribbage, over which they have been enjoying themselves hugely so far, with this marplot sitting by?

"Great Scott! Why should we mind her though?" Suddenly Mr. Triggs brisks up to make the above reflection. "After all she's doing us no harm, though she is a nuisance."

He glances round. "She" has opened a book and is quietly reading. The child

* Copyright strictly reserved.

Digitized by Google

with round, amazed eyes, is solemnly inspecting everybody by turn.

If the mother, for she is certainly the mother, had been a pretty, fresh-faced, smiling creature, and, above all, if she had come without "the kid," Mr. George tells himself, he would have "done the civil," for he is all for making himself agreeable to the ladies, even when they inconvenience him and defraud him, as in the present instance. Possibly he would have gone further if properly responded to, and proposed turning their "three" game into a "four" one—but as it is he shrugs his shoulders. There is nothing attractive, certainly nothing responsive in the shrinking figure, with the grave, composed countenance, and eyes fixed steadily on the pages of an uninteresting volume. She is not good-looking according to his idea. No dash, no style about her. Widow, of course. Black and all that. No fun to be got out of such a party, and beastly hard luck it is that she should be there to choke up the carriage, and impose a restraint. "No, hang it; she shan't do that!" he suddenly resolves.

"I say, get out the cribbage," he commands aloud.

Of course the ladies are delighted. Their tongues are unloosed as if by magic, the improvised board is brought forth, the cards are dealt, the pegs in their places. The little girl watches it all entranced. The mother never looks round; seems to see nothing and hear nothing. By-and-bye they forget her presence altogether. George's laugh resounds quite unrestrainedly. He claims a "fifteen two" from his sister and battles for it, she contending with equal ease and warmth.

Mrs. George says "Sh—sh!" glancing towards their fellow-passengers.

But, "Oh, come, never mind her. Let's be jolly," cries the husband, in a would-be aside.

He is winning, and his fat face glistens with triumph and merriment. After all, he is having a good time, and what a glorious day it is, and what a rate they are spinning along at. He does not mind the heat. It is nothing to the heat of their office, he avers.

He does not notice that the little girl has sunk back upon the cushions, having lost all interest in the game, and that her mother is bending over her, murmuring in her ear. Mrs. George does, however.

"Good gracious! I hope that nasty child is not going to be sick!"

"What?" cries George, startled, and, without hesitation, he wheels round—for hitherto his back has been well turned on the interlopers—and takes observations for himself.

Obviously there is discomfiture in the rival camp. The pale lady has flushed up and looks disturbed and anxious. The child leaning heavily against her is, on the other hand, as white as a sheet, and languidly indifferent to everything and everyone.

For the first time the mother turns an inquiring, almost an appealing eye upon her fellow-travellers—upon two of them at least, the two who are seated facing the engine. She and her little girl have back seats, and we all know what that means to some people. So far no one has thought of it—but now? It is dreadful, but it is the only hope for Dorothy. Dorothy's mother must ask those people. She does it with an effort only known to herself. "My little daughter is feeling the motion. It is very unfortunate, but if—if——" The speaker stammers painfully. They can see, anyone can see, what she wants, but no one is in a hurry to help her out.

"The child feeling sick, is she? Oh, well, you can change with her, Carrie." Mrs. George Triggs has a sharp, high-pitched voice and calls a spade a spade, even when not as now annoyed, and only conceding in dread of a catastrophe. "Take care, don't upset the board, Clumsy," she subjoins, as the other, not too willingly, makes as if to obey.

It is all that Dorothy's mother can do to thank them, they look such daggers at her and her offspring.

And Dorothy does not want to move. Humps a pettish shoulder and says: "No, let me alone," in the unmistakable accents of a spoilt child.

"You will be all right if you sit on that side, dear."

Shame to say, the three who look on are almost pleased with the distress and perplexity and fruitless efforts of their luckless fellow-passengers. They have conceived a dislike to the mother apart from the grievance of her intrusion. She has sat so immovable hitherto, never looking round nor taking any interest in their games and their jokes; and now she must needs disturb everybody, in the very middle of a deal, too, because of her tiresome brat.

Digitized by Google

"I should take her out into the passage," says Mrs. Triggs shortly.

The words have barely crossed her lips ere Dorothy flies through the open door.

Never so long as she lives will Dorothy's mother forget the laugh which followed. She rose hastily. She felt as if she could never return to her seat again.

. . . . .

"I can't tell you how grateful we are."

Many hours have passed, and the train is now speeding its way through beautiful Scottish moorlands, which the setting sun still lights up on every side, though it is past eight o'clock ere a halt is made at a small wayside station.

"I am so glad we met you," continued the speaker, "and that you should be getting out here, too. You see, Dorothy calls you her friend. Dorothy's friend must come home with Dorothy," and Mr. Triggs and party would have stared had they beheld the charming smile by which the words were accompanied.

Their recipient did not stare, he only blushed very shyly and deeply, as lads of seventeen, sensitive to kindness, more particularly feminine kindness, do blush at times.

Then he tried to speak, finding it equally hard to find something to say, and when found, to say it.

"But I couldn't, that is to say, I can't. I mean I couldn't you know."

"Oh, yes, I think you can," said the lady, smiling.

"A-course you can," nodded Dorothy, frowning. She had hold of his hand and was not going to let it go.

The last four hours had been to her a species of Elysium. Ashamed and disgraced she had fled from the presence of her tormentors, for, child as she was, she had perceived in what light they regarded her sufferings, and resented the grudging reluctance, almost worse than a refusal, accorded to her mother's appeal. Her heart swelling with mortification and amazement, and her eyes blinded by a burst of tears, she had heard the cruel laugh which mocked her retreating steps, and, strange to say, it had acted like a tonic. What with indignation, tears, and the blast of fresh air in the passage, giddiness and nausea, where were they? Gone. But where was Dorothy? Literally sobbing her heart out in the arms of a lanky lad, an utter stranger, who had been looking out of the passage window, and against whom she had stumbled in her headlong flight. She would have fallen but that he caught her.

"What's the matter?" said he. "Don't cry, little girl. Poor little girl, don't cry." Then he stroked her hair, and patted her shoulder, and saw nothing of another figure in the passage, who checked her impulse to interfere, and held back, watching.

"Agustin' people," sobbed Dorothy.

"Poor little girl," said the lad again. He had the gentlest voice imaginable, and he took out his own pocket-handkerchief and tenderly wiped away the fast raining tears as they fell.

"'Em laughed at me," whispered the offended little one, catching her breath between each word. "'Em did—oh, oh, oh!"

"Did they? Well, never mind. See how nice it is out here," and, with instinctive tact, he created diversion for her thoughts. "It is quite cool here, and you are so hot," holding a small swollen hand into the current of air. "Isn't that nice?"

"Ess, you're kind, aren't you?" smiles breaking out again. "Where's my muvver?" said Dorothy, suddenly looking round.

She was apparently gazing from a window a few feet off.

"That's her," said Dorothy, contentedly. All was right now, she thought.

"Shall I take you to her?" suggested her new friend.

Dorothy looked at him; her cheeks were still glazed with tears, but the blue eyes shone, and all the friendliness of a sociable little soul was at work. "Rather stay with you," said she; and then, glancing suggestively towards some portmanteaux piled in the passage: "Won't you take me on your knee?"

And fast asleep upon his knee, with her fair curls streaming over his shoulder, and his long arms firmly clasped round her, Dorothy's mother presently found her. She was not a very quick-witted woman, but maternal instinct had guided her under the present circumstances. So she merely smiled and nodded at the schoolboy, and he understood that he might obey his little mistress's behest. At the end of half-an-hour, however, being really unable any longer to stand, and yet dreading beyond everything to go back to her seat, the young lady—for she was still a young lady, whatever George Triggs might have thought—stole along the passage. Oh, dear what was this? An empty compartment, right opposite to where the piled portmanteaux made a seat for Dorothy and her friend.

Digitized by Google

"Is this where you are sitting?" whispered the lady, softly.

He motioned assent.

"And no one else?"

"They got out at Carlisle."

"And may—oh, may we came in?" It was the gate of Paradise opening.

"Only I don't like to disturb her," said the lad, looking down at his charge as he spoke. "She's sleeping so beautifully."

Between them, however, they lifted the little slumberer on to the seat, and laid her down with her head upon a pillow of soft plaid. There she slept on, and her two guardians talked and talked. Long before they had reached the point at which we took them up, when the train was approaching its destination for each alike, Dorothy's mother had learnt all about Dorothy's friend, and he had wondered at himself for being so ready to tell; usually he was reserved with strangers.

But there was no resisting the sweet face and winning manner. She learnt that he was alone in the world, and, albeit so young, earning his own livelihood. He had got his holiday—a fortnight's holiday—and he thought he would like to come to Scotland—was fond of fishing; a friend had said there was fishing to be had at a certain place, and given the address; he fumbled in his pocket and brought it out.

"Really? That is where I am going too," said the lady, laughing outright. And then and there a thought arose, which presently was put into words.

"You must, indeed; you must come home with us, with Dorothy and me," she said.

"Home?" The lonely boy's eyes emitted one eager flash; then he drew back, timid and blushing, murmuring he knew not what.

"We can give you better fishing than what you could get at the hotel," said the lady, gaily.

"I wasn't thinking of going to the hotel. I thought perhaps I could get a room at a cottage somewhere," he replied. Hotel bills were not for his modest purse.

"So you can with us, with my husband and me. He will meet us at the station, and invite you. He always asks anyone I ask. Highland hospitality, you know."

"You are—you are most awfully kind. But—but I should take up the room." In his mind's eye he saw a minute shooting-lodge, already brimming over; in hers—but no matter.

She was more and more pleased with him every moment. He was so gentle, so truthful, so unassuming; and absolutely ignorant as he was, he had rendered her such a service. She stuck to her point, and at length prevailed.

"We had got in with such very objectionable people," she had just begun to confide, when suddenly the burly form of Mr. George Triggs darkened the doorway. ("I'll look along and see where she has found a roost," he had told his companions, having lain low until now. "And I suppose I had better take her bag to her, eh?")

Accordingly the bag was now tendered, with a "Hope the little gurl's all right?" in Mr. Triggs's most supercilious and impressive drawl.

He was a little startled, however, by its reception. The lady who had just got as far as "objectionable people" turned in her seat, dropped her eyelashes over her cheeks, and slowly raised her chin. Her "Thank you" was haughtiness itself.

"Offended, by Jove!" muttered he to himself; but he retreated somewhat hastily, with a curious sense of discomfiture. He threw himself half out of the window, whistling, for the train was slowing to a standstill, and presently he called his women to look out. "I say—that's the Duke of Thingumtight's—that big place up there. The guard says so, and that's one of his carriages waiting. There must be some of them in the train. Let's see them get out," and he turned the handle of the door, and was out on the platform in an instant, Mrs. and Miss Triggs following.

"Would you allow us to pass, please?" A voice from behind.

"Oh, certainly," said George. ("She's getting out here, is she?") And then he nearly had a fit upon the spot. He could never talk about it afterwards. And he never saw exactly what happened—but all in a moment there was a small hubbub on the spot.

Digitized by Google

A powdered footman had seized his lady's bag—how well George knew the bag!—a French maid was chattering and gesticulating wildly apologetic and explanatory; Dorothy still firmly holding by her new friend's hand, was endeavouring to present him to a stalwart young Highlander in full costume—"A swell of swells," muttered the wretched Cockney, biting his lips, while this same great good-humoured fellow, laughing and kissing his wife (the widow!) demanded energetically, and without paying the slightest attention to anyone else, where in the name of wonder she had hidden herself? He had been up and down the platform and could find her nowhere.

"We had to get in where we could, Carlo; we were landed among such dreadful, dreadful people." (They heard her say it, distinctly heard her, though she, to do her justice, knew not they were so near.)

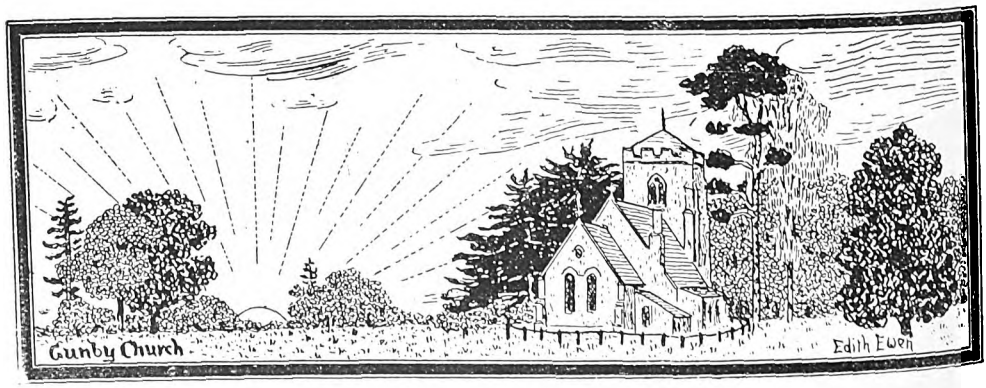
"It was all a muddle," continued the speaker, eagerly. "Hortense got separated from Dorothy and me; and we, all by ourselves, were—oh, never mind. But—oh yes, of course"—her eye fell on the stranger lad. "Mr. James Stephens, Carlo. He is coming to stop with us. Your father will give him some fishing." A whisper in his ear.

The next minute Lord Charles was shaking the boy's hand heartily. "Where are your traps? Just point them out, will you? And he"—indicating the returning footman, "will send them up with ours. You come along with us," linking on to his arm. "My wife says you made friends on the way." And this, too, was plainly audible to the miserable Triggs trio. Oh; had they only "made friends on the way" also!

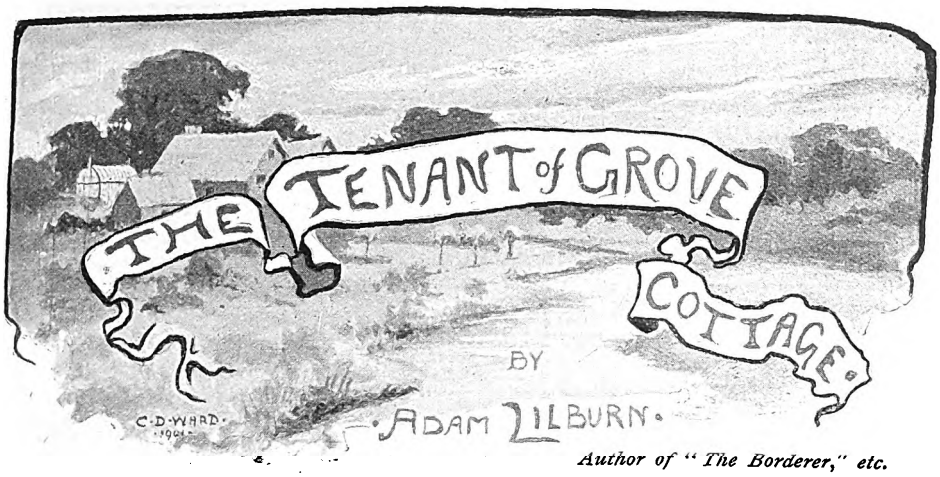
Nor did their punishment end here. A week later all the world within hail was assembled to witness a Highland gathering on the outskirts of the town where the party had found quarters. They did all they could. They turned out in plaids and scarves, and white heather; strutted hither and thither wherever they could get, and looked longingly at the coaches and unapproachable grandees—but they felt themselves mean and small, and almost wished they had never come after one dreadful moment. It chanced that they passed the Duke's own special coach at the moment when a lank, red-haired lad was handing refreshments to a lady in black (but with a rosette of the clan tartan on her breast), and as they lingered, for even in torment they could not resist lingering, they saw His Grace himself lean down and—"And give him a plate of pie," quoth George. "Confound it!" and he pulled his deer-stalker over his eyes to shut out the sight.

"I never was played such a trick in my life," he muttered. But he did not see that it was he himself who had played the trick.

[THE END.]



Digitized by Google



Author of "The Borderer," etc.

Illustrated by CHAS. D. WARD.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Nora Shelley, Mr. Pattinson's young ward, walking out with her uncle from his country cottage one day, discovers the dead body of a stranger who has been stabbed in Dredman's Lane. The knife with which he was stabbed belongs to Mr. Pattinson himself. He explains that he used it to cut his shrubs with, and left it in a place where it might easily have been stolen. Suspicion falls upon the village ne'er-do-well, Jerry Gobey, who is found in possession of the dead man's purse. He is taken into custody. The murdered man is identified as Mr. John Carlton, of Carlton and Co., merchants, in London. At the trial affairs look black for the prisoner, but on the evidence of a fellow-loafer who spent the night with him he is acquitted. Herbert Carlton, the son of the murdered man, returns from Australia. Father and son had quarrelled, and before Herbert left England he had been reduced to complete destitution. A romantic adventure befell him which proved a turning point in his career, and when he got out to Australia he was very successful in the goldfields. On his arrival in England he learns from his father's confidential clerk that Mr. Carlton owed a large sum of money to a money-lender named Solomon Bembridge who has not made any claim since the death. Herbert goes down to Hawkstone, the scene of the tragedy, and there meets a college chum in the local doctor.

CHAPTER XV.

ON WENSLEY COMMON.

AWAITING the time appointed for his visit to the young doctor, Bertie Carlton found the hours drag heavily. He read until his eyes ached; smoked moodily, cogitating upon the situation; and harassed the landlord of his inn with questions until that silent man at length sought refuge in the stable.

Eventually the young man went for a long walk, and found himself on Wensley Common late in the afternoon.

Wensley Common is an elevated stretch of land about three miles distant from Hawkstone. Although within such easy reach of that and of three other villages, it is practically as lonely and destitute of inhabitants as though situate in the wilds of central Africa. Except upon Bank holidays, when myriads of gasping Londoners seek its breezy heights, it is possible to walk there for hours without meeting a single pedestrian.

Yet it is a charming place, one of those wild stretches of moorland that serve so pleasantly to relieve the tameness of southern scenery. Here and there its vast expanse of heather and ling is broken up by clumps of white-stemmed birches; pools reflect rounded hawthorns and bending willows; foxgloves rear their tall spikes amongst bushes of sweetbriar in every hollow; the great waving bracken is a billowy sea whenever the wind passes across it; and during the early part of the year the glory of the golden gorse makes sunshine there. The few scattered farm-houses and labourers' cottages visible from rising ground merely strike a pleasant note suggestive of humanity and healthy labour.

Digitized by Google

On Wensley Common is heard the first cuckoo cry of the season, and in due time this is followed by the nightingale's song, which, from the copses below the hill, thrills the dusk with melodious rapture.

It was too early in the day yet for the nightingale, but Bertie heard the cuckoo that evening in May as he sauntered along beneath a golden sunset, against which the dark firs stood out clear and sharp. After the dry air the young man had been accustomed to breathe in the arid plains of Western Australia, this cool spring freshness was delightful. He took off his hat and allowed the breeze to play around his heated brow.

What a beautiful world it was after all! And how pitiful it seemed that he was scarce able to enjoy its charm because of the wickedness of man. Oh, that he were but free to enjoy his youth, to live the natural life of an ordinary man, with no regrets for a past he had done his best to spoil, no hot desire for vengeance burning within him. For once he felt inclined to let everything go, and rejoice—as befitted his age—in his glorious prime.

As he stood dreaming, his back to the sunset, a girl approached him, wheeling her bicycle laboriously up the slope. She faced the golden light, and it appeared to him that there was something curiously familiar in the small trim figure in the grey cycling dress. Where had he seen that quick turn of the head before, that firm, decided step? It all seemed but a continuation of his day-dream, and he passed his hand across his eyes to convince himself that he was awake. He rather disliked than otherwise the modern type of girl; that reckless, abnormal creature who is the product of our advanced civilisation. Women seemed to him to have grown strangely masculine while he had been absent from his native land. He thought them self-assertive to the verge of rudeness. Fine animals, certainly! Oh, yes, he didn't deny that. But it seemed as though they had lost something essentially womanly. Was the gain in physique not counterbalanced by some subtle deterioration in moral fibre? For his part he preferred the old-fashioned type, the softer womanly creature.

To be sure, he didn't know any girls. And the one who retained a place in his memory was by no means of the flabby, languishing sort. Even though quite a child when he saw her last she had the appearance of one well able to take care of herself, and to enforce respect. And, considering how dangerously impulsive she had proved herself to be in the one instance he knew of, this was decidedly an advantage. He thought of her during the short space of time the cyclist took to climb up the steep slope, and then suddenly she raised her eyes and gave a start of recognition. He lifted his hat. She smiled, then coloured very becomingly.

"This is indeed a strange meeting," he said, "almost as strange as our last. But, tell me, am I too bold in alluding to that? Would you prefer to ignore that winter day?"

She flashed him a look half-humorous, half-shy. This well-dressed calm young man was very different to the wild and haggard wretch of that never-to-be-forgotten winter day. He caught her glance and smiled too.

"You are thinking that I wear a coat less threadbare and a cheek less haggard? Well, I owe it all to you. It was you who brought me good fortune. You were my good fairy, my mascotte."

"I'm ever so glad! But I don't believe you'd have done it; only cowards seek that way of escape. But you don't know how miserable I felt after. It was horrid to have to leave you and do nothing to help. If I'd only not been a girl. We are so stupidly hemmed in."

He smiled again as he noticed that her quick, eager manner of speaking had not altered in the least.

"You don't seem a day older," he cried. "You are just the same impulsive child who took pity on a despair she was incapable of fathoming."

"Oh, but indeed I'm changed! I wouldn't do a thing like that now; at least I—I think not. I'm older by four whole years, and surely I'm more proper, more conventional? But Uncle Dan is down on me for being swayed entirely by impulse, so I fear I'm much the same after all. I do wish I could stop to think before I speak."

"Don't wish anything so cruel. I'm glad you haven't altered. There are quite enough cold, calculating people in the world already. But you must be quite tired of holding that bicycle," he continued. 'Do let me take it from you, or, better still, I will rest it against the trunk of this tree and then you can sit down for a few minutes upon this mound. The grass is quite dry, for the dew has not begun to fall. I would like to explain how it was that your impulse on that day we met (which I'm sorry to find you now regret) proved so fortunate for me."

Digitized by Google

"THIS IS INDEED A STRANGE MEETING," HE SAID.

The girl hesitated, although that same impulsive disposition she so decried urged her to wait and to hear his story, for her interest was thoroughly aroused. She had never forgotten that one adventure of hers with a flavour of romance. And though she knew so little of him she could trust him. He was a gentleman, and would give her no cause to regret her unconventionality.

"Well, I don't mind resting a little," she said, seating herself on the grassy bank; while, after placing her machine in safety, he threw himself down beside her. "The fact is I'm only a half-hearted cyclist at best, and don't practise sufficiently to keep in condition. I find it a good way of getting quickly into the country, but not of enjoying nature when there. One can't botanise, you know, or stop every minute to listen to the birds. Half the charm of the world vanishes when one's tearing through it at such a speed. But now tell me. What happened to you after that cold miserable day when—when——"

"When a divine impulse thrust you, sweet little fairy that you were, between a wretched outcast and destruction!"

"Oh, that!" and she flushed hotly. "Please don't remind me of it again! It makes me feel so awkward."

"Why? Look here," and he held up his watch-chain with its small pendant coin. "You emptied your purse into my hand and I picked out two coins. I spent one on food. This was the other. I kept it for a mascotte, and it certainly proved one to me. Thousands of pounds wouldn't buy that sixpence."

A mischievous look flashed into her eyes. "Really? But don't you think you ought to return it? I might require it myself—for a collection, you know. At any rate, you don't require it now."

He laughed. "No, no. You shall not wile my luck penny from me. I'm an absolute miser over that sixpence."

Digitized by Google

On the whole she was relieved at this refusal. It would have been humiliating if he had shown an eagerness to return it.

"Do you remember that you gave me the address of your home at Chelsea, and told me that you lived there with your aunt? Well, the other day, after I had finished business in the City—the business which has hurried me back from the other side of the world—I rushed off to Chelsea, hoping to find and thank you for your kindness of four years ago. But I hadn't reckoned on the changes brought by time. The house was closed, and a board stated that it was to let. The grumpy old woman who lived there as caretaker either did not know, or refused to give me, any information about the former tenants. She thought she had heard that the old lady was dead, and that the young one had gone to live in the country. She'd forgotten where, if she ever knew. She was there to show the house, not to answer questions on other matters. I came away disappointed. All the years I was out of England I had cherished the hope that I would one day be able to look you in the face and tell you how I have fared."

He did not venture to tell her of the dreams he had cherished along with that hope. How she had stood to him for all that was best and sweetest in woman, and how his thoughts had been impelled towards, and crystallised around, her image, until he could conceive no future apart from her. The daring words rose to his lips, but he repressed them. It was too early as yet for such frankness.

"But even when my disappointment was keenest I felt convinced it would not last. I knew that sooner or later Fate meant to bring us together again. And just see how true my instinct was! My luck has followed me from the other side of the world. I've been exactly a week in my native land, and, behold!—brought here by some unpleasant business which I won't mention yet—I stumble upon the very place where you have hidden yourself. Is this the work of Providence or blind chance? What say you? For my part I prefer to consider it the former."

Nora did not answer. He was a very unconventional young man, and his serious manner, combined with the unusual circumstances attending their first meeting, rather alarmed her. It was all very well to accuse her of being too impulsive. There did not seem much reserve or prudence about him either. No doubt it was flattering to discover how well he had remembered even her mannerisms, but it was slightly embarrassing all the same.

He had very nice eyes. Nora thought she had never seen any she liked so well; they were so clear and bright a blue; but that was no reason why he should fix them upon her while he talked. Perhaps he didn't know it was rude to stare a person out of countenance. Well, then, it was a pity he hadn't a female relative to tell him so—a sister or a cousin. No, after all, she hoped he hadn't a cousin Cousins had such dangerous privileges; at least, so she was given to understand by girls who had them.

If this sort of thing went on, she must just take him in hand herself. The silence grew embarrassing.

"You ought to tell me all your subsequent adventures," she exclaimed, breaking in hurriedly. "You seem to forget that I'm a woman, and consequently curious."

"First I want to show how well I've remembered every moment of the time we were together," he replied. "So, if you'll allow me, I'll begin by recounting the history of a certain young man who, by stress of circumstances, had been driven to the last extremity, and was only just rescued from despair and—and a cold bath—by the frankly-displayed pity of a charming child!"

"Not quite a child! I hadn't that excuse, though young enough and foolish enough in all conscience. But I'd seen things, you know, and ought to have been more discreet; but I was allowed so much liberty—though I knew how to take care of myself too. Perhaps you don't believe me, though, about that?"

"About what?"

"About the taking care of myself. Nobody ever presumed upon my freedom, I can assure you!"

"Indeed, I find it quite easy to believe it," he returned, with a slight smile at her pretty display of dignity.

CHAPTER XVI.

BERTIE CARLTON'S STORY.

"I believe the approved fashion of story-tellers is to describe the scene before coming to the actors, so here goes. It was winter in town, one of the most severe on record—a hard, bitter winter that froze the birds upon the trees, the children upon their mother's breasts. A bad time to be out of employment, and to have to pass the nights below railway arches, or on seats on the Embankment. More than once the young man whose history I'm relating was driven to such extremity. I don't wish to excite your compassion for him on that score, because there was a good home waiting for him had it not been for his wicked pride; and, indeed, it was principally through his own obstinacy and presumption that he found himself in such a position. He was a conceited young idiot, and deserved pretty nearly all he got; but he had a bad time all the same. Our misfortunes seem worse when we recognise that it is our own fault we have them to endure. Well, be that as it may, he tramped the streets for weeks in search of occupation and found none. The streets of every great city are full of such. These same streets are neither paved with gold nor with good intentions. The latter are utilised elsewhere. But they are paved with thwarted ambitions, wrecked enthusiasms, broken hearts.

Digitized by Google

"My man found his college education rather a drawback than otherwise. He flaunted his degree to such purpose that it prevented those who might otherwise have offered him employment from doing so. Upon the strength of a few accepted articles he fondly imagined the world of journalism open to him. It did not take long for him to discover the fallacy of this belief. Fleet Street would none of him. The work he had to offer, and which appeared to him so good when compared to the ordinary stuff of a reporter, lacked the sparkle and up-to-dateness of that turned out by the young fellows who dominate the modern press. His very scholarship was against him, for the dust of Oriel clung to it, giving it an old-fashioned flavour unacceptable to the ordinary editor. Manner as well as matter told unfavourably. The superior 'Varsity air is intolerable to the clever Fleet Street men who have carved their way to fortune.

"Well, I won't dwell upon all that. Suffice it to say he was at the last gasp, had parted with the last penny. He walked, simply because it was too cold to stand still, and eventually found himself upon Chelsea Bridge. A dull yellow gleam to westward scarce sufficed to outline the skeleton trees that grew on the river bank, and left obscure the dark water which throbbed and tossed among the lumps of floating ice as though fain to rid itself of an unwelcome burden. My man stood for a while gazing listlessly at this muffled sunset. The river traffic was almost stopped by the frost, and the barges had crept to the sides for shelter. Here and there a flutter of white discovered the presence of countless gulls driven by hunger to dispute with men the possession of the river offal. Far away in the country the snow was lying white and unsullied, but here in town it was indescribably loathsome; churned along with falling smuts and the mud of the roadways, and banked up foul and evil-smelling in the gutters, there to harden into dangerous banks. What a city of dreadful night was this. It was his soul rather than his flesh that shivered as the poor wretch gazed despairingly down from the bridge. What use of further struggle? But one leap, and the misery would be over!

"While he stood hesitating there was a timid touch upon his arm. He turned, but it was a minute or so before he could return from the threshold of the other world. Then he discovered that the person who appealed to him was young and very—may I say pretty? He awaited her first words in some surprise. They were quick, yet hesitating, as though the speaker was slightly nervous."

"So she was, not slightly, but horribly," murmured Nora, with a catch in her breath. "But you're only a man, so you'll never, never understand."

"'Don't be angry, please don't be angry,' was what she exclaimed. 'But one does imagine such strange things, and strange things do happen, you know, every day in this great, heartless place. If you'd only seen how you looked, so wild and pale——'

"Here she stopped altogether, and her small fingers began twisting her muff about. He looked more closely at her. She was an exquisite little creature, sumptuously dressed, though in rather too old a fashion for her age, which seemed to him to be that of a mere child. You see, he was not quite so ignorant as you imagined."

"It was auntie's fault," interrupted the girl, "I hate velvet and sable myself, but she would persist in making me wear them. I know they don't suit a little mite like me."

Digitized by Google

"Well, I'm not sure about that! They accentuated her youth. She seemed like some baby playing at being grown up. And yet her quick, shy glances, which reminded him of some bird, disconcerted him more than those of an older person might have done. What had such a baby to do with him or his troubles? She had 'but fed on the roses and lain on the lilies of life,' while he, like the ass he was, had been regaled on the thistles. He felt the full force of the comparison, and this is, I think, the only excuse I can bring forward for his rudeness. His face hardened and he laughed. I don't imagine it was a pleasant laugh."

"It was dreadful. I can almost hear it now."

"He was a brute to answer the child as he did. Do you recollect his words?"

"Indeed I do! They made me hot with anger and shame. 'You are much too kind,' he said, in a nasty, cold tone; 'but, believe me, it's not altogether wise for such a charming young lady to address a chance wayfarer! I don't think your mother would approve of it; and, really, it's not necessary, either. Surely I may study the river and the gulls without comment or interruption?'"

"Ruffian!" exclaimed Bertie, savagely. "He certainly deserved kicking for such insolence! However, the girl had her revenge. He felt penitent the moment after, and especially when she gave him one of her quick glances and smiled. He noticed then that she had a dimple in her right cheek. It's there still, I see."

"Fancy remembering that! How foolish."

"A mere matter of opinion. You've no conception what a comfort that dimple has been to him. It came with the smile, and the smile proved that she wasn't offended by his rudeness."

"Oh, but indeed she was," cried Nora. "And if he hadn't been so miserable, she'd have made him feel it too."

"Well at least she didn't show it, and that's something. She took it humorously instead. 'Ah, now you want to make me feel impertinent,' she said; 'and perhaps I do. But what of that if it rouses you?'"

"Then she moved onward, and he followed.

"'Why did you conclude that suicide was in my mind?' he asked, with irritation. For you must confess it was galling to him to find his intention written on his countenance so plainly that this girl—a mere child in years and experience—could read it there. 'For all you know, I may be a poet evolving a splendid epic from this sullen river scene! As a matter of fact, I'm a journalist in search of copy.'

"She shook her head. 'You need not trouble to invent lies for my benefit,' she returned. 'I saw your face! And if ever cold, and hunger, and despair were imprinted on a human countenance—— But I'm not surprised you try to hide it. You're a gentleman, and at the last extremity. Do you think I can't tell that much? But, look here, I—I just wouldn't, if I were you! When things are at the worst, they mend. Oh, yes, you can quote lots of instances when they haven't—but that's nothing. I want you to hope on for just a little longer. Besides, it's so hatefully cold!'

"As she urged this last rather babyish objection, she put her head on one side in a way that enhanced her resemblance to a bird, and her mouth trembled as though she meant to cry. The man's bitter mood melted rapidly beneath her winsome charm."

"You mustn't—you really mustn't," murmured the girl. "It makes me feel so foolish! Besides, it's a liberty your short acquaintance doesn't permit," she ended firing up.

"My acquaintance with the child I speak of dates back four years, and surely that permits a little plain speaking?"

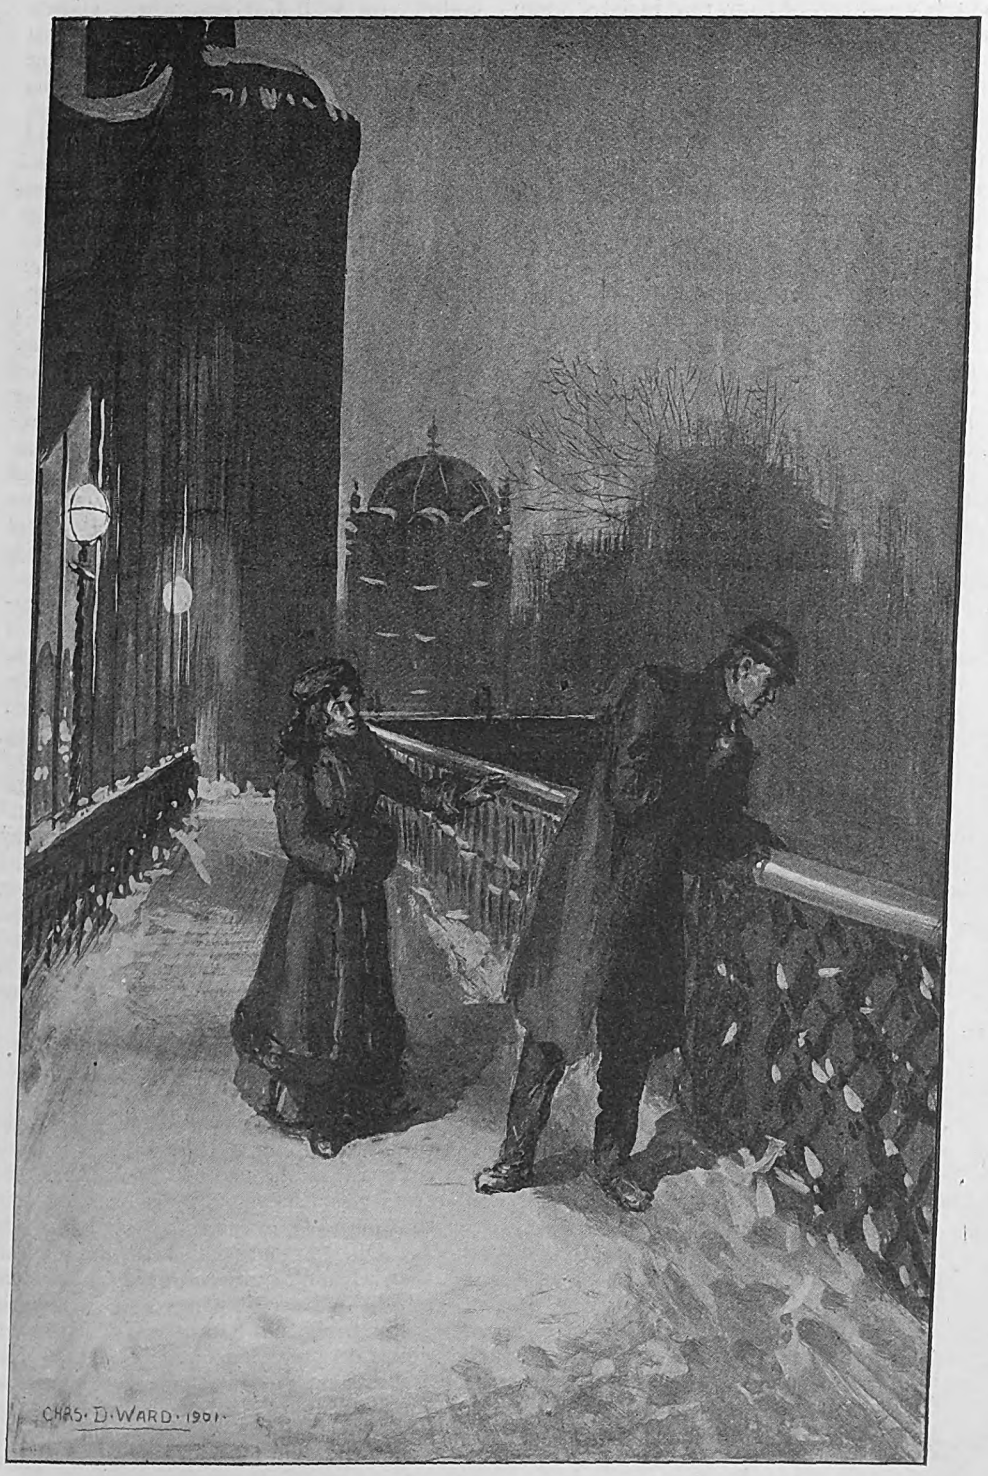
"Plain? Oh, if you call that plain! Gross flattery, I call it!"

"Well, I'll cut my story short for fear of further offence," he said. "Suffice it to say that when the pair I'm speaking of reached the bank on the Chelsea side, the man fainted—for the first time in his life. It was from lack of food, of course. He was carried into a doctor's house, but the girl stayed with him until he had somewhat recovered; and at parting emptied her purse into his hand, as I have before described."

"Now comes the part I don't know! What happened after that?"

"Fate turned a smiling face on the poor chap from that hour. He met an old college chum, who was on the eve of departure to Western Australia. The

Digitized by Google



WHILE HE STOOD HESITATING THERE WAS A TIMID TOUCH UPON HIS ARM.

Digitized by Google

chum was flush of coin, and insisted upon advancing the other's passage money, and carrying him off to the diggings. The rest is too long to tell you now. Besides, I want the chance of acting as raconteur some other time. I'm staying at the Greyhound, down at Hawkstone, and may have to be there some time, so if you live in the neighbourhood, perhaps you'll allow me the privilege of calling upon you?"

She looked curious. It was so seldom that any stranger came to stay in Hawkstone that her surprise was pardonable.

"Staying some time at Hawkstone?" she repeated.

His face clouded. "Yes; and my business is of an unpleasant nature, I'm sorry to say."

"I daresay my guardian will be pleased to welcome you at Grove Cottage. That's where I've lived ever since my aunt died. It's a pretty enough place when you get to it, but the getting——" Here she shuddered. "The fact is I have a morbid dislike to the approach. I never did like it—those gloomy trees, that make a midnight of noon. Ugh! It's not surprising that the lane should have been shunned before; but now—now, of course——"

He started, and looked curiously at her.

"Grove Cottage? A gloomy approach? Why, it must be the same! And the name of your guardian, tell me, is it Pattinson?"

She leaped at the truth, and gave a cry of pain and horror.

"Oh, now I know what has brought you here! At the time the coincidence of the name struck me; but it seemed so improbable, I thrust the idea from me. But it is! You are the Bertie Carlton whose letter was found upon him. You are——"

"The son of the man who was murdered in the lane you dislike so much? Yes. I am that unfortunate man; and I've come from the other side of the world for the express purpose of tracking his murderer and bringing the wretch to justice."

The girl drew a long breath. "How strange—how very strange!" she exclaimed. "And you never knew that I—— But how could you?"

He turned to her abruptly. "Then, of course, you are the young lady mentioned in the newspapers as having been with Mr. Pattinson, the tenant of Grove Cottage, when, during the course of a morning walk, he discovered the body of my poor father? And I never guessed! But, as you say, how could I? I associated you with Chelsea, where I knew you to be living at the time when I first met you. Even when I saw your name in the report, I never thought of it as more than a simple coincidence. Good Heavens, what a small world it is after all!"

There was something so strange and significant in the way Fate had been weaving strands around them—strands that crossed and now seemed tightening—that a certain degree of awe fell upon them both. The girl sat looking into the west, where the golden sunset died out slowly and left the sky all grey and misty. She wished that some less terrible fact than this murder had drawn them together again. A trembling seized her as she recalled the grey, cold face of the dead man upturned to the morning sky, his awful glassy, staring eyes, his white hair all bedabbled with dew. A sob rose in her throat, and Bertie, watching her closely, saw her eyes fill with tears.

"I am as sorry as you," he said, interpreting her emotion correctly. "All this has been too much for you. So I'll ask no more questions of you to-night. To morrow I intend to call upon Mr. Pattinson. From what I hear of him, he'll be ready and willing to give me all possible help."

She rose wearily.

"He's the kindest and best of men," she returned; "and be assured you may reckon upon him for all you require. Now I must go. I've no lamp, and the daylight is fading fast. I don't want to be run in by Pawson—that's our village policeman."

"May I hope to see you when I call?"

She hesitated. "I don't know—perhaps."

"Surely you won't allow the greatest trouble of my life to be also the means of separating us? If ever a man wanted a friend—a woman friend, that is—who would teach him to believe that the world isn't all made up of wickedness and cruelty, surely you must see that I am that man!"

"Oh, I'm not such a coward; it isn't that! I don't quite know why I hesitated, but I——"

He took her hand. "You tell me to count on your guardian's kindness. May I count on yours also? Come now, tell me! Will you be to me that woman friend I want so badly?"

Her hand fluttered in his like a captured bird. Then one of her quick, shy glances flashed forth.

Digitized by Google

"Yes—if I can, that is; but it's a dreadful responsibility, you know, especially for a little thing like me. What is the task you set me? I've got to teach you to believe in goodness, is that it? How am I to do it?"

"By being kind to me!"

"Kind! That depends upon how you behave."

"I'll be all you choose to make me, if you only persevere long enough."

"What else am I to do?"

"To sympathise with all my sorrow, and rejoice with my joy."

"You don't ask much! Just like a man. Anything else?"

"To allow me to tell you how much I appreciate your efforts, without snubbing me. Yes, even though I should venture to allude to that dimple in the course of conversation. I wish to put you on a pedestal and worship you; because man was made to adore and woman to be adored."

She laughed as she mounted her iron steed. "For pity's sake, don't make the pedestal too lofty! I'm so small, it will be difficult for me to climb down to earth again."

He stood watching her until she wheeled out of the range of vision, then, lighting his pipe, sat down to ponder events.

Was it Providence or blind chance that had thrown them together again, he wondered?

The mist rose from the valley, and a chill air crept across the face of the hill. He gradually became alive to the fact that he was no light-hearted lad rejoicing in his golden youth, but a sorrowful man launched on a scheme of vengeance. He looked at his watch. It was close on nine o'clock, and Jim Hawthorn would be expecting him every minute.

CHAPTER XVII.

DREDMAN'S BUNGALOW.

When Bertie reached Dr. Hawthorn's, he found another college friend awaiting him there. This was a man named Hargreaves. Jim Hawthorn explained that Hargreaves had suddenly accepted a long-standing invitation, just when expectation had given place to resignation. It was very jolly, because now Bertie would have an opportunity of renewing two friendships instead of one.

Bertie agreed cordially. Hargreaves had always been interesting. He was little changed since the days when—from his avowed predilection for certain occult sciences—they had dubbed him the Astrologer. His long, dry, dust-colored locks might have been blown about by the winds of strange doctrines ever since, and his eyes retained their strange impressiveness. Sometimes they looked out dreamily into an uninteresting world; but occasionally they deepened, like those of some seer of inner visions. For the rest, his lean, bent form possessed reserves of nervous force, and he was the kind of man who alternately preserves silence for hours together, or pours forth a flood of language when launched upon a congenial topic.

"Great Scott! Hargreaves, but this is jolly!" exclaimed Bertie, as they shook hands. "It makes me feel like a boy again to be with you fellows! Time seems to have stood still with you, old man!"

The other smiled vaguely. "Stood still, because it never galloped, that's all! Remember, I was never young, like the rest of you. It's the only way to escape the ravages of the old ruffian with the scythe. But come, I don't think you have much cause to complain of the way he's treated you! I imagine the 'Varsity training in athletics has stood you in good stead during your adventurous life. Hawthorn has been telling me of it, and he's green with envy, silly chap that he is!"

He gave an admiring glance at Bertie's lithe, well-knit figure as he spoke.

"I don't think Hawthorn ought to grumble either," returned Bertie, who thought the doctor's cosy sanctum perfectly delightful; "he seems to have dropped into a snug practice without any effort, and yet has the audacity to complain of his hard fate in having to work at all."

"He's dead beat, or he'd throw a physic bottle at your head," returned the person alluded to. "Pray how'd you like to spend the precious days of your youth in listening to the complaints of a whimsical old woman, or pulling a grave face over the disorders of a kid's stomach?"

"Why did you accept it then? There's room for chaps like you in the Bush."

"Ah, yes, and that's where I fain would be! But, unfortunately, I have a stern

Digitized by Google

mater with an eye for the main chance, and four unmarried sisters—good, but plain, like Barney Cree's pig, which he was obliged to provide for all the days of its life, because it was too affectionate to kill, and too ugly to sell! It was no use for me to protest, when uncle died leaving me his practice. I'm not cut out for the life, but I've got to endure it. Some day, however, I'll poison a patient out of desperation, and that will make an end on't. No lesser matter will.

"But now for your affairs, Carlton! I fancy I can guess the reason of your appearance in this Sleepy Hollow of ours."

"How was it you never guessed before? Our name is not so very common."

"Well, to tell the truth, I've had my suspicions all along, but I thought it better to say nothing until I heard directly from you. I was sure you'd turn up some day, and I hadn't your address. Besides, I could do no good, though I was there soon after it occurred. I'm awfully sorry, old man! It was a nasty business—a very nasty business!"

"Well, I shall trouble you to tell me all you know about it, Jim, but not to-night. I fell in for an astonishing piece of luck to-day, and I want to think it over. Happiness and tragedy are ill companions, so we will talk about the other to-morrow instead of to-night."

They both saw that Bertie did not wish to pursue the subject at that moment, and a rather awkward silence ensued, which was broken at last by Hargreaves. He had been down Dredman's-lane that afternoon, crossed the bridge, and come upon the bungalow. He was very much impressed with it, for the weird and mysterious ever drew him, as sunlight draws the butterfly.

"What is the story of the tumble-down old place?" asked Bertie, grasping at the chance of getting away from his own affairs. "When I asked your policeman about it, he was very reticent, and merely declared that the superstitious of the neighbourhood pronounced it to be haunted."

"Ah, I knew it!" murmured Hargreaves, dreamily. "I could feel presences there even in daylight; evil presences, having a malign influence upon humanity; elementaries, never properly subdued, hating like devils, and with some of their powers."

"Hold your tongue, for pity's sake!" cried the doctor. "You're as bad as a D.T. patient! As for Pawson, he's sensitive to ridicule, and dreads being chaffed if he should let himself go. Yet would that huge hulk of his quiver like a jelly were he forced to remain on duty in the bungalow after dark!"

"It smells of death and decay," said Bertie."

"Probably the drains are defective," returned the doctor; "and, indeed, that would account for a great deal that seems mysterious. Nevertheless, I share Pawson's dislike of the place to some extent, although I make a point of laughing at the notion of anything supernatural."

"But the story—the story?"

"Well, the place was built before my time, although not so long before as its dilapidated appearance would lead one to suppose. Grove Cottage dates further back, though no one would think so, because it's kept in such excellent repair. Dredman, who had the bungalow built after his own design, was a retired official from the Indian Civil Service. He lived there alone with his man, a native whom he had brought home with him. They were a mysterious couple. Whatever the bond betwixt them, it was certainly not that of affection. People heard them wrangling at all times, and the evil looks that passed between them were the constant subject of village gossip. Bukta Lal had some grievance against his master, and hated him too much to leave him. Whatever the secret was, they kept it dark, and lived alone together in that secluded spot, making no acquaintances, and employing no outside service. Bukta Lal did the necessary work himself, while his master made foraging expeditions to the village when food was required. The only extravagance he indulged in seemed to be brandy, for Dredman drank like a fish. My uncle was called in once by the Hindu, and found his master suffering from delirium tremens. The old gentleman gave me quite a graphic description of the scene. The long, lean Anglo-Indian was wrestling with some imaginary foe, or rather foes, for they seemed to be legion. He kept on crying out for Bukta Lal to help him; but when the latter came it was only to be thrust aside in terror. They managed to administer an heroic dose of bromide of potassium, and to bind him down upon his bed until his brain grew calmer. At last he slept. When my uncle turned from the bed, there was Bukta Lal standing gazing at the patient, and his looks were so evil that uncle was alarmed.

Digitized by Google

"'Your master will require careful treatment,' he said, sharply. 'Complete prostration will follow this attack. Above all, keep that from him,' pointing to a bottle of brandy that stood on the table. The Hindu showed his white teeth in an unmirthful grin.

"'Bukta Lal will watch him well,' he exclaimed. 'He must not die—yet! They are not ready for him!'

"'If it's too much for you, I'll send a nurse,' said my uncle. Bukta made as though he were pushing away some intruder. 'No, no nurse,' he cried. 'He kill nurse if he find her when all right! You not know him, doctor! Him one cruel man—very cruel man in my country! He live wicked life there. But soon his time for punishment now come. He afraid lose his position once if Great Sahibs know, so said those who knew of his wickedness must die. Then what you think? He had them bound where man-eater—tiger, you know—came to drink at night. One of them was my brother! He not know that! Soon the man-eater come for him too. They swore it! I heard them. So I wait—I wait ever! He must not die!'

"My uncle was a practical man, and contemptuous of modern theories of malign influence, and that sort of thing; so, concluding that Bukta Lal was slightly touched in the upper storey, but finding him, all the same, a careful and efficient nurse to an extremely awkward patient, he did not interfere further.

"But whether it was that the Hindu thought he had said too much, or whether the patient got better immediately, at any rate, my uncle's services were dispensed with from that time. It was known that Dredman drank as heavily as ever. Grove Cottage was then occupied by a retired publican—presumably not a person of weak nerves; but even he commenced to complain of the unearthly noises proceeding from the vicinity of the bungalow at nights. The peace of his household was broken, and it was impossible for anyone in Grove Cottage to sleep. It was more than the ordinary quarrels of a couple of drunken men. These took place certainly; but other voices overtopped, and shrieks of horrid laughter mingled with them. Sometimes there were groans, as of some human being in deadly fear and suffering torture.

"After enduring it for a little over a month, the retired publican quitted Grove Cottage, and it remained empty for the space of two or three years. Shortly after the publican left the neighbourhood, the mystery deepened. Dredman was discovered one morning, face downwards, in the stream. It was the postman who found him thus, as he made for a short cut to Yottam, across the fields behind the house. He did not venture upon approaching the body alone, but fled at once to the village. Some of the bravest of the inhabitants accompanied him back. They carried the body of Dredman to the bungalow. My uncle was absent on his rounds at the time, and did not arrive there until half-an-hour afterwards. But from what he then heard, some singular circumstances were connected with the discovery. For those carrying the body were confronted upon the very threshold by another corpse—that of the Hindu servant, Bukta Lal, who appeared to have died in the act of rushing forth either in pursuit of his master, or from some danger within. He was not quite dead when they raised him, and they poured a little brandy down his throat. He regained consciousness for a few moments, and stared around him wildly. Then, by a great effort, he completely rolled off the couch and stood upright, his lips drawn back from his teeth, and the whites of his eyes showing. Those around fell back, appalled at the awful expression on his face.

"'The tiger! The tiger!' he screamed. 'Help me to escape from the tiger! They sent it—but for him—for him—not for me—not for Bukta Lal, their brother! Oh, Kali, make me not a sacrifice for the sins of him that is slain! The goddess will not listen. She is greedy of blood! She sends her messenger. It has me, even me——' And here, with a shriek of horror unutterable, he died.

"Everything within the house was in dire confusion, chairs and tables overturned, and curtains pulled from their poles and lying heaped together on the floor. It was as though they had first been clung to, then used as guards against some onslaught. But now comes the strangest part of all. The faces and hands of both the dead men were scratched and torn as though by the claws of some savage beast!

Digitized by Google

"When my uncle made an examination of the body of Dredman he discovered that the man had not died from drowning, but from failure of the heart's action, caused, he declared, by sheer fright.

"The old man never liked to talk of the affair afterwards, for it seemed to contradict all his materialistic theories. But the bungalow has remained untenanted ever since. No one is bold enough to occupy it, although the ground landlord, to whom Dredman bequeathed it, as though unwilling his servant should reap any benefit from his death, in the event of Bukta Lal being the survivor, has repeatedly offered it rent free to anyone who chooses to brave the ghosts.

"For the villagers declare that old Dredman's shrieks and moans are still to be heard by those who venture within earshot after dark, and that upon each anniversary of the tragedy some great velvet-footed beast, with green lamps for eyes, prowls round the garden, ready to sneak in at the door of the house when the ghost of Bukta Lal leaves it ajar."

"It seems just the sort of place for the investigations of the Society for Psychical Research," remarked Bertie.

"Well, I believe they did send a couple of their members down. But they were poor nervous chaps, who declared the air to be damp, and that the bungalow smelt of decay, and went off without waiting for developments. But it's left you a chance, Hargreaves. What do you say to an all-night sitting in Dredman's Bungalow?"

The alchemist knocked the ash off his cigar before replying.

"It's an uncanny story," he said, thoughtfully, "but it would certainly be an interesting experiment. If you two fellows will join me I've no objection to spending a night there."

"I've spent many a night alone in the Bush," replied Bertie, "and that's a fairly good education for any adventure, so I'll join you whenever you like, Hargreaves."

"What of the tenants of Grove Cottage, though? How did such a quiet, pleasant man as this Mr. Pattinson venture to settle so near the haunted house?"

"Oh, I don't fancy Pattinson's a nervous man! I asked him once if he ever heard anything, but he only laughed and declared that the supernatural didn't exist; it was merely a bugbear to frighten fools into good behaviour. He's got a guardian angel, anyhow. Miss Shelley, the girl who lives there, and who I believe is his ward, is the sweetest, sauciest, daintiest little darling that ever bewitched the heart of a man."

"She is, indeed," assented Bertie, with enthusiasm. "I've never yet seen a girl fit to tie her shoe-laces!"

The other stared. "Why, how the dickens do you know? You don't mean to say that you've already—— Oh, I say, this is coming it a bit too strong! You entered the village last night for the first time in your life; or, at least, so you've told me. You've not been introduced into our select circle of village society; indeed, you don't seem to yearn for it, and yet you begin to speak of our best girl as though you were already in love with her. You atrocious old humbug! Where have you seen Nora Shelley?"

Bertie coloured first, then laughed. He had indeed betrayed himself completely.

"I met her on Wensley Common tonight," he replied, with some hesitation. "But, indeed, I ought to say I've seen her before—long ago."

Dr. Hawthorn threw himself back in his chair and laughed both long and loudly.

"Well, of all the deceitful young men! I never did! I'm done with you for ever. A nice person you are to read one a lecture. A nice one to impute motives to an innocent young man. Oho! 'Did some rural divinity lure you hither to twine garlands for her hair?' Hargreaves, what ought we to do to punish him for his vile deceit? Speak, oh, friend of my soul!"

"Give him to Dredman's tiger."

"The very thing! It was the fate of many a better man in the days of the early Christians. That's what we'll do, throw him to Dredman's tiger."

"First catch your tiger," returned the culprit, unmoved.

CHAPTER XVIII.

SPIDERS AND FLIES IN THUMB COURT.

Leading out of Crutched Friars in the direction of the Minories is a narrow, dingy alley called Thumb Lane, which terminates rather abruptly in a court of the same designation. Thumb Court is one of the oldest and darkest places

Digitized by Google

THE MONEY-LENDER LOOKED AT HIM MALICIOUSLY. "JUST DEBTS WAS WHAT I SAID, MORTON!"

within the City boundaries. The light of heaven never quite penetrates to its sombre houses, even during the sunniest day of summer. Upon all within it the dust of ages seems to have permanently settled, to rise in clouds beneath the footstep of any heedless pedestrian who is sufficiently ill-advised as to quicken his pace; for in truth the solemn measure of an andante is better suited to the place than the joyous one of an allegro.

There is one melancholy pear tree that still struggles for life in the Court, at once the pride and shame of all its denizens. It was probably planted by some prosperous City merchant, who lived in one of the fine stately old houses in the bygone days, when it was considered fitting to live in the heart of the City instead of rushing away from it directly business hours are over. If that pear tree could talk would it not bemoan its fate in these degenerate times? Its one protest is to put forth a few miserable, shrivelled leaves every spring, which are immediately covered with a veil of soot. Needless to say, its blossoming time is long past. The tree itself is not so much the roosting place of dingy-plumaged sparrows as the permanent abode of innumerable spiders, whose webs dangle from every branch and twig, float in the air, and threaten to strangle unwary visitors.

Joseph Morton, principal clerk to the firm of Solomon Bembridge and Co., was deeply interested in spiders, and took considerable pains not to disturb their industries more than he could avoid, though he often wondered how long it would be before the whole of the Court became so completely enmeshed in their webs that all air would be excluded. Morton was of a cynical turn of mind, and had a crony rather the same way of thinking.

"I'll tell you what, Blowser," he would say sometimes to this same friend, "those bloomin' flies are symbolical, that's a fact! For my governor, Solomon Bembridge, doesn't he spin webs for silly flies as industriously as ever they do, and find just as willing victims? There seems no end of flies, and no more is there of impecunious humans willing to pay seventy-five per cent.—that's our lowest rate—for a trifle of the ready, without the slightest chance of betterment. It's enough to make a chap laugh and cry all at once to see the fools. They're always so jolly sanguine, too. As if it was possible to wipe out back debts by incurring heavier ones for future use. D'ye ever read Carlyle, Jimmy? He's a bit out of date, but, great Scott! isn't he good? Mostly fools, he called folks. So they are! Who should know that better than me, unless it's Solomon B. himself? Day by day they flock to us for temporary accommodation. Temporary accommodation, mind you! Phut!" and he blew a cloud of smoke into the air with vicious suddenness. "They're all alike—doctors, clergymen, merchants, authors. And Solomon Bembridge doesn't allow one to escape until he's sucked him as dry as a spider sucks its prey. And I don't blame him, either, for they know what's before them, though I can't say I like the business."

Digitized by Google

"Why did you go in for it then, Joey? Though I don't suppose it's as bad as company promoting, when all's said and done."

"Beggars mustn't be choosers," returned the other. "It's not one pair of shoes I walked off my feet looking for a berth before I got this one. And Solomon isn't half bad, at least one half of him isn't bad. Sometimes I think he's two men rolled into one, like that Jekyll and Hyde monstrosity."

"Most chaps are, if you come to that," returned Blowser. "Why, when I remember how old Dumford used to talk to me like a father, it makes me sick; all about keeping straight, and not forgetting the prayers my mother taught me, and such-like. And, really, I believe he meant it all at the time, for there were tears in his eyes. But there's nothing so mixed as human nature. Pickles isn't in it with human nature."

"Who was Dumford, Jemmy? I forget."

"Don't you remember the Dumfords of the Daisy Mine? If I was to recount the history of that mine your hair would stand on end. There were two of them, regular swindlers, but as clever as they make them. The Daisy was salted wherever the prospectors went, and the main reef was worked for all it was worth, until the shares were taken up. Then came a decrease in the output. The main reef was allowed to lie fallow while the little side ones were worked. The gold grew beautifully less, and naturally so did the dividends. Down fell the shares. Then the two old foxes bought them back by degrees and finally sold the mine to our folks for a tidy million or so. And to think how they posed as philanthropists, founded a sect and built a chapel."

"The religious lay is generally successful," returned the other man, thoughtfully. "But you can't call it exactly an original one. My chief doesn't pose as a religious man, however. He's a dark horse. I can't make him out. He sometimes talks of the necessity of returning to a simple and natural use of life; advocates the cultivation of unsophisticated tastes. Great Scott! To watch him when he lays a flower on the desk by the side of his account books and lifts and sniffs at it every now and again as though for refreshment, no one would ever imagine he was employed in scheming how to make a hundred per cent. look like honest trading. It's a revelation, Jimmy. When you and I make our fortunes we'll put our heads together and write a book on the oddities of human nature we've discovered during the course of business."

"We might do worse! But fortunes? That's a doubtful quantity. We've both been too much behind the scenes to make money; it takes the courage of ignorance to do that. Why, look here, Joey, I'd as soon attempt to swim across the river at London Bridge as to buy shares. I've helped to float two companies and that's quite sufficient. What I save I put into consols, and that doesn't mean a fat lot for one's old age. Think I'll take your chief's advice and return to nature. Buy a bit of land and begin poultry farming, perhaps?"

"Should have thought wildgoose-chasing more in your line, Jimmy."

"Wild cat, you mean! We've a regular menagerie on 'Change, you know."

"Well, even that's better than flying kites with strings so flimsy that they snap at the slightest breath of wind."

"Where does Solomon Bembridge live?"

"He doesn't confide the secret of his foot of earth to yours truly."

"Which is no answer, for I bet you know."

"His letters are forwarded to his club when he is absent," returned the clerk, who evidently declined to commit himself on the subject, "and he's never invited me to have a cut from his joint on Sundays."

"Looks fishy, I think. Perhaps he's got a little place up the river? Is he married?"

Digitized by Google

"Even that I cannot say! I once saw him coming out of Queen's Hall after a concert with an uncommonly pretty little girl. But there was nothing lover-like about him, and she was young enough to be his daughter."

"That goes for nothing! These old boys are so artful. He might not care to show his affection too openly."

The other shook his head. "If you knew Solomon B. as well as I do, you'd feel the impossibility of such a thing. In some ways he seems aloof from the ordinary temptations of humanity."

"Ah, Joey, you know more than you care to tell. But I don't blame you. One has to be careful nowadays. Things gets into the papers, nobody knows how."

Morton might know more than he cared to tell, but he looked as meek as a lamb the next morning when his chief arrived in Thumb-court and favoured him with a keen glance from a pair of strange, light-coloured eyes. Solomon Bembridge removed, on entering the office, the coloured spectacles he usually wore, though Morton would have liked them retained, for he always felt uncomfortable beneath those searching glances. He was not exactly fond of the master he served fairly well. It would have afforded him pleasure to rebel against the power which dominated him, but he was as yet in no position to do so. But he always cherished a hope that at some future period their positions might be reversed, and that the rebellion latent within him might have a chance of breaking forth.

"Who has been here during my absence, Morton?" asked Solomon Bembridge, turning over the papers on his desk rapidly and yet not missing a single necessary point in them. He had been away from the office for two days. Money-grubbing was beginning to pall upon him. He hated to exchange the country for the town.

"Jabbers and Co. wish to raise more capital in order to extend their colonial branch," returned the clerk.

"How much are they wanting this time?"

"Ten thousand."

"What security do they offer?"

"Mortgage upon their premises in Fenchurch-street."

"First mortgage? Freehold?"

"Not exactly! There's a ground rent of fifty, and there's a first mortgage for two thousand already."

"Not good enough, I fear! Who manages the colonial branch?"

"Young Jabbers. He went out to Perth, Western Australia, a few years ago."

"Ah, yes, now I remember," said the money-lender, thoughtfully, removing, as as spoke, an auricula from his buttonhole and placing it on his desk in a tube full of water. "Young Jabbers was a bit of a scamp, had bills flying all over the City, and was sent out of the country to avoid scandal. His father was too lenient in giving him such a chance, I think."

"But they say it's been the making of him! He married out there and settled down steadily to business. The branch is doing well, sending goods up country to the gold mines; but they're hampered by lack of capital."

"I'm afraid it's too risky. But you can write and say we'll give them an answer to-morrow. Meantime I'll make inquiries. Who comes next?"

"Miss Hawkins writes to beg a little more time. The interest on her loan is overdue, but she's been ill and her school has fallen off in consequence, though she hopes it will recover——"

"Oh, of course," interrupted the money-lender, impatiently. "It's always the same old story; they all hope things will recover! How much has she had altogether?"

"Only a hundred and ten."

"And what has she paid up to now?"

"Twenty pounds a month for six months."

"Well, I don't wish to be too hard. I fancy she has wealthy relatives who would come to her assistance did they know of her straits. She's a proud little woman, and should be taught how to eat humble pie. It's a wholesome, if somewhat unpalatable comestible. At the worst, her furniture is good and new. It will serve to pay her just debts."

It was all Morton could do to repress a groan at the epithet. The money-lender looked at him maliciously.

"'Just debts' was what I said, Morton! And what have you got to object to in that phrase? A money-lender is the only friend of the impecunious, remember that. He has to take all the risks. Only last week that miserable spendthrift, Lord Annerly, cut his throat, and I was a clear thousand out or pocket. Yet the law invariably sides with the debtor. Morton, on second thought, you can send a threatening letter to Miss Hawkins. She'd do anything to avoid exposure, for she's a weak, nervous little wretch. She'll make an effort to raise the money by the end of the month."

Digitized by Google

Morton nodded and went back to his desk in the outer office, where he presided over a couple of weak and anæmic looking youths. It did not require a large staff to work the business of Solomon Bembridge and Co.

"You human bloodsucker!" he muttered under his breath, scowling at the door he had just closed. "It's all very well for you, but I have to bear the brunt while you take it easy in your snug retreat—wherever that may be. Some of them I've no pity for, they bring their troubles on themselves; but that poor little schoolmistress, I'm awfully sorry for! She's uncommonly pretty, too; and I hate to see a pretty woman cry. It makes one feel such a cad. She's safe to come here to-morrow and make a scene with me, while Solomon Bembridge will be away in the country gardening, or giving himself up to nature, as he calls it. Of course, I don't know where he lives. It's as well to say so, any way. But just you wait a bit, my fine fellow! I know a trifle more than you're aware of. I didn't suspect much at the time, but I've almost succeeded in putting two and two together since. I've worked out the problem all by myself; and now I'm only waiting for a fitting opportunity and then you shall feel my thumb"—and he put the said thumb down upon his desk and pressed the wood vindictively—"the same as you've made that pretty little schoolmistress feel yours, Solomon Bembridge, my boy! It's all in the fashion of Thumb Court, you know," he continued, with somewhat grim pleasantry, "Thumb Court, and spiders and flies! There's what Jimmy would call an artistic suitability about it all."

The two juniors were out of hearing, or probably he would not have delivered himself of this speech. And by the time they returned from lunch he was deep in calculations.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

DR. CLIFFORD AND HIS WIFE AND DAUGHTER, AND REV. J. A. SOPER, IN MINER'S ATTIRE, AFTER DESCENDING THE BRITANNIA GOLD MINE, BALLARAT, AUSTRALIA.

JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.

A SKETCH AND AN INTERVIEW.

By CHARLES SPENCE.

THE men to whom the world looks for guidance and leadership are never the men of cramped vision and narrow range, however brilliant in a limited sphere, but they are those who possess an all-embracing sympathy with its needs and aspirations, and a multiplication of talents.

Preacher, scholar, social reformer, scientist, politician, champion of the victims of industrial oppression and all who suffer wrong in any form, the name of Dr. John Clifford is not only the most outstanding in his own Baptist community, but is hailed everywhere as that of one of the most brilliant and conscientious workers for the religious, intellectual, and social uplifting of his fellow men.

For Dr. Clifford does not confine his energies to the pulpit; there, indeed, he is known as one of the most eloquent and spiritual teachers of our times; but he has chosen for himself a larger congregation than the mightiest cathedral could hold; and all along the line of social, educational, municipal, and political life, he is continuously trying to apply the lessons of the New Testament to everyday problems.

He has never sunk the man in the parson.

"I avoid every sign of the cleric," he told the writer, "and I don't regard myself as belonging to a profession, but as simply the religious teacher who has been chosen by a number of people to give his time and thought to the interests of the society to which they all belong. I never use the title of Reverend," he added, "and my people very rarely use it either."

Digitized by Google

If there is nothing of the cleric about Dr. Clifford, neither is there of the dogmatist. No man of vivid imagination could ever be a dogmatist, for he possesses the rare power of seeing with others' eyes as well as his own, and can therefore appreciate their difficulties.

To all in doubt or difficulty—whether professing Christians or not—Dr. Clifford is the kindliest and gentlest adviser and friend. He does not brush aside objections as though they were the product of obstinate unbelief, but meets them fairly and with a rare spiritual insight and logical acuteness, which have many a time brought comfort to the heart of the earnest seeker after truth. It is these qualities—his broad sympathies, which have contact with the needs of life in all the seven days of the week, his fairness, and his intellectual eminence—which have placed Dr. Clifford in the front rank of our spiritual leaders in this age of strenuous mental activity, when the great problems of life can no longer be kept in the background as in past centuries, but are ringing in the ears of all men, from the peasant in the fields to the ruler on his throne. Dr. Clifford in one respect certainly belies his appearance; delicate and fragile-looking, with mild, kindly eyes looking on you from beneath the full and lofty forehead which speaks the intellectual strength of the man, one would never guess what tireless energy is stored up in that slight frame, for the Doctor gets through an amount of work which would kill many a man of far more robust appearance.

Sunday is with him a day of ceaseless activity. Punctually at ten o'clock he reaches the church and presides over the Bible Circles, the meeting opening with singing and prayer, and the members then proceeding to the study of the Scriptures.

At eleven o'clock comes the usual morning service, and after that the preacher receives in the vestry all who wish to speak to him. In the afternoon he nearly always has an engagement, and a short time ago, when the Sunday-school superintendent left, the Doctor took the burden on his own shoulders, and for several months presided over the Westbourne Park school.

At tea-time he sometimes entertains a large gathering of young people from the church, and then follows the evening service. After that a social meeting is held. This forms a unique feature of Sunday at Westbourne Park Church, and was established by Dr. Clifford because of his intense sympathy with the young, and his desire to help them in all their difficulties.

After the exhausting labours of the day the Doctor cheerfully submits himself again and again at these "socials" to a running fire of cross-examination on every imaginable subject.

He is always liable to be called to visit the sick, an eventuality not so rare as might be imagined in a church with over 800 members, and if the day's labours end at ten o'clock at night he can congratulate himself, after twelve hours of almost incessant work, on not having experienced a day more than usually onerous. Though his labours reach perhaps a climax on what to others is the "day of rest," every day in the week is so crowded with duties, and of such diverse character, that it is difficult to imagine how one hard-worked minister can cope with them all.

Besides the work of his church—one of the largest and most progressive in the Metropolis, whose calls upon his time and thought are incessant—he takes a great share in the general denominational work, especially interesting himself in educational questions, and working hard in order to secure a more highly trained Ministry. His complaint is that while there are always plenty of men to undertake the charge of the small churches, it is very difficult to fill efficiently the larger and more influential pulpits.

Then at Westbourne Park, Dr. Clifford has founded a great institute for the education of the young people, and this now has a membership of some 1,100 or 1,200. He takes an active part in the work of the School Board, and is Chairman of the London Progressive Election Council.

He is president of the Christian Social Brotherhood, a Society whose members are anxious to apply the principles of Christianity to social life and the industrial conditions of the community.

Digitized by Google

Monthly meetings are held, over which the Doctor presides, and information is obtained from those who may be regarded as authorities on the evils belonging to any particular trades, and this being done they try to bring their influence to bear to get the trouble remedied.

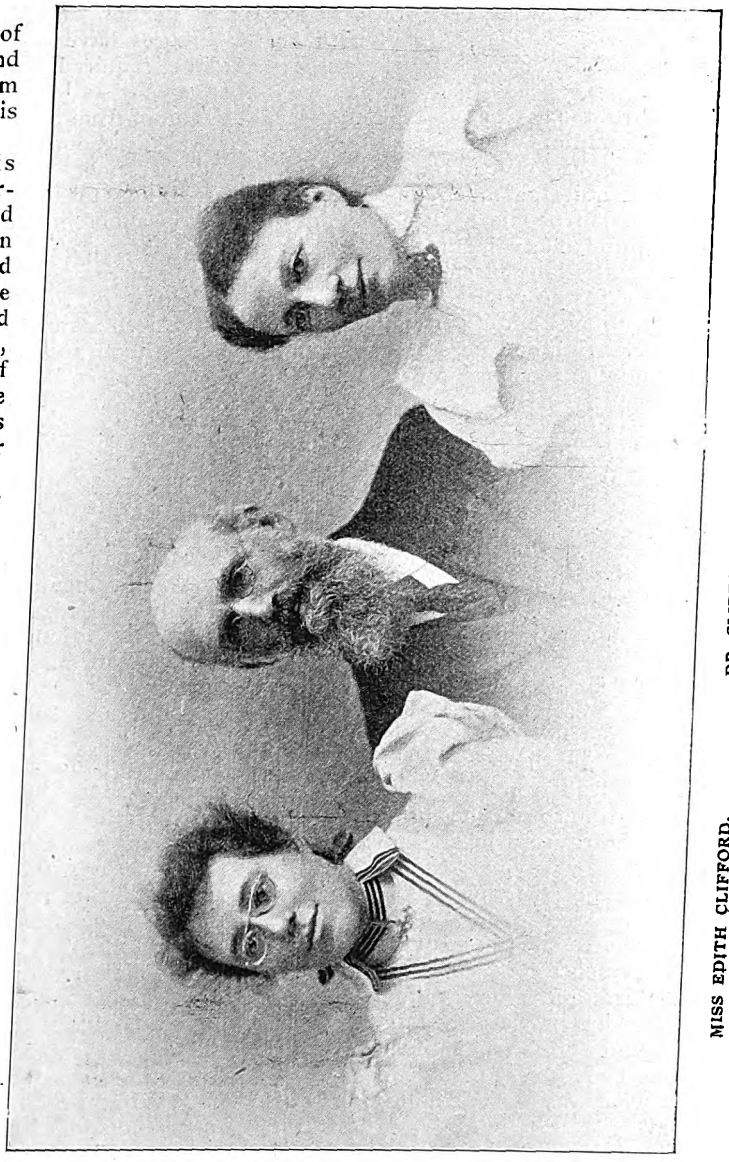
The grievances of shop assistants and the living-in system have received his especial attention.

Amidst all his multifarious undertakings Dr. Clifford in 1897 took a seven months' tour round the world, when he studied social and economic questions, and the results of his researches are embodied in his book, "God's Greater Britain."

He is a prolific writer, and is a fellow of the Geological Society, and at one time he used to do a good deal of geological work when visiting different parts of the country.

Like all men who can boast a wonderful record either for work or longevity, Dr. Clifford has a method of conserving his energy.

He can summon sleep at will, and even at times of exceptional strain he is always fit and ready, because he never lets the opportunity pass of taking a short nap in the interval of his engagements. While working, too, he always tries to rest himself as much as possible, and so when the writer called upon him with a quiverful of questions the Doctor submitted to the ordeal of the interview reclining restfully on a couch, from whence he delivered his replies with an ease and fluency which did much to explain his power of annihilating work—the intense mental activity which brings him to a conclusion on a subject before the ordinary man has mastered the premises.



MRS. CLIFFORD, DR. CLIFFORD, MISS EDITH CLIFFORD,

The first question which I put to the doctor was, "Are we in need of a new religious revival?"

"At the present moment," replied Dr. Clifford, "there is unquestionably a great need for the quickening of the National conscience in reference to everything that appertains to a high ideal of life, a spiritual interpretation of the movements of the time, and of the facts of the Universe. In that sense there is a great need of a religious revival. The phrase is very variously used, and if I used it I should mean that what is wanted is a deepening of the conviction in man that the spiritual elements in life must be the governing elements, and that only as we are faithful to them can we hope for a true social condition.

Digitized by Google

"I think that the revival I am speaking of is wanted quite as much among professing Christian people as it is outside, that in a good many instances there is outside the Christian churches the greatest sensitiveness to the reality and necessity of spiritual things, and a conscience more alert to social righteousness and justice.

"I am now in the forty-fourth year of my metropolitan ministry, and I do not think I have discovered at any time such a want of a quick perception of the spiritual phases of life as at the present time, or in other words, I don't think the Church has ever been more materialised or conformed to the world at any previous period.

"That the individual exceptions are very, very numerous inside the churches is a fact to which I am able to bear joyful testimony, but I am speaking now of the whole Church in its corporate condition."

"Can you give me any instances of this spiritual apathy?"

"I think," answered Dr. Clifford, "that the whole interpretation of the South African controversy is an illustration of what I am now saying; then I think the sluggishness of the churches in the direction of improved social conditions for the toiling masses of the people is another item of evidence.

"A third, and a very serious factor, is found in what is described as the decline of the Sunday-school, about which there has long been a very uneasy feeling."

"In what way has this falling-off shown itself?"

"There has, I should certainly say, been a decline of interest on the part of the thoughtful and more educated people of the Church in the maintenance and increase of efficiency in Sunday-school work. The chief lack, in my judgment, is the absence of trained Christians from the school; they leave the work very largely to the enthusiasm and ardour of young converts, and these converts are frequently persons who are unable to devote much time to the preparation of their lessons. Of course efforts are being made in many churches to supply that defect by training teachers, but those people who through their social advantages have had the opportunity to get the required training are the very ones, as far as I can hear and see, who stand aloof from Sunday-school work.

"At Westbourne Park we have four Sunday-schools, and I have again and again taken the superintendency of the Sunday-school in order to try and keep its standard of efficiency on a level with other branches of Church work.

"We want 160 teachers to keep the schools well manned, and the exodus from our neighbourhood of prosperous business people renders the problem increasingly difficult."

"What has led you to the conclusion that outside the Church there is often a more active spiritual life than within?"

"The facts on which I based my statements are easily explained," said Dr. Clifford emphatically. "My sympathy with social movements, which are not professedly Christian, and my interest in general educational work has brought me in touch with many people who, though not Church members, are leading very beautiful and self-sacrificing lives, and doing much for the benefit of humanity. Of course, I do not mean to say that they do not attend Church as members of the congregation, but they belong to the increasing number of people who are not in sympathy with any particular dogmatic representation of Christianity, and who devote themselves to social amelioration and the mental and ethical advance of their fellows, with such a whole-hearted and earnest endeavour to carry out the law of God that I am afraid it quite puts to shame the grudging service which we sometimes see offered in the churches."

"What would you say has been the most distinguishing feature of your ministry?"

"Its main drift," replied Dr. Clifford, "has been towards helping the young man. I have directed my attention all through these forty-three years to that object. I have tried to guide him through the changing moods of the religious world, and the invasion of the Church with sceptical and agnostic ideas. I have tried to be his friend and adviser, and helper, scrupulously setting apart every Friday from 7 o'clock till 10 for interviews.

Digitized by Google

"Young fellows often come from different parts of London to have chats with me on matters appertaining to the Christian life on its intellectual and social, as well as its devotional side."

"Do you deal much with current events from the pulpit?"

"Oh, yes," was the answer. "There is a book of mine on typical Christian leaders, which consists of sermons which I have preached on the decease of such men as Spurgeon, Dale, Stanley and Liddon. Then I have preached sermons on the death of Gladstone, President Garfield, Burne Jones, Browning, Henry Drummond, the great Christian scientist; another on Darwin, and just lately one on President McKinley. My aim is always to put a spiritual interpretation on the facts of everyday life.

"I belong to the Committee of the 'Citizen Sunday' movement, and on the day appointed we suggest some current question to be dealt with, such as: The conditions of labour, over-crowding, educational questions, municipal elections, etc.

"My theory of the Christian pulpit is that it should be one of the principal forces for the moralising and spiritualising of all life.

"Christianity is not something that can be separated from the whole purpose and manifold activities of the individual; it is to pervade his entire life, and is as necessary to his spiritual nature as breathing is to his physical.

"I have, therefore, persistently resisted the notion that a Christian minister should not 'interfere,' as some people phrase it, with politics or social matters. I maintain that a man in becoming a religious teacher does not lose his duties or his rights as a citizen. He is bound to discharge them, on the basis, not of ecclesiastical advantage or theological preference, but purely and exclusively on that of citizenhood.

"I have found people very frequently object to his doing so, but when the objection has been traced to its root, it has been found merely equivalent to saying: 'I disagree with the conclusion you have reached.' Those in sympathy with the Christian minister's conclusion don't resent his 'interference.' That, of course, is not the word I use, but 'interference' it is called by those who would restrict the preacher to his pastoral work."

"What time do you devote to the preparation of your sermons?"

"That depends a good deal," said Dr. Clifford, "on the nature of the subject, and also on the time I have at my disposal. I always know one Sunday what I am going to preach about the next, and my mind is working all the time on that particular theme, and if I have any leisure before Thursday, and can get an hour free from my other work I use it for the sermon.

"Thursday, Friday, and Saturday are the days which I devote to the preparation of my sermons for the following Sunday, and though I do a great deal of literary work besides, I never allow it to encroach on my sermon days."

"What led you to become a minister?"

"I come of a preaching stock," was the reply. "I had three uncles in the ministry and a cousin, and the preaching influence was very strong on me. Almost as soon as I became a Christian I began to do something in the way of giving addresses. It was a sort of instinct which came with my different view of life. I was quite early seized with the idea that preaching was my vocation, and along that very line of service I must travel.

"I remember well the first sermon I ever delivered; the congregation was strictly limited, consisting of four young fellows, who, together with myself, had prevailed on the kindly-hearted old chapel keeper, whom we bound to the strictest secrecy, to allow us to use a small room in connection with the Nether-street Baptist Chapel at Beeston, in which to practise our delivery, for we were all very earnest in our desire to be admitted on to the Local Preachers' plan.

"I received much timely encouragement from my minister, the Rev. R. Pike, who asked me for some of my sermons, looked over them, pointed out the faults and gave me many valuable suggestions. He urged me to persevere and devote my life to the work."

"Will you tell me something of your early struggles?"

"My parents were working people," answered Dr. Clifford, "and I received but a very scanty share of education at the village school. I began life in a lace factory when I was eleven years old, and I may say that I know the lace trade from top to bottom—at least as it was fifty years ago.

Digitized by Google

"I worked at first as an ordinary 'hand,' and in those days the factory laws were in their infancy, and the conditions of labour exceedingly onerous. The hours were terribly long, and I have worked all night again and again when a boy. As I grew older I got into better positions and easier conditions. I went through every department of the trade, and at the age of sixteen I became one of two managers of what is called the lace-mending department. We had to inspect the work of some 150 women—a strange position for so young a man.

"I well remember the day when my late employer sent to me one morning and asked for a specimen of my handwriting. I was then only a workman in the factory, and I did not know at all what his seemingly extraordinary request portended.

"It soon transpired that he wanted to see if it would be possible to give me the post of book-keeper which had just fallen vacant, and which I was fortunate enough to secure. This gave me my first opportunity of rising.

"I now began to study systematically, for my work was not nearly so severe nor the hours so long, and I contrived to devote thirty hours a week to my books. At that time 'Cassell's Popular Educator' came out and I found it most helpful. There were lessons in French and geology, and I caught my first enthusiasm for that science from this book, an enthusiasm which has followed me all my life. I also acquired the elements of Latin from the same source. Another book which was of the greatest service to me was 'Barnes's Notes on the New Testament,' which came out in sixpenny parts.

"I had been for some time a local preacher, and my love for the work steadily grew until at last I felt that I ought to devote my life to it. I accordingly left the lace business and entered the Baptist Theological College, where I remained three years. After completing my training for the ministry, I came to London in October, 1858, and was offered and accepted the pastorate of the Praed Street Church, of which I am pastor still, but I made it a condition that I should be allowed to pursue my studies at the London University College. I had purposed while at the Theological College going to Glasgow University, but the people at Praed Street were very earnest in asking me to take the pastorate, which I entered upon at the age of twenty-two."

Dr. Clifford's career at the University was in every way most brilliant.

He continued his studies through eleven years at University College, Gower Street, and the School of Mines. He took the B.A. and M.A. degrees, being bracketed first of his year in the latter, the B.Sc. with honours in logic and moral philosophy, and the LL.B. with honours in the principles of legislation.

These triumphs are all the more noteworthy because the Doctor had no early advantages. The ground-work of his knowledge was acquired entirely through his own efforts, and in spite of every difficulty. How few young men are there who would, after working for long hours all day at an exacting employment, be prepared to devote five hours a day to their books.

This thirst for knowledge and steady determination to allow nothing to thwart him in his noble ambition has been characteristic of the man ever since, and thus however hard the task, however numerous the claims upon his time and strength, it is only necessary for him to know the need, and the burden will be taken up cheerfully.

CHARLES SPENCE.

Digitized by Google

THIS STATELY BUILDING, ONCE A DUCAL PALACE FAMOUS FOR ITS LITERARY GATHERINGS, IS NOW "THE ROYAL HOSPITAL FOR INCURABLES."

A Home for the Hopeless.

THE ROYAL HOSPITAL FOR INCURABLES AT PUTNEY HEATH.

BY ROBERT VINCENT.

BETTER than a volume of sermons is an hour spent within that "palace of pain" at Putney Heath—the Royal Hospital for Incurables. Lessons may there be learned which are sadly needed by thousands of dilettante folk of all classes who pass their lives fretting about petty imaginary grievances.

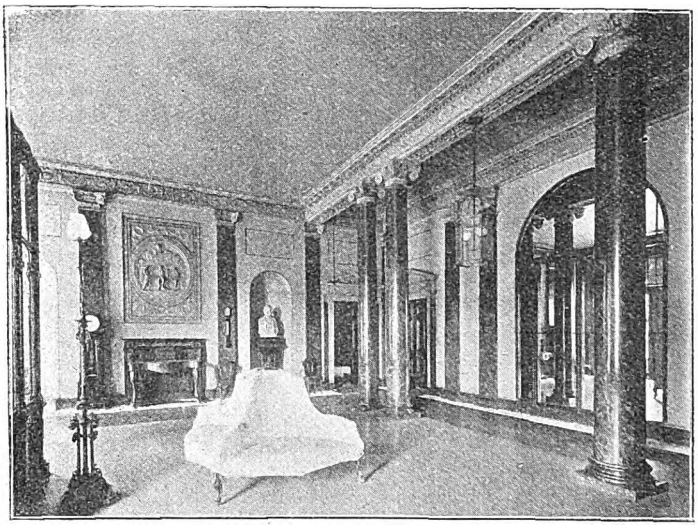
What an abode of human tragedy is here! It is a palace fit for a king to dwell in, in the midst of a lordly domain of flowering gardens and cool and shady lawns, surrounded by beautiful scenery, and bounded on the horizon by the blue line of the Surrey hills.

We enter. Here are lofty halls, enriched with frescoes, and evidences of the sculptor's art; everything calculated to enchant the imagination and the senses, Nature without presenting herself in her most attractive guise and art within displaying her treasures. All that externals can bestow is here for happiness, all, alas, but the one thing by which alone physical happiness at least is possible. Not one of the inmates of this lordly pleasure house—for such it originally was—but who has entered upon his or her inheritance through the door of despair, knowing full well that never might they recross that threshold into the busy world of joys and sorrows, never again rejoin the family circle, never realise earthly hopes or ambitions. This glorious palace was for them to be a life-long prison, a prison with golden bars.

Hopelessly incurable! Is it possible to imagine the awful significance of such a verdict to a sufferer and his friends? If the family be wealthy it may be possible to keep the poor stricken one within the circle, but if they be poor, what then? For his own good and for theirs they must part, though the wrench tear their heartstrings.

But this palace is not monopolised by pain and suffering. Thank God, there grow within it other and lovelier plants, of moral and spiritual beauty—Christian resignation, forgetfulness of self, gratitude for kindness shown, brotherly and sisterly love, a better understanding of spiritual things, and a sure and certain hope of perfect peace and joy when God in his own good time shall see fit to take them to the heavenly palace where pain may never enter.

Digitized by Google



THE HALL, FAMOUS FOR ITS BEAUTIFUL ADAMS' DECORATIONS.

A large number of the inmates owe their lifelong incarceration to paralysis, and a larger number still to chronic rheumatism. Few can have any conception of the terrible forms which this last disease may take. Limbs are twisted and distorted into all sorts of terrible shapes, and some of the poor folk never know what it is to pass an hour without pain. Yet in almost every case they are permeated with a beautiful spirit of patience, resignation, and thankfulness for what is being done for them. One of their chief consolations is that all fear of their future has been removed; they will never again be a burden to their friends, but will always have a shelter and loving care until the end. There are people of all ages in the Home, from over eighty downwards. For, although they are acknowledged incurable, life often seems to suit itself to pain and disease.

One poor man is not only totally blind but has almost lost all sensation through paralysis, though every night he gets a spasmodic contraction of the muscles which gives him such torture as in the dark ages was inflicted by the rack. He was formerly a sailor, and his sad condition was brought about through his ship taking fire, making it necessary for him to take a hurried leap into a boat. He misjudged the distance, receiving shocking internal injuries.

One of the great panaceas of trouble here, as elsewhere, is work. The patients are not required to do anything, but those that are able are glad to thus lighten the hours, the women with their needle, and the men with wood-carving or other suitable occupations. If anything can add to the pathos of the condition of these poor creatures it is when the sufferer is young. Lying all day on a long wheeled couch is a sweet-faced young woman with pretty blue eyes and flaxen hair. She had beautiful hands once—now they hardly look like hands at all, so frightfully distorted are they with rheumatism. Yet, though every movement must be pain, she is indefatigable with her crochet hook, producing a wealth of beautiful work, and she is always so happy and cheerful, and solicitous for the welfare of others, never speaking of her own life's blight.

On fine days the verandah and assembly room are peopled by women workers. One, who has artistic talent, has a paint brush within her aching hand, and she turns out really beautiful work on china. But it is not only those who are able to keep about in the living rooms who work, there are some who, though they are unable to leave their beds, with rare unselfishness make shawls and comforters, which they sometimes present to visitors for the use of poor folk outside. There is one little lady who is never able to leave her bedroom, but she sits all day by the west window, behind flowers and shrubs, stitching, stitching with deft fingers at some soft material, making dainty children's smock frocks. Working for others! Ah, here we have the the secret of such happiness as there is to be found in this abode of suffering!

Every year, in the month of June, on certain three consecutive days there are great doings at the Hospital. This is on the occasion of the annual bazaar, by means of which much of the work done is disposed of. The workers may earn a little pocket-money for themselves, for though they have small need of money it is pleasant for them to have something to provide for little personal tastes and requirements. Even those who are not able to work receive benefit from these bazaars. The Hospital has many friends who count it a privilege and a pleasure to be allowed to work for the non-workers' stall, which represents those whose light has gone out, and whose limbs are too stiff and too painful to work.

Digitized by Google

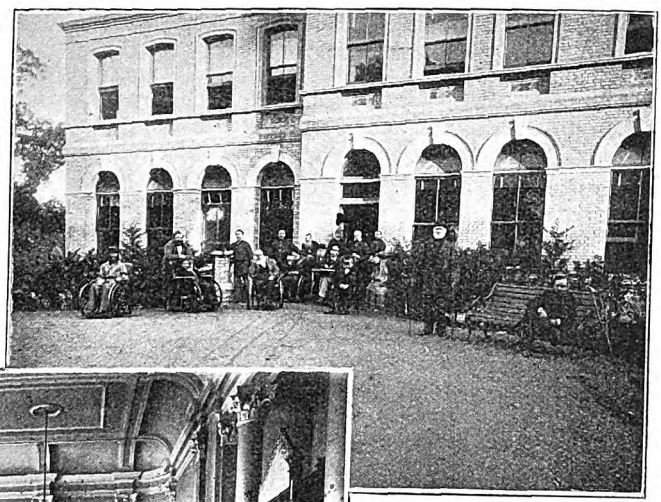
But, for all that, life at the hospital would be wearisome were it not for other pleasant breaks. For the few—alas, a small percentage—who are able to go out sometimes, there is a donkey-carriage, or, if they can walk, so much the better; but by far the greatest proportion of the two hundred sufferers may never stir from the Hospital from week's end to week's end. But how eagerly the Sunday services are looked forward to by the large number who congregate in the assembly room, and what a flutter of joyful expectation seems to go through the same hall as a concert or a sort of family party is about to be given; then is the Royal Hospital a place of peace and beauty, and well do the patients know it.

The pale wan faces that form the centre of the long rows of chairs are lighted up with pleasure and expectation of a musical treat. Both ladies and gentlemen have taken some pains with their toilets, the ladies' attire being brightened up with ribbons and laces, while the gentlemen look quite festive—those whose infirmities enable them to wear them—in immaculate collars and brand-new ties. Most of the entertainers are friends of the patients, and this, of course, enhances enormously the pleasure and interest of the audience.

These red-letter days live long in the memory of these afflicted people, and such occasional breaks in the monotony of their lives give an amount of pleasure of which those whose days are filled with pleasurable excitements can have no conception.



AN AFTERNOON IN THE GROUNDS.

THE ASSEMBLY ROOM—A MAGNIFICENT APARTMENT—WHERE THE PATIENTS SEE THEIR FRIENDS.

But what enables them to bear their lot without murmur or complaint, to always wear cheerful and smiling faces through all the pain and weariness which fill their lives, comes from a far deeper and truer source of comfort than any external pleasures can give. It comes from the peace of God, which, working in the heart, enables man, even in the darkest hour of trial, to always catch sight of the silver lining that lurks behind the cloud; and their lives are to them a never-failing source of gratitude.

Digitized by Google

And in truth everything that human love and sympathy can do to render life less burdensome is cheerfully performed, every resource of medical skill to mitigate their sufferings is freely employed in the Royal Hospital for Incurables. The Hospital is known as the "Home" among the patients, for the dread which fell upon their hearts with such a deadly chill, the dread of leaving their own family circle and entering an institution without hope of ever mingling in the world again, soon gives place to altered feelings—gratitude for the kindness of which they have daily evidence, and a growing affection for the place itself. Life-long friendships spring up between the patients who occupy the same rooms, and these companions in affliction share each other's joys and sorrows through many a long year, and become to each other the embodiment of that lost home life which they left with such a pang. As already indicated, it is a mistake to suppose that the duration of life in the hospital, in spite of the grievous maladies with which the inmates are afflicted, is necessarily short. The improved conditions—the good food, careful nursing, and healthful surroundings—which they could never have hoped for in their own homes gives to the patients quite a new lease of life.

The "oldest inhabitant" is an old lady, who has been an inmate of the Hospital for 46 years, and who was admitted as a patient into the original home at Carshalton when the present magnificent building, or at least the mucleus of it—for it has since been extensively added to—was a ducal palace.

There are several others who have completed their term of 30 years' residence, and who may yet eclipse the record of the happy old lady who now holds it.

No name, among the great philanthropists of the last century, is worthier of honour than that of Dr. Andrew Reed, through whose self-sacrificing labours so much has been done to alleviate the sufferings of the most afflicted classes in the community—the victims of incurable maladies both mental and physical.

Though a poor Nonconformist Minister, Dr. Reed set himself to grapple with this great problem, which had been practically untouched, and besides establishing the Royal Hospital for Incurables, he founded the Earlswood Asylum for Idiots.

It was in 1854 that the first steps were taken to provide a refuge for Incurables on anything like an adequate scale. A home was established at Carshalton, but the number who craved admittance soon became so great that it proved quite inadequate to house a tithe of the sufferers. It was just at this time that the beautiful mansion known as Melrose Hall, which had been formerly the residence of the Duke of Sutherland, came into the market. Melrose Hall, besides being the centre of rank and fashion, had a more enduring charm: it had drawn together the most celebrated men of letters of the time, and Sir Walter Scott had once been a member of its famous literary coterie.

The beautiful decorations in the hall and in the principal rooms were wrought by Adams, the famous architect, and are an unique feature of the building.

It will be easily believed that to keep up this splendid charity, which supports no less than 223 persons in the Hospital itself, at a cost of £69 per annum each, and 682 pensioners who reside in their own homes and draw a pension ranging from £20 a year, is a task which only the utmost vigilance on the part of its secretary and committee enables them to carry out. The assured income of the Hospital is £3,500, while the sum necessary for its maintenance is £32,000—an enormous margin which times of depression render it very difficult to bridge over.

But they have one appeal which has hitherto proved irresistible — the condition of the sufferers, from the hopelessness of their complaints, is the most pitiable imaginable, and, from this very hopelessness, less provision has been made for them than for any other class. The undertaking is one of the most serious magnitude, for, unlike the patients in other hospitals, each inmate must be supported for life.

At the present time we are informed £5,000 is wanted immediately to pay pressing liabilities—a need which has only to be known to be readily met by a people whose delight is to co-operate with what may be deemed a national work.

ROBERT VINCENT.

Digitized by Google

LITERARY JOTTINGS.

By J. CUTHBERT HADDEN.

WHAT an interesting volume might be written about our nursery rhymes! Of course the story of "Blue Beard" and "Cinderella" and "Mother Goose" and other leading favourites has often been told, but there are a great many lesser-known and yet familiar rhymes of the origin of which nobody seems to know anything. Who, for example, knows about "Jack Horner"? I am sure I didn't, until reading through Mrs. Charles Bagot's "Links with the Past" the other day, I came upon Jack's true history.

It seems that Jack was a serving-boy to a great abbot of Glastonbury. The abbot, thinking to propitiate Henry VIII., sent him the abbey title deeds disguised in a pie. Jack Horner thought he would like to taste the pie, and opened it, but to his alarm found only the title deeds, which he hid. The King, not receiving them, sent to dissolve the monastery. Horner and his relatives now came forward, and obtained and kept a good slice of the abbey lands. "Jack Horner's estates," says Mrs. Bagot, "have descended in the female line to the present Lord Ilchester." So, then, there can be little doubt about the truth of the story. At the same time, I should like to hear Lord Ilchester's version of how he came by the estates in question.

Most people if asked who wrote the famous song of "Annie Laurie" would probably reply that the author was a now forgotten minstrel of the olden time. The original version of the song was certainly written long enough ago—one hundred and eighty years at least—but the song which everybody sings now was written by a Scottish gentlewoman, Lady John Scott, who died last year at a ripe old age. It was known that she had written other verses, but these were seen for the most part only by her friends. It is now announced that they will be collected and published in a volume under the editorship of Miss Warrender, who will contribute a memoir of the author. It is interesting to know that the Maxwelton estate is still held by a Laurie.

This seems to be the season for second-hand book catalogues. Some people, and literary people, too, tell me they put such things in the waste-paper basket unread. They miss one of the greatest pleasures of the bookman's life, for the mere reading of a second-hand book list is a joy of no mean extent. Leigh Hunt knew all about it. "A catalogue," said he, "is not a mere catalogue or list of saleables, as the uninitiated may fancy. Even a common auctioneer's catalogue of goods and chattels suggests a thousand reflections to a peruser of any knowledge. Judge, then, what the case must be with a catalogue of books. We speak on this subject from the most literal experience, for often and often have we cut open a new catalogue of old books with all the fervour of a first love; often read one at tea, nay, at dinner, and have put crosses against dozens of volumes in the list, out of the pure imagination of buying them, the possibility being out of the question." Of course!

It is these imaginary acquisitions from the dealers' lists that make the great pleasure of the reading. You "mark down" your purchases as sportsmen mark down partridges in September, knowing all the time that the books can never be yours. Or, if you are lucky enough to have the means to justify an order, there is still plenty of excitement about the business. There is the risk of being too late in your offer. There is the wild hope of achieving a bargain that will make your acquaintances among bookworms green with envy. If you are too late, you console yourself by the thought that you are just so much money in pocket. If the books arrive in fair condition, there is the pleasure of trying to turn every goose into a swan. And even the keenest disappointment may afterwards prove to have been but a passing cloud, and the glory of the purchase will shine forth in a splendour that you never dreamt of when you despatched your order. By all means let the dealers continue to send their catalogues. The slippered ease of the fireside these long dreary evenings would not be nearly so delightful without them.

Digitized by Google

I have lately been reading Mr. Andrew Lang's recently published monograph on Tennyson, in Messrs. Blackwood's series. One of the most interesting points discussed is the old question of Tennyson's so-called "plagiarisms." Mr. Lang's view is eminently sensible. That Tennyson sometimes gave expression to a sentiment or feeling in the words of certain of his predecessors is true enough; but that he consciously and deliberately stole from these predecessors no reasonable person would seek to affirm. The stock of man's ideas is very limited after all, and there must be repetition. You can't say nowadays anything about love and the stars and life and death and spring and summer that somebody has not said long ago.

And then there is such a thing as unconscious reproduction by automatic memory. You think you are saying something original when, as a matter of fact, you are simply repeating something you have read or heard. Scott, confessedly, as Mr. Lang reminds us, was apt to reproduce the phrases of others without knowing it, and once he unwittingly borrowed from a poem by the valet of one of his friends! If that had happened in our day some little-minded, Argus-eyed literary detective would have promptly exposed him in the literary journals. The literary detective may have his uses, but as a rule he is a very foolish person. You remember Mr. Punch's parody of his treatment of poor Alexander Smith:—

"Most women have no character at all."—POPE.

"No character the servant woman asked."—SMITH.

This is the kind of plagiarism that the literary detective too often discovers.

A wonderful discovery has been made. A German writer has found that Charles Lamb was an authority, not on roast pig, but on the history of the Jews. How does he make it out? It is a very simple matter. The German sees in the "Essays of Elia" a treatise on the prophet Elijah or Elias. Of course he can never have read the essays, but that only adds to the humour of the discovery. One wonders what Lamb would have thought to find himself thus transformed into a historian of the prophet of fire. I imagine the first thing he would have wanted to do would be to examine the bumps of the Teuton.

So we are going to have a new life of the author of "Tom Bowling." It should prove an interesting work, especially as the writer is a great-grandson of the tuneful Charles, and must have a good deal of fresh material at his command. I hope he won't forget to tell that laughable story which Dibdin used himself to tell in one of his entertainments. As he was travelling to the Land's End he met some Cornishmen bearing music books and instruments. "Where are you going?" said Charles. "To church, to practise our music for Sunday," was the reply. "Whose music do you sing?" asked the poet. "Oh! Handel, Handel!" answered the men. "Don't you find Handel's music rather difficult?" said Dibdin. "Yees, it war, at first, but we alter'd un, and so we does very well with un now." This was conclusive: the "bard of the ocean" threw them a crown piece and bade them drink the health of the author of "Tom Bowling." I may state as a rather interesting fact that another great-grandson of Dibdin's died recently in Edinburgh. He was a man of some literary and musical culture, and had bought the house in Howard Place in which Robert Louis Stevenson was born.

There is another new book about which I should like to have a little chat, and that is Mr. Horace G. Hutchinson's "Dreams and Dreaming," published by Messrs. Longman. The subject is of interest to all of us, for I suppose we all dream. I have, indeed, met people who declared that they had never known what it was to dream; but I imagine this means only that they had no waking recollection of their dreams. I do not believe that the brain ever rests in the sense that the body rests. Its very existence implies movement of a kind, and the only difference between its action during sleep and during our waking hours is that in the one case we control it by the will, and in the other case we don't. When we sleep the brain goes on working, unconsciously to us, but working nevertheless. It is even a question whether during sleep the brain does not perform two separate fuctions. It may, for example, produce what we call a dream, and it may also be engaged in some mental process akin to the process of wakeful thought.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Hutchinson has an interesting suggestion in this connection. He adduces the case of the schoolboy who goes to bed having learnt rather imperfectly certain lines which he has to get off by heart for to-morrow's lesson. In the morning the boy, as likely as not, can repeat the lines without a single mistake. Has he been dreaming about them? Not at all. He has been dreaming about cricket or football, or playing marbles, or snowballing, or anything else that engages a boy's attention during the day. Mr. Hutchinson's theory, therefore, is that the brain has been busy during the night getting off these lines on its own account. Of course, we cannot prove this; and we must remember, besides, that there is a possible explanation in the fact that the brain as well as the body must be capable of better work after a night's refreshing sleep. But Mr. Hutchinson's theory is sufficiently plausible to be worth considering.

There is another curious point. Can we dream at will? In other words, can we, by thinking a great deal about a certain subject or person before we go to sleep, make sure of dreaming about that subject or person? Mr. Hutchinson answers with an emphatic negative, and I fancy he will be supported by the large majority of dreamers. If it were possible to determine the nature of our dreams beforehand we should always have pleasant dreams; whereas I believe the general experience is that the greater number of our dreams are decidedly unpleasant. I cannot see that anything is to be made out of the cases which are usually cited in support of the theory that you may dream at will. People remind you that when Dr. Gregory when to bed with a hot-water bottle he dreamt that he was burning his feet in an attempt to scale Mount Etna. Dr. Reid, again, they will tell you, put a plaster on his head before going to sleep, and then dreamt that he was being scalped by Red Indians! This is not really dreaming at will.

Just one more point. Mr. Hutchinson cites a considerable number of what he calls premonitory dreams. They are nearly all of what the Scotch call the "uncanny sort." Very interesting they are in their way, too; but most of them have the serious drawback of having been recorded after the occurrence of the event which they are alleged to have foretold. I have always a suspicion of these fulfilments. One has only the word of the dreamer for them, and something more than that is wanted. If you dream tonight that a dear friend is going to die a year hence, you ought to write down your dream in the morning and have it attested by witnesses. If at the time foretold your friend dies, you will then have sufficiently good evidence to support the theory of premonitory dreams. Of course, a single case of this kind would not be enough; it might be a mere coincidence. But if it could be proved in the way I have indicated that a certain percentage of these warning dreams came true, then we should know that there is really something in dreams after all—that they are more than the airy nothings of the brain, as most people suppose them to be.

J. CUTHBERT HADDEN.

Digitized by Google

SPOILS OF THE SEA.

Photograph by Lafayette.

Digitized by Google

ON DOING A GOOD DAY'S WORK.

By the Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

LONGFELLOW'S village blacksmith felt that "something accomplished, something done, had earned a night's repose"; and I suppose that he did little else than shoe the farmer's horses, or put new shares to their ploughs; yet he had the perpetual consciousness that he was doing something in the world, contributing to its well-being, performing a necessary part in the machinery of the village-life. It is not to be supposed that the honest man did his work for the money it brought him, but for the love of doing it, the pleasure of ministering, however humbly, to the common weal. However well he were paid, it would be a source of infinite regret and shame if his work were superficially and perfunctorily executed; if a horse were lamed because the nail was driven too far home, or a day's work in the sowing-time were lost because the share broke in mid-furrow.

This is the ideal of all good work. Too many work for the wage to be paid them at the end of the week, and become so degraded in their aim that they will only put in the best work when they are promised the highest pay. Let the remuneration be second-rate, their work will be second-rate; let the workshop be a peasant's cottage, their style of workmanship will lack the finish which would certainly be put in for a palace or church. This appraising of work by the amount of wage it will bring is vicious in the extreme, and sooner or later begets a perfunctory, superficial, and mean disposition. The man who reserves his best work for the best pay will ultimately be content to put in the semblance of the best work, though it be a bit of arrant scamping, in order to secure, as soon as he may, the promised wage; in this case, however, it should scorch his hand as the wage of unrighteousness.

Do you think that the old monks, who built religiously, and for the eye of God, stopped to ask whether some curiously-carved stone was intended for the vaulted ceiling, or the ornamentation of the doorway through which successive generations of admiring pilgrims would pass? It was enough to be permitted to put one piece of carving in the house raised for the honour and glory of God; there must be nothing inferior there; nothing that would cause the carver shame if he met the memory of it in any world; nothing that would seem contemptible to future generations if it should drop from its place to lie within the easy inspection of every passer-by.

Can you imagine a true artist painting an inferior picture because it would be skied in an exhibition, or sold cheap at an auction? He would tell you that he dared not do it. He would be untrue to his loftiest ideals; and if he permitted himself to fall so low, he would soon lose his power of realising his dreams, and deteriorate into a sorry hack.

Would a physician who was inspired with the true spirit of his profession reserve his deepest insight, his longest patience, his most skilful treatment for the rich, whose golden sovereigns would freely pour into his banking account, whilst the child of the peasant might take its chance?

And if each of these is expected to do his work in the world for the honour of his profession and the lasting benefit of men, why should not all men and women do whatever God has given them to do for the same high end? Not for fee or reward, nor for wages which are, of course, necessary and deserved, nor for the applause and praise of one or many, but because work is honourable and noble; because a true man finds his highest reward in putting his noblest self into all he does; because it is a scandal and shame to be content with anything less than the best; because God and His high angels are looking on; and because scamped work will return on us in other worlds to confront and shame us. There is no surer sign of deterioration of character than contentment with inferior work.

Digitized by Google

We are accustomed to speak of our work as a vocation or calling. "Let every man," says the Apostle, "abide in the calling in which he was called." Some are called to be servants, some to be masters; some to administer five talents, others one; but every man is as much called of God to his life-work as the minister is called to preach, or the physician to combat disease. Do you expect these to be above questions of £ s. d.—there is the same obligation on yourself? Would you think it mean of the servant of God to preach at half or quarter power, if he were to receive but a trifling solatium; or to cease preaching if he shall have realised a competence? But are you not guilty of similar meanness, if, in altered conditions, you permit your conduct to be affected by sordid considerations? Some men are called to sweep chimneys, and others to be Archbishops, but in the sight of the Almighty there may be less inequality than we suppose; and the sweep will stand highest at last, if he has driven the soot out of the intricacies of old chimneys with nobler purpose than the Archbishop has administered his diocese.

What counts in God's sight is not the work we do, but the way in which we do it. Two men may work side by side in the same factory or store; the one, at the end of the day, shall have put in a solid block of gold, silver, and precious stones, whilst the other has contributed to the fabric of his life-work an ephemeral, insubstantial addition of wood, hay and stubble destined to be burnt. What is the difference between those two? To the eye of man, there is none; to the eye of God, much; because the one has been animated, in the lowliest, commonest actions, by the lofty motive of pleasing God, and doing the day's work thoroughly and well, whilst the other wrought to escape blame, to secure the commendation of man, or to win a large wage. Never be ashamed of honest toil, of labours, however trivial or menial, which you can execute beneath the inspiration of noble aims; but be ashamed of the work which, though it makes men hold their breath in wonder, yet, in your heart, you know to have emanated from earthly, selfish, and ignoble aims.

What we make, makes us. The slight gauze on which the mantle of the incandescent light is formed flares away in a moment, but the solid fabric wrought on it by chemical agents will be luminous for a thousand hours. So the things we make in the world pass away as a wreath of flame, but the motives with which we do them go to make ourselves for better or worse. If you do your work in slovenliness, you become a sloven. If you do your work perfunctorily, you become a hypocrite. If you work only for the eye of man, the sense of God will die out of your life.

Men fret, for instance, at being tied to a clerk's desk. Surely, they say, anyone could direct these envelopes, copy these letters, cast up these interminable columns; and, in their contempt for their life-work, they fail to see its very unimportance is giving them a better opportunity of cultivating punctuality, patience, fidelity and similar passive virtues, than they would have if they played a more conspicuous part in the world's life, or in spheres where certain other considerations nerve to supreme efforts, which in their case can only be called forth by lofty principle.

At the end of life's brief day we shall be rewarded, not according to the work we have done, but to the faithfulness with which we have endeavoured to do our duty, in whatever sphere.

The servant who prepares my food, or saves me the necessity of doing the many duties of my home, thus setting me free to write, or preach or minister to men, will, in God's reckoning, be credited with no inconsiderable share of the results of anything which may have been achieved through my endeavours. The great deed that blesses the race seems to be wrought by one, but it is really the result of the contributed quotas of scores and hundreds of unnamed and unnoticed workers, and these, in so far as they entered into the spirit of his labours, shall share the reward.

This is the way to do a good day's work. Begin it with God; do all in the name of the Lord Jesus and for the glory of God; count nothing common or unclean in itself—it can only be so when the motive of your life is low. Be not content with eye service but as servants of God do everything from the heart, and for His "Well done." Ask Him to kindle and maintain in your heart the loftiest motives; and be as men that watch for the coming of the Master of the house.

F. B. MEYER.

Digitized by Google

THE SARDINIA ARCHWAY.
Where the Gordon Rioters worked their will.

DICKENS'S LONDON.

By SIDNEY E. JACKSON.

Photographs by H. F. Hatton.

THE London of Dickens's day will have become before long nothing more than a memory. One after another the buildings and streets whose names have been made for ever famous by the great novelist's pen have passed away, until now those that remain in anything like the same condition and with the same appearance that they possessed when he wrote ot them can be counted upon the fingers of one hand.

Perhaps nothing makes one realise more the extent to which London must have changed during the past thirty or forty years than the disappearance one after another of Dickens landmarks—not only of buildings which the great novelist knew and loved, but of whole streets that he has immortalised. Take, for instance, some of the recent demolitions which have been brought about by the County Council's scheme for a Strand to Holborn thoroughfare. Only a few weeks ago the writer went to look once again at the barber's shop in Kingsgate Street, High Holborn, over which Mrs. Gamp was wont to dwell.

This was one of the most interesting of Dickens landmarks, because, all through the years since Martin Chuzzlewit was penned, time had wrought few changes and those of an insignificant character. The house until a month or two ago stood just as Dickens described it, and the shop was still that of "an easy shaver and a fashionable hairdresser," although the bird-fancying branch of the business had been abandoned. But on his most recent visit the writer found that not only the historic little house had been pulled down but the whole of Kingsgate Street had also disappeared.

Digitized by Google

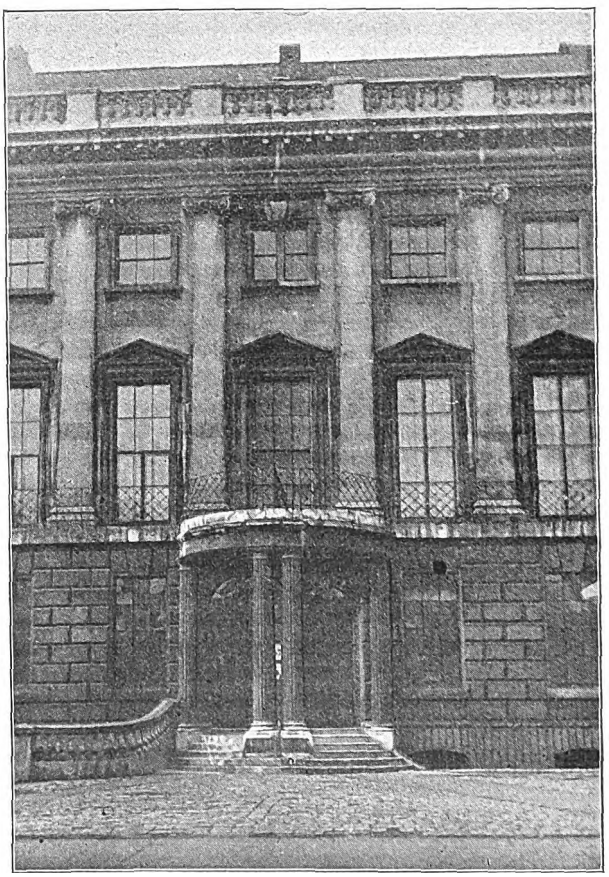
Many others of the buildings and thoroughfares in this neighbourhood associated with Dickens's novels are doomed, and those lovers of the great writer who are not content with merely reading his works but delight in tracing the characters and the scenes and venues to their origin might do far worse than spend half-a-day walking round about Holborn and Lincoln's Inn Fields with their immediate neighbourhoods.



MR. TULKINGHORN'S HOUSE, NO. 58, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS.

Dickens was a constant visitor to this house, the home of his great friend, John Forster. It is shortly to be pulled down.

There is the famous and picturesque Sardinia Archway, leading from the Fields into Sardinia Street, where the Gordon rioters worked their will and burned the private chapel of the Sardinian minister, whose house was next to the arch. The chapel has been replaced by the more pretentious church of SS. Anselm and Cecilia but the arch remains the same, and in the quiet of Lincoln's Inn one can so easily go back in mind to the period of "Barnaby Rudge."

By far the most interesting and well-known of Dickens landmarks is "The Old Curiosity Shop" in Portsmouth Street, Lincoln's Inn, preserved in much the same condition as the novelist found and left it, except that the old-fashioned, tiny window-panes have given place to a more modern front of glass, and instead of being "one of those receptacles for old and curious things . . . suits of mail standing like ghosts in armour here and there; fantastic carvings brought from monkish cloisters, rusty weapons of various kinds, distorted figures in china, and wood, and iron, and ivory, tapestry and strange furniture that might have been designed in dreams," it is in the hands of a waste paper merchant, Mr. Poole, who is only too willing to show visitors over the place.

"The Old Curiosity Shop" has, indeed, become a Mecca of Dickensites, for throughout the summer months, when American tourists are swarming in London, wagonettes laden with visitors are constantly arriving to see the curious little house that dates back to the days of Charles II., for the place was put up, along with Portsmouth Street, and many buildings in Lincoln's Inn Fields, by the Duchess of Portsmouth (Louise de Keroualle), one of the Merry Monarch's favourites. She kept her cows in the fields, and the little building, afterwards to become famous as "The Old Curiosity Shop," was her private dairy. It is a little known fact, which may be easily verified, that many of the older buildings in Lincoln's Inn still bear upon their façades the rose of England and the French fleur-de-lys alternating, indicating the countries of the Duchess's birth and adoption.

Digitized by Google

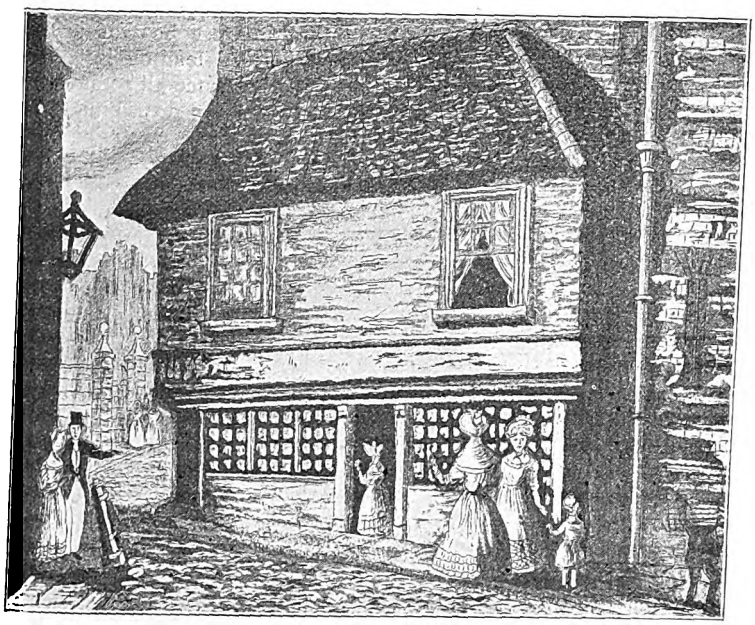
To return to "The Old Curiosity Shop." Having entered the shop, one can pass into the "back parlour" and easily follow Dickens in the opening chapter of his novel, where he says the old man led him through the place he had already seen from without, into a small sitting-room behind. All authorities are agreed that this is really the shop the novelist had in his mind, and it is a matter for satisfaction that, contrary to what has been stated, the new "improvements" are not to entail the destruction of "The Old Curiosity Shop"—at any rate for the present.

THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP.

Mr. Poole declares that by far the largest proportion of his visitors are Americans, the fact affording another proof that Britons, and especially Londoners, are the least interested in their own treasures. It is scarcely a matter for surprise that at the time when the Chicago World's Fair was preparing, more than one envoy from the other side of the Atlantic came to London with a view to purchase "The Old Curiosity Shop," but Mr. Poole was not by any means anxious to lose his historical dwelling. It is unlikely that the building will ever disappear entirely, for



THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP IN 1837.
This ancient house was built in Charles II.'s reign, and was the dairy of the Duchess of Portsmouth.
By permission of Mr. H. Poole, Publisher of the Engraving.

Digitized by Google

the permission of the landlord for its removal has been obtained by the lessee, and should "modern improvements" necessitate that it disappears from its present site, there are, no doubt, many, if not in this country, at any rate in America, who would be willing to undertake its demolition and its re-erection elsewhere brick by brick.

If Sarah Gamp's home in Kingsgate-street has ceased to exist, there is still an opportunity left of seeing the Black Bull in Holborn where she nursed Mr. Lewsome and moralised upon "what a blessed thing it is to make sick people happy in their beds and never mind one's self as long as one can do a service." The exterior remains unchanged and one can even see the window at which Mrs. Gamp stood just after her arrival at the Inn and remarked, "I'm glad to see a parapidge in case of fire and lots of roofs and chimney pots to walk upon." "Parapidge" and "chimney pots" are still there, but they will not remain long, for the Black Bull is coming down and a more modern pile of buildings will be erected on its site.

When in this neighbourhood it is well worth while to pay a visit to No. 58, Lincoln's Inn Fields. It is the former home of Mr. Tulkinghorn, the attorney-at-law and legal adviser of Sir Leicester Dedlock. Here the lawyer met his tragic death as described in "Bleak House," and the room in which the deed is said to have taken place still exists, although the painted ceiling out of which the "pertinacious Roman" pointed at the victim "lying face downwards on the floor, shot through the heart" has long since been whitewashed over. Dickens's description of the house is very apt. "Here," he says, "in a large house, formerly a house of state, lives Mr. Tulkinghorn. It is let off in sets of chambers now; and in these shrunken fragments of its greatness lawyers lie like maggots in nuts. But its roomy staircases, passages, and ante-chambers, still remain."

Dickens knew the building well, for in it John Forster, the great novelist's biographer and "dear and trusty friend" lived, and in his rooms many literary celebrities of the day foregathered. It was here that Dickens read aloud to his friends "The Chimes" which he had just completed, and that reading, as Forster himself tells us, "was the germ of those readings to large audiences, by which, as much as by his books, the world knew him in his later life." The house is coming down in connection with the new Strand to Holborn thoroughfare, and before long "the place thereof will know it no more."

All about Chancery Lane, Cursitor Street, and the various Inns of Courts, are Dickens associations, but the places which he knew and wrote of are changed completely from the great novelist's day. Only Staple Inn retains its former appearance, and the corner house of the inner quadrangle, bearing the mysterious inscription $\frac{P}{1747}$ J T is still to be recognised as the home of Mr. Grewgious, Miss Rosa Bud's guardian and "a particularly angular man." The reference is in "Edwin Drood," Dickens's unfinished story, and is the last mention made by him of a particular London house.

Many of the allusions to streets and buildings in London made by Dickens are of a painful or sordid character, but there is one at least which is prettily told —that of the meetings of Tom Pinch and his sister by the fountain in the Temple.

"There was a little plot between them" says Dickens, "that Tom should always come out of the Temple by one way; and that was past the fountain. Coming through Fountain court he was just to glance down the steps leading into Garden court and to look once all round him, and if Ruth had come to meet him, there he would see her; not sauntering, you understand (on account of the clerks), but coming briskly up with the best little laugh upon her face that ever played in opposition to the fountain and beat it all to nothing. . . . The Temple fountain might have leaped up twenty feet to greet the spring of hopeful maidenhood that in her person stole on sparkling through the dry and dusty channels of the Law; the chirping sparrows bred in Temple chinks and crannies might have held their peace to listen to imaginary skylarks, as so fresh a little creature passed."

Of course most of the churches to which Dickens alludes in his novels are still in existence. There is St. George's Church in Borough High Street, where Little Dorrit was married to Arthur Clennam, and there is the parish church of Limehouse referred to over and over again in "Our Mutual Friend." This latter church Dickens knew well from his childhood, for when as a young boy he was brought to London and his family took up its abode in a house in Bayham Street, Camden Town, he was allowed, as one of the few treats of his life, to occasionally visit his godfather, Mr. Huffham, a rigger and mast, oar, and block maker at Limehouse.

Digitized by Google

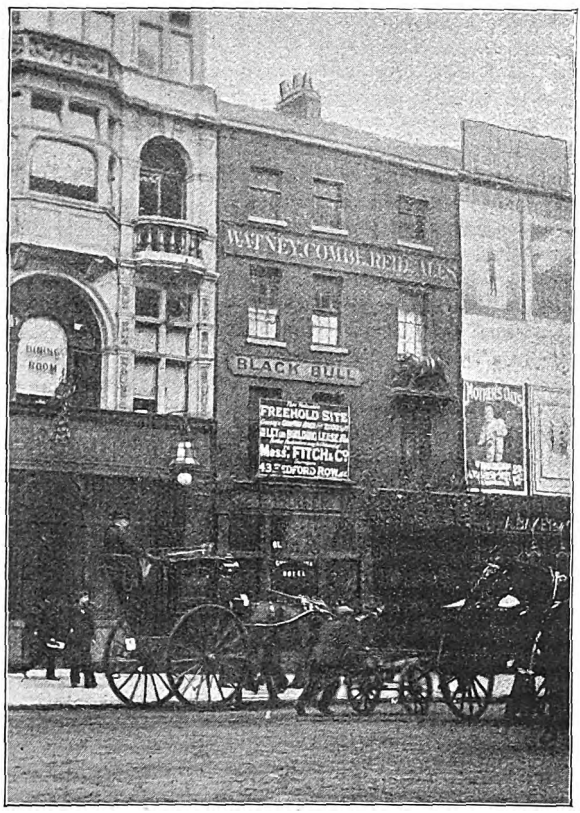
There is one other Dickens landmark in London, or rather the remains of one, which must be referred to—the old Marshalsea Prison in the Borough, of which the novelist wrote in "Little Dorrit," "David Copperfield" and elsewhere. The recollections of his childhood were far from pleasant, and not the least painful were those in connection with his father's sojourn in the debtors' prison.



THE BLACK BULL, HOLBORN.
Where Mrs. Gamp "made sick people happy."

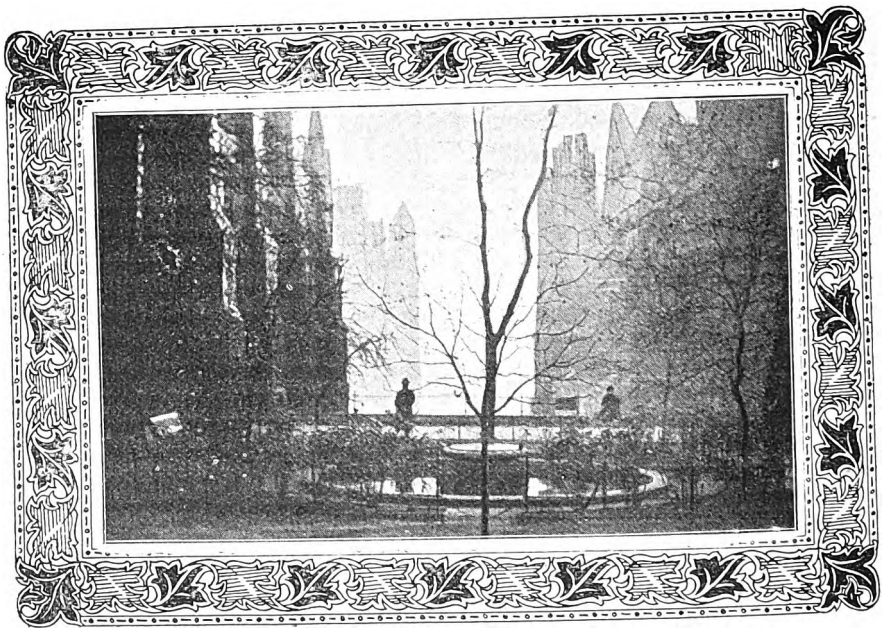
Forster, in his life of the novelist, gives a pathetic account in Dickens's own words of his visit as a child to his father in prison.

"My father," he says, "was waiting for me in the lodge, and we went up to his room (on the top storey but one) and cried very much, and he told me, I remember, to take warning by the Marshalsea, and to observe that if a man had twenty pounds a year and spent nineteen pounds, nineteen shillings and sixpence he would be happy, but that a shilling spent the other way would make him wretched. I see the fire we sat before now; with two bricks inside the rusted grate, one on each side, to prevent its burning too many coals. Some other debtor shared the room with him, who came in by and by, and as the dinner was a joint-stock repast I was sent up to Captain Porter in the room overhead with Mr. Dickens's compliments, and I was his son, and could he, Captain P., lend me a knife and fork?

"Captain Porter lent me the knife and fork with his compliments in return. There was a very dirty lady in his little room, and two wan girls, his daughters, with shock heads of hair. I thought I should not have liked to borrow Captain Porter's comb. The Captain himself was in the last extremity of shabbiness, and if I could draw at all I would draw an accurate portrait of the old, old, brown great coat he wore, with no other coat below it. His whiskers were large; I saw his bed rolled up in a corner, and what plates and dishes and pots he had on a shelf."

This was his first visit to the Marshalsea. His last visit was paid when he was completing "Little Dorrit." "Some of my readers," he says in his preface to that novel, "may have an interest in being informed whether or no any portions of the Marshalsea Prison are yet standing. I myself did not know until I was approaching the end of this story, when I went to look. I found the outer front court yard, often mentioned here, metamorphosed into a butter shop, and I then almost gave up every brick of the jail for

Digitized by Google



THE TEMPLE FOUNTAIN.
Described in "Martin Chuzzlewit" as the meeting place of Tom Pinch and his Sister.

lost. Wandering, however, down a certain adjacent 'Angel Court, leading to Bermondsey,' I came to 'Marshalsea Place,' the houses in which I recognised not only as the great block of the former prison, but as preserving the rooms that arose in my mind's eye when I became Little Dorrit's biographer. . . . A little further on I found the older and smaller wall which used to enclose the pent-up inner prison where nobody was put except for ceremony. Whosoever goes into Marshalsea Place, turning out of Angel Court, leading to Bermondsey, will find his feet on the very paving stones of the extinct Marshalsea Jail, will see its narrow yard to the right, and to the left very little altered, if at all, except that the walls were lowered when the place got free, will look upon the rooms in which the debtors lived, will stand among the crowding ghosts of many miserable years."

But this was a long time ago, and now all that remains of the old Marshalsea prison is the lower portion of the wall which divided it from the churchyard. It may be found by bearing round to the left after entering the yard. A tablet tells its story, and refers to its connection with Little Dorrit.

SIDNEY E. JACKSON.

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Weston's Grandchild.

By LADY VIOLET GREVILLE,

Author of "Nurse Cicely's Renunciation," "The Lost Letter," etc.

"WELL, I think you are entirely in the wrong." John Weston spoke to his mother in a decided and angry tone.

"I can't help it. I feel I'm right, and I don't consider it quite dutiful of you to ask me to sell my old home."

"Why isn't one house as good as another to live in? And we shall never, probably, have such a good offer again."

Mrs. Weston hesitated a moment; then she dropped her knitting and looked full at her son with keen, clear eyes.

"Your father left me the place for my life, in trust for you; the trust is sacred, and I mean to keep it." Her eyes had a far-away look, as though she were registering a promise made to someone in a spiritual world. "You would not have me break my word—you, a good man of business yourself? To sell an ancestral home seems to me almost like selling one's own flesh and blood. I couldn't do it. Don't ask me."

John sighed impatiently. "Mother, you are hopeless," he said. "We are in great need of money. I want money to make my business pay; you want money to live on. That kind of sentimental idea is exploded long ago. It is not practical life."

The old lady looked round at the faded furniture, the worn carpet, the curtains which hung limp from age and perpetual cleaning, and all the evident signs of poverty—that genteel poverty which is so pathetic.

"I am contented," she said quietly.

"Oh, yes," he continued warmly; "you may be. You are old; you have learnt not to care; but I am young, I have my way to make in the world, I must marry and have a family; and what good is an old musty home like this to a pushing, busy man, who wants to get on in the world?"

"It is the home of your fathers."

"By your obstinancy you are ruining me, and you don't seem to understand. Once more I ask you, mother—will you sell the place?"

"I will not," said the old lady firmly. John walked to the window and looked out. The park lay stretched out before him, damp and desolate. A few sheep grazed delicately on the rank grass; the paths were ill-kept and overgrown with weeds; but the timber was magnificent, the old oaks and elms towered towards the sky, and spread their wide umbrageous branches generously.

"At least let me cut down the timber," he said presently.

"No timber shall be cut down while I possess this place." Mrs. Weston's eyes glowed resolutely, and she took up the knitting which lay in her lap. The needles clicked merrily, and out on the staircase the old clock struck four in wheezy tones.

"I have only just time to catch my train," said John Weston, coming back from his survey at the window. "Shall I send Mr. Parchment to talk to you? Perhaps he can explain matters better than I can."

"No lawyer will persuade me to sell the place," said his mother firmly. Mother and son faced each other. They had the same straight nose, the same square chin, the same dark grey eyes; only the son had a quick, impatient way of speaking, while the mother let her words fall quietly and precisely. Mrs. Weston looked a gentlewoman from the tip of the picturesque cap, trimmed with old lace, which crowned her abundant white hair, to the slender white fingers which handled the knitting needles so deftly. She was the product of many generations of civilisation, but she had the strong will of her barbaric forefathers. John was determined also, and the result was a clash and collision between the two strong wills.

Digitized by Google

"You have no affection for me, mother."

"My son, it is because I care for you that I try to do my duty. This house will be yours some day, and, please God, I will keep it intact for you."

"I do not want it," her son said petulantly. "I shall never live here—never set foot in the place from this day!—I swear it—unless you consent to sell it!"

"And you will never come and see me?"

"Never!"

The old lady's face twitched, but she made no remark.

"And how you intend to exist, I know not. Your income is barely sufficient to keep up the place. Hitherto I have helped you, but now I shall do no more. I must think of myself—of my future!"

"And yet I am your mother!" Mrs. Weston spoke with suppressed feeling.

"I don't forget it, though you almost force me to do so. When you change your mind and listen to reason I will come back to you. Till then, good-bye." He put out his hand towards his mother, then withdrew it as by an afterthought, and left the room. Mrs. Weston sat motionless. When the door closed, with a great slam, a tear rose slowly to her eye. She wiped it away with her handkerchief, bent her head for a moment as though thinking, then with an effort she rose and rang the bell. The white-haired butler answered it. Her servants had grown old beside her; the maids, the cook, the butler, had all spent years in her service. Long service was a part of her religion, like the ancestral memories,

"Is Mr. John gone?" she asked.

"Yes, m'm. He is riding down the avenue."

"There will be some changes here, Turner," she said. "Times are bad; I shall have to economise. I can no longer afford to pay you such high wages. You are at liberty to leave if you like."

"I prefer to stay, m'm, even if the wages are lower."

"Very well, Turner, then I shall be glad; but you must tell the other servants I do not intend to keep so many. All those can leave that like to do so." Turner bowed and withdrew, and the establishment dispensed from that day with the services of coachman, kitchenmaid, underhousemaid and footman. A new cook was engaged, whose principal merit consisted in thriftiness. Another person might possibly, under the circumstances, have sold some of the fine old family plate, and consented to dine off china. Not so Mrs. Weston. Even if it consisted only of a potato and a piece of cheese, her dinner was rigidly served on silver, and old Turner took a pride in polishing the plate till you could see your face in it.

John Weston never came near the place again. From time to time news of him reached his mother. He was prospering; he was working hard; he was going to be married. But he never offered to bring his wife to see her, and she asked nothing. She knew this was her punishment, and she was too proud to complain. Little by little, as matters grew worse and the food and fire scantier, the new servants left one by one; but Turner stayed, and his rugged old face softened sometimes with an expression of unspoken pity as he looked at his mistress. Her pride was unshaken, but his kindly eye noticed that her firm elastic gait grew feebler, her voice lower, her energy relaxed. "Some day," he thought, "I shall write to Master John." But time wore on, and he did nothing. The gardener had long ago been discharged, but Mrs. Weston, with the aid of a boy to do the rough work, managed it herself. She might be seen on summer evenings in her shady black hat and a big coarse apron, tying up, watering, pruning and budding. She was proud of her carnations and roses; they seemed to grow better than in the days of her grand gardener. Things flourished in a kind of wild, wasteful way; the creepers now covered the whole front of the house, the magnolia tree annually put forth fragrant flowers, and the Provence roses climbed and blossomed in luxuriant clusters. The old sun-dial stood on the terrace as it had stood for centuries, with its quaint motto: "Gather ye roses while ye may," engraved in coarse characters upon it, and all around the air was sweet with the smell of roses. Within doors things looked more melancholy. The state bedchambers stayed unlived in from one year to another; occasionally a fire warmed the cold chimney, but coals were dear, and Mrs. Weston practised the strictest economy. In winter she never allowed a fire in any room but the small drawing-room where she sat, and in the kitchen. The tapestry flapped loosely against the wall in the draughty halls and passages, and the paper began to peel off in some of the rooms. Poverty was written in large letters on everything, from the moss-grown stable-yard and the empty stalls, to the bare larders and the skimpy fires in the old house. Yet Mrs. Weston was not unhappy. Thanks to the paucity of servants she had plenty to do. She was surrounded by the emblems of the position she clung to, and supported by a sense of right doing.

Digitized by Google

Occasionally neighbours came in to see her—the clergyman's wife or the squire's lady from a distance—though Mrs. Weston never encouraged visitors; she considered them an unnecessary expense. But when they did come, she ordered the big silver teapot to be brought in, and the best old china, and delicately-cut bread-and-butter bountifully spread, so that people said Mrs. Weston always did things well, and was a perfect lady in her ways. Once Mrs. Chasuble, the vicar's wife, walked in, her kindly matronly face wreathed in smiles.

"I'm so glad, my dear Mrs. Weston," she said, wringing her friend's hand warmly.

"What is it?" asked the old lady, vaguely wondering what could have happened.

"Why, the baby—the grandchild, of course! I read it in the paper this morning, and I said to my husband: 'I must run over and congratulate Mrs. Weston, she will be so pleased; her only son's first child.'"

Mrs. Weston kept silence. It was in the paper, then, but of course she had not seen it; she never took in a newspaper; that was one of her petty economies.

"Are you not glad, dear Mrs. Weston? And how is the young mother?—of course you have heard from your son—he naturally would write to you first?"

Mrs. Weston recovered herself. She gulped down a strange sense of sorrow and injustice that seemed to be crushing her, and managed to say in her quietest tone: "Of course we are all delighted. The mother is quite well." She longed to inquire the sex of the child—if it were a boy or a girl—but she dared not. To do so would have been to expose her own ignorance.

Mrs. Chasuble stayed some time chatting and asking questions; she was the mother of a large family herself, and took a lively interest in babies. Mrs. Weston sat on hot coals till she took her departure. Even the appearance of the tea-tray, with its brightly polished silver, scarcely served to withdraw the lively lady's attention from her favourite subject. As soon as she had left, amid a shower of final recommendations and good wishes, Mrs. Weston rang the bell. "Turner," she said, "if you are going into the village and could get me a newspaper, I should be obliged." When the paper was brought her, she carried it to her room and scanned it eagerly. "On the 10th instant, the wife of John Weston, of a son." So it was a son. He would inherit the place—live here some day. A flush overspread Mrs. Weston's pale cheek. How right she had been not to agree to sell it. If John did not care for his old home, his child would. That was certain. He should come here, learn to love it from his earliest infancy, appreciate the fine timber, admire the beautiful sweep of park, and the stately halls and bedchambers. Perhaps, then the latter would be refurnished, painted and repaired, as she had never owned the means to do. Into a happy day-dream the poor lady drifted. She saw the chubby faces of her grandchildren filling the old house with light and laughter; she heard the patter of their merry feet, their clear, high-toned voices chattering to the honoured and beloved grandmother who had kept their heritage intact. Suddenly, into the midst of this happy vision, shattering its ravishment, came the thought of her estrangement from her son. "He will never come here," she thought; "he will never let his children come. I must live alone till I die." Then warm tears began to gather in the dim eyes, and taking up the minature of her son as a child, which stood on her dressing table, she covered it with kisses, and allowed herself to sob piteously.

But externally she never relaxed from her attitude of dignity. Summer faded into winter, and no news ever reached her of her son and the new grandchild. She longed to know if it was alive, if it was well, whom it resembled. She remembered what a pretty child John had been, with blue eyes and curly hair, and she wondered if the baby's eyes were blue. The winter was the most trying time of all the year. The cold nipped the old lady and seemed to freeze her aged blood. Her bed-chamber was like an ice-house, and sometimes she could not sleep for the cold at night, even though she piled blankets and a heavy wadded quilt over her shivering limbs. Then the days were short and cheerless, and the long winter evenings seemed interminable, while she sat knitting by the light of one lamp, the rest of the room lying bathed in dark and melancholy shadow. Hitherto she had kept up her prestige as lady of the manor; the usual charities were doled out, bottles of port wine and coals and blankets at Christmas. This was a part of her fixed rule, that whatever she suffered herself, her dependants should still look to her as the Lady Bountiful, the dispenser of food and warmth. But the resources of her cellar were giving out; the bin containing the port wine was nearly empty, and she had scarcely any money at the bank. To run into debt, even for others, was impossible to this sturdy old lady, and bitterly she realised that this year her Christmas charities would fall far short of their usual munificence. To add to her misfortunes, Turner fell ill. The old servant, who had ministered to her so faithfully, seemed likely to leave her for ever. He had caught a cold, going an errand to the village in the snow, and had kept his bed ever since. The vicar's wife urged her to engage another servant, but Mrs. Weston, true to her principles, would not sanction such an expense. She did not give that as the reason, however. She merely said she could not endure new faces about her. So her loneliness deepened, and through the long winter evenings she sat silent, uncheered by Turner's quiet and unobtrusive attentions. She visited the old man in his room, a low, whitewashed garret, hung round with cuttings from the illustrated papers. The grate was empty, and the cold intense. "You had better have a fire, Turner," she said kindly.

Digitized by Google

"No, m'm," he answered firmly, "not while my mistress does without."

Mrs. Weston made no reply. Stoicism was a part of her nature, and she scarcely thought it strange that her servant should practise the same virtue. After all, he was neither as lonely nor as uncared for as herself. So every day she mounted the stairs to the garret and inquired of the old man how he did, and every day he cheerfully replied: "Better, m'm, thank you." But at last one day he did not answer when she spoke to him, and his eyes looked queer and wandering. Mrs. Weston got frightened. What if he should die—her old Turner, who had lived in her home and served her dinner carefully for forty years! She decided to send for a doctor, and when the cook started to fetch him, remained alone with the invalid. She felt very sad. Probably Turner would die, and then after a bit she would die, and be buried in the little churchyard under the yew tree, and perhaps then John would stand beside her grave and mourn for her. How unforgiving he was! Through all these years he had given no sign of regret or affection. He had married a woman who was a stranger to his mother; his child she had never seen. Then her heart yearned tenderly towards him, and she cried out like David, stretching her arms before her: "My son, O my own Jonathan, come back to me!" But only grim silence answered her, and the old man stirred feebly on his bed.

When the doctor arrived he ordered poultices and hot drinks, and a fire, and plenty of care and food. Then, his visit to the sick-room ended, he went to pay his respects to the lady of the house downstairs. Mrs. Weston stood, tall and erect, with her back to the fireplace, her grey hair primly pushed back under her cap, her worn black silk dress hanging round her in limp folds, dignified and well-bred as usual. "How do you find him, doctor?" she asked, with a transparent attempt at cheerfulness.

"He is very ill," the doctor said gravely, scrutinising the brave old face. "He wants care — but so do you. You are all alone. I will send in a nurse, and then she can attend to you both."

"I will have no nurse," said Mrs. Weston decidedly. "I am quite well, and there are servants to do what is necessary." She used the plural, though the cook alone made up the rest of the establishment. "Turner can have anything he requires."

"You must be very lonely," the doctor continued. "If I were you I should send for your son and his wife to pass Christmas with you. It is not good for you to be so solitary; and the winter has begun sharply."

Digitized by Google

"I did not ask your advice about my affairs," and the old lady lifted her head proudly, "but only to prescribe for my servant. Will he get well?"

"Oh, yes; but he is old, you know, very old; and old people can't expect the health and strength of youth."

Then the doctor took his departure, and drove off in his dogcart to visit the rest of his patients. The snow was falling softly, looking as though it meant to stay. Mrs. Weston watched the wheels of the carriage disappearing in the distance, and her heart sank within her. The solitude was terrible. All day long she should not hear another voice nor see another face. She must spend her Christmas alone, no one caring if she were alive or dead. For a moment her indomitable spirit quailed within her. What if she sent for her son, told him she was ill and alone, and sorry she refused to do his bidding? Then they might all be happy together. But then there was the baby. She could not strip the poor little thing of its inheritance. No; she must endure to the end, and remember the trust her husband had reposed in her. He was a good man; he would not have asked her to do what was impossible. So she took out her knitting and sat down as usual.

The next day was Christmas Eve. She saw from her window the school children wending their way through the falling snow, armed with branches of holly and laurel, for the decoration of the church. If this weather continued, she would not even enjoy the mild excitement of attending public worship. Without a carriage she dared not wade alone and unattended through the soft and treacherous snow. At her age the fireside was the only possible place. Then began a period of terrible mental struggle for the old lady. In her heart she questioned if she had done right after all. Might she not have yielded to her son's wishes, and let herself be guided by his reasons? The price offered for the place was a large one; they could have lived on the proceeds of the sale in comfort, whereas now the old place was a terrible drag on her resources. But then she had promised her husband, and promises were sacred. Her head ached, her thoughts seemed all in a muddle. How cold it was! The cheap coals raked together in a small heap in the middle of the large grate gave out no heat; her hands and feet were almost numb. "And yet I loved John!" she murmured. "I loved him. I did it all for the best—all for the best." The church bells rang out a merry chime. She almost fancied she heard the sound of the Christmas hymn being practised in the church. When she was young she had sung in the choir and taken an interest in the music. It would be warm in the little church, with the lights and the hum and buzz of merry workers. There would be white chrysanthemums on the altar, and bright red holly berries in the form of a cross. She had sent no flowers this year; the fires in her hothouses were long ago extinguished; she was as poor as any villager. She winced at the thought.

Then she remembered that there were no turkey, mince-pies or plum-pudding for her dinner to-morrow. Not that she cared for the food, but times were changed since the old hall resounded to the noise of song and laughter. Now all was silence, solitude and gloom. Even Mrs. Chasuble was not likely to look in. She would be busy with the Sunday-school, and the poor people's gifts, and the two services. The old lady's severe self-possession was failing her at last. She longed, with a heart-sick, inexplicable childish longing, for the clasp of some strong, kind hand, the touch of a loving kiss upon her faded cheek. If the baby had been here, now—that mysterious baby which filled her dreams by night, her waking thoughts by day, and which she felt certain that she was never destined to see! That baby was her stumbling-block, the more so that her absence from it was voluntary. What hindered her from going to her son? Her box was quickly packed, she wanted so little—some linen, her black silk dress, and a clean cap—she could pack it herself, and the cook could fetch a fly from the village. She half rose, quickened with a pleasant sense of excitement; then she remembered the cold, the snow, her age, and, more important than all, her ignorance of her son's whereabouts. No; she must wait. After all these years it would be foolish to change, to undo her long and weary work, the pitiful list of weary economies. Some day the baby would bless her memory, and if she did long for her son—well, she supposed she would get over it. No one yet ever died for want of a few caresses, but the day was long and so cold.

Digitized by Google

She must have slumbered. The fire had died down; the lamp stood on the table, where the cook had evidently placed it while she slept; the Christmas bells were still ringing, and Mrs. Weston raised herself, alert and lively. What was that sound? The back door must be open. She heard voices! Surely the elderly cook was not entertaining company against her mistress's express orders? It was a man's voice—a man's step—it advanced nearer—nearer——

"John!" Mrs. Weston gave a cry, at once hoarse and triumphant. "John, John—my son!" His arms were folded round her, and she lay on his shoulder sobbing. The unexpected happiness had broken down her hardly-strained composure. John soothed her. It was pleasant to cry in his arms.

"Don't cry, mother," he said, patting her gently as one does a child. "Don't cry. It's all right; we've come to spend Christmas with you."

She lifted her tear-stained face and looked vaguely round. A young woman approached timidly.

"Not the—the baby?" Mrs. Weston gave one hungry look at her, then turned away. The young woman pulled back her shawl and showed the face of a little child placidly sleeping. Mrs. Weston put her finger timidly on its chubby cheek.

"Are its eyes blue!" She asked wonderingly.

"Quite blue; they say it's the image of me," and John laughed in the hearty voice which seemed to bring a whiff of warm, vibrating life into the shadowy room, so full of sad memories. "How cold it is here," he continued, battering man-like with the poker on the dingy embers. "You're starved, mother; your hands are like ice!"

"It's—it's the pleasure," she whispered gratefully. "I didn't expect you."

"No; the doctor wrote and told me you were lonely, and Blanche thought you would like to see the child, and so we've come to stay."

"Oh!" An expression of ghastly despair came into his mother's eyes.

"What is it? You are not ill?" John's conjugal experience had taught him care for women's illness.

"No—but——" gasped out Mrs. Weston—"I haven't a Christmas dinner!"

"You poor, silly, blessed dear!" Her son dropped the poker and took both her hands in his. "How wretched you must have been all by yourself! Never mind the dinner; I'll arrange all that."

Mrs. Weston sank back in her chair with a sigh of relief. She was feeling very tired. Emotions were exhausting, she supposed. John went out to give orders and take the management of everything. Mrs. Weston no longer grudged it him; it was pleasant just to sit still and look at that dear baby sleeping so peacefully, with the long lashes drooping over its blue eyes. A boy—and blue eyes! Heaven had been good to her.

Presently John returned. "Why, mother, I can't think how you've been living! There's nothing in the larder and hardly any coal in the cellar! I'm glad I came. Why, you would have been starved—why, you might have died! I've sent off the garden boy with a long list, and I made the cook light a roaring fire in the kitchen."

"But——" Words of objection rose to Mrs. Weston's lips.

"Let me have my own way to-day, mother, and spend our Christmas as I choose. We've been parted too long." John's tone was masterful still, but his mother listened gladly. "I'm rich enough now to spend what I like."

"Then you don't want to sell the place?" She asked the question tremblingly, fearing that all this blissful vision, the calm, buxom woman before her, the little baby on her lap, the manly son, firmer and more manly than ever she remembered him, would fade away into a phantasmal creation of her fancy.

"You were right, mother, and I was wrong," said John, laying his strong hand tenderly on her shoulder. "We will keep the place, and baby shall live here some day."

Mrs. Weston stretched out a thin hand. "John," she said, "John, you've made me so happy. I tried to do my duty and keep my promise, but it's been hard—you don't know how hard—for I loved you always—loved you best—you and the baby."

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

SOCIAL LIFE IN FRANCE.

By MRS. CRAWFORD.

A TRIFLING custom is often the outcome of a profound conviction, the fruit of some wide social principle which emerges here and there in a succession of specific manifestations. The universal French habit of addressing a person as "Monsieur" or "Madame," whether they be superior or inferior to the speaker in station, may be taken as a case in point. It is the effect of something much deeper than what we in England vaguely refer to as French politeness. It is the direct outcome of that democratic spirit of equality which cannot be ignored in any study of French social life, and which is one of the best results of the French Revolution.

To say "Sir" to an omnibus conductor or a policeman, to address the newspaper-seller in her kiosque as "Madame" and the hotel servant-girl as "Mademoiselle" does not come readily to our English upper classes, with their rigid notions of class distinction and their clearly defined sense of their own social superiority. But in France good manners allow of no distinction of persons, and people of every rank are entitled to one and the same designation, for even the duchess and the countess in ordinary everyday parlance become simply "Madame," no more and no less than their humblest neighbours.

It is the law of conscription, from which no Frenchman is exempt, and the fact that there are no great public schools, corresponding to our own, reserved for the sons of the upper classes, and that consequently on the benches of the Lycées, or Government secondary schools, boys of practically every class sit side by side, that help to break down the old class distinctions. It would be easy, I admit, to find examples of an opposite tendency, for in human institutions equality can never be more than relative. Thus in France to-day we find a far wider diffusion of titles—nominally unrecognised by law though they be—than under the ancient régime, and the distinction of the Legion of Honour is far more eagerly sought after than any corresponding decoration with us. Yet every Englishman, I think, who, shunning the cosmopolitan crowds of Paris, sees something of normal French life in the provinces must be struck by this national characteristic.

One of its results is that in country districts respect and popularity are far more dependent on personal merit and amiability than on position. The mere fact that a person is rich and inhabits a château does not call forth any of those outward signs of deference from his poorer neighbours to which the English squire and his lady feel themselves entitled. On the contrary, he is probably an object of suspicion until he has gained the confidence of the people, in proof of which we find that a very small amount of local discontent or political disturbance will lead forthwith to the stoning of the château windows, or to a raid upon the trees in the park. Such an occurrence in France has no special significance, whereas in England it would indicate very deep-rooted disaffection.

Yet, in a general way, the relations of rich and poor are incomparably more pleasant and unrestrained than in an English village; greetings are exchanged more cordially, and the unfailing bonhomie of the French lower classes helps to create a friendly atmosphere. I have lived for some weeks at a time in a Normandy village unknown to the British tourist, and, studying the people in their simple, everyday life, have invariably found them kindly and courteous, and possessed of all the qualities that go to make good citizens and pleasant neighbours. In many, even of the poorest inhabitants, one found a refinement of mind and a charm of manner to which—with all their sterling virtues—our own working-classes cannot lay claim. Their hours of labour were long, their tasks often laborious, but whether it was the fishwives toiling over their husbands' nets, or the blanchisseuses ironing the summer frocks of the visitors in full view of the village street, they always appeared gay and cheerful.

Digitized by Google

The postman never stopped at the door with letters without a friendly "Bon jour, Madame," and a departing "Au revoir, Madame." The proprietor sent in frequent little gifts of game, and ripe pears, and salt herrings from his fishing-boat when it came into harbour from the North Sea fisheries ; and every market woman from whom we had ever purchased small smelts by the dozen, or apples for a few coppers, claimed an eager acquaintance with us on all occasions. Our village servant, who cooked unrivalled stews and purées, made our interests her own, and clearly considered that les Anglais were entitled to the best that the village could produce, and when finally we took our departure in the lumbering omnibus for the nearest railway station, everyone turned out to bid us good-bye, with the most courteous expressions of regret. All this was at the height of the Dreyfus agitation, and when we returned home to find the English papers ringing with the perfidy and depravity of the French nation, it was a little difficult to maintain an equable temper.

To condemn the mass of the French people for the doings and utterances of corrupt politicians and gutter journalists in the capital is as grotesquely unfair as to judge of French domestic morality by the conduct of M. Bourget's heroines. Smart society in the French capital is as extravagant and reckless and selfish as the corresponding society in London, and it is usually much better dressed, but in either case the class represents a very small fraction of the nation, the drones that live upon the industry of others. We have, too, in France, as in the sister Republic of the United States—for reasons too profound to be touched on here—an amount of political corruption which has never yet been found in a constitutional monarchy, and equally in both the Republics we find a venal and hysterical press hanging on to the skirts of the political world. All friends of France and of America regret these things, but it is not by them that the nations can be judged.

It is only away from Paris, and from the haunts of wealthy tourists, who invariably bring demoralisation in their train, that one can study the solid virtues and excellent qualities of head and heart, which are the mainstay of the French nation. To those who are familiar with the admirable example set by the majority of French women of all classes as wives and mothers and heads of housholds, it is lamentable to hear English people talk with self-righteous pride of the notorious frivolity and worldliness and love of dress of the average Frenchwoman. You may hear French ladies of good position declare quite simply that they have never left their children for a single night, and that they never fail to preside in the nursery while the baby is being put to bed. You will see, even in Paris, on a fine spring morning, rows of smartly-dressed young mothers walking beside the nurse and the perambulator in the Champs Elysées—a thing no English mother of the upper classes ever dreams of doing. French ladies are scandalised at the extent to which we in England relegate the care of our children to nurses and governesses. Among the working-classes cruelty to children is far less common than with us, and wife-beating is practically unknown. On the other hand, what has come to be known in the French Courts as "crime passionnel" is of far more frequent occurence in all ranks of life than on this side of the Channel.

The most ordinary young Frenchman will entertain for his mother a romantic attachment, so little understood in England that we regard it as something theatrical and excessive. But it is the natural return for years of self-sacrificing love and a life-long community of interests. From his mother the Frenchman hides nothing—not even his debts and his love affairs ; she arranges his marriage, she watches over his career, and in return he flies to her in every crisis of his life, and has frequently been known to refuse a brilliant appointment on the ground that it would entail too long a separation. Indeed this cult of ma mère has come to form one of those intangible barriers which close the path of colonial expansion to the French nation.

In trade and commerce French women are their husbands' trusted assistants. Their methodical habits and their talent for figures make them excellent accountants, and it is they who habitually keep the books of the establishment, however extensive it may be. In agricultural pursuits they take a far more active share than Englishwomen. The French peasant woman, sturdy and active, works in the fields all the year round and in all weathers, hoeing and weeding and helping to gather in the crops. And the wife of the peasant proprietor or well-to-do farmer does not disdain to rise at four in the morning and to turn a practical hand to all the work of the establishment. Early morning hours are essential to the success of agricultural operations, and I often think that the lie-abed habits of the English people must be partly responsible for the cry that "agriculture won't pay."

Digitized by Google

A lady farmer, one of the few in England who have made a comfortable living out of a small grazing farm, and who herself rises at five o'clock all through the summer months, told me that the wives and daughters of her farming neighbours were never visible before eight o'clock, an hour by which half her morning's labours were over. It is the women, not the men, of France who are responsible for the poultry-rearing and butter and cheese-making, and it is not from large agricultural establishments, as we might suppose, but from thousands of small homesteads, each possessing but a few acres of land, that we import every year the millions of eggs and the tons of butter which our own countrywomen are unable to produce, although England possesses the richest pasture land in Europe.

The wealth of France does not consist, as with us, in the existence of a large number of princely fortunes, or the accumulation of vast masses of capital in the hands of the few. It consists in the wide diffusion of moderate wealth, and of a sober measure of solid comfort throughout the nation at large. The article in the Code Napoleon destroying the rights of primogeniture, and constraining parents to an equal division of property between their children, together with the universal custom of bestowing a dot on every girl at her marriage, has helped to bring a modest competency within the reach of many, while contributing directly to the breaking up of large accumulations of land or capital.

The smallness of French families, which to-day is becoming a grave source of weakness to the country, is another direct result of the very stringent property regulations of the Napoleonic Code, and, of course, assists materially in maintaining the level of comfort. Poverty there is in Paris and in all the great towns, and isolated cases may be found, no doubt, in every parish, but there is no great mass of squalid poverty such as exists in the East and South of London, constituting one of the most terrible problems of our time. It is the rarest thing in France to see a man or woman in rags. They seldom wear the cast-off clothing of the rich. The food of the working-classes, although they eat less meat, is immeasurably superior to that of our own. The modest home of the peasant or fisherman lacks none of the necessaries of life.

Civilisation, as Mr. Bodley has pointed out in his admirable volume on France, has permeated society to a much lower level than in other countries. Concerning the working-classes he writes: "Their stores of household linen, their excellent cooking, the propriety of their attire, though not universal, exist as signs of the force of the French race, which resists the disorderliness of its governors." I have known French families of the working-class in London who had retained all the natural characteristics of their race. The children were the best-dressed in the school, the home a pattern of cleanliness, an admirable economy prevailing throughout. It was not that they spent less than their English neighbours, but that their standard of comfort was so manifestly higher.

The wife of a Normandy fisherman was one day pouring out to me her husband's impressions of Ireland, and she spoke of the Irish people as of some half-civilised nation living in a condition of semi-starvation. That was the impression her husband had derived from frequent visits to the Irish coasts. "Ah, Madame, quel malheureux pays," the woman repeatedly exclaimed in the course of her narrative, and her sincere horror and pity seemed to me instructive. It was plain that these people, simple fisher-folk as they were, were wholly unfamiliar among themselves with the degree of poverty which is the normal condition of an Irish fishing village. And yet, on the face of it, there seems no good reason for so marked a contrast.

Here we touch on a pre-eminently French virtue—the virtue of thrift. From her cradle upwards the Frenchwoman practises it; her vice is never a reckless prodigality, but not infrequently she is parsimonious, even avaricious. The typical French peasant is always represented hoarding his savings, and there is some unkind truth in the picture. A Frenchwoman will ceaselessly husband her resources, turning to good account scraps and remnants which an English housewife would fling aside as worthless. She is emphatically the good ménagère, and it is owing to her domestic qualities that French charitable institutions are admittedly among the best managed in the world.

Digitized by Google

Ladies of the very highest rank will devote themselves to the domestic details of the charitable concerns in which they are interested, and show an innate capacity for the work. They have a genius for order and method, and the most elaborate schemes for effecting some philanthropic object will be carried out by a whole army of voluntary workers, each punctually performing her allotted task, where in England the same undertaking would inevitably fall to the ground from lack of organisation. It was only a French feminine mind that could have grasped the charitable possibilities to be extracted from the house-to-house collection of broken food, and the idea having been taken up in England the ratepayers are relieved of the maintenance of some thousands of destitute old people.

It is one of those curious inconsistencies of life that, in a country which in all classes owes so much and accords so much to its women, women's rights, as we understand them—the political equality of man and woman—are a thing almost undreamt of. A good deal is heard of "feminism," as it is called in certain circles of the capital, where it is preached, as a rule, by somewhat hysterical women, but as a tendency it has no hold whatever on the nation. I do not think it will ever harmonise with the essential Latinism of the race. The "jeune fille" of the French upper classes is still closely chaperoned, takes very little exercise, and is, from the English point of view, prim and narrow, and wholly lacking in initiative, though she certainly possesses some old-fashioned domestic qualities in which our English high-school girl is conspicuously lacking.

Away from the gaieties of Paris, life in a French château—those charming country-houses with gardens in front and court-yards behind, and pointed turrets on the roof—runs in a very monotonous groove. An English girl, who has paid French country-house visits, tells me there is very little to do, and a good deal of etiquette to keep up, with frequent changes of toilette. Out-door games—save perhaps croquet—play a very small part in the lives of Frenchwomen. So, too, at a sea-side resort they will spend whole mornings, day after day, doing embroidery on the sands, and the whole afternoon and evening, in fresh toilettes, or gossiping at the Casino.

The ubiquitous bicycle has, of course, introduced a fresh element into French life, and added somewhat to the small measure of freedon accorded to the jeune fille, but, as a matter of fact, Frenchwomen seldom ride long distances. They are content to potter about with a gentleman in attendance, and are rarely met with far from home.

It has always seemed to me that English and French people have a special aptitude for misunderstanding each other, and their misunderstandings not infrequently attain to matters of national importance. And it is when we make enemies of the French that we see them at their worst. French people are charming friends and the most ungenerous of foes. Like all Latin people they indulge quickly in bitter personal invective, and the venom of their tongue or pen is turned as easily against each other as against a common enemy. Hence the scurrility of the French Press, which must never be held to represent the sober opinion of the French nation. Hence those ebullitions of temper and jealousy which we on our side find it so hard to regard with patience.

The best friends of the French are those who know them the most intimately, who can converse freely with them in their own language, who have been in a position to watch them in their normal daily life. And for them, in spite of judicial blundering and political corruption and newspaper ravings, the French nation will always retain a hold on their affections.

V. M. CRAWFORD.

Digitized by Google

ROYALTY WORKING FOR THE POOR.

What the London Needlework Guild is Doing.

By MRS. HIRST ALEXANDER.

SINCE Dorcas made coats and garments for the poor at Joppa what generations of women have trodden in her beneficent footprints, so imperishably scored on the sands of time! But the world is growing daily in compassion for the needy—a compassion ever spreading its tendrils into all classes of society—from the Throne downwards. "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord." This makes sacred the privilege of helping those of our fellows who are so unfortunate as not to be able to help themselves—Christ's poor, whom he thus makes one with himself.

In taking up the headship of the London Needlework Guild, and in so earnestly fulfilling her many other self-imposed charitable offices, H.R.H. the Princess of Wales has testified practically to her deep sympathy for the sick, aged, and unfortunate, and for that large section of humanity who, though more than willing to work, seem in their inability to get a living share of it, to be de trop upon the earth.

The Guild, which held its annual exhibition of work in November at the Imperial Institute, was founded in 1882 by the late Lady Wolverton, the lead being taken over on that lady's demise by the philanthropic Princess, H.R.H. the late Duchess of Teck, zealously assisted by her daughter, then Princess May, and the mother's mantle was sacredly folded to her own shoulders by the Duchess of York, when, later on, the Patroness and Head President of the Guild was in her turn called by God to lay the work down.

The objects of the Association are to distribute articles of clothing among the hospitals, missions, prisons, refuges, and poor parishes of London, to encourage useful work and to provide an aim for many who have hitherto worked without one. It is open to men, women and children of all ages and classes, and is unsectarian in character.

The Guild is divided into groups, each group containing one president, five or more vice-presidents, and at least fifty associates. A president is expected to contribute 7s. 6d. annually to the expenses of the Guild; to find five vice-presidents or send not less than 100 articles yearly. A vice-president must secure ten associates or supply a minimum of twenty-two articles, whilst each associate undertakes to donate two or more articles to the cause. All goods must be new and useful.

Men associates are welcomed, and H.R.H. the Prince of Wales evidences his practical interest in the organisation by being an associate and a large contributor. Each gentleman binds himself to send annually two or more articles of clothing suitable for men or boys, as suits, overcoats, boots, socks, stockings, vests, etc., or a subscription to purchase these things.

The associates send their work or subscriptions to their vice-presidents, whose duty it is to receive them and to see that buttons and strings are on all articles requiring them, that everything is properly finished off, and that all pairs of stockings, etc., are firmly fastened together. The importance of this duty may be estimated in the fact that before one of the recent displays of work, several persons were employed three days, making good these failures in thoroughness of careless members. The vice-presidents then forward the collected goods with their own to their president. The latter sorts and packs the work of her group and sends it on the day and to the place appointed for distribution, with her name outside the respective sacks or parcels. Each member is expected to pay the carriage of goods forwarded.

Digitized by Google

THE PRINCESS OF WALES'S GROUP AT THE EXHIBITION.

The presidents form the Committee for management and distribution. Each 150 articles sent by a president entitles her to an appeal for a parish or charitable institution subject to approval of the Committee. After the grants asked for have been dealt with, any surplus remaining is apportioned to charities known to be deserving of support.

The distribution of grants is confined to the area of the County Council map of London, with the addition of a small piece of Essex (quite in the East) called "London over the Border."

This year the aggregate of articles sent in was upwards of 60,000, but when the scale of division is considered, it will be seen, large as the number is, how far it falls short of the necessities of the people and how great is the call for more workers. The scale of distribution for large parishes is as follows :—

20,000	and over	poor	inhabitants		500 articles
15,000	,,	,,	,,	,,	400 ,,
10,000	,,	,,	,,	,,	350 ,,
8,000	,,	,,	,,	,,	300 ,,
5,000	,,	,,	,,	,,	200 ,,
2,500	,,	,,	,,	,,	150 ,,

Some idea of the labour of distribution may be gauged in the fact that last year, besides 1,000 articles sent to the soldiers fighting at the front, no less than 137 parishes, 34 missions, 91 hospitals, homes, associations, etc., and 19 ragged schools, orphanages, and children's guilds received grants, whilst the superior clothing was apportioned to twelve societies for the aid of poor gentlepeople. The following single quotation out of the innumerable letters of thanks sent shows the appreciation of the gifts by the recipients :—

Please accept our very warmest thanks

PRINCESS EDWARD OF SAXE-WEIMAR'S GROUP.

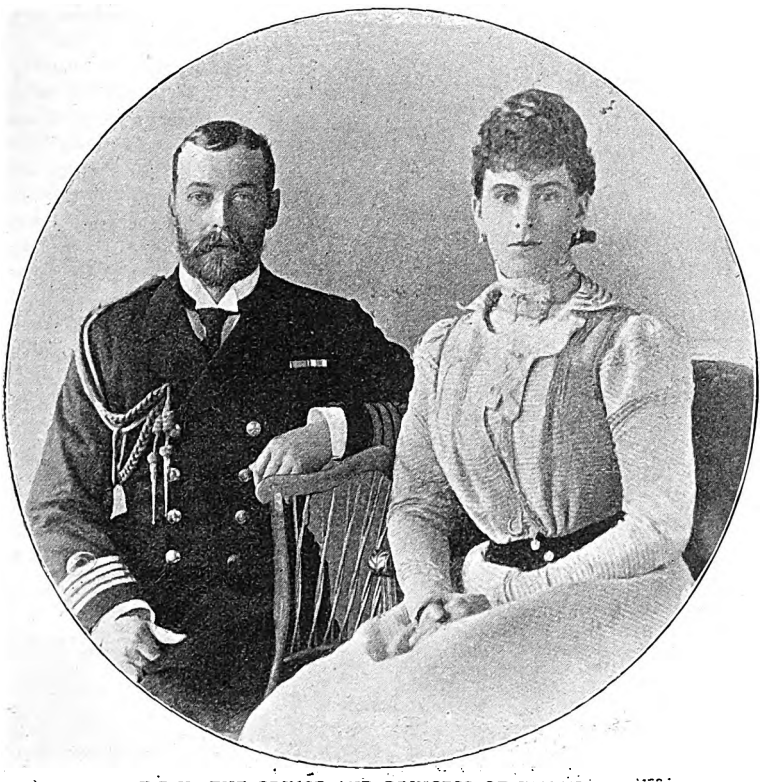
Digitized by Google

for the splendid gift of clothing for the poor of the "Tilbury Dock and Railway Parochial Mission," which arrived quite safely a few days ago. I feel that my words are but a very poor response to all the loving care and time that has been expended on those delightful gifts, though I know the ladies did not work for our poor praise. However, I trust you will most kindly express to the members of the Guild our sense of the benefits conferred on our very poor people by their generous and gracious presents.

Many charities are craving for help, and it is the regret of the Committee that they are not always able to make grants to very poor parishes needing them, and presidents are being urged to persuade their friends to join the Guild, and form a group.

At present, the number of presidents besides its Royal Patron and Head—the Princess of Wales—is 127. Among them are H.S.H. Princess Edward of Saxe-Weimar, the Duchess of Newcastle, the Duchess of Somerset, Viscountess Maitland, Dowager Countess of Northesk; Dowager Countess of Aylesford, Dowager Lady Manners, the Lady Mary Lygon, Lady Mary Arkwright, the Lady Belhaven, Lady Edith Drummond, Lady Faudel Phillips, Lady Vernon Harcourt, the Lady Mount Stephen, Hon. Mrs. Mostyn, Hon. Mrs. Mallet, and ladies from all parts of London and the country.

Mrs. Basil Ellis, Bevendean, Oxshott, Surrey, is the Honorary Secretary—a very onerous post, which she has assiduously and most successfully filled for many years.



T.R.H. THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.
The Princess is the Head President of the Guild; the Prince an Associate and large contributor.
Photograph by Hughes & Mullins, Ryde, Isle of Wight.

In the annual exhibition, at which all who have worked and the general public may see the result of the year's efforts, a great deal of labour is also incurred. For a fortnight before the recent Show, the members were busy in the East Corridor of the Imperial Institute unpacking the goods, and arranging them for display on the various tables. H.R.H. the Head President was among the busiest, assisted by the Lady Mary Lygon, her Lady-in-Waiting, who takes a very active part in the operations, and others.

Digitized by Google

Her Royal Highness, as far as possible, personally looks at all the contributions, noting those especially useful and of extra good quality, whose donators are sure to hear of their President's pleasure at the thoughtful gifts.

As the Princess of Wales's Group sent in nearly 12,000 articles, it may be imagined that the work undertaken by its President in unpacking and reviewing so vast a number is no sinecure.

Among the articles on view were a number of warm blue and pink crocheted petticoats for children, worked by her Royal Highness on board the "Ophir," during her late wonderful tour around the Empire. A parcel of men's clothing from His Majesty the King; 500 articles from H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, who in his gifts showed the domestic, fatherly heart in thinking of the children and small babies, as well as of the women, men and boys. H.R.H. the Princess Victoria sent warm knitted stockings.

In addition to the clothing, of which all kinds requisite for comfortable wear for both sexes and all ages, including boots, shoes, slippers, hats, caps, collars, neckties, and even umbrellas, were represented, there were to be seen on the tables, arranged according to groups, piles of winter blankets, rugs, quilts, and a multitude of cosy things for invalids and old folks.

As warning and information to contributors who thoughtlessly send useless articles to the Guild, a table was laid out with sundry presentations of this kind with their failings fully noted. A box of 500 articles was marked "Incomplete and unsuitable." A large quantity of towels and dusters, from their very inferior quality, as "Absolutely useless," "Acceptable if good." "Infants' clothes must be of flannel," was written over a tiny garment of flannelette. Some petticoats and stockings were inscribed as "Too thin"; a pinafore, "Too narrow across the back for any child"; a nightdress sachet of embroidery and lace, "Unsuitable for the poor"; a knitted hood, "Too inferior in quality"; a pillow case, "Too small"; whilst over a couple of crocheted mufflers was written, "No child could wear them"; and helpers were asked not to send large quantities of pocket-handkerchiefs.

Many of the members contribute far more than the minimum specified number of articles. H.R.H. the Princess of Wales sent in 836; Mrs. Basil Ellis (Hon. Secretary) 2,914; Lady Harcourt 2,586; Princess Edward of Saxe-Weimer 389; the Duchess of Somerset 266, and so on.

Enough has been said to show the extent and great usefulness of the work done by the London Needlework Guild and the scope it and other guilds since founded on the same lines offer to busy fingers wishful to turn leisure and industrial talent to good and beneficent account.

M. HIRST ALEXANDER.

THE CHILDREN'S SECTION OF THE EXHIBITION.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSION.*

By A. CONAN DOYLE.

THE convent of the Third Order of Dominican Nuns—a large whitewashed building with little deep-set windows—stands at the corner of the Rua de St. Pedro in Lisbon. Inside the high wooden porch there is a life-size wooden statue of St. Dominic, founder of the Order, and the stranger is surprised to observe the curious scraps which are scattered over the pedestal. These singular votive offerings vary from week to week. For the most part they consist of cups of wine, splinters of firewood, crumbs of cheese, and berries of coffee, but occasionally a broken tin saucepan or a cracked plate is to be found among them. With simple faith the Sisters, when their household stores run low, lay a piece of whatever it is they lack in front of their saint, as a reminder to him that they look to him for help, and sure enough upon the next day there arrives the wood, the wine, the new saucepan, or whatever else it is they need. Whether this is due to a miracle or to the help of the pious laity outside may be a question to others, but it is none to the simple-minded Sisters of St. Dominic. To them their whole existence is one continued miracle, and they point to the shelves of their own larder as a final refutation of every heretical doubt.

And if they were asked, these gentle fanatics, why their Order above all others should be chosen for this constant supernatural care, they would have answered that it was a heavenly recognition of the sanctity of their Mother Superior. For twenty years Sister Monica had worked among those fallen classes which it is the special mission of the Dominican nuns to rescue. There was not an alley in Lisbon which had not been brightened by the flutter of her long white gown. And still as Lady Abbess she went on working and praying with a tireless energy which put the young novices to shame.

No one could compute how many there were who had been drawn from a life of sin through her exertions. For she had, above all things, the power of showing sympathy and of drawing the confidence of those who had suffered. They said that it was a sign that she had suffered herself; but none knew her early history, for she had come from the mountains of the north, and she spoke seldom and briefly of her own life. Her wax-like face was cold and serene, but there came a look sometimes into her large dark eyes which made the wretched and the poor feel that there was no depth of sorrow where the Abbess Monica had not been before them.

In the placid life of the convent, there is one annual event which is preceded by six months of expectation and followed by six of reminiscence. It is the yearly mission or retreat, when some reverend preacher comes among them, and, through a week of prayer and exhortation, stimulates these pious souls to a finer shade of spirituality. Only a saint could hope to influence so saint-like a congregation, and it is the last crown to the holy and earnest priest that he should have given a retreat to the Sisters of St. Dominic. In one year it had been Espinas, the Franciscan; on another Father Menas, the famous Abbot of Alcantara. But neither of these had caused the suppressed excitement which filled the convent when it passed from cell to cell that the retreat this year was to be given by no less a man than Father Garcia, the Jesuit.

For Father Garcia was a priest whose name was famous through all Catholic Europe as being a worthy successor to the Xaviers and Loyolas who founded the first Company of Jesus. He was a preacher, he was a writer, above all he was a martyr, for he had carried the Gospel into Thibet and had come back with splintered fingers and twisted wrists as a sign of his devotion. Those mutilated hands raised in exhortation had moved his hearers more than the exhortation itself. In person he was tall, dark, and bent, worn to the bone with self-discipline, with a keen, eager face, and the curved predatory nose of the aggressive churchman. Once that dark, deep-lined face had grace and beauty; now it had character and power; but in youth or age it was a face which neither man nor woman could look upon with indifference. A pagan sword-cut, which had disfigured the cheek, gave it an additional grace in the eyes of the faithful. So warped and worn and haggard was the man's whole appearance that one might have doubted whether such a frame could contain so keen and earnest a spirit had it not been for those flashing dark eyes which burnt in the heavy shadows of the tufted brows.

Copyright strictly reserved.

Digitized by Google

It was those eyes which dominated his hearers, whether they consisted of the profligate society of Lisbon or of the gentle nuns of St. Dominic. When they gleamed fiercely as he denounced sin and threatened the sinner, or when, more seldom, they softened into a serene light as he preached the gospel of love, they forced those who saw them into the emotion which they expressed. Standing at the foot of the altar, with his long black figure and his eager face, he swayed the dense crowd of white-cowled women with every flash of those terrible eyes and with every sweep of that mutilated hand. But most of all he moved the Abbess. Her eyes were never taken from his face, and it was noticed that she, who had seemed for so long to have left all the emotions of this world beneath her, sat now with her wax-like face as white as the cowl which framed it, and that after every sermon she would tremble and shake until her rosary rattled against the wooden front of her prie-dieu. The lay-Sister of the refectory, who had occasion to consult the Lady Abbess upon one of those nights, could scarcely believe her eyes when she saw her self-contained superior sobbing her heart out, with her face buried in her little hard pillow.

At last the week of the retreat was over, and upon the Saturday night each nun was to make her general confession as a preparation for the Communion upon the Sunday morning. One after another these white-gowned figures, whose dress was emblematic of their souls, passed into the confessional, whispered through the narrow grating the story of their simple lives, and listened in deep humility and penitence to the wise advice and gentle admonitions which the old priest, with eyes averted, whispered back to them. So, in their due order, lay-Sisters, novices, Sisters, they came back into the chapel, and waited only for the return of their Abbess to finish the day with the usual vespers.

The Abbess Monica had entered the little dark confessional, and saw through the foot-square wire-latticed opening the side of a grey head, one listening ear, and a claw-like hand which covered the rest of the face. A single candle was burning dimly by the Jesuit's side, and she heard the faint rustle as he turned over the leaves of his breviary. With the air of one who discloses the most terrible crimes, she knelt, with her head abased in sweet humility, and murmured the few trivial faults which still united her to humanity. So slight they were, and so few, that the priest was wondering in his mind what penance there was which would not be out of all proportion to her innocence, when the penitent hesitated, as if she still had something to say, but found it difficult to say it.

"Courage, my sister," said Father Garcia; "what is there which still remains?"

"What remains," she said, "is the worst of all."

"And yet it may not be very serious," said the confessor reassuringly; "have no fear, my sister, in confiding it to me."

But still the Abbess hesitated, and when at last she spoke it was in a whisper so low that the hand beyond the grating gathered itself round the ear.

"Reverend father," she said, "we who wear the garb of the holy Dominic have vowed to leave behind us all thoughts of that which is worldly. And yet I, who am the unworthy Abbess, to whom all others have a right to look for an example, have during all this week been haunted by the memory of one whom I loved—of a man whom I loved, father—in the days, so many years ago, before I took the veil."

"My sister," said the Jesuit, "our thoughts are not always ours to command. When they are such as our conscience disapproves we can but regret them and endeavour to put them away."

"There lies the blackness of my sin, father. The thoughts were sweet to me, and I could not in my heart wish to put them away. When I was in my cell I did indeed struggle with my own weakness,

Digitized by Google

but at the first words which fell from your lips——"

"From my lips!"

"It was your voice, father, which made me think of what I had believed that I had at last forgotten. Every tone of your voice brought back the memory of Pedro."

The confessor started at this indiscretion by which the penitent had voluntarily uttered the name of her lover. She heard his breviary flutter down upon the ground, but he did not stoop to pick it up. For some little time there was a silence, and then with head averted he pronounced the penance and the absolution.

She had risen from the cushion, and was turning to go, when a little gasping cry came from beside her. She looked down at the grating and shrank in terror from the sight. A convulsed face was looking out at her, framed in that little square of oak. Two terrible eyes looked out of it—two eyes so full of hungry longing and hopeless despair that all the secret miseries of thirty years flashed into that one glance.

"Julia!" he cried.

And she leant against the wooden partition of the confessional, her hand upon her heart, her face sunk. Pale and white-clad, she looked a drooping lily.

"It is you, Pedro!" said she at last. "We must not speak! It is wrong!"

"My duty as a priest is done," said he. "For God's sake give me a few words. Never again in this world shall we two meet again."

"I did not know you, Pedro. You are very changed. Only your voice is the same."

"I did not know you either—not until you mentioned my old name. I did not know that you had taken the veil."

She heaved a gentle sigh.

"What was there left for me to do?" said she. "I had nothing to live for when you had left me."

His breath came quick and harsh through the grating. "When I left you! When you ordered me away," said he.

"Pedro, you know that you left me."

The eager, dark face composed itself suddenly, with the effort of a strong man who steadies himself down to meet his fate.

"Listen, Julia," said he. "I saw you last upon the Plaza. We had but an instant, because your family and mine were enemies. I said that if you put your lamp in your window I would take it as a sign that you wished me to remain true to you, but that if you did not I should vanish from your life. You did not put it."

"I did put it, Pedro."

"Your window was the third upon the top."

"It was the first. Who told you that it was the third?"

"Your cousin Alphonso — my only friend in the family."

"My cousin Alphonso was my rejected suitor."

The two claw-like hands flew up into the air with a horrible spasm of hatred.

"Hush, Pedro, hush!" she whispered.

"I have said nothing."

"Forgive him!"

"No; I shall never forgive him! Never! never!"

"You did not wish to leave me, then?"

"I joined the Order in the hope of death."

"And you never forgot me?"

"God help me, I never could."

"I am so glad that you could not forget me. O Pedro, your poor, poor hands! My loss has been the gain of others. I have lost my love, and I have made a saint and a martyr."

But he had sunk his face, and his gaunt shoulders shook with his agony.

"What about our lives!" he murmured. "What about our wasted lives!"

. . . . . .

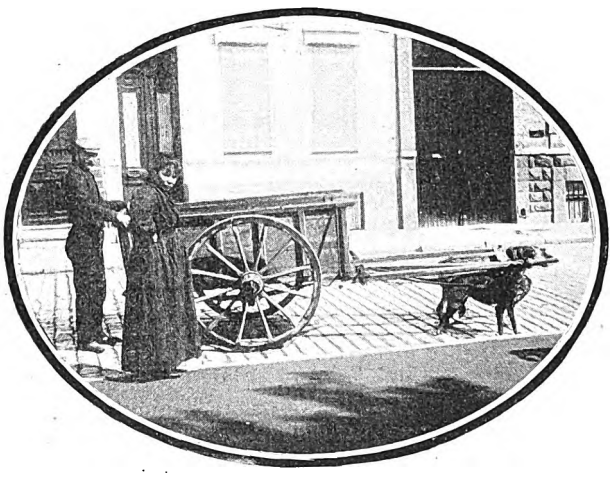
The Sisters of St. Dominic still talk of the last sermon which Father Garcia delivered to them, a sermon upon the terrible mischances of life and upon the hidden sweetness which may come from them, until the finest flower of good may bloom upon the foulest stem of evil. He spoke of the soul-killing sorrow which may fall upon us, and how we may be chastened by it, if it be only that we learn a deeper and truer sympathy for the sorrow of our neighbour. And then he prayed himself and implored his hearers to pray that an unhappy man and a gentle woman might learn to take sorrow in such a spirit, and that the rebellious spirit of the one might be softened and the tender soul of the other made strong. Such was the prayer which a hundred of the Sisters sent up, and if sweetness and purity can aid it their prayer may have brought peace once more to the Abbess Monica and to Father Garcia of the Order of Jesus.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

DOGS IN HARNESS.

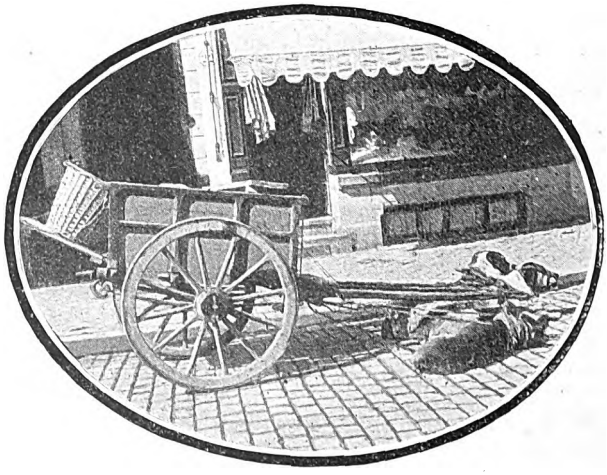
By CHARLES HORNER.



A FLEMISH PEASANT AND HIS WIFE, WHO CONSIDER THEMSELVES RICH IN THE POSSESSION OF A CART AND PAIR OF DOGS.

"IN Belgium all the dogs are horses" is the way in which the Irishman described the fact illustrated by our photographs. It comes as a rude surprise to an Englishman the first time he sees a heavy cart with an equally heavy market woman comfortable squatting in it, drawn by a dog. And when he finds that the streets of the old Flemish cities swarm with dog-drawn vehicles of all sorts, sizes, and shapes he rapidly concludes that he has entered a land of cruelty where man hath no bowels of compassion for the dumb brute. The milk-woman, the butcher, the fishmonger, the general dealer, all convey their goods through the streets in dog carts. Sometimes a single animal represents the tradesman's wealth in dogflesh; more often we see a pair cheerfully plodding along; occasionally the load is heavy enough to tax the energies of three of these patient beasts.

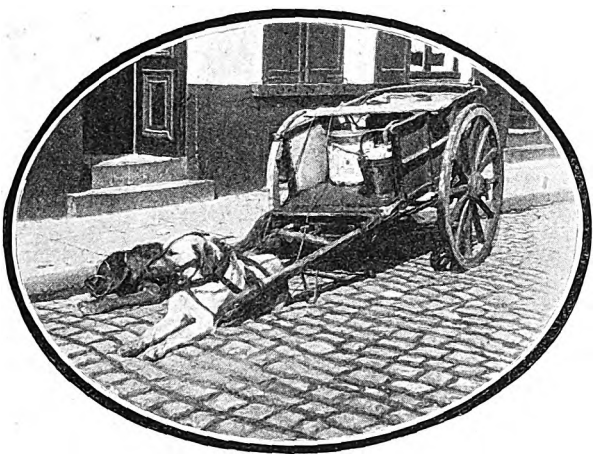
Is it cruel? That is a question the dog alone can answer. But the probability is that there is really very little cruelty save in exceptional cases. Though unnecessarily clumsy and heavy, the carts are comparatively small, as some of the photos show. The following incident recently witnessed by the writer in Bruges will show how deceptive is the apparent weight of these carts. A couple of dogs, harnessed to a clumsy cart, would persist in turning down the wrong street. The man in charge, without any whip or stick, and without the inevitable curses we should expect to hear under similar circumstances in England, firmly, quietly, and repeatedly turned the dogs in the right direction. But, like many a two-legged sinner, they had no desire to be shown the error of their ways and with the obstinacy of mules the two creatures wheeled round again and again. Finally the man seized the shafts and lifting them and the dogs bodily, walked a dozen paces in the right direction. Then he put them down and they went



IN THE MARKET PLACE AT BRUGES AFTER BRINGING A LOAD OF VEGETABLES IN FROM THE COUNTRY.

Digitized by Google

peaceably on their way. He was not a second Sandow. Our photo shows that, for he afterwards kindly posed with his buxom wife for the readers of this magazine.



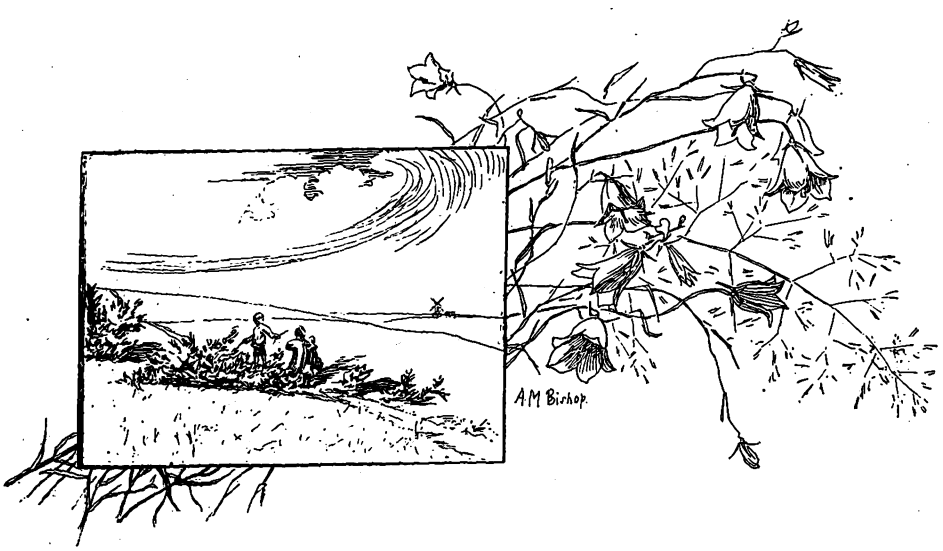
A FLEMISH MILKWOMAN'S CART AND PAIR.

Neither are these Belgian dogs on their feet all day like horses. Directly the cart stops down they go, stretching at full length with the shafts resting on the ground. Often they are able to enjoy a short nap. The dogs that draw a milkwoman's cart for example are thus able to sandwich rest and labour, labour and rest through every street. This is a practice that would doubtless commend itself strongly to our English cab-horses while their lord and master is waiting for a fare. It would be a highly diverting sight however, to see scores of horses taking forty winks.

Could these four-footed beasts of burden voice their grievances they would probably be unanimous in grumbling about the wretchedly paved streets. You can't shoe dogs as you can horses and so deaden the sense of feeling in the feet. On a hot summer day, continual trotting over the scorching and uneven stones must be very trying to the poor beasts' feet. Happily the rule of the road (just the opposite to ours) is not so strictly observed over there, and traffic has a way of gravitating to the shady side of the road.

As might be expected, a lifetime in harness results in an abnormal development of the hindquarters. While drawing a cart the dog strains the body forward, firmly pressing the feet on the ground. So that when free from the shafts the haunches stand out prominently and the legs—all muscle—are planted firmly and well apart.

CHARLES HORNER.



Digitized by Google

COMMON SENSE FOR MOTHERS AND NURSES.

A SERIES OF ARTICLES

By Dr. Julia Holmes Smith.

NUMBER ELEVEN.

Proper Nutrition of Infant Children.

THE love of the beautiful is an instinct of the race. Man everywhere seeks to express this sentiment; a savage in the adornment of his person with garish paints and beads; the great artist in his model of the human form divine. The early lessons in the nursery should instil into the mind the duty of making the very best of the faces and forms God has given us, and the necessity of health to beauty is a truth which needs only to be stated. We all want to be physically perfect; and unless proper food is chosen for each individual, carefully adapted to age and constitution, the process of development is interfered with, and illness results. Without nutrition there cannot be beauty; without proper assimilation of food there is no nutrition; without proper digestion there is no assimilation.

We know that our bodies are built up from materials taken from the food we eat, the water we drink, the air we breathe. These make the bony framework; they nourish the muscles which clothe the skeleton and give graceful contour to its angles. From these same materials the blood which courses through the arteries gets its ultimate elements, and the very brain, which controls the whole being, depends upon proper nourishment for its health and activity.

To the end, then, that a mother may select proper food for her child, it seems to me very important that she should understand the digestive apparatus, what part of the body is concerned in the changing or transmutation of the food into the life-giving blood which bounds from centre to periphery.

The digestion proper is managed through the alimentary canal, which is, if unfolded, five or six times the length of the body, and, of course this alimentary canal begins at the mouth. The mouth and throat, stomach and intestines are all lined with a mucous membrane, which is full of minute glands of two kinds with separate duties; one to take in the nourishing parts of the food when properly softened by the juices of the intestines, and the other set of glands to throw out the fluid which digests or emulsifies the food. Now, of course, when we remember that shut up in the body is this long extent of digestive apparatus, and that this is lined with all these little glands forming part of the mucous membrane, it is not wonderful that a slight variation from propriety in diet or irregularity in feeding may cause disease.

The first thing to notice is the mouth, which, in the new-born child, is quite incomplete in development and its shape is arranged for suction. As the teeth are evolved it broadens and the jaws harden; but in infancy it is really a passive thing, and has nothing whatever to do during the first two or three months of the child's life with any chemical change in the food. All changes during this earliest part of the baby's life are made in the stomach or the intestines. Just as soon as a mother sees a baby's mouth watering and the saliva dribbling down on its dress, she may know that there is a stimulation in the glands which lie inside the mouth under the tongue and the jaw. The glands are called the parotid, the sub-maxillary and the sub-lingual. During the early part of the child's life they are quiescent, but when the teeth begin to set in the jaw, as nurses say, the glands begin to wake up, and throw out a secretion which is sticky, tastes something like soda-water, and has the power of changing starch into sugar. And just here I must make a very important statement, to wit: No starchy matter which is taken into the infant's mouth can become part or parcel of its organisation until it has been changed into glucose or sugar, and this change is accomplished by saliva. The baby, therefore, before it is three months old should never be given food which has starch in it unless something be added to aid digestion; because it has not the necessary juices to dissolve such substances, and they go unchanged through the stomach, so giving rise, as soon as they reach the intestines, to severe and painful irritation. There is not a bit of starch in the mother's milk, and the child needs nothing else until after it begins to get its teeth, or until the excessive flow of saliva hints to the mother that the child craves some nutrient not to be found in its food.

Digitized by Google

From the mouth the food enters the child's stomach, which is very different from the stomach of a grown person, for it is pushed toward the left side, and, as has been stated in a former article, often crowds upon the heart, because the liver in the baby is very much larger in proportion to the body than in an adult. The baby's stomach is more tubular in form than in an adult, and is lined, as is the stomach of an adult, with mucous membrane, in which are imbedded tiny glands which emit an acid fluid called gastric juice. To show the value of this juice in the digestion of certain foods, an experiment has been made of placing the white of an egg in a bladder and suspending it in water. As long as nothing else is put in the bladder the egg remains in its normal condition, but if a tiny bit of pure gastric juice be added to it there is a change, and the contents of the bladder pass through the membrane and mingle with the water. This is called exosmosis. We must remember that the stomach only digests albuminous compounds, such as the white of an egg or milk, and does not at all attempt to dispose of fat or starch, but such articles must wait until they meet the discharge from the pancreas, which is a gland called "sweetbread" in the lower animals, and in the human being is sometimes designated as the salivary gland of the abdomen.

If it be true that, while the nursing mother is feeding her infant, both should be undisturbed, it holds equally true with regard to the child who is being fed with spoon or bottle. Let the little one be happy. Fix the bib comfortably; arrange the head easily, letting the little hands cuddle round the bottle or cup, and see to it, so far as possible, that the animal part of eating be made pleasant. It is only a matter of twenty minutes out of two hours and surely the nurse or mother might give that time to letting the child enjoy its meal. Again, a baby should never be fed in a crowd. Its attention is then distracted from its food by the presence of strangers, and a certain amount of nerve force, which is needed while eating, is taken from the stomach by the brain, because an extra amount of attention is called for, and so the process of digestion is impeded.

It seems to me that every mother or nurse should be able to understand whether a child is well satisfied with its food or not, and if there are indications of cravings and a child cries directly after eating, or seems to keep its mouth open, as if it asked for something more, there should be some effort made to see what is lacking in the dietary, and it has happened in my experience that a tiny bit of bacon given to the child to suck, even to a little one four or five months old, will so change the juices of the stomach that normal digestion will proceed.

One of the points to be considered very carefully, both in health and disease, is the condition of the child's tongue. In spite of the fact that a baby may acquire the habit of putting out its tongue unnecessarily when the mother would have it look its best, it is wise to teach it, at as early a period as possible, how to put the tongue out and to open its mouth so as to expose the whole throat.

Children are mimics, and the mother who has taken singing lessons and learned to curve the tongue down, thus exposing the throat to its fullest extent, would do well to make a game with her children, encouraging them to such imitation. If she will open her mouth and make the sound a-a-h—, letting the tongue form a curve in the lower part of the mouth, her baby will copy it, and the chances for required applications to the throat, in cases of diphtheria and other maladies, will be greater. Apropos of this, another nursery game, which is valuable in its far-reaching possibilities, is the putting on to the child of a rubber bib and teaching it to gargle. Have some sugar and water, and let the little one, in its imitative performances, even spill a great deal and swallow some. If the result is accomplished and the child learns to gargle, there will be gained a better opportunity for curative measures in case of simple or malignant throat maladies.

Digitized by Google

I have in my care several families of children, with whom this method has been pursued, and threatened disease is often averted by the wise administration of gargles by the nurse or mother. So much for the throat. Now for the characteristics of the tongue. The perfectly healthy tongue is clean, moist, lies loosely in the mouth, is round at the edge, and has no prominent papillæ. The tongue may be furred from local causes, or from sympathy with the stomach, intestines or liver. The dry tongue occurs most frequently in fever and indicates a nervous prostration or depression. A white tongue is diagnostic simply of the feverish condition, with, perhaps, a sour stomach. When it is moist and yellowish-brown, it shows disordered digestion. A dry and brown tongue indicates a low state of the system, possibly typhoid. When the tongue is dry and red and smooth, look out for inflammation, gastric or intestinal. When the papillæ on the end of the tongue are raised and very red, we call it a strawberry tongue, and that means scarlet fever. Sharp, pointed, red tongue will hint of brain irritation or inflammation, and a yellow coating indicates liver derangement. When so much can be gained from an examination of the tongue, how important it is that the youngest child should be taught to put it out so that it can be visible to the uttermost point in the throat.

It must be remembered that I stated that the permanent teeth were in the jaw at the time the child was born, and all but the wisdom teeth have to be evolved through the gum before the little one is fourteen years old. The second dentition is, then, as important as the first, and many a puny little child, who causes his mother great anxiety because of restlessness, meagreness and indigestion, is simply suffering from the fact that proper nourishment is not being supplied in a sufficient quantity to meet the demands which the teeth are making from time to time, as well as to meet the demands of the muscles and brain, which also are doing their very best to bring him into mature life, and which demand proper constituents for growth.

The teeth will come, and they will steal from the surrounding tissues what is necessary for their need, hence it not infrequently happens to a child, whose baby teeth have been pulled out rather than filled, that they miss just that much lime which should have been absorbed from the root of the milk teeth. About the sixth year we find the advent of the first four permanent molars, or jaw teeth, and between eleven and thirteen, four other molars still further back in the jaw, called the second permanent molars. The six years between are spent in exchanging the twenty baby teeth for twenty permanent teeth and so the full complement of thirty-two is evolved.

It it a sad commentary upon our civilisation that only one person in eighty has sound teeth, and the statement is made that two hundred years ago the proportion of a perfect set of teeth was one in every five. Very hot drinks and very cold drinks have the same effect on the enamel of teeth that they would have on a fine glass goblet, and the biting of threads and the cracking of nuts, it goes without saying, are undersirable exercises for the teeth.

When the teeth are bad and the food improperly masticated, indigestion results, and from indigestion comes dyspepsia, gastritis and even death. A recent article in one of the magazines of dentistry contains a very interesting theory propounded by an experienced dentist, on the relation of catarrh of the nose and inflammation of the eyes to decayed teeth. Owing to the intimate relation of the nerves which are distributed through the cheek and inside of the lids of the eye and within the nose, the disease which had its origin in a decayed tooth was extended, and conjunctivitis and nasal catarrh were set up.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by
THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.

"HOW I FILL-IN MY SPARE TIME."

(PRIZE COMPETITION.)

I have read of a young lady who kept a diary, but who said she was so busy filling it up, that she had no time to do anything worth entering in her book! I am reminded of this as I observe how the bulk of the correspondence this month is from girls; the boys, I presume—reversing the way of the young lady alluded to—are so busy doing things that they have no time to spare for recording their doings.

All the letters sent in are extremely interesting even to the older folk, bringing home, as they do, the old truth that the child is the father of the man, or the mother of the woman that yet shall be. The one who finds "mischief still, for idle hands to do," must often be grievously disappointed as he finds how busy my young correspondents can keep themselves. Better rub than rust, and if these young ones go on as they have begun, they will all of them be bright and useful keys yet.

I give the letters in the order of the ages of the writers, without comment, for which there is no space, only calling attention to the sad case of over-crowding in the second letter—nineteen living in four rooms!—and without a license from the Old Lady who Lived in a Shoe! I don't want to get my young friend into trouble, but she had better keep her eye on the County Council.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—Everybody knows what I do in my spare time—it is reading. I am afraid that I fill up a great deal of time which ought not to be spared. Why I like to read is because I want to learn. My favourite book is "Deeds that Won the Empire."

With much love from Your interested reader,
RONALD H. W. CASE.
27, High Street, Evesham. (Age 8 years.)

DEAR SIR,—I don't have much spare time because I go to school. This is what I do in the time I have. Well, I play, and I have a big doll which is made of rags, it was made in America; this is one of the things that I play with. Now there are a few things more. This is another: it is a doll's-house with four rooms, and curtains in the windows, but it has not got chimneys, and I pretend that the top is a room. It has 19 dolls belonging to it. These are the two mothers—Mrs. Davies, Mrs. Lenneli, and the servant, whose name is Thirza, the others are the 16 children. And other times I run up and down with my wooden hoop and stick. I have a little sister seven years old, and she plays with me and I cut out patterns of Mrs. Weldon's and then we paint them and call them paper girls. When it is fine, I take my doll out in the carriage. On Saturday morning I go out with my mother to market, and in the afternoon I go out with my mother and father for a walk round the garden, or Lord Tredgar's park.

Yours truly,
DAISY G. DAVIES.
Arvon, Llanthony Road, Newport, Mon. (Age 8 years.)

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I have got a bicycle, and spend most of my time riding it about the village, or playing with a tiny white kitten which I had given me the other day. I sometimes run round a corner and cry "Puss! puss!" and she will come running round and always finds me. I have got a rabbit, and when I am getting its food I sometimes leave its door open, and it will look out all round. When I first had it I used to spend all my time watching it, and a big black cat we have, who had never seen one before, and used to watch it all day. I have got a garden, and it takes a good deal of my spare time picking the flowers in the summer and taking, drying, labeling, and putting away the seeds in the autumn.

Digitized by Google

MARY NOELLE WALKER.

Chisledon, Swindon. (Age 11¾ Years.)

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—On Sundays I read a book called "Line upon Line," and in the evening I sing hymns or put texts into my Sunday scrap-book and paint frames round them. On week days I get my father to play cricket with me, in summer, when he comes in from business, and in winter I and my father play at "Ping Pong." I also knit, and practise, and read, and sometimes draw. Just now I am doing some needle-work for Christmas presents. I also make paper flowers. Sometimes when I come in from school I have a swing in the garden, or play a game of hockey, and when the roads are dry I go for a spin on my bicycle. Altogether, I am pretty well occupied during the day, and quite ready for rest when bed-time comes.

KATHLEEN HENDERSON.

35, Bowes Road, (Aged 12.)
Palmers Green, N.

MY DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I go to school from 9.30 to 12 o'clock. I have about an hour before dinner, which we have at 1 o'clock. I help my mother, and do what I can in the house, often doing shopping and other errands, but if she does not want me I sew, or read or knit. A favourite servant of ours got married and went to live in York, and she has a sweet little baby, and I make it dresses and little baby-shoes, and anything I can. I am very fond of dolls and enjoy making all kinds of hats and clothes for them. I play games with my little sister Barbara. In the summer we go for bicycle rides together and play croquet, and in winter we play patience and draughts and many other games. I am very fond of reading, and father thinks I read a great deal too much. We belong to a Magazine Club, and it is a great pleasure to me to read them and especially the "Children's Competition Club." I can make my bed, dust, make several different kinds of puddings, and lay the cloth for meals, trim lamps, and am always busy, and the days seem to go much too quickly. I sometimes go for drives with father, when he goes to see his patients. This summer I played Badminton for the first time, and I like it very much. I am very fond of school, and always try to be top of my class.

Believe me,
Your little friend,

The Green, GEORGINA MARY JOAN JACKSON.
Kirbymoorside, Yorks. (Age 12 years.)

DEAR SIR,—I was looking through "THE TEMPLE" a short time ago and was very interested in the letters sent in, and thought it would be very nice to have a try myself. I am an orphan, and as there are forty-one girls, in addition to myself, I have quite a number of playmates you see. During recreation hours, when the weather is fine, I go into the playground and, to the best of my ability, try to amuse the little ones. Some of the games I play with them are: Skipping rope, black-thorn, rounders, tick, captain and rings of every description. Then, I have a garden all to myself, as also have the others too. I like to tend my plants and pull up all weeds, which grow so very quickly. My playfellows and I often speak of weeds in connection with selfishness, ill-temper, disobedience, untruthfulness, etc., the latter growing as quickly in our hearts, if not checked, as do the weeds in our gardens. On rainy days and in the evenings I knit lace of all patterns, also pincushions; at the same time laughing and chatting to my companions. I ask riddles and try to answer those asked by the others. When not lace-knitting there are different games I join in, such as draughts, ludo, snap, word-building, attracto, stool of repentance, and all such games that English girls so enjoy. As Christmas is drawing near most of my spare time is taken up in making scrap-books, handkerchiefs, pin-cushions, dolls' clothes, and bookmarkers which I intend to place in the stockings of some of my chums on Christmas Eve. Now I think I have come to the end of telling you what occupies my spare moments, and why it is so pleasing to me is, in trying to help and also amuse others I know I am not living wholly for self, but meekly striving to follow in the footsteps of the One who was all unselfishness.—I remain,

Yours very sincerely,
ANNIE GREENWAY.
(Born Sept. 6th 1888, Age 13 years.)

The Royal Albert Orphanage, Worcester.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I have not very much spare time to boast about, but what I have I spend in various ways. One way is in doing "fancy work." I like it very much, and think it is very interesting. Another way in which I spend my time is helping my father at his office. I write letters for him, make bills out, etc. I am also very fond of making "tales" up. I could sit for hours at a time and not get tired. Then I think that the last and nicest way of all to spend one's time is reading. I like Sir Walter Scott's books, and when I read "Ivanhoe" I could hardly leave it. Next to Sir Walter Scott I think I like Dickens. At the present time I am reading "David Copperfield." It is a very nice book and some of the characters are splendid. Hoping there will be a nice competition next month.

I remain,
Yours truly,
FLORENCE E. SARLL (Age 14½.)

Lime Tree Place, Mansfield.

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—There are many ways in which I fill up my spare time. These ways of course differ with the time of the year. In summer outdoor amusements are possible, and in winter indoor amusements are most popular. My chief way of filling up spare time, winter or summer, is by reading. With an interesting book or magazine such as the TEMPLE, no evening seems too long. A walk in the country is pleasant at all times of the year. In the spring, I think it is very interesting to see the bare branches of the trees becoming covered with green leaves; in summer the trees and flowers are in full bloom; and in the autumn and winter the leaves are changing colour and becoming variegated with red, gold, and brown. In the spring and summer, gardening fills up part of my spare time; and I am well repaid for any trouble I may have taken when the plants come up. In the warmer months of the year I often go to the seaside or spend an afternoon in the parks. In winter, besides reading, I look at my collection of foreign stamps, and paste in any new ones I may have got. I also fill up my time by doing fancy work, such as tatting, knitting or crocheting. Sometimes I fill up an evening by going to an entertainment of some kind; a concert, a temperance meeting, or a Good Templar lodge meeting. I think I have told you of all my ways of filling up spare time.

Digitized by Google

I remain,

Yours sincerely,

6, Foxhall Terrace, Mornington Road, Ranelagh, Dublin.

GWENNIE HEAP. (Age 15 years.)

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I am at business until 7.30 p.m. every evening excepting Saturday, so you see I have not much spare time during the evening, but what I have I make the most of. Sometimes I go to the Christian Endeavour at the Countess of Huntingdon's "Chapel." This meeting is very nice, and it helps to remind us of our duties to God. When the roads and weather are favourable, I sometimes go for a short bicycle ride, or else play some game such as cricket, etc. I am fond of these sports, as they are very pleasant, whilst at the same time they are very invigorating. I am very fond of reading, especially when it is a book of adventures by such writers as "Defoe," "Kingston," or "Henty," and when I can get one by either of these, I generally devote most of my spare time to reading it. I leave business at one o'clock on Saturdays, so, as I have all the afternoon to myself, I often go to the swimming baths; these baths are of mineral water, which is very nice to swim in. If I do not go there I go for a bicycle ride or watch a football or cricket match. On Sunday mornings I cannot very often manage to go to chapel, but in the afternoon I go to Sunday-school, and in the evening to chapel. Both of these meetings are very nice, and they greatly help to keep one in the right way throughout the week. I think I have told you all, so I must now close.

I am,

Yours very sincerely,

ERNEST E. CLOW.

(Age 15 years.)

4, Victoria Buildings, Bath.

The best letter, for what it says and how it says it—neat writing and nice spirit—has been judged to be that of Annie Greenway, to whom, accordingly, the prize of a handsome volume has been sent.

The next competition will be on :—

"WHEN I'M GROWN-UP."

Tell me, that is, what you would like to be when you are a man or woman—what occupation you would like to follow, or what deeds you would like to do, where you would like to go—the thing, in fact, that you most look forward to in the time when you are "grown-up." Letters to be written on one side of the paper only, with name, address and age (under 16), and to be sent, not later than the 14th of this month, to Rev. J. Reid Howatt, the Crescent, Camberwell-grove, Denmark-hill, London, S.E.—and I shall give a beautiful book for the best.

THE CRUTCH-AND-KINDNESS LEAGUE.

An ounce of experience is worth pounds of vague theory or sentiment, and something of the hardship and suffering lot of poor crippled children in London may be accurately gauged by the following letter, in which, for obvious reasons, I have only suppressed the names and addresses.

Exeter.

DEAR SIR,—Having read of the "Crutch-and-Kindness League" in THE TEMPLE I applied to Mr. Kirk to enrol my daughter Evelyn, aged 12, as a member, and asked that a child of her own age might be placed under our charge.

In reply a little girl named Minnie S——, aged 10 years, was given.

As it was rather vague, writing to a stranger, I wrote to my friend the Rev. ——, asking if one of the workers in connection with his church would visit her. I received a letter from him, and also from the gentleman who went to see Minnie. He says: "Poor child, she has been now over twelve months on her back, and her doctor promises her three more years to stay there. She needs sympathy indeed. I shall make occasional calls myself." Being in London a month ago I called to see her, and found her a bright, intelligent child.

Her disease is spinal—she is strapped tightly in an instrument and can just put her hand under her head to lift it up, so as to try and see the one she is talking to. She had been out in her invalid carriage, kindly lent by the Ragged School Union, and was carried in, instrument and all, on to the bed. Being so firmly strapped and so stiff, I asked, "Could not the instrument be tipped up on the slant, as we should lie with a bolster?" but the doctor will not allow even that. Night and day this dear child has to be encumbered with this terrible instrument. We have sent to her repeatedly, as the father is a carpenter earning 25s. per week and there are eight other children, six I believe at home. I found the mother a most respectable woman. She had married far below her station in life and had to suffer accordingly. The child was beautifully clean, and well tended. When I came out rom there I seemed so full of thankfulness that my children were not deformed that I said afterwards that it had done me more good than twelve sermons. My little girl receives letters from Minnie and I also receive letters from the mother. I feel so glad to be able to help one of the little sufferers.

Digitized by Google

The mother cannot account for the weakness of the spine in any way, as there has been no fall or anything to occasion it. She told me she went to several hospitals before she could get any doctor to take the case in hand, as it seemed such a long job; still, it is a mercy that the child is now being properly attended to.

Wishing you every success in your kind, good work for the sufferers.—I am, regardfully yours,

H. A. BURTON.

Yet this is only a sample case; the like tale, without any of the mitigations, can be told of thousands of poor, afflicted bairns, in the area of the big city. There are no less than six thousand such children under the motherly care and oversight of that most philanthropic organisation — The Ragged School Union. It does for them what it can by means of its voluntary visitors, but even when it finds surgical instruments, places in hospitals, and such-like, how little is all it can do to mitigate the sad lot of the pained child! The visitor can only come at rare intervals, these children are often fatherless, many motherless too, and even those who still have a mother have often to lie so patiently for long hours quite alone, mother being out to earn whatever she can get to keep a roof over the head of her afflicted child. Yet it goes without saying—indeed to say it sounds almost like an insult to motherhood—that the more pitiful is the case of the child, the more the mother's heart broods over it; the mother may have many faults—as many as you choose to heap upon her at times, unhappily—but rarely, in a very wide experience, has a case been known in which the mother was unmotherly toward her suffering boy or girl. But her poverty is her drag.

Some five or six years ago I took a vow to do what I could to raise up a friend for each of these six thousand sufferers—a friend living somewhere out in the great world of health—and very marvellously has the "God of all compassion" encouraged my efforts, for, by the Crutch-and-Kindness League, which I then started, members have been raised from every quarter of the globe, to the number of about five thousand. They hail from America, Canada, India, China, France, Germany, Italy, Russia, as well as from every part of the three kingdoms, with a strong contingent in Natal and Australia.

How do these help? By calling in the aid of a branch of the Civil Service, namely, the Post Office. To make something of a bright break in the weary monotony of the crippled child, the members of the League write to the little charge given them, with all particulars of the case, a letter once a month at least, or if time should fail to permit the letter, then some illustrative magazine or paper is sent, some toy, scrap-book, or the like—some little token that the lonely one is not forgotten. What a blessed uplifting this can give to the heart of the pale little sufferer! and how much of slowly encrusting selfishness it sweeps away from the heart of the one who does the kindness!

It is work, as all will see, which can be done by all. A child can write to a child, an invalid can do it, it can be done by the busiest man or woman, however far away from London the writer lives. Scattered everywhere throughout the globe are folk with kind hearts, but many have not the scope to do what it is in their heart to do, for want of the opportunity near their door. By this means, however, they can get the outlet their hearts need—need, for sympathy unexercised soon crusts into mere emotional selfishness, leaving the heart harder than it was before. I do trust the thousand or more members we yet require will speedily be forthcoming. Cannot you, reader, be one of them?

All further particulars concerning the League may be had for a stamp from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary, Ragged School Union, 32, John Street, Theobalds Road, W.C.

NEW MEMBERS FOR THE MONTH.

Miss W. R. Tilley, Swansea; Mrs. Peters, Orwell; Master Stanley Blunden, Brighton; Master Percy Gridley, Brighton; Miss Marjorie Eldridge, St. Leonard's-on-Sea; Master Archie Ackland, Master Bertie Jones, Miss Mary Haines, Miss Ada Davis, c/o Mrs. Hill, Barry; Miss Hoddinott, Coventry; M. F., Tipton; Miss M. Iddles, St. John's Wood; Miss Trinder, Leytonstone; Miss Florence Hill, Leytonstone; Miss Esme Wright, Miss Dulcie Wright, Slough; Miss Maud Wyatt, Tamworth; Miss A. F. Smith, Natal; Miss M. Greenhalgh, Radcliffe; Miss Emily Budding, Cardiff; Miss Cecile Berridge, Mansfield; Miss Audrey E. Cobb, Surrey; Mr. George Rippin, Stoke Newington; Miss N. Hudson, Miss E. Lane, Miss Mann, Miss A. Vaut, Mr. W. T. Huxley, c/o Miss Hudson, Rochester; Miss Emma Higgins, Braintree; Miss H. E. Osborne, Braintree; Mrs. Halstead, Miss Dora Halstead, Blackpool; Mrs. Pullar, Montrose; Miss Christine Hitchin, Westgate-on-Sea; Miss Ellen S. Martin, Teddington; Miss Lilian White, Huddersfield; Miss Davies, Manchester; Miss K. Coles, Maidstone; Miss M. Baylis, Coventry; Miss Louisa Goodwin, Bath; Miss Clara Perks, Bromsgrove; Miss Nellie Dewar, Penarth; Miss Katie Cook, Lancashire; Mrs. J. White, Highbury; Miss A. Brown, Notting Hill; Master A. H. Johnson, Margate; Miss Violet Anderson, London.

Digitized by Google

FRIENDLESS AND FALLEN.

London Female Preventive & Reformatory Institution.

Office: 200, EUSTON ROAD, N.W.

ENTIRELY SUPPORTED BY VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS.

FIVE HOMES AND AN OPEN ALL NIGHT REFUGE

For 180 Friendless and Outcast Young Women and Girls are maintained.

The Work is Evangelical, while the pitiable condition of those whom it seeks to save constitutes a powerful appeal for the sympathy and aid of Christian men and women.

. . CONTRIBUTIONS ARE URGENTLY NEEDED. . .

Bankers: Lloyd's Bank, Limited, 16, St. James's Street, S.W.

WILLIAM J. TAYLOR, Sec., 200, EUSTON ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

. . THE . .

Evangelical Alliance.

The Rev. B. F. Meyer, B.A., writes: "In my opinion the Evangelical Alliance was never more needed than in the present day, as the common meeting-ground of those who, though they think differently on many points, are one in their loyalty and love to the one Divine Head."

The Rev. G. Campbell Morgan recently wrote: "I look upon the Evangelical Alliance as a splendid organisation for the accomplishment of just the work our age needs."

Pastor Archibald G. Brown writes: "Never was the witness of the Evangelical Alliance more needed than now. There is great demand for the Evangelical Alliance to keep its flag flying and maintain its glorious testimony."

Principal J. Oswald Dykes says: "The Alliance seems to me

In sending financial help, or the names and addresses of new members please, direct to

The SECRETARY of the Evangelical Alliance,

7, ADAM ST., STRAND, W.C.

"BEGIN WITH THE CHILDREN,"

LORD SHAFTESBURY used to say—and he was right!

For nearly sixty years this has been the work of the

Ragged School Union,

of which he was the practical Founder.

This Society is affiliated with 152 Local Mission Centres in the congested districts of London.

It thus reaches at least 100,000 Souls weekly through its manifold agencies, sustained by over

6,000 VOLUNTARY WORKERS.

It has a sensible scheme for helping the Bootless, Clothing the Ragged, and Feeding the Hungry.

It has a register of over Six Thousand in their own homes—poor afflicted little ones who need "most everything," the spiritual interest being paramount.

CRIPPLE CHILDREN

It sends away over

6,000 PALE-FACED CHILDREN and adults to its Holiday Homes in the country each year. It gives over 50,000 of the poor children a Day's Fresh Air.

The Society is a distinctly Christian organisation, an ally of the Church, and an embodiment of the spirit of

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

FUNDS ARE URGENTLY NEEDED. ALL GIFTS SHOULD BE SENT TO

Mr. JOHN KIRK, Secretary,

Ragged School Union,

32, JOHN STREET, THEOBALD'S ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

"The world has seen nothing like it since St. Francis preached his crusade of self-renunciation many hundred years ago."—Windsor Magazine.

The Social Work of the Salvation Army

is in Urgent need of Financial Assistance.

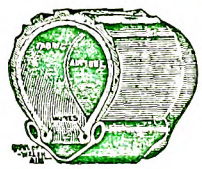
By means of Shelters, Lodgings-Homes, Food Depots, Workshops, Rescue Homes, Children's Homes, Slum Stations, Inebriates' Homes, Farm Colonies, Ex-Criminals' Homes, etc., etc., many hundreds of thousands of the Outcast and Poorest are helped to help themselves annually.

"I Heartily wish success to the Social Work of the Salvation Army."—The Right Hon. Jesse Collings, M.P., Home Office.

The work is highly commended by persons of all grades of society. See pamphlet giving their opinions, annual reports, etc., sent gratis on application to Mrs. BOOTH, 101, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., to whom Cheques should be addressed. Clothing much needed. The Homes can be inspected at any time.

"I can distinctly declare the work is a blessed one. I wish it from my heart God's blessing."—The Very Rev. The Dean of Canterbury.

Digitized by Google



Wired.

Simply Perfect!

Reduced to 55s. per pair; guaranteed for 13 months. Of all Cycle Agents.

But be sure you see the Company's trade mark on the inner tube as well as the outer cover.

DUNLOP TYRES

"All about Dunlop Tyres," a handsomely illustrated Booklet, post free on application.

The Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co., Ltd.,
Para Mills, Aston Cross, Birmingham; and branches.

Wireless.

Perfectly Simple!

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS,
AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

"NEGO" FIRELIGHTERS

Are a scientifically prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. ONE OF THESE FIRELIGHTERS IS QUITE SUFFICIENT TO BOIL A KETTLE IN A FEW MINUTES.

Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d.; or twenty packets will be sent post free on receipt of 5s. P.O.

A Sample "NEGO" Firelighter will be sent post free on application.

Sole Wholesale Agents for the United Kingdom GENDALL & CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, W.C.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

FOR HOME AND SUNDAY READING.

VOL. 6. FEBRUARY, 1902. No. 5.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

"With a forehead pure and saintly."

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.

"The Standard of Highest Purity."
—The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

INVALUABLE FOR NURSING MOTHERS.

A Delicious and Wholesome Tonic—Refreshing, Invigorating, and Sustaining.

EASILY DIGESTED BY THE MOST DELICATE.

Brewed by Messrs. BEAMISH & CRAWFORD, Ltd., Cork, from the Finest Malt and Hops, and Guaranteed by them to be ABSOLUTELY PURE.

An EMINENT DOCTOR says:—

"I can strongly recommend BEAMISH'S STOUT. I have prescribed it for many of my patients with excellent results."

LABORATORY, 24, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.
March 4th, 1901.

A careful analysis has been made of this sample of Beamish's Stout, as a result of which I am able to state that it is an excellent one. It is good in flavour, high in extractive matters, rich in albuminoids, yet contains only a very moderate amount of alcohol, and is very low in acidity. Although I understand the sample which I have received has been in bottle for two years, no active fermentation is taking place.

LAWRENCE BRIANT, F.C.S., F.R.M.S.

Agents Wanted Everywhere.

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

This is the only Stout which will not introduce into the system unfermented yeast cells, and consequently it can be taken by the most delicate without fear of indigestion.

Delivered carriage free to any address in the United Kingdom in Cases containing 3 dozen reputed pints, Price 18/- per case.

Wholesale Agents to whom all communications should be addressed—

GENDALL & CO., 34, Norfolk St., Strand, London, W.C.

MIDDLESEX 1902 Digitized by Google

ADVERTISEMENTS for the March No. must be sent not later than Feb. 4th to H. DAWSON & Co., 34, Norfolk Street, STRAND, W.C.

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

Have you tried Osman Turkish Towels?

HIGHEST AWARD: "Grand Prix," Paris Exhibition, 1900, Two other Medals, and 15 Awards.

HIGHEST QUALITY!
PRICE MODERATE!!
WEAR GUARANTEED!!!

The "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWELS are made in small sizes for Face Towels and in larger sizes for the Bath-room, with knotted fringe or hem-stitched ends. Once you have used "OSMAN" Towels you will buy no others. The wear is guaranteed by the manufacturers.

BARLOW AND JONES, LIMITED,
MANCHESTER.

SOLD BY ALL THE PRINCIPAL DRAPERS AND HOUSE FURNISHERS THROUGHOUT THE EMPIRE.

"NEGO" FIRELIGHTERS

Are a scientifically prepared composition, with enormous inflammatory properties. All that is necessary when lighting a fire is to break the block into three sections and place in the stove, surrounding the same with coal. When ignited a steady fire will immediately result. ONE OF THESE FIRELIGHTERS IS QUITE SUFFICIENT TO BOIL A KETTLE IN A FEW MINUTES.

Sold everywhere in packets of 10, price 3d.; or twenty packets will be sent post free on receipt of 5s. P.O.

A Sample "NEGO" Firelighter will be sent post free on application.

Sole Wholesale Agents for the United Kingdom CENDALL & CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

A DAINTY DRESS.

One of the smartest new models shows a charming frock of grey zibeline, the zibeline being of the most hairy description. Of course these are far more expensive than the less hairy kind, but there is no doubt whatever of its superior smartness. The model in question was edged round bodice and skirt with an infinitesimal band of chinchilla. The skirt was made on somewhat novel lines with a perfectly plain panel down the centre of the front, this being outlined with the fur, while at the foot hem a double flounce, some nine inches deep, was put on fairly full. The bodice was made in cross-over fashion, with a pouched front and pretty bell sleeves, while the undervest was closely tucked crèpe Royale, this material, by the bye, being quite the prettiest and quite the newest for such use at the moment.

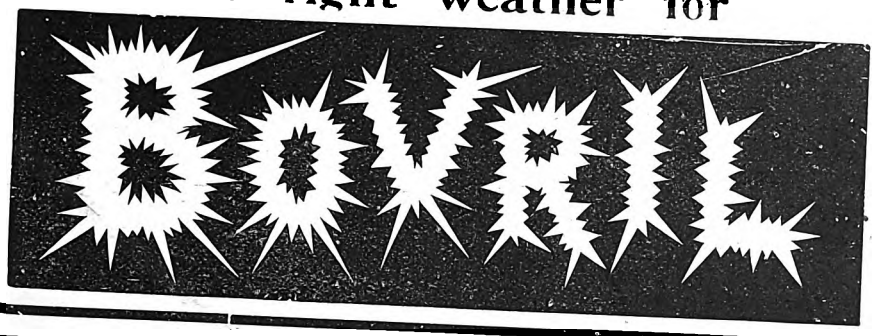
SOME WOMEN TALKERS.

There are many brilliant conversationalists in the world of London, prominent among them being Consuelo Duchess of Manchester and Mrs. Asquith—the Margot Tennant of old days. Mrs. Murray Guthrie, daughter of Sir John and Lady Constance Leslie, is the gayest of talkers, with an endless store of amusing anecdotes; and Mrs. Willie James is one of the few young married women who can be termed a genuine wit. Lady Charles Beresford is a good talker, with much political acumen and a deep knowledge of music. Lady Sykes—the latest recruit to journalism—has opinions of her own on the affairs of nations, which she expresses with considerable fluency. Lady Jeune is an eminently agreeable woman, counts among her friends, ministers, ex-ministers, and ministers yet to be, and is in a position to talk ably on almost any conceivable topic. Mrs. Arthur Henniker, sister to Lord Crewe, is a clever woman, and has much to say on serious subjects. Lady Dorothy Nevill is the time-honoured type of a dinner-table conversationalist, and proves a magnetic talker, who, when in society, is ever surrounded by a crowd of interested listeners.

He that thinks himself the happiest man really is so; but he that thinks himself the wisest is generally the greatest fool.

Digitized by Google

The right weather for



Needham's METAL POLISHING Paste

HALL'S WINE THE MARVELLOUS RESTORATIVE.

AFTER TYPHOID, INFLUENZA, SCARLET FEVER,

or any illness, when your patient is exhausted and wasted, a few glasses of HALL'S WINE will be sufficient to effect that change which will bring back health and strength.

ONE TRIAL IS ALL WE ASK. YOU WILL BE WELL SATISFIED WITH THE RESULT.

IT CURES Neuralgia, Nervous Debility, Sleeplessness, Anæmia and Physical Breakdown.

A Member of the Royal College of Physicians writes:—"Gentlemen,—I feel it my duty to let you know how satisfactory Hall's Wine has proved in the many cases in which I have used it. I have prescribed it in Influenza, Phthisis, Neurasthenia, etc., and always with benefit.

Sold by most Licensed Grocers, Chemists, and Wine Merchants. 3s. and 1s. 9d. per bottle.

Name and address of nearest Agent sent by return of post. STEPHEN SMITH & Co., Ltd., Bow, London, E.

Digitized by Google

A WALKING COSTUME.

There does not seem to be a wide variety in walking costumes. Still we have the stitched trimmings, and they are likely to continue. Glacé silk, panne velvet, and a shiny cloth upon a rough cloth are all used for the purpose, while the bands of trimming take various shapes—vandykes, scrolls, half moons, diamonds, and shaped and mitred pieces all being employed with varying results. The coats to such gowns are as often short as long, for the long coat, although so extremely graceful, has not yet caught on in England. Only the ultra-fashionable folk have made up their mind to adopt this not always becoming fashion. Fur for collar and revers, muffs, and edgings to our outdoor sleeves are still with us, and, of course, will continue until spring sets in.

We too often consider superfluous in another the things we haven't cared to cultivate in ourselves, and in the same way over-estimate those we have ourselves been able to cultivate and become interested in.

PUNCTUALITY.

Method is the very hinge of business, and there is no method without punctuality. Punctuality promotes the peace and good temper of a family. The calmness of mind which it produces is another advantage of punctuality. A man without punctuality is always in a hurry; he has no time to speak to you, because he is going elsewhere; and when he gets there he is too late for his business; or he must hurry away to another before he can finish it. Punctuality gives weight to character. "Such a man has made an appointment; then I know he will keep it." And this generates punctuality in those with whom he lives; for like other virtues it propagates itself. Servants and children must be punctual, where the master of the family is so.

FASHIONS IN JEWELLERY.

Earrings are coming more and more into fashion, and the fact that the Princess of Wales wears them will naturally give them an additional push. The earring of to-day, however, is a simple stone—a pearl or sapphire, ruby or diamond. Naturally, the quantity of stones needed for the Coronation will be enormous, and the jewellers are inventing hundreds of beautiful designs to commemorate the coming ceremony, as well as resetting customers' own precious stones and jewels. One of the latest conceits in jewellery in the way of neck chains and coiffure ornaments are the beautiful drop festoon baubles, hung from invisible platina chains. A fad is to collect all the best single stones cut and polished, and one lady is said to have a rare collection, her aim being that not only shall all the stones be perfect specimens, but if possible of the rarest form of the jewel represented. Amongst her stones are a rare pink pearl, a green diamond, a Mexican opal, and a wondrous sapphire of unusual depth of colour and size.

No success is worthy of the name unless it is won by honest industry and a brave breasting of the waves of fortune.

Give me for my friend one who will unite heart and hand with me, who will throw himself into my cause and interest, who will take part when I am attacked, who will be sure beforehand that I am in the right, and if he is critical, as he may have cause to be, towards a being of sin and imperfection, will be so from very love and loyalty, and a wish that others should love me as heartily as he. —CARDINAL NEWMAN.

Digitized by Google

FED ON "FRAME-FOOD" FROM ONE MONTH.

"FRAME-FOOD"

is especially suitable for INFANTS, however young, who are

DEPRIVED OF MOTHERS' MILK,

and for Invalids.

It is the MOST EASILY DIGESTED and MOST NOURISHING FOOD on the Market.

Sold in 16-oz. Tins, 1s.

FREE TEST. ½-lb. Sample Tin of "FRAME-FOOD," or 5-oz. Sample Jar "FRAME-FOOD JELLY," sent free on receipt of 3d. to pay postage; both samples sent for 4d. postage.

Please mention "Temple Magazine."

FRAME-FOOD CO. LTD., Battersea, London, S.W.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. By CHARLES READE. A NEW EDITION. Illustrated by 16 Photogravure and 84 half-tone Illustrations by MATT B. HEWERDINE. Small 4to, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net.

LOVE, COURTSHIP, AND MARRIAGE. By the REV. E. J. HARDY, Author of "How to be Happy though Married." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF ROBERT BUCHANAN. With Portrait in each Volume. Two vols., crown 8vo, buckram, 12s.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE GRAND BABYLON HOTEL. By ARNOLD BENNETT.

JUDAH PYECROFT, PURITAN. By HARRY LINDSAY, Author of "Methodist Idylls."

A BLOW OVER THE HEART. By ROBERT MACHRAY.

THE OLD BANK. By WILLIAM WESTALL. [Feb. 13th.

THE CAT'S-PAW. By B. M. CROKER. With 12 Illustrations by FRED. PEGRAM.

THE SHADOW OF THE ROPE. By E. W. HORNUNG. [Shortly.

FAN FITZGERALD. By H. A. HINKSON. [Shortly.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS—Continued.

A STUMBLE BY THE WAY. By L. T. MEADE, Author of "The Diary of a Doctor."

THE CANKERWORM: BEING EPISODES OF A WOMAN'S LIFE. By GEO. MANVILLE FENN.

THE WEALTH OF MALLERSTANG. By ALGERNON GISSING.

THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.

POCKET VOLUMES, printed upon fine thin paper. Pott 8vo cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net each.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. By CHARLES READE.

"IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND." By CHARLES READE.

THE DEEMSTER. By HALL CAINE.

UNDER THE GREENWOOD TREE. By THOMAS HARDY

FAMILIAR STUDIES OF MEN AND BOOKS. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

NEW ARABIAN NIGHTS. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Keystone Burgundy

Is the Perfection of Wine

Being FREE from ACIDITY and ROUGHNESS, and not EXCESSIVELY ALCOHOLIC,

It makes an Ideal Dinner Beverage.

Keystone Burgundy

Is an Absolutely Pure and Natural Wine, made from rich grapes grown on soil largely composed of Iron and Limestone.

Keystone Burgundy

IS DELICIOUS AND APPETISING.

Sold by Licensed Grocers, Chemists, and Wine Merchants everywhere.

Flagons, 2/-; bottles, 1/6; half-bottles, 10d.

Please write for name of nearest Agent.

STEPHEN SMITH & CO., Bow, London, E.

Digitized by Google

FASHIONABLE CHIT-CHAT.

For coat decoration ermine is still to the fore. It is indeed enormously worn; almost too much so one would think, considering the dirty time of the year, and the dull weather we are experiencing. However, fashion decrees that ermine shall be one of the leading modes, and therefore, so long as the shape and cut of the fur is correct, we who own any fur of the kind may be content with the first flight of fashion. There is a good deal, however, in the shape and cut of any fur additions on our various coats, cloaks, and mantles. One of the newest arrangements is the "Napoleon," or stand-up turn-over collar. This suits many faces remarkably well, while, in addition, pretty, long-shaped revers should be added to the front of the coat, and in this way one sees many of the Russian blouses most successfully adorned. The Russian blouse, by the bye, is the shape of the moment. Both coats and bodices are made in this style. As to fur, sable, mink, sealskin, caracul, broadtail, and astrakhan are all carried out in this fashion most happily. The coat itself is tight-fitting upon the shoulders, the fulness of the fur being allowed to pouch pretty considerably at the centre of the front. Such a shape may be carried out for indoor wear, and here silk, serge, cloth, or any material at hand will look well so arranged. Of course, for indoor wear the fur trimming is eschewed, and instead we may have lace of more or less elaboration according to the amount which we have to spend. While talking of fur, I would add that removable tippets in various shapes are considered just now remarkably fashionable. Perhaps the smartest of all these tippets are those arranged with a square collar back and front, with long-hanging "swags" of fur attached to the centre front of such collars, and allowed to hang over and fall below the waist. Other tippets there are in almost cape fashion, and in Paris we see these worn almost slipping off the shoulders, after the fashion seen in many old pictures. The style is certainly graceful and picturesque, while the tippet can be drawn closely to the throat at any moment should the temperature require it. Talking of this particular style, that is, the cape slipping off the shoulders, how very pretty are the long chiffon and gauze scarves which so many women are adopting just now for evening wear. A long length of any pretty soft filmy material will serve the purpose. This is caught round the shoulders and twisted twice round the right arm, while such a scarf may be donned for theatre or ballroom wear.

EPIGRAMS ABOUT WOMEN.

Men praise or abuse women too much, never so much, however, as women do.

Love is a human law, duty is a social one: Love is greater than duty. Happy the men and women who can obey both laws.

Women die twice. Their first death takes place on the day they cease to be attractive. An old woman who tries to be beautiful is like a corpse that tries to look alive.

In matrimony love is only a hors d'œuvre; friendship is the pièce de résistance. Foolish are the married people who do not retain friendship when love becomes out of season.

The heart of a good woman is a well of love. She has a smile for all joys, a tear for all sorrows, a consolation for all miseries, an excuse for all faults, a prayer for all misfortunes, and a word of encouragement for all hopes.

The world is hard on woman. It is not sufficient for her to be estimable, she must be esteemed; it is not enough for her to be beautiful, she must be amiable. Her happiness and chances in life will depend more on her reputation than on her conduct.

Digitized by Google

Best Articles. Best Stories. Best Pictures.

That is what . . .
EVERYONE IS SAYING OF

Volume V. OF THE Temple Magazine

NOW READY.

(HANDSOMELY BOUND IN RED AND GREEN CLOTH.)

TWELVE MONTHS' READING for 7s. 6d.

The most interesting and varied Magazine published.

Over Eleven Hundred Pages and not a dull one.

The Volume Contains—

TWO SPLENDID SERIAL STORIES

By DORA LANGLOIS and Mrs. BAGOT HARTE.

Scores of Short Stories and Special Articles.

Illustrated by some 700 Beautiful Pictures.

OUR CONTRIBUTORS INCLUDE Dr. Joseph Parker, Ian Maclaren, Rev. Silas K. Hocking, George Manville Fenn, Joseph Hatton, Adeline Sergeant, Mary E. Wilkins, Clive Holland, J. A. Hammerton, Leonard Graham, Lady Violet Greville, late Rev. H. R. Haweis, Lady Henry Somerset, Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, Rev. E. J. Hardy, Thekla Bowser, Rev. Joseph Hocking, Mrs. Hirst Alexander, Mary Angela Dickens, Hugh W. Strong, and many other well-known writers.

Of all booksellers or the Publishers, Messrs. HORACE MARSHALL & SONS, Temple House, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

Price 7/6. ✻ Price 7/6.

Digitized by Google

A SATIN GOWN.

Shell-pink satin is the material of the pretty evening dress shown in the illustration. The bodice and sleeves are finished on the shoulders with a trellis-work of black velvet, headed with pink roses and supplemented by a lace berthe falling from a rich embroidery in pale gold and pink and cream-colour. The pointed belt is in this lovely embroidery. On the skirt the velvet trellis work is introduced, bordered by the embroidery which heads a frill of lace midway on the skirt and again on the edge of it, which is finished with many narrow frills of the shell-pink satin.

WANTED, MEN OF PURPOSE.

Parents, guardians, and teachers of young men should ever remember that "Purpose" is the eternal condition of worldly success. Few successful or distinguished men began life without a fixed purpose. Purpose underlies character, culture, position, and attainment of whatever sort. It steadily trains men's faculties into strength and aptness. It wars against reliance on chance, or the tendency of the times to engage in ventures and speculation. Purpose grasps the handle of being. Steadfast purpose is like a river that gathers volume and momentum by flowing on.

FORGET THE EVIL.

As manhood and womanhood open up, discrimination is necessary between what ought to be remembered and what it were better to forget. One good general rule which holds through life is to forget as speedily as possible the evil which we see around us and even within us; for evil, like a plant, thrives in the light and withers in the darkness. Brought into open view, talked about, thought about, and stored in remembrance, its tendency is to reproduce itself.

HAVE AN EVEN TEMPER.

When subject to a passing fit of dejection the average man is apt to magnify his liabilities and to overlook his assets. On the other hand, when unduly elated he is apt to forget his liabilities and to overestimate his assets, meaning by assets health, time, position, or general aptitude, as well as money. The true course is not to make much of moods, but rather to emphasise principle and purpose, and to keep so far as possible upon an even keel of temper, viewing the whole of life's problem, including both assets and liabilities, in a proper perspective, putting one's trust in God and maintaining throughout that spirit of hope which, after all, is the best architect of fortune.

A TRIO OF BRILLIANT SISTERS.

Seldom is brilliant cleverness bestowed upon so many members of one family as is the case of the three Countesses Gleichen. The name of Countess Feodora is best known to the public, and she has studied and worked really hard to attain her present enviable position as a sculptor. Countess Hélène paints beautifully, and is likely one day to make a success as a follower in the steps of Rosa Bonheur. Her pictures of horses are instinct with real genius. Countess Valda Gleichen possesses a highly-cultivated voice, and has the opinion of no less an authority than Albani as to its exceptional beauty. At one time the young Countess thought seriously of taking to the concert platform, but the opposition of Royal relatives prevented her from realising her ambition.

Do not read great authors solely with a view to inoculating yourself with their idea on a certain subject, but reason the matter out and form your own opinion.

Digitized by Google

GREGORIAN
Church & Chapel Organs

The method of tone production is radically different from all others.

Its Distinctive Features are :

Tonal superiority.
Compactness of form in proportion to capacity,
Variety of registration, and Price.

Style 35.

A SPECIAL WORD to the Church having Cathedral Organ desires with limited funds.

THE GREGORIAN system of organ-building enables us to build in compact form and at small cost organs which are veritable reproductions of the cathedral organ. Write us for catalogue and information as to where our instruments may be seen in your vicinity. Even should the outlook for an organ-fund not be encouraging, if you need a new organ, write us.

The Orchestrelle Co., 225 Regent St., London, W.

Send for Catalogue A2.

TO ASTHMA SUFFERERS

INSTANT RELIEF is gained in all cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, CROUP, and WHOOPING COUGH by the use of

POTTER'S DATURA ASTHMA CURE

Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists, in Tins at 1s. each Free Sample sent on receipt of Post Card to POTTER AND CLARKE, Artillery Lane, London, E.

TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

Messrs. H. DAWSON & Co.,
34, NORFOLK ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

By Royal Appointment.

THOMAS TURNER & CO. MAKE THEIR OWN STEEL.

ENCORE RAZOR

Hand Forged. Extra Hollow Ground. Carefully Set. Guaranteed Perfect. See "Encore" on Shank.

IVORY ... 6s. 6d. | BLACK ... 4. 6d.

Send for Free List of Cases. From all Dealers, or write direct to Makers, T. TURNER & CO., Suffolk Works, Sheffield, who will supply through nearest Agent. Ask for "Encore" Pocket and Table Cutlery.

HOVIS
TRADE MARK BREAD

Every genuine loaf is stamped "HOVIS."

has the charm of always being nice.

Most Family Bakers make it daily.
Any further information will be gladly sent by HOVIS, LTD., Macclesfield.

Digitized by Google

SILK DINNER GOWN.

The dinner gown sketched in this column is black silk with lines of pale blue velvet inserted and partly hidden by a herringbone stitching of black silk. Very fine tucks intervene between the bands of velvet on both bodice and skirt, the latter being fitted to the figure with narrow tucks below the waist. The band below the yoke of jet and steel embroidery is lined with blue velvet, and also the one on the skirt that heads the tucked and frilled and lace-trimmed silk flounce. The yoke and under-sleeves are in embroidered net. The sleeves themselves are in jet and steel embroidery over tucked black silk.

BREAKING UP BAD HABITS.

It is hard, but not impossible, to break up a bad habit and to form a good one, even late in life. It is always a mistake to underrate the difficulty, and to imagine that only a single strong resolution is necessary. That indeed is essential; but there must also be patient, watchful, earnest, continuous effort, persevered in, and not suffered to flag, through much discouragement and many failures.

A DAY'S DUTY.

We hear it often said that life is but a day. It is said to express the shortness of our stay upon the earth. It is said, for the most part, sorrowfully. Let us reverse it and say, with more striking truth, that each day is a life. Every day is a life, fresh with reinstated power, setting out on its allotted labour and limited path. Its morning resembles a whole youth. Its eventide is sobering into age. It is rounded at either end by a sleep—unconsciousness at the outset and oblivion at the close. We are born anew every time that the sun rises and lights up the world for man to do his part in it. One thing at least may be said of each day, as it dawns and darkens. It is that every one, short as it may be, embodies the fulness of the past and indicates what is long afterwards to come.

A HAT-TRIMMING TEA.

This is a Canadian idea. Any number of ladies may be invited. They must all be provided with a doll's hat and a paper bag containing scraps of muslin, chiffon, silk, ribbon, and flowers. The prize is offered for the prettiest hat trimmed in the time allowed. An hour will not be found too long. When the time agreed upon has elapsed, all the hats, finished or unfinished, must be given up, and a number pinned to each. They are all placed on a table, and everyone then examines them, and writes on a piece of paper the number of the one she thinks has been trimmed the best. The competitors then adjourn to another room for tea, and while they are absent the votes are counted, and the hats arranged in order of merit. The guests may be allowed to keep the hats, or they may be sent to some bazaar, where they are sure to find a ready sale.

Ofttimes, that which is assigned to genius should more properly be attributed to that silent giant, concentration, which is the lever by which mountains can be removed.

Certainly virtue is like precious odours, most fragrant when they are incensed or crushed; for prosperity doth best discover vice, but adversity doth best discover virtue.

The fountain of content must spring up in the mind, and he who has so little knowledge of human nature as to seek happiness by changing anything but his own disposition will waste his life in fruitless efforts, and multiply the grief which he purposes to remove.—JOHNSON.

Digitized by Google

27
YEARS' SUCCESS.
THE UNIVERSAL REMEDY FOR Coughs, Colds,
Asthma, Bronchitis,
Influenza, Whooping-
Cough, Hoarseness, &c.

Owbridge's
Lung Tonic

IMPORTANT NOTICE:
SUBSTITUTION. — There are so many imitations of this successful, and therefore popular, remedy that it is of the utmost importance you should use the word "OWBRIDGE" when buying Lung Tonic, and TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

Sold everywhere in bottles at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s 6d., & 11s.

COPYRIGHT.

Myra's Journal

FEBRUARY No. Now Ready.
PRICE THREEPENCE.

AN ALBUM . .
. . OF FASHION.

48 pages, over 100 designs.

HANDSOME COLOURED FASHION PLATE.

Cut out Pattern of the NEW BLOUSE, WITH ADDED BASQUE.

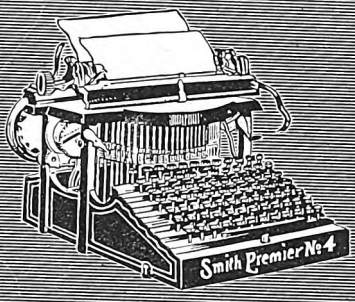
THE CHEAPEST AND BEST FASHION PAPER
MYRA'S JOURNAL,
The Leader of Fashion.

THREEPENCE MONTHLY, OF ALL BOOKSTALLS AND NEWSAGENTS.

BEETON & Co., LTD., 10 & 11, Fetter Lane, London.

The Smith Premier Typewriter is a Revelation of the possibilities of Typewriter Mechanism



The Embodiment of Strength & Simplicity

GRAND PRIX PARIS 1900

Art Catalogue Free

The Smith Premier Typewriter Co.
14 Gracechurch St.
London E.C.

Digitized by Google

SMART HATS.

The first hat in the sketch is a large one of pale blue felt, of the kind that has a rough surface. It is trimmed with a garland of tinted leaves laid on folds of chiffon. At the left side it is lifted high with a bandeau on which edelweiss and black roses are arranged. The second toque has the crown covered with black and steel. A steel ornament holds in the centre the feather trimming that is draped round the hat. A little creamy lace falls over the hair. The third toque is in cream cloth with green velvet rosette and lace drawn tightly round the brim. The fourth and last toque is made of three graduated plateaux of soft white felt, each edged with narrow felt. Parma violets and velvet bows are arranged under the brim at one side and variegated leaves at the other.

SUGGESTIONS FOR EVENING DRESSES.

Nothing is prettier, or more durable, than soft Oriental satins, and with these diaphanous trains are worn, often made of pink chiffon, or of lace lined with pink. The present penchant for velvet trimmings has given an impetus to a trellis-work introduced on the front of the skirt. Black velvet thus treated on soft satin with a pink chiffon train displays roses made of pink chiffon at the inter-section of the lattice-work, which also appear on the diaphanous trains. The soft satin bodices are trimmed with chiffon roses, the sleeves showing the lattice-work to the elbow.

Buyers and Sellers.

Our business is to introduce buyers to sellers.

We have been engaged in doing this successfully for many years. Our friends admit that the results of our efforts on their behalf have been a large accession of buyers for their goods. They say, in short, that they are better off to-day than they were when first they made our acquaintance.

We should like you to be in their position. If you have an article of merit that people want, we should be glad to discuss with you our system of creating a demand for it by means of advertising, &c. It saves our clients' time, worry, and money.

The advertiser has a greater opportunity of selling his goods than a non-advertiser.

H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Why is "Globe" Metal Polish to be found in use all over the United Kingdom, the Colonies, America—in fact, the World?

Because it works its way. Merit is its travelling ticket.

"Globe" Metal Polish contains nothing injurious to the skin, nor will it scratch or otherwise injure the finest metal-work.

It is sold everywhere; but should any difficulty be experienced in obtaining it, please write to Raimes & Co., Ltd., Tredegar Works, Bow, London, E., or Stockton-on-Tees.

Digitized by Google

THE XXth CENTURY

Citizen's Atlas

IS THE ATLAS OF TO-DAY

1st, For Completeness.

Its 156 Maps comprise all that the average British Citizen, or Colonial and Foreign Merchant, or General Student requires in the way of reference maps. With its Index, Gazetteer, and Statistical Tables it is a veritable Compendium of Geographical lore.

2nd, For Excellence.

In clearness and beauty of workmanship it is unsurpassed. The drawing, engraving, printing, and paper are all produced in the most perfect style.

3rd, For Cheapness.

It is quite unrivalled. It is by far the cheapest Atlas of the kind ever published in this country, and on account of its merits it is having a larger sale than any other Atlas. It is being published in 26 Fortnightly Parts at 6d. per part. Parts I. to IX. are now ready.

But Seeing is Believing!

and if you have not seen a Specimen Copy send a Post-card to the Publishers and they will forward one free.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., 7-12, Southampton Street, London, W.C.

WORLD - TRAVEL

Organised by

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., F.R.G.S.,
W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,
AND CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

CRUISES

on the Magnificent Ocean Yacht "ARGONAUT."

Tonnage 3,273. H.P. 4,000. Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

Sailing as follows to* THE MEDITERRANEAN:—

February 15th to March 31st.—From Marseilles to Naples, Alexandria (for Cairo), Jaffa (for Jerusalem), Beyrout (for Damascus and Baalbec), Constantinople, Piraeus (for Athens), Nauplia (for Mycenae), Katakolo (for Olympia), Naples, Ajaccio, and back to Marseilles. A Forty-five days' Cruise for £49 7s. and upwards. Return Ticket London, Calais, Paris, Marseilles, included.

April 3rd to April 24th.—From Marseilles to Naples. Ancona (for Loreto), Venice, Trieste (for Miramar), Pola, Zara, Spalato, Klek (for Metkovic, visiting Mostar), Ragusa (for Lacroma) Cattaro (for Cettinje), Corfu and back to Marseilles. A Twenty-one days' Cruise for £26 5s. and upwards. Return Ticket London, Calais, Paris, Marseilles included.

These Cruises are under the auspices of the Co-operative Cruising Co., Ltd.

£10 10s. and £13 13s. TOURS to ROME, vid the Mont Cenis Route. With Optional Extensions to Naples. Assisi, Perugia. Siena. Florence, Venice, and the Riviera.

£12 12s. 6d. TOURS to FLORENCE and VENICE.

Details of Seats for the Coronation and for the Coronation Naval Review.

Full Particulars from the Secretary*—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR FEBRUARY, 1902.

			PAGE
I.	"The Broken Pitcher"		Frontispiece
II.	Some Great Pictures and Their Painters. Illustrated.	C. Sheridan Jones	377
III.	Aunt Sophy. Story	Sheila Alison	386
IV.	Benefactors of the Race. Illustrated.	Reginald Turner	392
V.	The Paid Guest. Story	Adeline Sergeant	398
VI.	Literary Jottings	J. Cuthbert Hadden	405
VII.	The Tenant of Grove Cottage. Serial Story. Chapters XIX.-XXIII. Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Adam Lilburn	407
VIII.	Unrealised Ideals	Rev. Silas K. Hocking	421
IX.	My First Book: Some Well-known Writers on their Beginnings in Authorship. Illustrated.		424
X.	A Forgotten City	John Foster Fraser	431
XI.	Fire-Fighting and Life-Saving at Home. Illustrated.	Alex. Henderson	433
XII.	From the City of Darkest Night: The Story of a Work of Mercy. Illustrated.	A. Wellesley Ireton	439
XIII.	The Strange Disappearance of Lance Martin. Story	Clara Mulholland	445
XIV.	In the Public Eye. Illustrated.	The Onlooker	454
XV.	The Revolution in Arcady	Rev. Augustus Jessopp, D.D.	461
XVI.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	466

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

INSIST ON HAVING

PETER'S

THE ORIGINAL

MILK-CHOCOLATE

IMITATIONS LACK THE CHARM AND DELICACY OF PETER'S.

A SWEETMEAT AND A FOOD

Sold Everywhere in 1d., 2d., 3d., 6d. and 1s. Tablets; 6d. and 1s. Croquettes.

Sole Agents: S. J. MACKENZIE & Co., LTD., London.

No More Chapped or Rough Skin!

"BEETHAM'S Reg'd Larola"

will very soon remove all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, CHAPS, IRRITATION, &c., and render THE SKIN delicately SOFT, SMOOTH, and WHITE. Try a 6d. bottle. Its effect will delight you! Bottles, 6d., 1/-, 2/6, of all chemists.

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

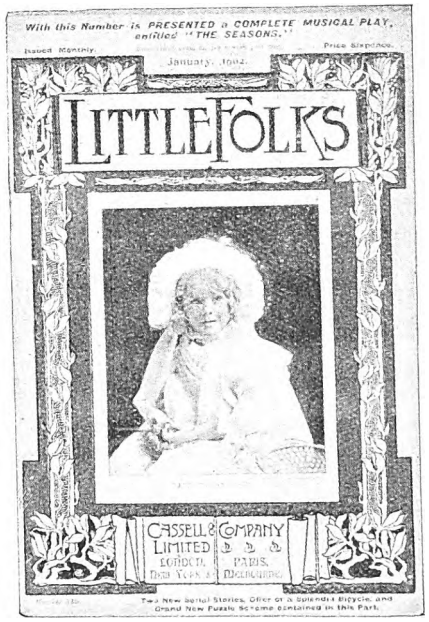
Digitized by Google

Great News for Young People.

A COMPLETE MUSICAL PLAY . . .

Simple, Tuneful, and entirely Original, with New Music and full Directions for Costumes and Scenery; a Play that can be performed by a small or large number,

. . . TO BE HAD FOR NOTHING



With the First Part of the New Volume (Price 6d.) of

"LITTLE FOLKS."

Amongst the Special features of this Part are

TWO NEW SERIAL STORIES, and AN EASY COMPETITION,

in which

A Splendid Bicycle

is offered.

CASSELL & COMPANY Ltd., LONDON; and all Booksellers.

New and Enlarged Edition of the Great Popular Work on Wild Flowers.

MESSRS. CASSELL & COMPANY have the pleasure to announce that on Feb. 24 they will publish the First Fortnightly Part, price 6d. net, of a New and Enlarged Edition of their celebrated work,

FAMILIAR WILD FLOWERS,

By Prof. F. E. HULME, F.L.S., F.S.A.

For this Edition 40 Entirely New Coloured Plates have been prepared, which will represent well-known Familiar Flowers, and thus this new issue will be by far the most valuable and complete edition of this splendid work ever published.

CASSELL & COMPANY Ltd., LONDON; and all Booksellers.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"THE BROKEN PITCHER." By Greuze.

"With a forehead pure and saintly,
Which two blue eyes undershine,
Like meek prayers before a shrine."

Digitized by Google

SOME GREAT PICTURES AND THEIR PAINTERS.

By C. SHERIDAN JONES.

ART has its source, we are told, in the life of a people. How little does art react on that life! To thousands the world's greatest pictures are unknown. While the masterpieces of literature have been sold by the million at a price all can afford, reproductions of great pictures have been few and far between. Of some no prints at all exist. Others are issued at a price prohibitive to all but the wealthy connoisseur. At last this is in a fair way to being changed, largely, it should be said, through the enterprise and skill of a single firm. "The Hundred Best Pictures," issued by Messrs. Charles Letts and Co., in seventeen parts, for as many shillings, form an admirable epitome of the greatest works of the world's greatest painters. Every school and every nation is represented, and the reproductions, some of which we are privileged to give, are in themselves an achievement.

"THE HUGUENOT."
By Sir John Everett Millais, R.A.

To begin with British art, Turner, incomparably its greatest master, is represented by the famous picture "The Fighting Téméraire Tugged to her Last Berth to be Broken up." Exhibited in the Academy of 1839 with the lines:

> The flag that braves the battle and the breeze
> No longer owns her, marked against the title in the catalogue, the picture became at once popular. The public, clinging obstinately to false standards of art which Turner's genius finally threw down,

Digitized by Google

were accustomed to deride the great man's work. The sentiment that inspired this picture appealed to them, however. The Téméraire had been the second ship in Nelson's line at Trafalgar, and, with little provisions or water on board, was what sailors call "flying light," so as to keep pace with the swift sailing Victory. When the latter drew upon herself all the enemy's fire, the Téméraire tried to pass her to take it in her stead, but Nelson himself hailed the Téméraire to keep astern. The Téméraire cut away her studding sails, and held back, receiving the enemy's fire in her bows. Two hours later she lay with a French 74 gun ship on each side of her—both her prizes—one lashed to her mainmast, the other to her anchor.

"THE HAY-WAIN." By John Constable, R.A.

Constable's Pictures marked the return to reality in Landscape Painting.

This was the vessel for which the authorities decided they had no further use. She was sold out of the service at Sheerness in 1838, and towed to Rotherhithe to be broken up. But what the Admiralty destroyed, Turner has made immortal.

"Of all pictures," says Mr. Ruskin, in a famous passage, "of subjects not visibly involving human pain, this is, I believe, the most pathetic that was ever painted. The utmost pensiveness that can ordinarily be given to a landscape depends on adjuncts of ruin: but no ruin was ever so affecting as this gliding of the vessel to her grave. A ruin cannot be, for whatever memories may be connected with it, and whatever witness it may have borne to the courage or the glory of men, it never seems to have offered itself to their danger, and associated itself with their acts, as a ship of battle can. The mere facts of motion and obedience to human guidance, double the interest of the vessel: nor less her organised perfectness, giving her the look, and partly the character of a living creature, that may, indeed, be maimed in limb or decrepit in frame, but must either live or die, and cannot be added to, nor diminished from—heaped up and dragged down—as a building can. And this particular ship, crowned in the Trafalgar hour of trial with chief victory—prevailing over the fatal vessel that had given Nelson death—surely, if ever anything without a soul deserved honour or affection, we owed them here. Those sails that strained so full bent into the battle—that broad bow that struck the surf aside, enlarging silently in steadfast haste, full front to the shot—resistless and without reply—those triple ports whose chorus of flame rang in their courses, into the fierce revenging monotone, which, when it died away, left no answering voice to rise any more upon the sea against the strength of England—those sides that were wet with the long rivulets of English life-blood like press planks at vintage, gleaming goodly crimson down to the cast and clash of the washing foam — those pale masts that stayed themselves up against the war ruin, shaking out their ensigns through the thunder till sail and ensign dropped steep in the death-still pause of Andalusian air, burning with its witness cloud of human souls at rest. Surely, for these some sacred care might have been left in our thoughts — some quiet space amid the lapse of English waters.

Digitized by Google

"THE FIGHTING TÉMÉRAIRE."
By J. W. M. Turner, R.A.
One of the most pathetic pictures ever painted.

"Nay, not so. We have stern keepers to trust her glory to—the fire and the worm. Never more shall sunset lay golden robe on her, nor starlight tremble on the waves that part at her gliding. Perhaps, where the low gate opens to some cottage garden, the tired traveller may ask, idly, why the moss grows so green on its rugged wood; and even the sailor's child may not answer, nor know, that the night dew lies deep in the war-rents of the wood of the old Téméraire."

Of the picture which inspired this magnificent passage, we give above a reproduction. But no reproduction can do more than suggest the matchless glory which Turner has given to the canvas. "It would light a dark room," someone exclaimed at seeing it for the first time. Splendid as is the sunset, the master has contrived that stealing through its beams the cold deadly shadows of twilight creep,

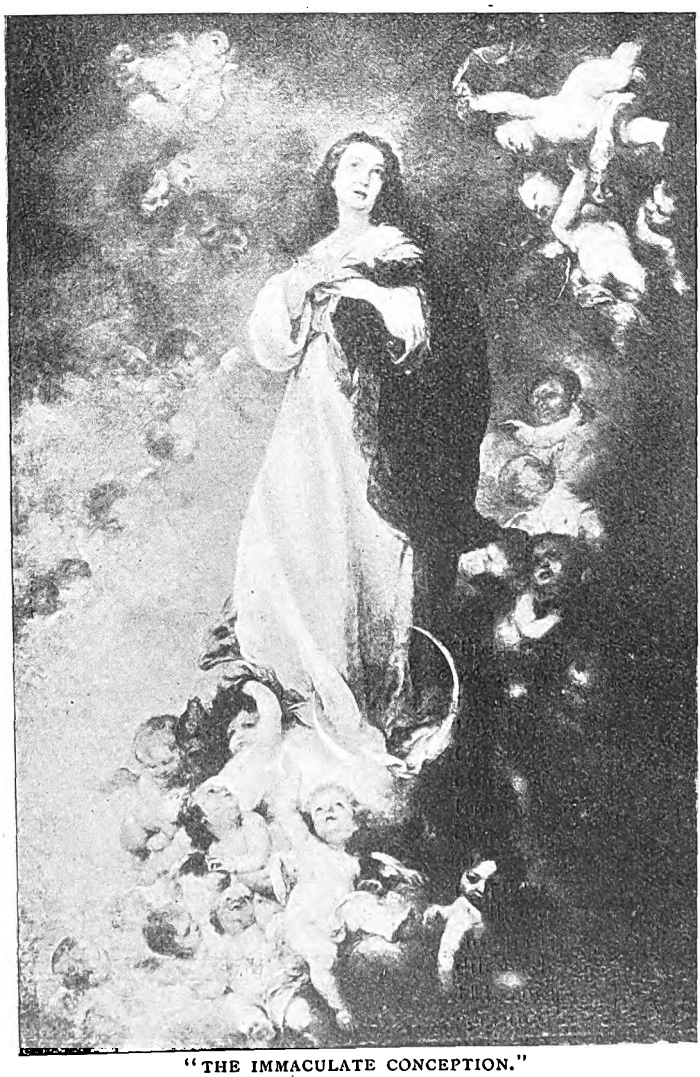
"BLIND MILTON DICTATING 'PARADISE LOST.'"
By Munkacsy, the Great Hungarian Painter.

Digitized by Google

suggesting the end that awaits the Téméraire when this, her last voyage is finished. The water is so presented that one can scarcely remember that it is not real. The picture hangs in the Turner room of the National Gallery, and is, perhaps the artist's greatest masterpice.

Turn from the old Téméraire to "The Hay-Wain" and "The Cornfield," by another and very different kind of artist, who, like Turner, did much to change and to develope art. As Turner showed Nature in her wild magnificence, stern grandeur, and luxuriant abundance, so Constable depicted the serene calm and welcome greenness of the English meadows, wooded depths, and clear streams. He studied his subjects with extraordinary fidelity. "I love every stile," he said, speaking of his native Suffolk, "and as long as I am able to hold a brush I shall never cease to paint them."

Constable's pictures caused an extraordinary sensation. The world had grown accustomed to the stiff, artificial, though beautiful, school of pastoral landscape. Nature was depicted as elegant, not to say genteel, in her velvety smoothness, and man was always represented as a happy creature, free from care or labour, usually engaged in piping a shepherdess to the dance. Constable painted Nature as she is, and his realism commanded immediate attention. "Look," said the French critics, "at these pictures by the Englishman. The ground seems to be covered with dew," a tribute the reader can appreciate best with "The Hay-Wain" before him.



"THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION."
By Murillo.

It was over this school of pastoral landscape that Turner and Constable, leading the way to a closer view and truer concept of nature, ultimately triumphed, though not without a struggle, a struggle corresponding to the battle which in literature was being fought by Burns, Wordsworth, Shelley, and Keats, pioneers of reality. Both to Turner and Constable recognition came largely after death. Unlike in every other respect the two men were alike in this, that they worked incessantly at their art, and did not stoop to conquer an uninstructed public. "The Hay-Wain" and "The Cornfield" are in the National Gallery.

The great movement towards reality began, in a sense, with Greuze, the French master.

Digitized by Google

"THE CORN-FIELD." By John Constable, R.A.

That it has gone far since we may see when we contrast his picture, "The Broken Pitcher," with, say, Munkacsy's "Milton" or Meissonnier's "La Rixe." Greuze's work, however, was at least charged with serious feeling, and free from the forced levity and monotonous lasciviousness that then dominated French art. Diderot, the great encyclopædist, encouraged Greuze to paint the innocent girlhood and fresh domestic scenes that the painter made so charming. "Introduce," he said, "morality into painting. Has not the pencil been too long consecrated to debauchery and vice? Let it unite with dramatic poetry in instructing us, correcting us, inviting us to virtue."

Nearly all Greuze's work is like "The Broken Pitcher," which we reproduce. His type is that of a girl, young and serene.

"With a forehead pure and saintly,
Which two blue eyes undershine,
Like meek prayers before a shrine.
. . . . . .
Face and figure of a child,
Though too calm you think and tender,
For the childhood you would lend her."

There is a very fine collection of Greuze in our National Gallery. "The Broken Pitcher" is in the Louvre.

Contrast this picture, beautiful as it is, with that of a later French artist, Millet, one of whose greatest works, "The

Digitized by Google

Gleaners," we reproduce, and you will see at once how far art has travelled on the road of reality. For the placid, not to say complacent figure of the pretty child holding the broken pitcher, we have the stretched attention of the three women, each straining so that none of the ears of the corn just gathered in shall escape them. They are life-like in their bent humility and pitiful eagerness.

"THE MADONNA DI SAN SISTO." By Raphael.
Said to be the Greatest Picture in the World.

Millet's pictures, I may add, fetched enormous prices after his death. Not so in life however. For years he, his wife and family, lived in a simple country cottage, on the barest measure, and the pictures of the simple French peasantry, eloquent of the hardship and pathos of their life, the pictures that afterwards moved the world, were disregarded or condemned. Like Turner and Constable, Millet was urged to distort his vision, and to look on things as other painters before him had seen them. But he followed his art heroically, and would not gloss the evil or hide the truth. His widow and family were granted a meagre pension. "The Gleaners" hangs in the Louvre.

While Millet in France was fighting the conventions that had shackled art, the Pre-Raphaelites, in England, were steadily forcing on the public higher ideas of beauty. The picture that became one of the most popular of the last century—who has not known and loved it?—"The Huguenot," by Sir John E. Millais, was received with a chorus of carping condemnation. Punch alone acclaimed its beauty, and the critics prophesied its oblivion.

Let us give again the explanatory note from the original catalogue:—

The Huguenot (1852). A Huguenot, on St. Bartholomew's Day, refusing to shield himself from danger by wearing the Roman Catholic Badge. "When the clock of the Palais de Justice shall sound upon the great bell at daybreak, then each good Catholic must bind a strip of white linen round his arm, and place a fair white cross in his cap." (The order of the Duc de Guise.)

Scarcely ever were two silent passive figures endowed with so much feeling on canvas. The tender fortitude of the Huguenot, who looks into his beloved's eyes with the intenseness of one who looks, perhaps, for the last time, and the pleading solicitude of the woman are realised on canvas as they could never have been in words. We seemed to have watched the lovers come together to the old wall, and to have listened to every word they have had to say to each other.

Hardly less moving is the masterpiece of Millais's brother Pre-Raphaelite, Ford Madox Brown's "The Last of England."

Digitized by Google

"THE GLEANERS." By J. F. Millet.

The intense energy of the figures is one of the most remarkable characteristics of this picture.

Husband and wife are taking their last look at their native land, and in that look what pathos lies! Behind them are the noisy riff-raff of the emigrant ship, but they sit, hand in hand, oblivious of the talk, or the wet, thinking only of all that they are parting from for ever. The subject was conceived by Madox Brown during a visit to Gravesend where he had gone to wish God-speed to his friend, Woolner, the sculptor, on his departure for America. Years afterwards Madox Brown wrote the following lines as a kind of interpretation to the picture :—

"The last of England ; o'er the sea, my dear,
Our homes to seek amid Australian fields ;
'Tis not the million-acred island yields
The space to dwell in. Thrust out! Forced to hear
Low ribaldry from sots, and take rough cheer
With rudely nurtured men. The hope youth wields
Of fair renown, bartered for that which shields
Only the back, and half formed lands that rear
The dust storms blistering up the grasses wild.
There, learning skills not, nor the poet's dream,
Nor aught we loved as children shall we see."
She grips his listless hands and clasps her child,
Through rainbow tears she sees a sunnier gleam,
She cannot see a void, where he will be.

The picture hangs in the Art Gallery of Birmingham, which city has the credit of possessing perhaps the finest collection of modern British masterpieces.

Between the subjects of these pictures and those immortalised by the old masters, what a difference exists. The old painters were practically limited to three figures—The Virgin, the Babe, and the Saint who had come in holy adoration. In Raphael's great picture, "The Sistine Madonna," these are presented with a clearness and a beauty unsurpassed. Mr. G. F. Watts, R.A., perhaps the greatest living English master, has said, as stated by Messrs. Letts in their publication, "I should say it is one of the finest, if not the finest, picture in the world. It embodies the best and noblest ideas which can be associated with the personality of the Madonna." The picture, a part of which only we are able to reproduce, was painted for the Church of San Sisto of Pianeeza, and is now in the Gallery at Dresden.

Murillo's "Immaculate Conception" belongs to a later period. The Virgin, with a white robe and azure blue cloak, stands with her feet on a crescent moon, surrounded in a luminous haze by a wreath of angel faces. The picture, by the way, was taken from the Spaniards in the Peninsular War and sold in 1852 by Marshal Soult for £24,000. Murillo's art is divided into two periods. During one, the earlier period, he painted Spanish peasant boys. Later he endeavoured to depict saints, not, perhaps, with the same success. Had he lived to-day the second period would never have been entered on. The natural, not the supernatural; men, not angels, would have been his subjects.

Digitized by Google

To return to moderns and reality, Meissonier, in his great picture, "La Rixe," has endowed a "tavern house brawl" with an interest so vivid that we catch our breaths. The critics, wrong as usual, had accused Meissonier of being unable to represent action in his pictures. His answer was "La Rixe." To get the picture Meissonier had his model held by two stout fellows, from whom he tried to free himself as Meissonier painted. Nothing more lifelike than the result has ever been seen on canvas.

In its way, however, the picture of M. Michael de Munkacsy, the great Hungarian artist, "Blind Milton Dictating 'Paradise Lost' to his Daughter," is a more supreme achievement. The scene is a quiet one, but how tense is the interest.

"There is a pause in the dictation. The poet meditates, reflects, and looks for the right expression. The hand, which is resting on his breast, counts the syllables with an almost imperceptible movement of his fingers. The willing daughter is looking fixedly towards his lips. She is considerably older than the two other girls, has passed the prime of youth, and cannot be called a beauty; but every feature of her face reveals a loving, serious, honesty. She is her father's eye and support. She may be taken to be the child of Milton's first marriage. The hand in which she holds the pen is raised over the paper, which has slipped somewhat aside. The left hand reposes almost ungracefully on the knee, with a sharp angular motion of the elbow, and yet in this motion there lies great energy and true self-forgetfulness. Only the greatest artists have the courage to forsake exterior beauty in a painting when they want to express sovereignty of the mind. . . . This writing girl does not think of herself, or how she looks. She is entirely at her father's work, and seeks with him the missing word. She can almost foretell the word he will choose. . . . It hovers on the lips of this willing (?) assistant; a strained

"THE LAST OF ENGLAND."

By Ford Madox Brown, one of the Founders of the Pre-Raphaelite movement.

Digitized by Google

"LA RIXE."
By Meissonier.

expectation is legible in all her features. But she keeps silent.

The tallest, and most beautiful daughter of all, the manager of the house, on the point of leaving, stands still behind the table in expectation. She cannot return to her affairs till she has heard the last of the verse. The youngest of the sisters near the window stops in her embroidery, and looks listening. The father and his poem are the centre and the contents of the daughters' lives, their love, their hope, and their faith. . . . We shall never forget this silent room, in which we have seen Milton and his daughters, and we shall never be able to imagine it in any other form."—FANNY BRAID.

One last word should be said, not of this alone, but of all the pictures. The reproductions are published at a price which those who toil may pay, but money alone cannot buy them. It has been well written that "Comprehension is our only true Possession."

C. SHERIDAN JONES.

Digitized by Google

AUNT SOPHY.

By SHEILA ALISON.

Author of "The Surgeon's Wife," "Maying in Harvest," etc.

I.—WHAT THE GIRLS SAID.

"IT is simple cruelty!" mourned Amethyst.

"If I were in the House of Commons," threatened Iseult, savagely, "I would cut down the Lord Chancellor's salary at once. I would abolish him altogether!"

"King Herod himself wasn't half so cruel," Amethyst went on, "to defenceless children. He did put them out of pain. He didn't send them to a nasty, cold, dark, lonely, barbarous place, to live under a sour visaged spinster as goaler, where nobody could see them, and they could see nobody; and where nobody knew the difference between a Bond-street gown and one from the native modiste. All the pretty things I got for the Crickmays are wasted. Sackcloth would do for Long Chesterton! It is such a waste."

"Waste!" cried Iseult. "It is perfectly shameful! Even a Lord Chancellor is supposed to have the country's interest at heart; he helps to govern it; and here he sends me, who feels inexhaustible power burning within me, and capacities for immense usefulness, to a stunted, shallow, stupid, uneducated village, where all that force will be simply lost!"

"To an old maid, too!" groaned Amethyst. "She will think everything improper, and want us to read Miss Yonge's books all day, and knit stockings for the poor."

"It shows how absurd it is that these offices should be invariably filled by men," said Iseult. "Now, a Lady Chancelloress would not have made such a pitifully absurd mistake as to send two girls like us to the charge of an unsophisticated old maid, and not to a woman of the world and a mother like Aunt Crickmay."

II. WHAT THE VILLAGE SAID.

"Poor dear Miss Ellaby! What will she do with them? What havoc it will make in her house! How cruel of the Lord Chancellor to force such a fate upon her! Two modern girls from Girton, who will turn everything upside down, and make her life a burden to her. What will she say about it? What is she going to do with them? A hen in charge of ducklings has a peaceful time of it compared with what hers will be!"

"She seemed a good deal dismayed, but she makes the best of everything as usual. Amethyst, the elder one, is a great beauty, and not so very clever, though she was at Girton. Iseult is the clever one; goes in for women's rights; would like to be a doctor, and that sort of thing. The Lord Chancellor took her quite by surprise. She didn't say so, of course, but the real reason must have been that Mrs. Crickmay is not a good chaperon for girls."

"What will be done about those girls? They will expect to be entertained and fussed over," said the vicar's wife.

"I promised to make a party for them," said her friend, Mrs. Medell, a naval Captain's widow. "Miss Ellaby means to invite us all, of course, for Thursday, the day after the girls come."

"I suppose I shall have to have them," sighed the vicar's wife, Mrs. Heath; "but it really would be most inconvenient at present. I remember their mother, I think."

"They had two mothers. They are not sisters, though they are both Kerrisons. Mary and Lucy Ellaby married brothers, and Grace Crickmay came next."

"And Sophy was the youngest? It seems quite odd. One always thinks of her as the eldest of everybody. I wonder why she never married?"

Digitized by Google

"She never had an offer that anyone ever heard of. She was born to be an old maid. She will make a capital dragon—keep off all undesirable lovers."

III.—WHAT THE GIRLS SAID.

"It was a delightful little party, Aunt Sophy," said Amethyst, "and so good of you to make it for us. The people are most amusing—kind, I mean. I suppose the golden youth of Long Chesterton shines chiefly at entertainments where more violent exercise is offered—balls, and tennis and water parties?"

"I am afraid, my dear, that our force of young men has passed before you to-night," Aunt Sophy answered, smiling amusedly. "They came eagerly, indeed, as they have never been known to come before, to see my two novelties."

Amethyst looked honestly perplexed. Iseult said: "For myself, I prefer old men. The vicar, at least, was educated at Oxford. I don't want to flirt."

"Oh!" cried Amethyst, sarcastically. "You don't call it flirting, I suppose, when you monoplise old professors and young politicians for a whole evening; but it looks just the same. I suppose there isn't a Latin or Sanscrit word for flirting, or that would describe it perfectly."

"Mr. Wood is not an old man," said Miss Ellaby. "He is only thirty-five, and you cannot call Johnny Heath old, or Frank Medell—they are not out of their teens. There are never many men in the country. They are drafted away to towns."

"There is the new member, Sir John Hendley. Don't you ever have him?" asked Iseult.

"Oh, my dear, he is too great a person to come to our little tea parties. I don't even know him. He has only just come to the Hall. It has been shut up ever since his uncle died."

"Then you should call upon and invite him," said Amethyst. "It is very unkind to leave him out."

"My dear, he is a bachelor. I cannot possibly call upon him, or ask him to visit us. It would not be proper. I believe he has called at the vicarage."

Amethyst sent a little twinkling glance from under her eyelashes at Iseult, but that young lady had laid aside her spectacles for the present; so it was lost.

Miss Ellaby seemed old enough to Amethyst to call upon a regiment, as far as propriety went.

"I should like very much to know him," said Iseult, thoughtfully. "He is a very advanced Radical. I should like to talk to him about his property."

"We are sure to meet him somewhere," continued she afterwards, when the cousins were in their own room brushing their hair; "and I will see that he is made free of the house. The only eligible creature here. We cannot afford to waste time."

IV.—WHAT SIR JOHN SAID.

"They are two remarkably pretty little girls? Deliciously fresh, especially the dark one. I hope you will allow me to call upon you, Miss Ellaby, to improve their acquaintance," said Sir John.

"He is a real tonic in this dead-level wilderness," said Amethyst to her cousin; "and I don't think he can be so very old. Anyway, his maturity stands out in most refreshing contrast beside the guilelsss infancies of the Heaths and Medells. I think, on the whole, I like old men best. They are kinder, politer, more chivalrous than the absurd creatures who call each other Johnnies and Chappies, and who are always thinking so much about themselves and their looks that they cannot spare a thought for other people's."

"He has some good ideas," said Iseult, thoughtfully, as was her wont; "and he is not in the least bigoted, as very young Radicals often are. He likes to hear my views, and listens to them with the greatest attention; indeed, he is eager to draw me out. Some men might have preferred shutting me up."

"Of course he enjoyed drawing her out," Amethyst said within herself. "I expect he has had no end of quiet fun to-night, thinking over what she has said. As if a man of his weight and experience would care for what a girl said! No, no! Men hate political and learned women. They like something as different from themselves as possible. I knew he was talking about us all that time to Aunt Sophy, and now he is coming to call. I wonder when he will come, and whether I should wear white or a colour!"

"I see my way to a great career," mused Iseult, as she stared at the stars from her little white bed. "I am not mistaken ; I am not the sort of girl who fancies every man who looks at her is in love with her, nor am I the girl a man would idly flirt with, much less 'draw out' for his private amusement. He talked to me nearly all the evening ; he hardly did more than stare at Amethyst ; and I knew he was talking about me to Aunt Sophy, that long time under the plantain, and now he is coming to call ! He is very clever and clear-sighted, but he has his fads. These I can easily manage to make him give up. Why, a member of Parliament's wife is more than the member nowadays——"

Digitized by Google

"Here comes Sir John!" exclaimed Amethyst. "What will our watchful dragon say when she returns and finds what has happened? What fate inspired her to set off for the hospital so early? Destiny, Iseult—destiny! He has certainly lost no time. Perhaps he saw her go out and seized the opportunity. Make haste, dear! I cannot go down to him quite unchaperoned."

"As I am younger than you——" Iseult put in hastily, flushing angrily.

"Oh, as for that, we are all on an equally unchaperoned level here, according to poor Aunt Sophy. We must chaperon each other."

"I am sorry not to have found Miss Ellaby in," said Sir John, after shaking hands with the bright girls, each all shining in happy excitement, Iseult's brown eyes beaming behind her spectacles as radiantly as Amethyst's blue ones under her golden fringe.

Both were in white, and Iseult had a bunch of carnations in her dress.

"She won't be in until six," said Iseult, simply.

Amethyst flashed an angry glance at her cousin's unconscious back crop of dark hair—she wore hers gathered into a fluffy golden heap on the top of her head.

"She may be in any minute," she contradicted. "How stupid of Iseult not to remember that Sir John, being so old, might have antiquated English ideas as to the propriety of prolonging his visit when the dragon was off duty!"

"Well, I hope you will manage to take care of me till she comes," said Sir John.

Iseult was rather annoyed at his manner, which savoured somewhat of the caressing patronage he might have used to children —and rather perplexed, too, and her consequent pause, and then a moment of deliberation, whether first to introduce the subject of Irish land or of Welsh tithes, gave Amethyst her opportunity.

"We'll take the best of care. Come into the garden and eat strawberries. We will pick them, and then eat them in the corner, under the copper-beech."

"You don't care for strawberries?" said Iseult, gravely, to Sir John.

How could anybody discuss land and tithes, stooping over strawberry-beds, and impeding the utterance of every other word by a strawberry surreptitiously popped into one's mouth?

But Sir John elected for the strawberries, and Iseult could but bide her time and wait an opportunity. She had it when, an hour later, they were sitting at the rustic table under the copper-beech with their strawberries and cream.

"I suppose you have hardly had time to see the Premier's speech at Cardiff yet, the papers are so late coming here," she said.

Sir John had paired for the rest of the session with the Tory member for another division, as he had important business to look after at home.

"How can you tease about politics on such a lovely afternoon?" cried Amethyst. "Do let us enjoy our strawberries?"

But Sir John evidently was not teased by politics, nor hindered by them from enjoying the strawberries. He seemed immensely interested in discussing these great questions with Iseult, and even took pains to keep Amethyst well placed in the conversation, and made the topics quite amusing and interesting, so that she might not be bored, and was even led into giving her own opinions on the subjects discussed.

"He is glad of any excuse to stay on with us," she thought.

At six o'clock Miss Ellaby returned, and was sent by the servant to find the merry party under the copper-beech. The strawberries were all eaten ; but Sir John insisted on gathering more. And just to soften any wrath that might lie hidden under her gentle exterior, because he had stayed so long, he actually stayed on till seven o'clock ; and then Miss Ellaby virtually hinted him off the premises, by asking him to stay to tea, as it was their hour.

"No, thanks ; I must be off!" he exclaimed, starting up guiltily and looking quite sorry. "I have paid an unconscionable visitation; but, in fact, I waited for you, Miss Ellaby, so it is your fault. I want to give a party of some sort—a sort of house-warming, in fact, or garden-warming, if there is such a thing, for these young people will want tennis; and I thought you would advise me what to have and whom to have."

Digitized by Google

Amethyst literally jumped for joy.

"But I must not detain you," continued Sir John. "May I come again, Miss Ellaby, to talk it over?"

V.—WHAT THE VILLAGE SAID.

Omnes: "There must certainly be something in it. The question is, what, or, rather, which?"

Mrs. Heath: "Iseult. He has promised to have a Home Rule demonstration in his park to please her, and he is going to pull down the Colter's-row cottages, and build a hideous new place, like a workhouse, instead, after a design she has drawn."

Mrs. Medell: "No; Amethyst. A man turns to beauty like flies to honey. He is far too practical with Iseult to be in love with her. When people are in love, they don't talk about drains and Acts of Parliament."

Mrs. Heath: "It certainly is Iseult. He treats Amethyst like a baby, and laughs at her little airs. A man doesn't laugh at a girl he is in love with."

Miss Bowen: "It is neither one nor the other—not in that way. He is dull, and he has found two girls ready to flirt with him and pet him; and he is willing enough to accept their homage, like any other idle man."

Mrs. Medell: "No; that cannot be. He is a gentleman, and as clever and practical as he is kind. He would never keep going to the White House, day after day, knowing how ready girls are to misconstrue and people to talk, unless he had honorable intentions."

Alice Heath: "Amethyst is madly in love with him. Iseult is far too high up in the clouds to think of love."

Edith Lee: "No; Iseult is as much in love as any ordinary young woman. Amethyst treats him like a grandfather. He could not care for a butterfly thing like her. Iseult and he are twin souls—kindred spirits."

Mrs. Medell: "As for kindred spirits, men always marry their opposites."

Miss Bowen: "It is rather hard on the Long Chesterton girls that these Kerrisons should have come. If they had stayed away, what a chance it would have been for Clara Scott! She is exactly the girl that would have suited him."

Mrs. Heath: "He doesn't seem to see it. He never looks at her."

Alice Heath: "Amethyst has got a new consignment of dresses from Bond-street. The Lord Chancellor really ought to interfere. Her bills must be outrageous!"

Edith Lee: "The Lord Chancellor is a Tory. He will never allow the wedding to take place."

Mrs. Heath: "Perhaps that is why Iseult is so rapturous about the recent elections and the Unionist split. She wants a Liberal Lord Chancellor to come in."

Johnny Heath: "I never heard such stuff! As if either of them would look at an old fogey like that! The two jolliest girls that ever came near the place!"

Frank Medell: "Iseult might have him; she's not jolly; she's an awful prig, just like yourself—but Amethyst! By Jove! A man would deserve to be banished from the country who proposed to monopolise her. Did you ever see such eyes, and such dimples, and such glorious hair? And the way that girl can play tennis, why, it's divine!"

Mr. Wood: Miss Kerrison is very charming, but in my opinion Miss Iseult is far more beautiful. She has the face of St. Catherine—or, rather, of Hypatia, since I fear her Christianity is not her strong point. If she would but suffer herself to be taught by those appointed to teach her, what might not her talents, her enthusiasm, her self devotion, do for the Church? She would be thrown away by marriage. I feel sure that she at least is not a willing attraction for Sir John."

The Vicar: "They are pretty girls, but neither of them is to be compared with their aunt. Oh, yes, you boys may stare, but Sophy Ellaby was ten times prettier than they are when she was a girl; and she has hardly lost any of her beauty. Her grey hair is as pretty as theirs, and her complexion is as good, and her soft eyes could never lose their expression; and with all Miss Iseult's tall talk, I should like to see her do half as much with her whole life as her aunt has done with every year of hers. As for conversation, I never knew a better, more sympathetic and intelligent listener than Miss Ellaby, and she has a wonderful gift of seeming to have said almost nothing, and yet to have placed things in a clearer light for you."

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Lee: But there is no room for comparison; the girls are girls, and quite different from elderly people; have less experience, of course, and are apt to overdo enthusiasm."

The Vicar: "She is far younger than they are, though her hair turned white a little after she was thirty. Her manner seems to me quite child-like in its simplicity beside Miss Kerrison's vanity and woman-of-the-worldishness, and Miss Iseult's learned theorising."

Alice Heath: "She is a regular old frump. Look at her dress!"

The Vicar: "Her dress seems to me perfection, for it is perfectly suitable to her age and circumstances. She dresses like a modest gentlewoman. As for Miss Kerrison's dress, it is, no doubt, pretty and fashionable, but it seems to me too smart for this country place."

"Then, do you admire Miss Iseult's dress? I declare I nearly called after her the other day, thinking it was you, Frank."

Edith Lee: "She is very masculine; it is horrid."

Johnny: But her hats, and ulster, and little natty coats all fit her so bewitchingly. A pretty girl may wear anything she likes."

Miss Bowen: "There is nothing so repulsive to me as an unwomanly woman."

Mrs. Heath: "I daresay she is pure womanly enough to be very glad to catch a baronet. He seems to like her style, since he is pulling the place to pieces to please her."

Mrs. Medell: "She is not the rose, but near the rose. It is an excuse to get near Amethyst to go to the White House with plans of drains and ventilators."

Alice Heath: "Amethyst certainly thinks he is in love with her. She blushed when I mentioned him the other day, and she could hardly attend to anything last night when we were all expecting him, and then she smiled when he came and appropriated him at once."

Edith Lee: "Why, Iseult talks as if they were already married. She says, 'we' shall have this done and 'we' object to the other. It is perfectly absurd."

Omnes: "Well, time will show very soon now. He has abundance of opportunity, and not even a pretence at ignorance of his pretensions to contend with or a show of coyness. 'Elegant females' do not seem to think it due to themselves to refuse a man the first time he offers, as they did in Miss Austen's days. His mouth is open, and they are both ready to drop in, and no doubt he will be equally happy with either. It is only a matter of which dear charmer happens to be out of the way when the spirit moves him to propose."

VI.—WHAT AMETHYST SAID (TO HER REFLECTION).

"To-morrow I shall wear my black dress! I am almost sure that I look best in black, after all. Black is a very good idea. He has seen me in nothing but white and light things, and, perhaps, as men are so blind, they seem all alike to him; and men do require novelty. Who knows but that my sudden appearance in black may startle him into saying something more definite—more official, I should say; for he could hardly have made his meaning plainer, really. Perhaps he hesitates, thinking I am too young to be married and settle down to an important and influential position. I shall look more sedate and more like a stately Lady Hendley in black. . . . Aunt Sophy is a hopeless old maid. I told Sir John how she actually expected I would have helped her with her nasty, infectious hospital, and go poking into those horrid cottages, and stay in the house this lovely weather to smother myself beneath heaps of hot flannel for the poor. He said so nicely that some people were born to be butterflies, and we should not like to do without them, useless as they are; which I daresay punished Aunt Sophy nicely, saying as it did that she was an ant, grubbing down amongst the dust and sand. I must say for Aunt Sophy that, in spite of her antiquated notions, she has taken to effacing herself a good deal lately. I think she will be sorry to part with me."

VII.—WHAT ISEULT SAID (TO HER JOURNAL).

"I see exactly where his fault is. He is full of right ideas, and eager to improve himself and to assimilate mine, and not at all bigoted about giving up plans that I condemn; but he has a want of practicality. He is too sublimated, as it were, about some things. He doesn't seem to know that though we understand each other perfectly well, our position would be strengthened if, in fact, we were officially engaged. He recognises our perfect equality so fully that I believe it has not occurred to him that the initiative should be with him any more than with me—in fact, it strikes me that he will not presume to speak since I do not, his natural chivalry yielding precedence to a woman, and that he waits for me. . . . I will give him until after the demonstration; if he has not spoken by then, two more days hence, I will speak. . . . It is rather tiresome that Amethyst is so often in the way, but he is wonderfully patient with her. Still, I wish she could be as sensible as Aunt Sophy and keep out of the way more. Perhaps Aunt Sophy would be less ready to efface herself if he did not tease her about her Toryism. She is very old-maidish—she makes such a fuss if my papers are what she calls littering about when visitors come. She looks gloomily at us sometimes. I suppose she sees all her pet fads and theories knocked down when I come into power at the Hall."

Digitized by Google

VIII.—WHAT SIR JOHN SAID.

"But I cannot understand. I mean, how was it possible you did not understand? I flattered myself that a man had never been more straightforward. Why, I have hardly ever been out of the house. I am quite ashamed to think how I must have bored you, but you have been too kind. You not only hid from me that you were bored, but you seemed to encourage me by your—by looking pleased to see me, and all that. You are the only person in the parish who has not understood. Everyone else seems to have guessed that I could not come here so often for mere friendship's sake."

"But the girls—it might have been the girls."

"The girls!" in genuine incredulous astonishment.

"They are so pretty, and Iseult is so clever. They would be so much more suitable."

"Suitable! Good Heavens! Which one? Little Amethyst, with her dimples and baby nonsense, or Iseult, with her blue-books and spectacles?"

"You seemed to enjoy the blue-books and the nonsense very much."

"I enjoyed anything that kept me near you."

"Iseult would enter into all your plans and ambitions."

"She would do nothing of the sort. She would insist on my going in for hers. She is a pretty little goose, and it is charming to hear her wild theories."

"I am a Tory! I pauperise the poor! I can't bear to think of the pretty old cottages coming down. I am an old maid with antiquated notions, and my hair is white, and I have no sympathy with the revolutionary spirit."

"Sophy, you are the most beautiful, and the sweetest, and cleverest, and womanliest, and youngest of women."

"I am forty-one."

"And I am forty-two; a very proper age for you. The world is upside down now, I think; and girls are born twenty years old. Both these girls are old enough and wise enough—though little Amethyst is the wiser of the two, with real practical world-wisdom—to be your great-aunts. Sophy, I am sure you care for me. Will you be my wife?"

IX.—WHAT AUNT SOPHY SAID.

"Yes; I suppose so. I am afraid people will be suprised.

X.—WHAT THE GIRLS SAID.

"I knew she would be jealous of us, and set him against us, wicked old thing!"

"He thinks she has money. He would be jealous of a wife who took the lead. He is very narrow, after all, very prejudiced, and cannot submit to being ruled by a woman. He wants a tool."

"After all, it will be very nice to live at the Hall till we are married."

"A woman can never be free and supreme if she binds herself down by marriage. I shall be far more the power at the Hall than if I had been his wife."

XI.—WHAT THE VILLAGE SAID.

"It is really astonishing, but really much wiser; and Sophy Ellaby is a very pretty woman, and much more suitable to be lady of the Manor than a little extravagant flirt, or a young woman who wants to lecture upon the franchise, and to wear a divided skirt, as she calls it."

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

Benefactors of the Race.

By REGINALD TURNER.

HE who can make two ears of corn grow in the place where only one grew before ; the inventor who brings into being that which makes easier the lives of men ; the man who discovers a new means of alleviating human suffering, of stamping out disease ; the pioneer who takes by the throat a great social evil : the names of such men as these deserve to be written on history's scroll in letters of gold.

The latter half of the last century produced some such benefactors of the race, of whom a few brilliant examples yet survive.

In no branch of life has more progress been made than in surgery, progress mainly due to the work of two men.

The year 1847 was a momentous one. In that year Dr. Simpson, of Edinburgh, ventured into the dark unknown. With the properties of chloroform the medical profession had some theoretical acquaintance, but the exact quantities of this highly dangerous agent that could with safety be used could only be determined by actual experiment. This experiment Dr. Simpson and one or two of his fellow physicians resolved to make on their own persons. Bacon says "Men fear death as children fear to go in the dark." What must have been the feelings of these daring pioneers of science as they took the plunge into oblivion, not knowing whether they would ever wake on earth again? Happily, they came through the ordeal in safety. Henceforth, by the use of anæsthetics, surgery was shorn of half its terrors.

But there remained another discovery destined to confer even greater blessing. Though anæsthetics rendered operations painless, they were still attended by much loss of life. However skilfully an operation might be performed, there was always grave doubt whether the patient would live or die. Dreadful complications were constantly occurring. The walls of the hospitals were saturated with infection, and there was no guarantee that the germs would not find their way into newly made wounds, setting up fatal gangrene and blood poisoning.

It was due to a great surgeon still living that an effectual remedy for this shocking state of things was found—Lord Lister, of whom it was recently said without an atom of exaggeration, "The whole of Humanity with uncovered head salutes you." The enormous value of his gift to humanity has been recognised by the powers that be—Joseph Lister was the first member of the medical profession raised to the peerage.

Lord Lister's scientific bent is doubtless inherited, for his father, although a business man, gave up much of his spare time to the study of optics, to such good purpose as to invent valuable improvements in the lens of the microscope.

After a course of study in hospital, Mr. Joseph Lister accepted the post of secretary to Professor Syme, a distinguished surgeon in Scotland, and later he was entrusted with the post of house surgeon. While occupying this position he was brought into daily contact with all manner of subjects for the surgeon's knife. One fact impressed him deeply—the terrible septic complications that so frequently destroyed the patient. His mind was constantly at work to find an antidote to these malign forces. The theories of Pasteur on germs directed his experiments to the right channel. A germ killer must be devised if the terrible risk attending operations was to be obviated. Lister found his antiseptic in dilute carbolic acid. In future, no operation was to be performed without the stringent use of the disinfectant. All the instruments, the hands of the surgeon and of the nurses in attendance, were impregnated with the solution. Nothing was allowed to have contact with the patient unless first so treated. The beneficial effects of the new system were immediately apparent. The percentage of successful operations was incalculably increased, and thousands who are alive to-day owe their recovery to the wisdom and research of Lord Lister.

Digitized by Google

LORD LISTER.
The Discoverer of the Antiseptic Treatment in Surgery.
Photograph by Barraud.

What Lord Lister has done for surgery has been done for nursing by that queen among women, Miss Florence Nightingale. Miss Nightingale is over eighty now, but her noble work in the Crimea is fresh in the personal recollection of many, and hers is a name that will be handed down in history to generation after generation as an emblem of womanly tenderness and self sacrifice. At a dinner given by Lord Stafford at the end of the Crimean War, slips were handed round, the guests being invited to write upon each the name they deemed most heroic in connection with the war. When the slips were examined they were found all bearing the same name —Florence Nightingale. One of the few sources of consolation in connection with the present miserable conflict in South Africa is the care bestowed on the sick and wounded of both sides. It is all traceable to Florence Nightingale. It was she who originated the present admirable system, sealing it almost with her life's blood. For nearly forty years she has paid in pain throbs for her heroic disregard of her own health all through those awful months in the hospitals of the Bosphorus.

She found these places pestilential shambles, too hideous for description. There lay the poor wretches brought in from the field uncleansed, deprived of all suitable nourishment, the place literally overrun with rats and all kinds of vermin. Up to that time no woman had ever been allowed to be present in a military hospital—no woman's touch to soothe the dying soldier, no woman's quick intelligence and sympathy to nurse back to health those who, having such a chance, might have recovered.

No wonder Florence Nightingale and her staff of lady nurses seemed to them as angels. As at night time she went from bed to bed holding aloft her little lamp, dying men turned to kiss her shadow as she passed. "Only to see her was happiness," said one poor soldier. That a lady delicately reared should voluntarily forsake a beautiful home, the refinements of wealth, to come and work herself to death in that den of horrors, was to them a source of unending amazement. Nowadays there are thousands of ladies who follow in her footsteps. But their ways are made plain by her experience and the lessons she has taught the military authorities.

Digitized by Google

Within six months she had changed the pandemonium to comparative paradise. But it was at terrific cost to herself. The gratitude of the nation was deep. A sum of £50,000 was presented to her, the whole of which she used to found a nursing home in connection with St. Thomas's Hospital. In this institution is to be seen a statue of Florence Nightingale carrying the lamp which she used in the hospital at Scutari. Although an invalid for many years Miss Nightingale has exerted a very powerful influence on all movements pertaining to nursing. Her advice is constantly sought by the War Office and by promoters of new schemes in America or on the Continent. One cannot call to mind a case of another woman whose work has been so mighty and so permanent.

Some few years ago an English gentleman received an invitation to visit Italy. The letter came from an influential body of statesmen, divines, and other leading men of that country, and contained this sensational clause: "In our opinion you have done more to make Italy than Cavour or Garibaldi." The name of that English gentleman was no other than Dr. Samuel Smiles, the author of "Self Photograph by MISS FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE. The London Stereoscopic Co.

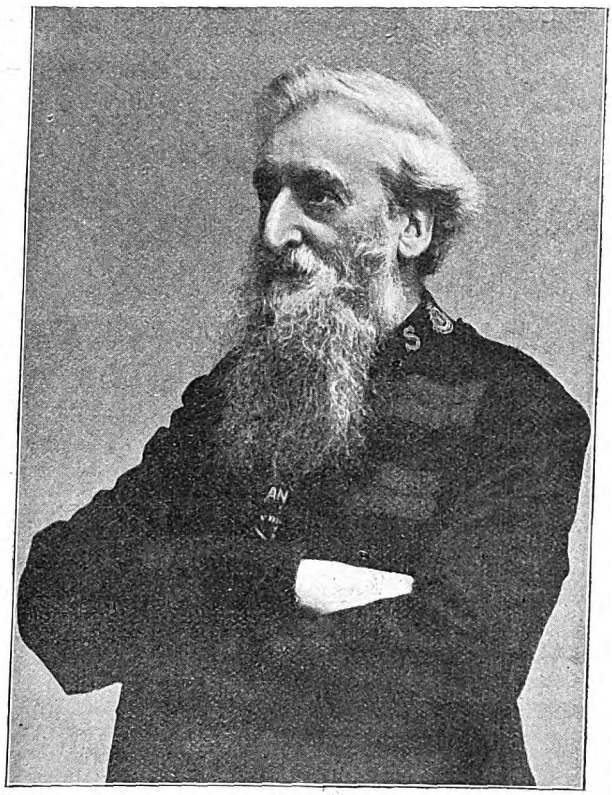
The Pioneer of work which has shorn sickness of half its terrors.

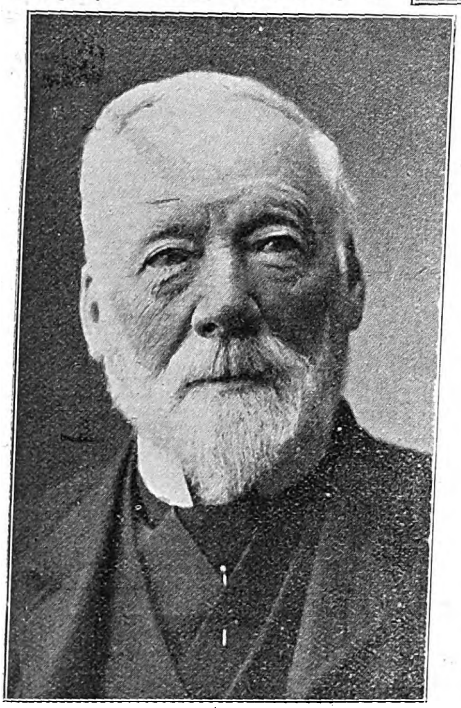
Digitized by Google

Help." What a magnificent tribute from a whole nation to a single individual. It is to be doubted whether a parallel can be found for it, at least in the present generation.

Dr. Smiles is a very old man now—not very far short of ninety years of age: he has lived to see his famous book translated into seventeen languages, and attain a circulation of a quarter of a million copies in this country alone. No other writer living can claim to have done more good with his pen than Dr. Smiles. The influence of "Self Help," especially on the young life of the world, has been extraordinary. Dr. Smiles has been called the apostle of perseverence, and his own life is a testimony of the value and efficacy of the maxim he has taught with his pen. He tried one business after another till he found his vocation in railway work, reaching the high position of secretary of the South-Eastern Company. More than half a century has gone by since the idea of "Self Help" originated. During his tenure of office as secretary to the Leeds and Thirsk Railway Dr. Smiles was often asked by the young men about him for help and advice. He gathered a few around him for informal chats on such staple subjects as thrift, courage, and industry. The counsel he gave, as he himself says, was as old as Solomon's, but what could be better? These talks were the basis of "Self Help," published fifteen years later. The publisher to whom the MS. was first offered did not appreciate its value and sent the author a note to that effect. But the public pronounced an immediate judgment in its favour, no less than 20,000 copies being sold in the first year of publication.



GENERAL BOOTH.
Who has brought light to "Darkest England."



DR. SAMUEL SMILES.
Author of "Self Help," a book whose influence for good has been incalculable.

If one were asked to name the man living to-day who has done most good to his fellow creatures, the answer would be "General Booth." There is scarcely a country in the wide world, which is not touched by his influence, and the "soldiers" under his command may be numbered by tens of thousands, each unit being pledged to war with sin and wrong wherever he or she finds it. The remarkable part is that of this vast army a large proportion are drawn from classes hitherto almost untouched by religion.

Digitized by Google

The Salvation Army has succeeded in reclaiming characters from lives of sin and wretchedness where all other bodies have failed, or have not even attempted the task. The Army is the conception of one man and his wife. To her influence may doubtless be traced the prominence given to women workers in the Army scheme, a factor which has had so much to do with making the Army the power that it is to-day. General Booth and his devoted band of soldiers, male and female, are every day saving souls and bodies in all quarters of the earth.

Photo by LORD AVEBURY. Bassano.

The Apostle of Recreation and Culture.

It is their mission to alleviate the hunger of the body as well as of the soul, to help those who are willing to work to obtain it, to which end there are some forty labour bureaus always open, and some sixty labour factories always at work.

General Booth has been, indeed, a faithful steward of the talents entrusted to him some years back by public subscription for the raising of the submerged tenth. That a very large proportion of the population still remain submerged there can be no gainsaying, but an enormous amount of good has been and is still being done.

No less than 20,000 destitute men and women are touched by the scheme daily, of which number 15,000 are housed every night in the 160 or so shelters and food depôts.

No man can make a pound go further than the General. One hundred pounds under his management sustains fifty persons for six months, or at the rate of £4 per person a year. Of course, the secret of this wonderful economy lies in the fact that everyone who receives benefit from the scheme contributes to it in some form of work. Had it not been for the General's power to get work out of what is usually considered hopeless material, that which has cost £260,000 would have cost a couple of million.

In the days prior to the Reformation there were a great many more holidays than at present, despite what has been done for the people in this respect by that public benefactor Lord Avebury, perhaps even now better known as Sir John Lubbock. Saints' days were almost as plentiful as blackberries, and every Saint's day meant a holiday.

When the Puritans came into power they went too far in the opposite direction; in fact, they made practically a clean sweep of all holidays whatsoever, and the nation as time went on grew in danger of becoming like Jack, the proverbial dull boy.

Gradually, however, common-sense people rebelled, and Easter Monday, Whit Monday, and Boxing Day were kept. Bank clerks, and thousands of others engaged in commercial pursuits, were still prisoners until the passing of the Bill in the sixties promoted by Lord Avebury authorising the payment of bills due on these holidays on the day after. This measure practically secured the days mentioned to the whole of the people, together with the first Monday in August, for, although not compulsory except in the case of banks, the closure of the banks gave a lead that the nation at large could hardly help following.

Digitized by Google

Lord Avebury has been well called the apostle of recreation. His work for the elevation of the people does not end with the institution of much-needed Bank holidays. He is a great believer in the elevating influence of healthy amusements which can be followed all the year round in spare hours. His little book, "The Pleasures of Life," pointed the way to self-culture; in it was the germ idea of the "hundred best books," an idea which has been followed by all the leading publishers, and which therefore, more than any other in recent, years has been the means of introducing to the masses the finest standard works. Latterly the idea has been extended to sets of hundred best pictures.

The man who gave to the children of England their great Charter of protective justice was not so many years ago a Congregational minister, working in a quiet, unobtrusive way at Greenwich. The name of the Rev. Benjamin Waugh has for some years been one to conjure with—a terror to the oppressor of childhood, and a man to be universally revered by all humane people.

During his ministry in the poor neighbourhoods of Deptford and Greenwich, Mr. Waugh's heart was often saddened by the cruel cases of child neglect that came under his notice. A man of tender sympathies, and of a keen intelligence, he constituted himself Childhood's champion. At this time he was editor of the "Sunday Magazine," and it was in a little room above the offices of that journal that Mr. Waugh, single-handed, carried on the work of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children that he thus brought into being.

REV. BENJAMIN WAUGH.
Who won for the Children their Charter of Protection.
Photo by A. Montville Evans, St. Albans.

Working with the powers conferred by Parliament in the Children's Charter, Mr. Waugh brought no less than 4,000 cases of cruelty to light within the first year. Public sympathy was aroused, and the little room was given up in favour of adequate premises in Harpur Street, Bloomsbury. By this time Mr. Waugh had a number of willing helpers, though a mere nothing compared to the large army who are fighting the Children's cause to-day under his command. The society has now between 800 and 900 centres of operation, by which more than half-a-million children have been benefited.

REGINALD TURNER.

Digitized by Google

THE PAID GUEST.

By ADELINE SERGEANT.

Author of "The Story of a Penitent Soul," "Beyond Recall," "No Saint," "Out of Due Season," etc.

I.

COURTNAY was dull. He had been feeling dull all day, and when a steady rain began to fall, and a raw February fog to obscure even the gas-lamps, and render crossing the road a matter of difficulty, he yielded to the influences of the weather, and became for once thoroughly depressed. His pleasant rooms in Piccadilly and the skilful attentions of his invaluable servant failed to cheer him; he smoked two big cigars, and was beginning a third, when a note was brought to him, which he opened without much interest, feeling that all the world and its concerns were but of small importance. But his face changed while he read the letter:—

"Dear Courtnay,—I am awfully sorry to bother you, but if you are passing old Granger's to-night, would you mind stepping in and telling him that I shall not be able to go to Reading to-morrow to report the meeting? I have got a touch of influenza, I think, and shall not be out for a day or two. I thought that, as Morley is such a favourite of yours, you might possibly care to run down in my stead, and Granger will probably suggest this if you carry him the news of my defection. —Yours, G.T."

"What a good fellow he is!" Courtnay soliloquised, laying down the letter: "It is not every man who would take the trouble to put the work he can't do into another fellow's hands. He thinks I'm in want of a job, that's what it is. All my own fault, for the fit of grumbling which I favoured him with, last time I saw him. Vapoured a bit about wanting work, didn't I? Yes, my good fellow, but not your kind of work; I've no ambition to be a struggling journalist. 'Pon my word, I don't quite know what I want to be or do; I seem to have lost all my energy since I came back from Switzerland last autumn. If only I could find that girl again, I believe I should be all right. But a more complete disappearance I never came across. Nobody knows anything about her, apparently, and she never gave me her address. If only I hadn't been called to England so suddenly just then! My dear mother couldn't have chosen a worse time than that September for falling ill—as far as I was concerned, that is. I told the dear old lady so the other day, but she only laughed at me.

"Well, what am I to do about this letter, I wonder? I hope poor old Thorpe isn't really ill. Doesn't look particularly strong, I fancy. Lives in lodgings, I remember he told me, but did not say where." He lifted the note again, and drew in his lips with a whistle of surprise. "Newport Buildings!" he repeated. "Why, those are not anything but workmen's dwellings, surely! He must be pretty hard up if he lives there. He never gave me anything but a club address before. As he has given me this address, I wonder whether he would mind my turning up at his diggings to see how the poor chap really is. He must almost expect to see me, I fancy, after writing that note. At any rate, as I can't very well do his reporting for him to-morrow, I may as well go and see whether there is anything I can do. Something to occupy one's mind, in this beastly weather."

It was not late, although the skies were so dark; it was not yet six o'clock; and as Courtnay pursued his way along the slippery streets his mind was filled with reflections concerning his friend Gilbert Thorpe, a man to whom he had been attracted during his visits to a literary club that held its meetings once a week in a little street off the Strand: attracted partly by the brilliant cleverness of the man, partly by something lovable in his nature, and partly—though Courtnay would not, perhaps, have admitted it—by a curious resemblance, which of late had forced itself upon him, between Thorpe and the girl with whom Nigel Courtnay had more than half fallen in love last autumn in Switzerland. It was a strange similarity; extending not only to complexion and feature, but to gesture and expression and turns of speech. Courtnay meant to ask his friend some day whether there were any connection between him and Celia Devereux.

Digitized by Google

At last he reached Newport Buildings—a group of dingy-looking "model" dwellings where it seemed wonderful to Courtnay that any man of refinement should care to live—and endeavoured to find the number which had been written at the head of Thorpe's letter. To Courtnay's dismay it was at the very top of the house. "Poor chap!" Courtnay ejaculated; "what a hole! Who would have thought it to look at him! I wonder if I'd better go back? After all, I don't think they'll mind me very much. He hadn't a scrap of false pride about him; and I'm sure I've been down on my luck before now." And forthwith Courtnay knocked at the door.

When it was opened, he thought he must have made a mistake. A young and very pretty but wan-looking girl, with a baby in her arms, stood before him and asked his business. Courtnay explained that he had come to see Mr. Thorpe, but——

"My husband is very unwell to-night, sir," the girl replied; "but I can ask him if he will see you. Do you come from Messrs. Blackly?"—naming an important firm of wholesale merchants in the West-end.

"No," said Courtnay, more and more astonished; "I have nothing to do with them." The young woman seemed doubtful. It was plain to see that she had no pretensions to gentility, but her face was sweet and gentle in expression, and her voice was low and soft. She went away to inquire, retiring to an inner room for that purpose, while Courtnay stood and meditated on the folly of men who married hastily, and evidently below their station. For, whatever Thorpe was, he was a scholar and a gentleman.

The girl returned presently, with an intimation that the visitor might follow her. Courtnay followed with some trepidation, and found himself in a tiny room, scrupulously clean, but almost entirely bare, where Thorpe awaited his friend. The young man was lying on a low bedstead, but to Nigel's surprise he was not entirely undressed; in fact from the preparations about the room one would have imagined that he was just going to dress for the evening. But his face was flushed with fever, and his voice was so frequently interrupted by fits of coughing that he could scarcely, at times, make himself intelligible. He smiled faintly when Courtnay came in, and held out his hand. "It is awfully kind of you to look me up," he said. And more than ever Courtnay remarked that visionary likeness to Celia. "I am not in very good trim, you see, or else I would not have bothered you about the meeting."

Courtnay was more embarrassed than his friend. "I must apologise for my intrusion," he said. "You see, I had no idea that you were—h'm—a—a——"

"A married man," said Thorpe, completing the sentence cheerfully. "Well, somehow one does not always think of mentioning it. I have no notion, now, whether you are a bachelor, or a Benedict with half-a-dozen olive-branches."

"Do I look like it?" asked Nigel. "But I ought not to say that, for anyone less like a married man than yourself I have seldom seen."

"Do I look so juvenile?" laughed Thorpe; then with sudden gravity he added: "But you are perhaps right. I married rather earlier than most men. I have, at any rate, the advantage of a good wife."

Courtnay marvelled a little and wondered whether the wedding of this good wife had not been the cause of all the young man's troubles. But he could not make inquiries on this point, so he went on rather hurriedly to his reason for coming. "It occurred to me that if you were ill there might be one or two things I could arrange for you," he said. "I'll go to old Granger's for you with pleasure. But I don't much care about doing the Reading work, unless by any chance you feel that you must go if I don't."

"No, no; it isn't that. There are plenty of people to do it. This attack's an unlucky thing for me; I was hoping to get on Granger's staff, but I know he has a mortal horror of illness, so I expect he won't see me again for weeks. He's far more nervous than a woman."

Digitized by Google

"Look here," said Courtnay abruptly, "we're fellow-workers, and I know well enough what a bore it is sometimes to be brought to a stop like this in the middle of one's work. I've got plenty in hand; in fact, I'm a bit of a fraud, Thorpe, for I'm not dependent on a profession at all, though I'm afraid I have let some of you think so at the Century, for the sake of good-fellowship; and if twenty pounds, or fifty, for the matter of that——"

"What a good fellow you are, Courtnay!" said Thorpe, in the pleasant voice which Courtnay liked to hear. "But indeed it's not so bad as you think with me. I've got some commissions, and I shall work at home, and, as the doctor said, keep warm and quiet. Thank you a thousand times all the same."

"Very little good thanking me when you won't let me do anything for you," grumbled Courtnay. "Come, Thorpe, don't be pig-headed. I would come to you at any time if I wanted help, sooner than to anyone I know. I am sure you need not mind taking a temporary loan from me, and I'll promise to dun you for it if I want it back. You won't be able to do much for the next fortnight, I can promise you, so why should you not make your mind easy?"

But Thorpe shook his head; and Courtnay would in no sense of the word have carried his point if at that moment Mrs. Thorpe had not appeared at the door, saying:

"I'm sorry to interrupt you, Gilbert, but there's a message just this minute from Blackly's to say that they can't find a substitute, and they will be very much put about if you can't go. I told them how ill you were, but they wouldn't listen——"

"Never mind now, Mary," said Thorpe soothingly. "Is the messenger waiting? Tell him I'll be there without fail, if I possibly can."

Mary retired, and Courtnay looked at his friend with suspicion. "You do not mean that you are making arrangements already for your future work?"

Thorpe attempted a laugh. "My dear fellow, I'm not so bad as you think me. But—don't call me uncivil"—with a nervous glance at a clock which ticked on a table beside him—"but I am obliged—to say good-bye. Perhaps another time you'll stay longer! If it were not that I have an engagement——"

"You don't mean that you're going out!" cried Courtnay, a sudden light bursting upon him as he noticed the dress-suit to which Thorpe's eyes had strayed. "Impossible! Are you mad?"

"My dear Courtnay, you don't know the circumstances," said Thorpe, flushing like a girl. "It's a professional engagement—that is all. You know as well as I do that there are things of this kind which cannot be put off."

"I'll be hanged if I do!" said Courtnay, a little roughly, for he was vexed with Thorpe for so sturdily refusing help. "Any engagement must give way when you are suffering as you are now. I'll go myself to the place, and tell them that you are too ill to come. Leave it, whatever it is, to me. Won't that do? You see, it is no use for you to nurse yourself up one day, and run into danger the next. It won't pay in the long run."

Thorpe smiled at the little lecture. "I'm afraid," he said, "that I can't find anybody to take my engagement." He flushed sensitively at the thought. "I'll tell you what it is, and then you may despise me at your leisure. Sometimes—I don't so much mind confessing this to you, Courtnay—I've been so hard up that I would have swept the streets if I could have got a living that way. I've not known how to get bread for my poor wife, or milk for the child. You don't know what it is to feel yourself so helpless, perhaps. Well, I happened to come into contact with a great London firm—in fact, I wrote some rhyming advertisements for them—and they suggested to me a way in which I could earn a couple of guineas a night, if I chose. There are dinner-parties—chiefly among self-made people who are trying to get into society—where men are wanted to act as guests. Now do you understand?"

"You were to have gone to one of these entertainments to-night?"

"Yes. And, as time presses, you must let me get up and go."

"Why should I not go in your place?"

"Nonsense! Impossible!"

"Why impossible? Can't I wear a dress-coat and talk small nothings as well as you? I suppose it's not a place where one would be likely to meet one's most intimate friends?"

Digitized by Google

"I should think not. They are tradespeople, extremely rich, but so vulgar that even London hesitates to receive them. At the last moment they were disappointed of a guest upon whom they relied, and I was asked to take his place. But I must go myself; it would not do for you to take my place; you would not like it, and——"

"If that is all your objection, my dear fellow, I shall insist on going, whether you consent or not," said Courtnay with a laugh. "Like it! I shall think it the best joke I have had for years. Tell me all the details, and I'll be off directly."

"But you'll have to go in my name. Do you mind that? You can explain privately to the host if you think fit, but it would be better not."

"I'll do just as you like," said Courtnay light-heartedly; "I think it will be the biggest lark I've had for years. I hear myself introduced—Mr. Gilbert Thorpe—and——"

"Excuse me," said Thorpe, while a flush rose to his face, "Thorpe is my pen-name only. You will be announced as Mr. Gilbert Devereux."

Nigel stared; seemed about to ask a question, and then held his tongue. There was no time to go into matters of family resemblance or relationship. But he could not help that momentary start of astonishment. For the name of the girl he loved, and whom Thorpe so strangely resembled, was Celia Devereux.

II.

The house was in Portland Place; one of those portentously solemn grey mansions which seem to breathe wealth at every pore. A red carpet adorned the steps, and a carriage was just arriving as Courtnay's hansom drove up. He had to wait while the two ladies who occupied the carriage alighted; and although Courtnay could not see their faces he caught a glimpse of very gorgeous cloaks and dresses, and of a slim, graceful figure following a more ponderous one up the steps. He felt a thrill of interest and curiosity which he had certainly not expected to experience. "They may be vulgar people, but they may also know who are the right people to ask," he reflected. "I hope to goodness I shall not see any friends of mine. At a house like this, one might meet anybody in these degenerate days."

He was admitted, gave his name, and was rather disgusted to note that the footmen grinned behind their hands, as if they knew the terms on which he was admitted to the house. "Poor Thorpe!" said Courtnay to himself, recognising the fact that these derisive looks which affected him not at all were probably misery and degradation to a man who was forced against his will to put up with them. He was announced in due form, however, as Mr. Gilbert Devereux, and was received with a certain amount of empressement by the Jewish-looking gentleman who was the host, and who introduced him to an enormously stout lady in green satin and rubies, who informed him that "'er 'usband 'ad made hall 'is money in pork." Courtnay said to himself that Gilbert had been right, and that it was highly improbable that he would meet any of his intimate friends at the house of Mr. Isaac Goldstein.

But his confidence was destined to receive a rude shock. For, at that very moment, the door opened again, and the butler sonorously announced: "Lady Devereux and Miss Devereux." And Courtnay's divinity sailed into the room, in the wake of the gorgeous lady whose carriage had preceded Courtnay's hansom. At Interlaken, Celia had been accompanied by an aunt, but no doubt this gorgeous lady was her mother. Courtnay rather wished that he could sink into the earth. Suppose Gilbert were a relation of these people? Would not his situation then be very ridiculous, to say the least of it? He had half a mind to turn his back on the whole entertainment, plead illness, and return to his friend to explain the extraordinary contretemps which had occurred.

But he had not been prompt enough. Celia had seen him, and he could not be blind to the fact that her whole face lighted up when she saw him, as if she had recognised a friend. She bowed to him graciously from the other side of the room, but she had not time to speak to him, for dinner was announced at that moment, and Courtnay found himself going into the dining-room with the stout lady on his arm, and no opportunity of saying a single word to Miss Devereux. At that moment the folly of what he had done became painfully apparent to him. At any moment his host might address him by name; or Celia herself, who was not very far off, might speak to him. In either case, detection would immediately follow, and Courtnay would be the laughing-stock of the company. So, at least, he imagined, forgetting that the laugh would be turned against Mr. Goldstein rather than himself. His anguish of mind made him a very poor companion to the lady in green satin, to whom his remarks were spasmodically vague; and she, concluding herself to be despised by this young swell, as she designated him, became gradually silent and sulky, as one ill-treated by her host and his guest.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Goldstein had taken in Lady Devereux, and made jovial remarks to her in a loud voice from time to time—remarks which Courtnay could not help straining his ears to catch. But the moment that he had dreaded did not come until dessert was on the table; and Courtnay had suffered a martyrdom by that time. He was almost prepared for the worst when the ordeal came.

"It's an odd coincidence that we should have another guest of your ladyship's name, isn't it?" said Mr. Goldstein cheerfully. "Maybe he's a cousin of yours, my lady?"

"No, that cannot be, for we have no cousins, Mr. Goldstein," said Lady Devereux urbanely. Then she put up her long-handled eyeglass, and looked round the table. "Which is the gentleman who bears our name?"

"Sitting next the lady in green," said Mr. Goldstein in a lower tone. "The dark gentleman with a moustache—Mr. Gilbert Devereux."

Lady Devereux's start and change of colour were unmistakable. It was evident that she knew the name. "That is remarkable," she said, after a short pause. "I did not know that there were two persons who had a right to bear that name. It was the name of my husband's eldest son by his first marriage, and we have not seen him for some time. But of course this is not my stepson. I do not think I ever saw him before."

"Your daughter seems to know him well enough," said Mr. Goldstein with an unsatisfied growl. "I saw her smile and bow to him as she came into the drawing-room. I thought how lucky I had been in finding somebody that she did like." For Mr. Goldstein had already noticed that his eldest son and heir did not seem to be making much impression upon Miss Devereux. "Not that he's anybody particular," he continued, in a lower key, meant for Lady Devereux's ear alone; "the fact is that Lord Herbrand Clive, who had promised to come, was detained at almost the last moment, and as I did not want an empty place I got a—well, a friend of mine to send me a gentleman of good family and all that sort of thing: he comes for a consideration, you know. I'm told it's done in the highest circles, when there's a hitch. Just send round to Blackly's—and there you are, you know."

Lady Devereux went white with rage. "I am not accustomed to meet Blackly's young men," she said, in a perfectly audible voice; and she surveyed poor Courtnay through her eyeglass in a way which brought the attention of all the company upon him.

Courtnay could not of course catch more than a word or two of what was being said; but he heard enough to make him very uncomfortable. He wondered whether he had not better say a few words of explanation to his host when the ladies had gone, and then take his departure. But he was drawn into a conversation with one of his neighbours, and it was not until the men were making their way to the drawing-room that he had any opportunity of accosting his host. And then it was Mr. Goldstein himself who took the initiative. "Look here, young man," he said, cornering his chartered guest in the corridor, "I don't know anything about you, except through Blackly, but if I find that you ain't all that you say you are—why, I'll let Blackly know it, and you too! And it don't seem to me that you know your duties, neither, for you didn't hardly open your mouth to the lady that you had the honour of taking down to dinner, and I ain't going to pay my two guineas for nothing. You come upstairs and make yourself a little more agreeable, or I'll tell Blackly you're not worth the cost of your dinner."

Courtnay shrugged his shoulders—he could not help it—and for a moment thought of walking straight to the front door and telling Thorpe that the situation had become intolerable. But then he remembered that Thorpe was not so independent of Mr. Goldstein and of Blackly's as himself, and it seemed unfair to spoil Thorpe's chances of work for the future. So he followed his host upstairs, solacing himself with the reflection that at least he should have some chance of renewing his acquaintance with Miss Celia Devereux.

Digitized by Google

It was plain, at any rate, that she had as yet not heard anything to his discredit. She turned to him with smiling lips and outstretched hand as soon as he entered the room. It almost seemed as if she had been watching for him to come. "Oh, Mr. Courtnay," she said, "I am so glad to see you again! I am going to introduce you to mamma, who was not with me when I met you in Switzerland."

Courtnay would gladly have been excused. Lady Devereux was already bearing down upon them, with wrath in every line in her face and every fold of her silk brocade. Celia, evidently misinterpreting the signs, began quite innocently: "Mamma dear, this is Mr. Courtnay, whom I met in Switzerland, and whom you have said so often that you would like to meet."

Here was a dilemma. Courtnay bowed low, and hoped that Lady Devereux would have the discretion to let the matter pass. But Lady Devereux was not the person to let anything pass where her dignity was concerned. She stared coldly at Courtnay, as if she had not seen him; then attempted to draw her step-daughter away with her. "My dear, you are quite mistaken," she said in a voice that was audible to more persons than Celia and Nigel. "He is not named Courtnay at all, and I believe that he is nothing but an impostor." Celia blushed crimson, and she cast a sudden imploring glance towards Courtnay, as much as to ask him to excuse her step-mother's rudeness, which he was willing enough to do. But Fate was against him. Mr. Goldstein had overheard the words, and was pressing forward, his face inflamed with rage, to inquire into a matter which he vaguely felt concerned the honour of his house.

"What's that you say, young lady?" he called out, "what's that you say? This gentleman's name is Courtnay, you think, do you? That's curious, now, because he's here under another name to-night. Come into some property and changed it to Devereux, I suppose?"

"Devereux!" repeated Celia, with the colour again springing to her face.

"Mr. Gilbert Devereux, at your service," said Goldstein sneeringly; "and as it is not usual for gentlemen to have more names than one——"

"It is my brother's name," said Celia faintly; and she turned upon Courtnay a look of such anxiety and supplication that he felt his heart die within him at the thought of the explanations that he would now be obliged to make.

He turned savagely towards his host. "If it were not for your guests I should make you a very different rejoinder, sir," he said; "but as I think an explanation is due to them I will ask them, with your permission, to let me speak to them for a moment in private. I can then reassure Miss Devereux as to the use I have made this evening of her brother's name."

"Certainly not," replied Lady Devereux majestically; any explanation that you may have to give must be given in public. Neither I nor my daughter wish to hear it, but it seems probable that you owe an explanation to Mr. Goldstein, whose house you have apparently entered under a false name."

Courtnay turned rather pale. "I do not conceive myself bound to render any account of myself to Mr. Goldstein," he said haughtily, "and I could have made only a partial one to Miss Devereux; but I may say this—that I am here to-night at the request of the gentleman whose name has been introduced, and that I am sure of his support."

"Come, Celia," said Lady Devereux, turning towards the door. "This has evidently nothing to do with us. We had better leave Mr. Goldstein to settle the matter with his guest. I must say, however, Mr. Goldstein," she added in a tone of the greatest severity, "that it would be advisable for you to hesitate before you ask people of my position to associate with paid guests." And it was with a shudder of reprobation that Lady Devereux drew her silken draperies around her and was gone.

But in the meantime Celia and Courtnay had exchanged a word.

"You know my brother? O, Mr. Courtnay, for Heaven's sake, give me his address."

He gave it, not knowing whether he was doing right or wrong, and was rewarded by the loveliest smile of thanks that ever shone from mortal eyes. At least, he thought so, and he had always been accounted an excellent judge.

A brief but unpleasant interview with Mr. Goldstein formed an appropriate conclusion of the evening, and Courtnay got out of the house with the happy consciousness of having done as much mischief to his friend, and also to himself, as it would be possible to accomplish in the course of one short evening. Celia's smile was the only pleasant memory he could carry away with him.

Digitized by Google

It was with great misgiving that he made his way next morning to Newport Buildings and knocked at his friend's door. It was speedily opened, but not by Mrs. Gilbert. Celia herself stood in the doorway and held out her hand, with a face all April tears and smiles.

"I am here before you," she said, "and have confessed all your misdeeds."

"I am bewildered," Courtnay said, holding the slender fingers closely in his own, and looking unabashed into her lovely eyes. "How does this come about?"

"It was all Gilbert's pride and folly," she answered, but there was nothing save tenderness in her tone. "He had a quarrel with my father when he married the daughter of a farmer in our neighbourhood. She is a dear, sweet girl, I believe, and she has made him an excellent wife; but, you see it was a disappointment to my father, and perhaps to all of us, because we did not think that"—and here she hesitated a little—"that Mary had had quite the right training to make her exactly what a Lady Devereux ought to be. However, I daresay she will learn, and I mean to do all I can to help her. But my father and Gilbert had such a frightful quarrel about it that Gilbert said he would never come home again until my father apologised to Mary, and that he would cast in his lot with people who work for themselves, and earn his own living. And my father said he had done with him for ever."

"But that seems a deadlock, seeing that the situation has not changed," said Courtnay."

"The situation has not changed, but my father's views are modified," said Celia. "You see, he adored Gilbert, although he quarrelled with him, and he has not been the same man since Gilbert left home. He has long been wanting to find Gilbert, and make him any amends and apologies that my brother demanded; but the difficulty was that we had lost trace of Gilbert altogether. We advertised; but he would not answer. I suppose his want of success made him all the more reluctant to do so. I was growing desperate about it, and my father was breaking his heart. What we should have done if you had not so kindly—so generously—come to Gilbert's aid last night, I cannot imagine."

"I did not expect to meet anyone who would know me."

"I should think not—at that dreadful man's house! It was my step-mother who wanted to go," said Celia with a little blush. "She thought that as they were so wealthy it might be a good thing for us to know them. She meant well, but I don't think we shall ever go there again."

"I hope not," said Nigel gravely. "And does your father know that your brother is found?"

"He is with Gilbert at this moment, and I don't know which of the two is the happier. Gilbert and his wife and their dear little boy are all to come down to us in Gloucestershire as soon as he is well enough to be moved."

"Gloucestershire! What a long way off! That accounts for my never meeting you."

"You must come down to see us," said Celia, with a shy little smile. "We shall all want to thank you for your kindness to Gilbert. I don't know how we can ever repay you."

"Don't you?" said Courtnay, looking at her with all his heart in his eyes. And from the way she blushed in answer he was satisfied that she knew better than she chose to say.

It is certain, at any rate, that he ultimately gained the only reward upon which he had set his heart; and although Mr. Goldstein could never be induced to disgorge the two guineas which had been promised to Gilbert, Courtnay always declared that he had been an exceedingly well-paid guest.

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

LITERARY JOTTINGS.

By J. CUTHBERT HADDEN.

A NOVEL has lately come out under the title of "The Peril of the Prince"? I haven't seen it myself, but I gather from the reviews that the "Prince" of the title is the present reigning Sovereign, and that the writer makes an English lord follow him about with the intention of assassinating him. The story begins by one Anarchist telling another that "the Brussels business has been botched," referring, of course, to the attempt by the wretched Sipido; and then the narrow escapes the Prince has at Ascot, in the train, in a yacht, etc., are minutely described. It is an absurd piece of fooling so far as I can see. But one reviewer declares in effect that it is a direct incentive to assassination. "Such a book might be the excuse for some madman's crime," says he. I don't believe it. Anarchists do not go to fiction-writers for suggestions. If they did they would make a pretty mess of their business, as this very "Peril of the Prince" abundantly proves. For who but a novelist's hero could possibly have escaped being done to death with so many assassins on his track?

A fellow-penman writes about girls' books. While admitting that these are better than they were, he thinks they are not so good as they should be, with the result that girls, when they get the chance, read the boys' books. It is perfectly true. Nor is there any difficulty in accounting for the girls' preference. Books written avowedly for girls are always more or less feeble productions. Their authors can't resist the pointing of a moral, and young people hate morals in books. They are well represented by the Scotch Sunday-school boy who being threatened with a moral by a platform speaker, exclaimed: "Never mind the moral, gie's another story." We want strong, healthy, and at the same time high-toned books for our girls. The story in which the good invariably die young has long been recognised as a mistake. It contains no invitation to goodness for any but the anæmic, and if our daughters throw it aside in disgust, who shall blame them? Were I a girl I should do the same.

With all the multitude of women writers amongst us, it is curious that so few set themselves to the production of the kind of book that girls so clearly demand. There is no girls' author of to-day with half the prestige that Miss Charlotte Yonge enjoyed in the seventies. The single recent recruit of promise is Mrs. Tynan Hinkson, whose fiction for girls has delicacy, unusual breadth, unusual wit, and a real literary flavour. Of the "practised hands," Mrs. L. T. Meade has discovered that she can write sensational tales for the man in the street as well as anyone in the three kingdoms, and naturally she sticks to what pays best. Mrs. Molesworth usually caters for the quite small girls. In short, we have no really first-rate writer for girls. We want someone who will do for them what Mr. Henty does for the boys; and surely in these days, when everybody seems to be taking to authorship as a duck takes to the water, the want need not remain unsupplied.

Mr. Russell Lowell's biography makes a big volume, but there is one good story I miss in it. Lowell had published his first book. Like most first books it was not a huge success, and the author was naturally disappointed. Presently a fire occurred in the publisher's warehouse, and all the copies of Lowell's book were burnt. How the publisher regarded the calamity I cannot say, but Lowell clearly had no regrets. In a day or two he was writing to his friends to say that "the entire edition" of his book had been exhausted! Probably a good many authors of first books would prefer a fire of that kind to the usual fire of criticism.

Digitized by Google

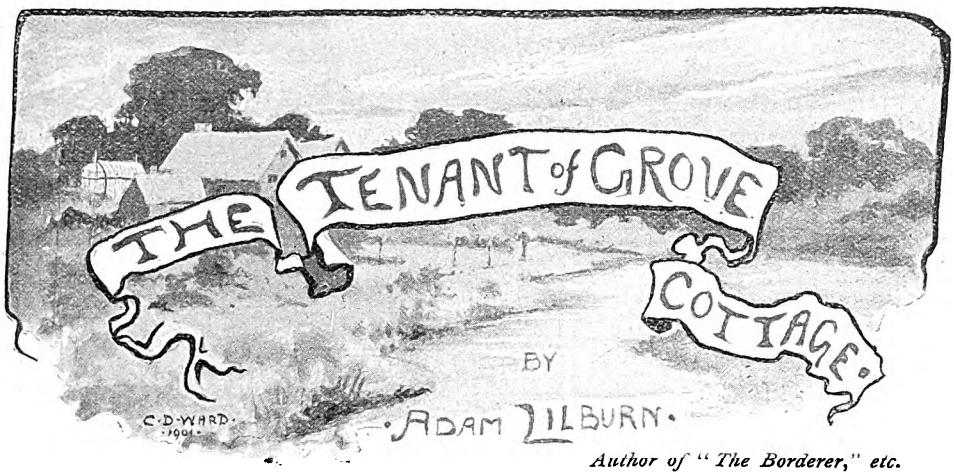
One of the great lessons of Lowell's life for present-day writers is that he would never consent to do mere hack work. What he did undertake must be up to the level of his own exacting taste. Edward Fitzgerald said of him: "A merit about Lowell is that he is in no hurry to write on any matter, but lets it gather in form within him until as complete as he can make it." The pity of it is that so few of us can afford to follow his example in this respect. We must write, as Sterne said (or was it Goldsmith?) "not to be famous but to be fed." And yet Lowell was a poor man up till nearly the end. He could have made a great deal more by his pen if he had liked, but he did not like. He would rather be poor than not give of his best. Why can't we all have a like courage?"

Mr. F. C. Kenyon has written a monograph on Mr. Hall Caine. He has not much to say by way of biography about the eminent novelist, and naturally so, for Mr. Caine has lived a singularly quiet and retired life away from the busy, bustling, nerve-destroying centres of human existence. He was born in 1853, and is of Manx parentage, as any careful reader of his books can readily see. His young manhood was largely spent in the Isle of Man. For a winter he was a Manx schoolmaster, living in a house which stood at the top of a desolate old headland called Maughold Head, and with poor boys and girls of all ages for his scholars.

During that time he was also a journalist. Stevenson used to decry all forms of newspaper work as being absolutely detrimental to the acquisition of a good literary style. There is something in this, no doubt, for the journalist has to produce his work under conditions which do not allow him a whole afternoon to turn a sentence or think over a nicety of expression. But style is not the only valuable thing for a writer to possess; and Mr. Caine at least has found himself none the worse, but all the better, for his early connection with the newspaper press. His beginnings were certainly modest enough. For nine months he contributed a series of articles to a Manx paper called Mona's Herald. The articles were anonymous, and Mr. Caine recalls with considerable amusement how the readers of the paper imagined the author to be some venerable greybeard of the traditional Father Christmas type. When it became known that a smooth-faced boy of seventeen had written these portentous papers the disgust was unspeakable.

J. CUTHBERT HADDEN.

Digitized by Google



Author of "The Borderer," etc.

Illustrated by CHAS. D. WARD.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Nora Shelley, Mr. Pattinson's young ward, walking out with her uncle from his country cottage one day, discovers the dead body of a stranger who has been stabbed in Dredman's Lane. The knife with which he was stabbed belongs to Mr. Pattinson himself. He explains that he used it to cut his shrubs with, and left it in a place where it might easily have been stolen. Suspicion falls upon the village ne'er-do-well, Jerry Gobey, who is found in possession of the dead man's purse. He is taken into custody. The murdered man is identified as Mr. John Carlton, of Carlton and Co., merchants, in London. At the trial affairs look black for the prisoner, but on the evidence of a fellow-loafer who spent the night with him he is acquitted. Herbert Carlton, the son of the murdered man, returns from Australia. Father and son had quarrelled, and before Herbert left England he had been reduced to complete destitution. A romantic adventure befell him which proved a turning point in his career, and when he got out to Australia he was very successful in the goldfields. On his arrival in England he learns from his father's confidential clerk that Mr. Carlton owed a large sum of money to a money-lender named Solomon Bembridge who has not made any claim since the death. Herbert goes down to Hawkstone, the scene of the tragedy, and there meets a college chum in the local doctor. On Wensley Common, Carlton meets Nora Shelley, whom he recognises as the young girl who some years before had stayed him when about to jump into the river and given him all the money in her purse. He arranges to call at Grove Cottage to see Mr. Pattinson with reference to the murder of his father.

CHAPTER XIX.

TEA ON THE LAWN AT GROVE COTTAGE.

BERTIE was more fortunate upon the occasion of his second visit to Grove Cottage, when he found the tenant, Mr. Pattinson, busy amongst his auriculas, now in all their glory of many-hued blossoms.

Bertie expressed his admiration for the pretty flowers in warm terms; and the enthusiastic amateur beamed upon him, and took some pains to point out the various beauties of his collection. It was a pleasure to find a young fellow who cared anything about the products of Nature nowadays, he averred.

Upon the matter for which Bertie claimed his assistance, he did not appear to have much to say. He was willing to assist the young man in every way within his power, but, unfortunately, that was limited. To his ready sympathy for Bertie's personal loss, Bertie—rather to his own astonishment—did not warm. The latter told himself that he was too critical; but this did not alter his feelings.

It seemed to him rather the polite assumption of an emotion by one whose philosophy enabled him to stand aloof from all human sorrows, than the spontaneous response of one heart to another.

Digitized by Google

The young fellow was annoyed, he knew not why, except that the cold, nerveless handshake of the auricula grower had roused a feeling of antagonism within his breast. Such details were indicative of character.

Nevertheless, he prosecuted his inquiries. Mr. Pattinson answered his questions readily enough. Without saying so outright, he conveyed an impression that he was of the same opinion as the village constable. He pointed out the fact that Jerry Gobey must have passed along the path beside the stream on the day preceding the murder. Indeed, the poor wretch had admitted this, even while swearing that he had never seen the fatal knife lying on the garden seat. No, he didn't lay much stress on the alibi, although it had convinced the jury. One thief would tell a lie readily enough to save the life of another, especially if that other were a chum.

That went without saying! But the poor wretch had been punished since, for suspicion still clung to him, and he was now a sort of moral leper to the rest of humanity. And really the creature ought not to be judged by ordinary standards. He was hardly responsible for his actions. Nature had been in an unkindly mood when she framed him. He was one of humanity's outcasts, scarce worth the price of the rope that would be required to hang him.

Mr. Pattinson talked like a philosopher, but he set Bertie's teeth on edge. The young fellow's eyes flamed.

"I can't understand your way of looking at it," he said, sharply. "You talk as though murder was but a venial offence. Of course, I don't expect everyone to feel so keenly as I do about the matter. But murder! Isn't murder the most atrocious of all crimes? Anyone can destroy life, but, alas! who can restore it?"

Mr. Pattinson stooped and quietly removed a caterpillar from one of the flower-pots, and crushed it under his foot.

"They are such pests," he remarked, in a pensive voice, then shot an odd glance at Bertie from behind his spectacles. "But what you say is true—too true! I hope you don't misunderstand me, Mr. Carlton! I have no wish to palliate the crime, which is, as you say, atrocious—only I would like to point out to you that the murderer may possibly not be quite responsible for his deed."

"It's impossible for me to regard it from any point of view other than my own!" cried Bertie, passionately. About a thing that affects one's love and loyalty one can only feel. And I tell you this, Mr. Pattinson, it would be bad for that same Jerry Gobey if I believed him to be guilty."

His hands worked and his nostrils dilated as he spoke, and the other watched him in an interested way. Then quite suddenly his mood changed, and he grew sad rather than fierce.

"If we had parted in love, it wouldn't have affected me so terribly, although I should always have done my best to bring his murderer to justice. But just think of the pity of it all! Put yourself in my place for a minute! I was fond of the dear old man and he of me, yet—yet we had quarrelled—quarrelled fiercely, as people do who—who love each other! And I hadn't been gone a week when I wished myself back in England, for just one thing—just to tell him how sorry I was, and how I knew myself to be in the wrong. I was an obstinate, conceited young fool, but—but I always hoped to see him face to face, and to tell him—tell him——"

Here a lump climbed up to his throat, and he choked over it. Mr. Pattinson drew a sharp breath, as though something in the speech had hurt him.

"And—and that villain has robbed me of forgiveness! Don't you see how hard it is? Death has taken my chance of gaining it away. I can never tell him now, never gain his forgiveness!"

The other man seemed more distressed than at any previous moment.

"I never thought of that," he murmured, half audibly; then, with an effort, he threw off the emotion, and smiled. "It's all very, very sad, Mr. Carlton," he said; "but you may be quite sure the forgiveness was yours all the time! No father, worthy of the name, would continue to bear anger in his heart for what was said in a fit of temper. Come, now, put aside your grief for a time, and join the ladies under the ash tree on the lawn. I see they're having tea there to-day. It's the first time the weather has been sufficiently warm for such a proceeding. And my ward, Miss Shelley, makes excellent tea, I assure you! Ah, yonder is the friend you spoke of, the gentleman who was to call for you. He must join us also. Let us hasten to persuade him."

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

And, hurrying off, the hospitable man welcomed Hargreaves, who was just entering the garden. Bertie was following Mr. Pattinson, and was surprised at the effect the first sight of the latter appeared to have upon the astrologer. Hargreaves started back, as though alarmed by the mild and beaming countenance, and scarcely returned the greeting accorded to him. But in a minute he recovered his manners, though ever and anon his eyes returned to his host, and the latter appeared to grow uneasy beneath the curious gaze.

When they joined the group under the drooping branches of the ash tree on the lawn, Bertie, at any rate, lost consciousness of all except the presence of the girl who had promised to be his friend. If Nora had appeared sweet and womanly, and greatly to be desired, in the bicycling garb of Wensley Common, how much more so did she seem now as she dispensed tea to them, dressed in a pretty white gown, with touches of primrose showing here and there among the laces at throat and waist. Her quick, slightly imperious ways were subdued to tender grace as she paid little attentions to the blind mistress of the cottage, or performed the duties of her position as hostess, which Mrs. Pattinson had allotted to her.

The enamoured young man followed her every movement with his eyes, until recalled to a sense of propriety by noticing an amused smile playing about Hargreaves's face, when he quickly withdrew them. For if even the dreamy Hargreaves noticed it, he must, indeed have been making himself conspicuous.

So he subsided into a sort of day-dream through which he continued acutely conscious of her proximity, until rudely disturbed by the voice of his friend reminding him that he had promised to do five miles before dinner, and that if he intended to keep that promise, they must start at once. Inwardly blaming his own folly for promising anything so idiotic, when he might have had another half-hour of Paradise, he yet felt obliged to follow the example of Hargreaves, and take leave. But he contrived to detain Nora, as they made the tour of the garden before starting.

"When may I see you again? Is to-morrow too early for me to return?" he inquired, eagerly.

A pretty smile brought out the dimple he liked so much. "No, perhaps not, but —but I shan't be here! I'm going to stay at the Vicarage, and help with some bazaar work."

"Couldn't you make me useful too?"

"I don't know! I might ask Mrs. Courtland. Can you cut out garments for the Boriboos?"

"The Boriboos? Who are they, in the name of wonder?"

"Some natives of one of the South Sea Islands, of which Mrs. Courtland's brother has just been made Governor. That's the work I've got before me next week."

"A superfluous one, I should imagine, in a climate where—like the hart—the natives pant for cooling streams," Bertie said to himself, but aloud he only exclaimed: "Oh, indeed! I hope you don't use heavy material for their garments."

"Well, may I count on you as a recruit for the work?"

"I—perhaps I could read to you while you worked? Don't curates come in useful for that sort of thing sometimes?"

"Oh, yes, of course, and that would be jolly, but I sometimes lose my temper when the stuff is too coarse, and the needles aren't quite good. You see, there's a foolish economy practised in the matter of needles. We buy them cheap for philanthropical work, and they break! And then, if you saw me out of temper, you'd throw me down from that pedestal, you know."

Bertie was beginning to protest, when they overtook the others at the gate. He was forced to content himself with a murmured threat of calling at the vicarage, and seeing for himself that the needles were not dangerously brittle.

"What is your opinion of the gentleman whom we have just left?" asked Hargreaves, abruptly, after the two friends had walked briskly for about an hour, and were well away from the village. Bertie was not thinking of Mr. Pattinson at the time, and required to have the question repeated.

"Well, I don't quite know. He seems very pleasant and congenial, but——"

"Exactly," said the astrologer, with a laugh. "Your instincts, like my own, are against him. It required an effort for me to shake hands with him. And yet he's interesting, almost fascinating! When he sat and piped to those curious playmates of his, I was reminded of some elementary creature, some creature of an old world, born without a conscience, without a soul. When we were in the greenhouse, his spectacles slipped aside and gave me a glimpse of his eyes. Carlton, they are the eyes of a goat! Have you ever noticed what a singularly malicious expression there is in a goat's eyes? The cold, dull yellow of them repels me so that I can never look into them without shuddering. Well, that man's are exactly the same. He does right to hide them behind dark glasses. He's a survival of some antique race. He is a satyr, whose love for flowers, and trees, and wild creatures is but a remnant of his ancestral instincts. I'm quite sure he has neither heart nor conscience."

Digitized by Google

Bertie was accustomed to the astrologer's wild theories, but this one struck him as a peculiarly visionary one.

"But Hawthorn tells me he is benevolence personified. I can't remember how many charitable institutions he subscribes to. And Miss Shelley says he is perfectly delightful in private life."

Hargreaves paused to fill his pipe before answering.

"All that proves nothing. I daresay Fauns were good-natured creatures until they were thwarted, or their passions aroused."

"But just see what a devoted son he is! And his mother absolutely worships him!"

Hargreaves looked thoughtful.

"Yes; that's the one note of modernity in an antique character. But for that, he'd be perfect in his way. But the very fact of her loving worship helps to keep him nice to her. All the same, I wouldn't care to cross Mr. Pattinson's path. I'm quite sure that no scruples would prevent him from getting rid of me if I interfered with him in any way."

CHAPTER XX.

MOTHER AND SON.

The next few days were uneventful. Bertie summoned up sufficient courage to call at the Vicarage, and there he saw Nora for a few minutes; but the Honourable Mrs. Courtland did not approve of promiscuous young men visiting the girl while under her charge, and Nora herself appeared nervous and ill at ease. So he was forced to content himself with casual glimpses of her, out of doors; and it was the curate, after all, who read the books to the lady workers in the Vicarage drawing-room.

Meanwhile, Mr. Salter had sent several communications that seemed to promise well. He or his agent had succeeded in getting hold of Solomon Bembridge's clerk, and, from what they could gather, this young man had important information to divulge, if it were made worth his while.

Bertie wired back for Salter to use his own discretion in the matter, and on no account to spare expense.

Hargreaves and he were waiting until their friend, the doctor, should have a night disengaged, to carry out the scheme of spending a night at the haunted bungalow. Hargreaves stayed on for the express purpose, and studied the interesting personality of the tenant of Grove Cottage meanwhile.

The cottage seemed very quiet after Nora left it. The blind woman, conscious of failing powers, missed her greatly, and asked for nothing but to sit in the sun and dream. The son watched his mother with considerable anxiety, for the doctor had warned him that her heart's action was weak. Nevertheless, even Nora's absence had its advantage. There was a certain sweetness to both of them in being left alone together, for the tie between them surpassed that between most mothers and sons.

"Tell me, mother, have I made you happy? Has life gone smoothly since you came to me?"

They were sitting in the twilight, and her hand sought his in answer.

"It has, indeed, Daniel, my son. God has been good, and given me a peaceful old age. An' it's all a-owing to you, dearie."

It was an exquisite evening, and the windows were open to the balmy air, which was all heavy with the scent of early roses. A big faint moon sagged low in the heavens, its light growing stronger as that of the day faded. There was a murmur of running water from the stream at the foot of the garden, a murmur of caressing winds from the ash tree boughs. Some sleepy bird gave out a few notes, and a great moth thumped its heavy body against the window-pane, too stupid to discover that the window was half-open.

Digitized by Google

The blind woman seemed to delight in the beauty, and to perceive it all without eyes.

"Aye, aye," she continued. "It was very different when I was young and in the old country. Times were bad then, so they were! There was little to eat, and hard work to get it. Blows, too, though it seems wonderful to think of them now. Not that anyone was to blame. It was enough to make parents short-tempered, when their children were a-cryin' out for bread, an' they hadn't got it to give them! When I was old enough to go to service things was different. I never was with but one mistress, an' that was our little Nora's grandmother. An' I served her faithful, that I did, Daniel! I should ha' stuck to her though, an' not married. 'Twas on'y then my troubles began. But then, again, it gave me you, an' what could I want more than such a son to look after me now I'm old, an' blind, an' useless?"

That same son stroked the hand that lay so passively in his own. He remembered those hard times only too well! The father, who was a mere fine animal, without one redeeming feature in his nature to counterbalance its evil; who would come home at night sullen and malicious, when funds were low, and did not admit of him getting drunk, and would proceed to vent his ill-temper upon the patient, industrious woman whom his handsome face and plausible tongue had wiled into matrimony; or who—compassing the end for which he seemed to exist—would return, mad and uproarious, knock her about, or, worse still, turn her and her boy out of doors, and bolt the door against them. Oh, the misery of those cold nights when—too proud to complain, or to seek refuge with a neighbour—they had huddled together in some shed or beneath some haystack; seeking shelter from the bitter wind or cold drizzle of rain. He had never forgotten them, and they had hardened him.

There were two sides to his character. Originally he had been created for happiness, a simple, kindly creature, though, perhaps, without much conscience. Circumstance helps to mould character, when a man has no religious faith for his guidance and protection, and brings to the surface hereditary traits that would otherwise lie dormant; and, in his case, circumstance developed certain hard, selfish, and relentless traits inherited from his father. He had come to the great city alone, poor and friendless, imperfectly educated, but with a fixed determination to succeed, if but for the sake of the mother whom he had left behind; and also because he wished some day to live the pleasant life for which he longed.

He had experienced all the usual hardships; had slept beneath railway arches, or on Embankment seats; chewed bits of rope, in order to allay the pangs of hunger, and associated with thieves in East End dens of infamy. But ever he kept before him one aim. If he lived, nothing should prevent him from succeeding.

At length his luck turned. One day a miserable-looking old man was knocked down by a hansom just before his eyes. He assisted the old man to rise, and his heart warmed when the cabman was saluted with a torrent of oaths in broad Somersetshire dialect. Daniel went home with the old fellow, who proved grateful. They were natives of the same county. When he died, six months afterwards, the old man left some money to the boy who had befriended him. Although, from his appearance, no one would have judged him worth five pounds, he proved to have amassed a considerable sum, and, what is more, he told the lad how this had been managed.

Daniel Pattinson followed in his steps. Being a sharp lad, and recognising that an education would be of considerable service to him, he waited for a year before commencing business, during which time he studied systems of finance and certain points of law. He never forgot to send remittances to his mother, who was, happily, by this time, relieved by death of the matrimonial curse.

When firmly established and in comfortable circumstances he went down to his native place and brought her back to live with him in the snug little cottage, remote alike from the madding crowd and from any disturbing whisper of his business affairs. His statement that he was an accountant served to reassure her as to the way he had made money, at which she had been inclined to wonder, for her ideas were elementary in the extreme. He traded under another name, after a modern City fashion, and kept his private address a secret even from his clerks.

He knew well that to her some of his transactions would have appeared little short of infamous, and he loved her fondly enough to wish to conceal them, both for his own sake and for hers.

Digitized by Google

"Well, if I've made you happy, mother, that's all I care about," he now said, affectionately. "You worked and struggled and suffered for me, and it's but fair that I should do the same for you in turn. And you've loved and believed in me always. But mother, I want to ask you something. If someone who knew me well, perhaps even better than you do, should come to you one day and tell you that the man whom you love so well was not what you think him—was, indeed, a hard, cruel tyrant, who lived by taking advantage of human weakness and human necessity—would you believe it?"

She shook her head. "No. I would tell them they did not know my Daniel. I would tell them that he has a heart brimful of love and kindness for everyone. I would tell them there isn't a finer man in the world than my son. For who should know better than the woman that bore him? But you—surely you're joking, Daniel? No one will ever come to me with such a silly story as that!"

SOMETHING IN HER VOICE AROUSED IN HIM A SUDDEN ALARM.

"I hope not. But if it were true, mother? If I were all they said, and more, if there were sins I could not bear to think of, but had committed, nevertheless, in wild moments of passion, it wouldn't alter you—you would still love me?"

"Does a mother ever cease to love the child she bore?" returned the blind woman, a shade of anxiety creeping over her placid face. "But tell me, Daniel. What's wrong with 'ee?"

He gave his shoulders an impatient shake, as though to throw off some burden.

"I don't know, mother. All day I've been conscious of some overhanging trouble. It's as though something were about to happen that would render life barren and worthless to me. Yet you know I'm not much given to fits of the blues. Perhaps it's but the absence of Nora and the lack of her brightness that makes the place seem dull and gloomy. Not that it isn't sweet to be alone with you again; just you and I together, and all the rest of the world shut out. I'm a good man when I sit at your feet, mother. Had fate permitted I might have lived a quiet, natural, humdrum life in the old home, at peace with the world."

"At peace with the world?" repeated the mother, wonderingly. "Surely you are that now, Daniel? But I often wish you'd never left me to go to that cruel, godless London. Not that I believe it's done you much harm, or you wouldn't be so contented here with only your silly old mother to keep you company. But when you were a boy you went to church regular, and said your prayers, and——"

Digitized by Google

"And now I prefer to potter about my garden rather than go to church and listen to the prosy platitutes of our worthy vicar," continued Mr. Pattinson. "But, really, if that was all my conscience had to burden it I would sleep soundly enough. We make our own creeds for the most part, however we may seem to conform with existing ones."

"I don't understand 'ee, Dan; but seems to me 'ee would do better to listen to the vicar, even though he do be a bit prosy. An' I did pray for 'ee when 'ee was a child, for though 'ee were good enough in a general way, there were times when your temper ran riot, an' 'ee were like some wild creature or other. Eh, deary me, how you'd go on then, tearin' things to bits an' tramplin' down the very flowers 'ee loved while the fit lasted. 'Twas born in 'ee, an' came from your father, it did. An' the worst to me was that you'd never be sorry after, or cry like other children. But 'ee growed better with time, an' I hoped 'twas because ye knew more about what was right and what was wrong."

"Perhaps it was only that I gained the skill to conceal my faults of temper," he murmured. "But so long as they haven't worried you, mother, I care nothing."

After that he was silent for a while, and the evening shadows lengthened rapidly. Suddenly he rose.

"Come, mother, we are getting altogether too serious," he exclaimed. "The sun has dropped behind the cloud, and I must shut the window to keep out the mist that rises from the stream. What shall I do to amuse you? Read aloud, or play you a tune?"

"A tune, Daniel, a tune for choice. It's just wonderful to listen to you. When you are playing I can imagine myself back in Oyston woods on a hot summer day. I seem to hear the leaves rustle, and the little streams tinkle, and the birds chirp overhead among the branches. It's a spell that leads me back through the long, long years and makes me young again. The blood dances through my veins instead of creeping there sad and slow, and all the foolish dreams creep back to say farewell to me."

He played to her for an hour while she sat and dreamt of her long-lost youth. She was young and gay once more, a lass desired of village swains. She laughed, and sang, and danced through life; for though life was hard and prosaic, it was overlaid as yet with the poetry and glamour of youth, and allured her on with a visionary future. The lambs bleated plaintively for their dams, and in the thickets all the birds sang of love. The maiden too, had her love-dream; and the sweetheart of her youth walked beside her beneath the spreading branches of the wood. This sweetheart had died before reaching manhood, but in the old woman's dream he was again young, and strong, and gay; as he twined hawthorn buds in her brown tresses or whispered honeyed words in her ear.

Once, when her son stopped playing for a minute and addressed her she did not hear him, for she was back through the years; and it was really a gay and happy lass who sat there hidden within the form of an old and white-haired woman.

At length the music ceased, and the player laid aside his instrument. There was no sound in the dim room but that of the foolish moth which kept ever thumping against the window pane. Mr. Pattinson stooped over the bent figure in the arm-chair.

"Are you asleep, mother?" he asked, gently.

She raised her head. "Not asleep, only dreaming. 'Tis said that, at the last, one goes back to one's early home and life and so it has been with me to-night, Daniel. But don't 'ee mind, I'm content to awake, though the dream was sweet."

Something in her voice aroused in him a sudden alarm. "You don't feel ill, mother?"

"No, but I'm tired. I think I'll go to rest now, and maybe then I'll keep on a-dreaming that sweet dream."

He kissed her tenderly, and rang for Susan to assist her to bed.

But when the girl came to the bedroom in the morning she found that the dream held her mistress bound for ever. Quietly had she passed away, with no one near to listen to her last words, or close her dying eyes. It was the death she had always desired.

CHAPTER XXI.

SOLOMON BEMBRIDGE DISMISSES HIS CLERK.

The sullen resentment long smouldering in the breast of Joseph Morton against his employer was fanned into a flame by a breeze of youthful, living sympathy with the pretty little schoolmistress, upon whom the unjust claim of the money-lender pressed so heavily. Strong is the power of youth and beauty, spite of the cynical attitude of the age; and it is quite possible that the clerk might have steeled his heart against the same amount of distress embodied in a less attractive form. But the money-lender's latest victim was an exceedingly attractive little person, with large grey eyes capable of expressing any amount of pathos without becoming red and swollen, and these said eyes proved too much for Morton's susceptible heart.

Digitized by Google

All fell out as he had foreseen. When she came to the office to beg for mercy, his was the unpleasant task of having to refuse it. It was a cruel thing that such a painful business should have been thrust upon him, and he felt himself a brute in that he had made it possible. When she went down upon her knees and wept, it was simply impossible for him to continue enacting the rôle of a stern and unyielding tyrant, and he abandoned it very speedily, promising instead to intercede with Solomon Bembridge, and to extend the time for repayment. He knew this promise to be valueless; but that mattered nothing. It was quite as unlikely that Solomon Bembridge would accede to his request as that the Druid copper mine—concerning which his chum had given him a tip—would continue to boom for long as it had been doing. But he was young and she was fair, and her piteous looks were too much for him.

He was, in some degree, prepared for the stormy scene which ensued when the money-lender heard of his leniency, but it turned out even worse than he had anticipated. Solomon Bembridge was at this time unusually restless and irritable. Morton fancied that he must be suffering from heavy money losses, though such a thing seemed incredible. Still, it was more incredible that he should be touched by any ordinary human troubles, for the clerk considered him a sort of monster, incapable of ruth or sorrow.

Nevertheless, the man was undoubtedly shaken and unlike himself. His hair had whitened visibly during his short absence from Thumb Court, and even his face seemed to have caught a touch of greyness. No flower enlivened the sombre hue of the coat he wore, or was laid upon his desk to give out fragrance amongst the dusty papers.

"The old Shylock!" commented the clerk. "Seems to me he's had a bit of a shake. Wonder what it was? Can't imagine his caring about anything but filthy lucre. Well, I'm jolly glad his sins are beginning to find him out. I'd ladle it out to him hot and strong if I'd my own way. She did look sweet when she gazed up at me, and her pretty lips trembled like those of a child. Poor little girl! Doesn't seem as though she'd anyone to stand by her or take her part. Never mind! I'm her friend in default of a better. So here goes to have it out with him!"

He contrived to give an account of the affair in an absolutely stolid manner, as though he had sinned more through stupidity than malice. But Solomon Bembridge could read men like books, and discovered the personal feeling underlying the surface stolidity. And for some reason this annoyed the money-lender more than all the rest. He felt like one who—whilst racing against time or fleeing from some threatening danger—is hindered in his course by the stings of some otherwise contemptible insect. His anger burst forth in a storm of bitter words. He had nourished a traitor. Whilst drawing the wage of an able man, Morton had proved himself a fool. A fool? Nay, worse! It was not want of sense but purposeful malice that had prompted his actions. He was disloyal, a spy, and a traitor; a cur that turned and bit the hand that fed him.

These wild words had very little effect upon Morton. The clerk had faced the situation before, and managed to retain both temper and patience of mind. He watched his employer with considerable interest. His hatred had grown to such a height that it craved food, and found this in the signs of Bembridge's discomforture. These seemed to Morton rather elicited by some deep anger against fate than by the trivial incident under discussion.

But no compassion for Bembridge's evident suffering prevented the clerk from seizing the opportunity to attack a hitherto impregnable citadel. He saw his chance and took it at once.

Waiting a moment or two after the money-lender finished to produce a proper effect, he began a deliberate discourse upon the iniquity of several recent transactions of the firm. He discovered such a complete understanding of the intricacies of the money-lender's schemes as revealed powers of observation that would have been invaluable to a detective. He possessed, in fact, sufficient knowledge to prove himself a dangerous foe, and yet appeared to keep much in reserve.

Digitized by Google

Bembridge grew pale to the lips, but he preserved a brave front. Evidently cowardice was not one of his failings. He dared Morton to do his worst, and declined to retain a spy in his service any longer.

This was no more than the other anticipated. He proceeded to hand over the keys of his desk and cash-box.

"I expected this," he said, in a fairly steady voice. "If I hadn't counted the cost beforehand I'd have held my tongue. But as for your nasty word 'spy,' I throw it in your teeth. I've been your catspaw long enough, and done no end of dirty work that won't bear thinking of, but there's some things one must draw the line at. No fellow with any self-respect could be content to drive a girl to desperation. Who knows what might happen in such a case? If she were to—to commit suicide, for instance, I'd consider myself a murderer—a murderer like yourself!"

Bembridge rose from his chair. "What do you mean by that?" he asked, sharply.

The clerk looked him over with a coldly critical gaze before answering.

"It was the little schoolmistress I meant, this time," he said, with some hidden significance. "Would it not be murder if one were to drive her to seek a refuge in the river from all her troubles?"

The money-lender drew a long breath. "Was that what you meant?" he said. "Much you'd have minded what became of the girl if she had been plain. Sentimental humbug all that! Why should every commonplace transaction have a tragic ending? But enough of this drivel. Have you any other accusations to make before we part for ever? I picked you out of the gutter and put you in the way of earning a fair livelihood, and this is your gratitude."

The younger man flushed hotly. "No thanks to you for that," he returned; "for only in the gutter were you likely to find an instrument fitted for your work. But you'd best keep a civil tongue in your head. I know more than I've hinted at. That poor girl isn't the only person you've driven to desperation. And though you've not been called to account yet it doesn't do to holler till you're out of the wood."

He slammed the door after him, and the money-lender looked thoughtful. After a moment he rose as though to follow, but seemed to think better of it and fell back in his chair.

"What does he know?" he murmured. "I wonder if I ought to have tried to propitiate him? But no—no! There is but one attitude for me to take now. To be bullied into leniency by a fellow like that would never do. Fate seems to be drawing a net around me, slowly but surely, and though I still might break through its meshes I don't seem to care to make the attempt. After all, what does it matter now? I'm just dead beat and heart-sick of everything.

Then he did a strangely inconsistent thing. Searching amongst the papers in his desk he presently found an agreement betwixt Solomon Bembridge and Priscilla Sexton, and proceeded to read it carefully through. Yes, it was without a flaw, and would stand good in any court of justice. But immediately he finished reading it he tore it across, placed it in an envelope, along with a half-sheet of notepaper, upon which he hastily scribbled a few words, and directed it to the little school-mistress. He smiled grimly as he sealed the envelope.

"I meant all the time to let her go, for the sake of—of her who died last week," he said to himself. "But it's one thing to surrender one's rights willingly, and another to be bullied into doing so. If there's any truth in the religion my loved one believed in, and she knows me now for what I am, perchance this may help to soften the truth a little."

As he was closing the desk his eyes fell on a small phial that peered from beneath a legal document. He took it up and removed the cork, smelt it, then re-corked it carefully.

"That's all right yet," he muttered. "An open door, when all others are closed. Socrates was forced to swallow hemlock, but I'm quite sure he was philosopher enough not to whine over the draught!"

. . . .

When Joseph Morton, boiling with anger and indignation, and jamming his hat over his eyes as though someone wished to steal it, emerged from the dusty purlieu of Thumb Court, a quietly-dressed, colourless-looking individual who had been standing at the entrance of it for the past half-hour watching the spiders, touched him on the shoulder.

Digitized by Google

Morton started, glanced round, and laughed wildly.

"Oh, you're there, are you? I long for vengeance on mine enemy, and behold the means are at hand! What the dickens are you here for?"

"Why, to see you, of course," returned the other, placing his arm within that of Morton. "But you needn't make such a row about it. We don't want to attract more attention that we can avoid. Mr. Salter would like to see you at once about that business you know of. He's communicated with the other party, who's prepared to come down 'ansomely for any information you can give us."

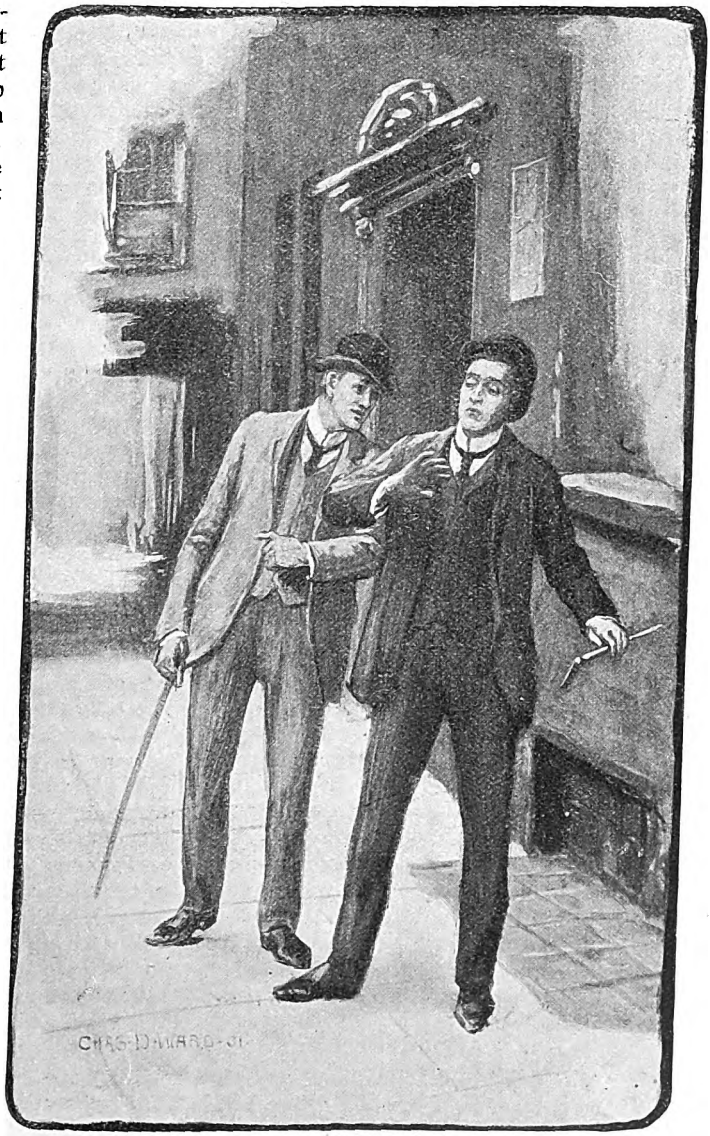
Morton attempted to free himself, but the other held him firmly.

"Look here," exclaimed the clerk, "I don't know that I'm prepared to go that length. He's a blood-sucking reptile, is Solomon Bembridge, and I've special reasons to hate him just now, but there's things a chap can't stoop to, you know. I won't have any blood money, I tell you."

"Don't act the goat," returned the other, firmly; "it's too late for scruples now. You've got to tell all you know, whether you like it or whether you hate it. It's on'y a question of doin' it willingly or on compulsion in the name of the law, so just make up your mind to come quietly to my chief. I've a cab waiting round the corner. We've no time to waste. One never can tell what such a downy cove as yonder Bembridge 'll be up to."

Again Mr. Morton attacked his hat. "Well, here goes," he exclaimed. "I'm a gentleman at large, if you care to know. My time's my own, and that's about all I can boast of at present. But mind, no blood money. I've said it and I'll hold to it, even if I'm left to die in the street."

The colourless man smiled as he closed the door of the cab. Heroics amused him, though he had long ceased to believe in them.



"IV'E A CAB ROUND THE CORNI R. WE'VE NO TIME TO WASTE."

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XXII.

EVIL MUSIC.

After the sudden death of its gentle old mistress Grove Cottage lost its principal attraction, and seemed to her son an abode of desolation rather than a home. He scarcely ever spoke of his sorrow, but it clung the closer because unexpressed. He was to be seen carelessly garbed and unshaven, wandering restlessly around the house and garden. All his usual employments were neglected. The auriculas drooped for lack of water, and his curious pets sulked in holes and corners, missing his coaxing and the weird music to which they were accustomed.

Nora remained at the Vicarage under the wing of the Honourable Mrs. Courtland, and Bertie Carlton was forced to be content with fleeting glimpses of her as she passed out of doors. The aristocratic lady at the Vicarage did not approve of the girl's intimacy with a young man who had not been properly introduced and vouched for by some society person. Bertie was treated with such extreme and frigid severity upon the occasion of his call at the Vicarage, that he did not venture upon a second. But the love he cherished for Nora grew but stronger because of all the obstacles to it which loomed ahead. He knew how deeply she would feel the loss of her dear old friend, and his heart was sad for pity of her grief and loneliness.

And of a truth the girl required the sympathy of those about her, for life seemed very dreary, missing the gentle presence of the blind woman. Besides, the latter had been delightfully dependent, and it had been sweet to Nora to consider herself necessary to someone. Now she was but one of many in the crowded Vicarage which conventionality, in the person of Mrs. Courtland, would not allow her to leave.

Even her guardian appeared to think it a more desirable home for her under existing conditions. He did not respond to her timid suggestion that she should return to Grove Cottage. She went there to see him on the day following Mrs. Pattinson's funeral. He was strangely altered. Not only did he seem bowed to the earth with grief, there was more than this about him, more than the natural sorrow of an affectionate son for the loss of a fondly-loved parent. Nora detected another expression—something furtive, yet dogged. It seemed to her a recognition that fate had not done with him yet, but had further buffets in store; and that it was for this reason he had determined that her future should be dissociated from his own.

"No, no, child," he said, with a sort of wearied impatience, "you are better where you are, even though it may be dull and tiresome to have to give in to all Mrs. Courtland's restrictions. It is safe, at any rate. Nay, do not frown and think me unkind. Remember how Hamlet spoke to Ophelia—spoke to the girl he loved more than his life! It was love, not indifference, that bade her get to a nunnery, where she would be safe from whatever ills fate might have in store for him."

"But why should you do the same, Uncle Dan? Surely you have no reason to dread any other blow? I think you want me more than ever now; and you'll grow morbid if I don't come back. Why do you talk so strangely? I cannot understand you."

"That may well be, since I cannot understand myself, Nora. But this I do know. I've grown to love you, as I never thought to love any human being save my mother, and, like Hamlet, I would fain save you from the evil to come. Don't tempt me further, little one. I want you every moment of the day. But for your sake, we're best apart. The dogs are on me, and I'm too old and tired to escape their teeth. The gods forbid they rend you also!"

He opened the greenhouse door, and she followed him down between the rows of neglected flower-pots.

There was something strangely significant in the spectacle of these dead and dying plants, and Nora's steps dragged.

"Oh, the poor, pretty flowers," she exclaimed; "why, they haven't been watered for days! May I bring some water now and give them a drink?"

But he would not permit this.

"No! Let them die! Fly from this place as though it were plague-stricken, I tell you! Go and be happy, and enjoy the days of youth that speed—ah, how swiftly! Ah, but life is good, when—like you—one has that exquisite gift. To bask in the sun, to lurk in the leafy shade, to lure the small four-footed things of wood and moorland to one's side, with charm and music!

Digitized by Google

Alas! that spring should vanish with the rose,
That youth's sweet-scented manuscript should close,
The nightingale that in the branches sang,
Ah! whence, and whither flown again, who knows?

I think the soul of some old Pagan has been reincarnated in my body, and is longing to be free to return to its ancient loves and life!"

He reached out his hand for his neglected pipe, and blew upon it a strain so piercingly sweet that the girl's heart melted within her breast, and tears rolled down her cheeks. Suddenly, however, she snatched the pipe from his lips, and threw it on the ground.

"Don't!" she cried. "I can't bear it another moment! It's evil, even in its wild sadness! It suggests the Pagan spirit you speak of; and if I listen long, I'll go mad or die. O Uncle Dan, don't let your mind dwell upon such horrors! Think of our dear one, and how beautiful her simple faith in Christ was!"

She turned away, for there was that in his face that both frightened and sickened her. It really seemed as though the soul of that old Pagan he spoke of was peering out from behind those dark glasses, and curling her friend's lips up in a satyr grin.

As she went slowly up the garden path, the evil music pursued her; so he must again have picked up the pipe. The air seemed full of the weird strain. It pierced, and echoed, and floated; rose to the highest boughs of the tallest trees, which threw it back to earth as though it were too evil to soar; then it crept along the ground, wailing and lamenting, until it appeared to gather strength for a fresh outburst of fiendish glee. Nora could bear no more; she put her hands to her ears, and fled.

She never heard it again.

CHAPTER XXIII.

HARGREAVES SEES A VISION.

Bertie Carlton was heartily dissatisfied with the progress of affairs. Weeks had passed, and the end seemed as far off as ever. The enigmatic Salter counselled patience, and declared that they had found a clue, but must decline to give any particulars. The impetuosity of amateurs had before this ruined many a promising case. It was better for his men to work alone and unfettered.

Snubbed by Salter, and likewise by the lady who had undertaken the charge of Nora, the young fellow grew fractious, and worried both the doctor and his friend with sudden outbursts of temper.

At length Dr. Hawthorn suggested that—the village being at this time in a deplorably healthy condition, and nobody in the least likely either to enter the world or leave it—it would be as well to embrace the opportunity, and carry out their proposed nocturnal expedition to Dredman's Bungalow. Hargreaves' holiday had almost come to an end, and he was due in a day or two to lecture on some occult subject in town. There would be no fun in going if Hargreaves were not to be there! Probably the spirits would decline to appear without the proper incantations. For his part, he intended to have a clinking time, despite the uncanny nature of their vigil.

"But, after all, we're three to one!" he concluded.

"No, we're not," cried Bertie; "we're three to three!"

"How d'ye make that out?"

"One, old Dredman," said the other, ticking them off on his fingers; "two, Bukta Lal; three, the tiger! You pay your money, and you take your choice! Which one will you tackle, Jim?"

"Not the tiger, truly! You ought to be skilled as a mighty hunter of wild game; so, if you please, I'll leave that fierce animal to you," and the doctor laughed, as he filled his cigar-case.

"There's precious little wild game left in the sandy deserts of Western Australia. Nathless, I'll do my best.

"But here comes the postman. A letter for me too."

Bertie had given Hawthorn's address to Salter, and the letter was from the detective. It was less enigmatic than usual. Salter stated that he had discovered something very important; indeed, he might now venture to say that the person who had committed the crime was, so to speak, within his grasp. He intended, therefore, to come down by the first train in the morning, when Mr. Carlton should be put in possession of all the facts.

Bertie grew excited at this news. He knew that Salter would not have written so confidently unless quite sure of his man.

Digitized by Google

"But why is he coming here? He agreed to wire for me in the event of a discovery."

Hargreaves stood with eyes fixed upon him as he twisted the letter about.

"Have you really no idea of the truth?" asked the former.

Bertie shook his head. "I'm all at sea," he said, irritably; "but you—you seem to have your own idea?"

"Maybe I have, but I'm not going to give it away. You employed Salter, not me, to enact the part of bloodhound. Salter hates amateur work as much as Pawson; so I'll keep my notion dark, if you please. After all, I've nothing to go upon save an instinct," he continued, dreamily. "Nevertheless, I often see things that are hidden to others. The net is drawing closer around the form of the pursued, and there's no chance of escape. No, there I'm wrong! There's one door open; and, if I don't mistake, he'll pass through that, though it lead to darkness eternal!"

Dr. Hawthorn glanced at the mystic's face, which was fixed like one in a trance.

"Look here, old chap," he cried, "this second-sight business isn't a thing to be cultivated. It spells epilepsy sometimes. Mediums generally end by going wrong in the upper storey!"

Bertie was annoyed at Jim's interruption. He had been on the eve of a discovery. Hargreaves possessed the very power he had once longed for himself—clairvoyance, or whatever they liked to call it. But Jim's matter-of-fact tones dispelled the trance, and the power vanished.

"Come," he cried, "it's quite time we set off for the bungalow. I believe you both want to shirk the business, after all. For all Jim's bluster, I can see his heart is in his mouth, and he doesn't relish it a bit!"

Disdaining to reply, the doctor proceeded to examine the priming of a revolver which he had got into the way of carrying about the lonely roads when on night duty.

(To be concluded.)

THE HAPPY DREAM.

I dreamed that I was singing
A little song for you;
The happy notes went winging
Like swallows o'er the dew.
My heart so fondly pleaded
In strains by passion stirred,
No waking prayer were needed
If you had only heard,
Sweetheart,
If you had only heard.

Your glance was grief-beguiling,
It made my sorrow flee;
In peerless beauty smiling
You gave your heart to me.
But night hath fled, and morning
Brings back the old heartbreak—
To meet your cruel scorning,
Alas, why did I wake,
Sweetheart,
Alas, why did I wake!

Samuel Peck.

Digitized by Google

UNREALISED IDEALS.

By the REV. SILAS K. HOCKING.

KING DAVID desired to build a temple in honour of Jehovah. It was to have been a sanctuary of unrivalled splendour and unprecedented magnificence. But his ideal was unrealised. Still, God gave him credit for his good intentions. A cynic has remarked that a man with ideals is a very uncomfortable person to live with. This may be quite true to people of low spiritual development; but to such as have a soul above money-getting and money-hoarding it is not true. On the contrary, such a man will be a constant stimulus and inspiration. In all ages of the world the great leaders of thought and action have been men who cherished lofty ideals; men who had it in their hearts to do some noble thing for God and humanity; men who could not rest in the lowlands of life while the snowy summits gleamed above them. Seeing visions that other men could not see, they led the van in the great fields of progress and discovery. To sluggard souls—to men without ambition and without enterprise—they may have seemed restless, irritating, uncomfortable people. But history has crowned them with immortality, and their praises the ends of the earth will sing.

One of the painfullest features of the present day is that there are so few people who are inspired by any great or lofty ambition. There is any amount of push and jostle and squeeze; any amount of struggle and scramble for unworthy ends. On all hands men are elbowing each other, and fighting each other, and ready to slay each other, for place and power and gold. But there is very little enthusiasm for moral and spiritual ends. Even the Church of Christ has become infected by the prevailing spirit, and can be aroused to enthusiasm only on some question of ritual, or some point of sectarian expediency. Moral and spiritual ideals are going out of fashion. We are living in an age of marked religious indifference. It is only a man here and there who has it in his heart to build a Temple for God. We are all busy building mud huts for ourselves.

Men everywhere are saying in effect: "Let us alone. Why should we exert ourselves? The world went on all right before we came into it, and it will go on all right after we have left it. We may work ourselves into a frenzy, and it will be all the same in fifty years." Now, a spirit like that is fatal to enterprise and achievement. The religious passion of John Wesley changed the face of England in twenty years. If our forefathers had had no loftier ideals than some of their children possess we should still be struggling as a nation in ignorance and superstition.

It may be laid down almost as an axiom that to possess an ideal is essential to enterprise and achievement. A man who aims at nothing will reach nothing, except by accident. We must have a purpose before we can strive, and the nobler the end we have in view the nobler will be our endeavour.

Any real success is impossible to the man who merely drifts. Character is built by effort. Disposition may be inherited, but character is the outcome of our own striving. Hence, to talk about success in the case of a man who has no ideals is an utter misuse of words. You do not call a man successful who inherits a fortune that somebody else won. You do not say that this man is deserving of your respect simply because he stumbled into a well by accident and found a bag of gold at the bottom. A great many so-called successful men are not successful at all. They have done nothing. They have not even tried to do anything. They have been pushed into place and position by the struggles of other people. They have had no ideals, no passion, no enthusiasm, no enterprise. They have simply been the puppets of fortune, and the same power that lifted them up may tumble them down.

Digitized by Google

The success is not what we put into our pocket, but what we build into our life and into the life of the world. He who does something that in the doing makes him a better man; he who strives after a lofty ideal, and in the striving wins strength to endure; he who accomplishes something that is for the general benefit of mankind, he is the successful man, and is deserving of honour and renown.

What the present generation needs, perhaps, more than anything else, is to be awakened to the necessity of cherishing some lofty purpose. It was good for David that he had it in his heart to build a house for God. We none of us know how much evil that good purpose saved him from, how many unworthy desires it choked back and destroyed. Year after year that unrealised ideal was before him, driving out all meaner desires, and filling his thoughts with plans and schemes which, though never carried into effect, left their indelible mark upon his life and character.

We are very apt to think because a man does not realise his ambitions that therefore his life is a failure. No greater mistake could be made. Success is not merely in achievement, but in effort and purpose. The shallow critic says:—"That man has been striving for twenty years after a certain end and has missed it. What wasted effort! What a failure is his life!" How little does he know! Good work is never lost. Noble effort cannot be wasted. In the economy of God's moral government no life is a failure that is given to noble endeavour. No man can strive for twenty years, or one year, or one day for that matter, in a righteous cause without being a better man for it. You say his labour is in vain. You only say that because you have no eyes to see below the surface of things, no means of measuring the silent forces that are ever at work in the realm that lies outside your narrow ken.

All this talk about wasted effort in our churches and schools, and in the great fields of social reform, is but the irresponsible chatter of people who are incapable of thinking deeply on any question. The wasted effort of the world is in other directions—in the selfish and dishonourable struggles of men for wealth and power and position—in the plottings and schemings and rivalries that go on in Church and State—in the prostitution of time and talents to unworthy and ignoble ends. But to say that any unselfish effort put forth for the good of humanity is wasted is to give the lie to the plainest facts of human history.

> Say not, the struggle naught availeth,
> The labour and the wounds are vain;
> The enemy faints not nor faileth,
> And as things have been they remain.

That is the language of the pessimist and cynic, the hopeless cry of men who have lost faith in themselves and God.

> If hopes were dupes, fears may be liars,
> It may be, in yon smoke concealed,
> Your comrades chase e'en now the fliers,
> And, but for you, possess the field.
>
> For while the tired waves vainly breaking
> Seem here no painful inch to gain,
> Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
> Comes silent, flooding in, the main.
>
> And not by eastern windows only,
> When daylight comes, comes in the light;
> In front the sun climbs slow—how slowly!—
> But westward, look, the land is bright.

It is ever so. Good deeds, striving after lofty ideals, operate in a thousand ways unknown to us. Even if others are not benefited by our efforts, we ourselves are better for the struggle. And yet how slow we are to believe this! All over the world to-day there are people mourning over perished ambitions and unrealised ideals. In the Church, in the Sunday-school, on the mission field, in the domain of social and temperance reform, men watch and wait in almost hopeless silence. Like David, it was in their hearts to build a house for God—to do some great thing for the world's uplifting; but they seem no nearer the realisation of their desires to-day than they did twenty years ago. Shall we say that "their struggle naught availeth;" that the moral enthusiasts of our country have done no good; that the heroes of missionary enterprise have thrown away their lives; that our Sunday-school teachers have laboured in vain; that our social reformers have been trying to store the lightning?

It cannot be. These idealists have been the saviours of our country and the salt of the earth. They have kept their own faith alive, and have kept alive the faith of others. Nay, more, they have helped to lay the foundations of the great temple of truth and righteousness, which in the ages to come shall lift its pinnacles clear into the light of heaven.

Digitized by Google

David did not build the Temple, and yet, had not the plan and purpose been in his heart, the chances are it would never have been built. He not only made it possible for Solomon to build it, but he made it imperative. He set in motion currents of influence that Solomon could not resist. Because it was in David's heart, he rooted the idea, and the ideal in the heart of the nation. We are doing things to-day because our fathers—who are sleeping in the dust—compel us to do them. They began the work, and we can but carry it on. Present achievements have their roots in past ideals. The dreams of a hundred or a thousand years ago are the realities of to-day. The men who see visions and dream dreams are in reality the most practical of all. All great reformers were idealists, and the greatest Idealist of all was Christ. He did not realise His ideal, but it is growing into shape with every passing generation, and the fullness of time shall witness its consummation.

So every right-minded man will hail it as a privilege as well as a duty to cherish some lofty purpose, and strenuously toil for its realisation. The fulfilment may not be in his day. But he knows the struggle will do him good, that others will carry into shape what he has planned, and that in the end "He that soweth and he that reapeth shall rejoice together."

SILAS K. HOCKING.

FINISHED IN WORLDS BEYOND.

I stood in the ancient minster,
Beside the white-robed choir;
And the faces of the singers
Seemed aglow with heavenly fire.
Their voices rose in the anthem,
Like birds on a soaring wing;
And even the angels must have paused
To hear them sweetly sing.

It ceased, and the organ-master
In rapture began to play
A theme which filled me with wonder,
And charmed my care away.
Through rosy-pictured windows
The sun its radiance shed
O'er the master, weaving a veil of gold
And a halo around his head.

He appeared as if transfigured,
So lofty were his lays;
Anon like solemn requiems,
Then like sweet hymns of praise;
Now soaring to heights supernal,
Now falling to depths untold;
My spirit rode on the organ's notes,
With its cadences manifold.

Ere long came a soothing calmness,
Which shrouded the soul with peace.
Methought the white-haired master
His seraph airs would cease;
But the hush was but the prelude
To notes sublime and grand,
Which stopp'd abrupt; for the throes of death
Had still'd that magic hand.

Thos. J. B. Casey.

Digitized by Google

MY FIRST BOOK.

Some Well-known Writers on their Beginnings in Authorship.

By JUSTIN McCARTHY.

IT gives me much pleasure to comply with your request.

My first distinct impulse to write a book was given to me when a very young man by the sound of a flute on the shore of one of the English lakes. It was on a moonlight night and the flute breathed forth some notes from Mozart. I do not know how or why, but my whole mind and heart became possessed with a longing to write a novel which should have much to do with music. Well, I began my novel and disclosed my scheme to a friendly publisher. He was not discouraging, but he told me that the time was not favourable for such a subject, as the public just then only wanted sensation novels. He advised me to write a sensation novel, and urged that, if the experiment proved a success, I might then venture to bring out my musical novel under the shelter of my previously acquired renown. I wrote a sensation novel, my first published work, and it was rather successful—I long since suppressed it. Then my publisher, still diffident about the musical novel, recommended some quiet story as a kind of intermediate stage of authorship. I wrote the quiet story and then was allowed to go on with my musical novel. But in the meantime the story about music and musicians had been lying wholly untouched, and I suppose my inspiration had chilled off before I could return to my early purpose. But only see what an advantage that interruption has been to me! I can always tell myself and tell my friends that if I had only gone on with my romance of music under the spell of that first inspiration it would have been a masterpiece—and who shall say me nay?

JUSTIN McCARTHY.

MR. JUSTIN McCARTHY.
Author of "Dear Lady Disdain," etc.

By G. B. BURGIN.

Isn't there something unkind in being taken back to those innocent days when one first began to write, to frequent literary haunts, to dream dreams? Isn't there rather a remorseful feeling when one takes down the first-born and it blushes for its parent? "Where," says the first-born—"Where, O my father, are the ideals I bequeathed to you before I parted company with the author of my being? You wrote me because you had to write, because then every woman was beautiful, every goose a swan, every friend a comrade to the death. You knew not doubt. You revelled in life, found the world fair, the soul of it sweet. And now you go to see problem plays, you say cynical things, you notice the husks left by the swine, you ponder on the motives of men, the wiles of women; you read Henry James, and you analyse the soul of things until there are no things left. Decidedly, my parent, you must renew your youth."

Digitized by Google

And this from the offspring ("Tuxter's Little Maid") of my youth, that child written at midnight until the first faint rays of light stole through my window, and I snatched a couple of hours' sleep, then away to the City of Gold, to coin—pence! I had been ill in the East—with typhoid—and came home to recruit, went into a City office in order to "have time to look round," and said to myself: "I must write my way out of this or die." And I nearly died in the writing.

Then came a letter from Messrs. Cassell's saying that they were considering "Tuxter." They considered to some purpose. "Tuxter" faced the light of day; and dear old ladies wrote nice letters to me and said that he was a rough diamond but a pure and good man, and I must go on writing about pure and good men, sweet girls, brave young lovers. And I have gone on ever since—with momentary intervals—and feel that I have made many friends; that, hard though the life of a writer be, it is the best of all lives for me; that if one honestly does the best that is in one, if one does not allow the irritable vanity and conceit of the craft to get the upper hand, there is always the reward—the man who pats you on the back, the stranger who writes a line to say that he is touched or amused, the person who "knows the same thing," the publisher with the modest shekels.

There is also the reviewer! Sometimes one feels when the reviews come in that Providence is a little too generous in the matter of reward. The reviewer is a hardworking man, but he cannot be expected to know your "pet" bits. Once he has placed you in a certain groove, it gives him additional work to find out that you have made a fresh departure. So, as a rule, he does not find out; and perhaps he is right. I am a reviewer myself, and have come to this conclusion on the subject: If a book deals with butchers, a shorthand man ought to go to a dozen butchers, give them the book to read, and then jot down what they say about it. Questions of technique could be left to professionals. The proper person to review a book is the person who is dealt with in it. He knows. The reviewer frequently does not. Hence, injustice. But when you consider how hard the modern reviewer has to work, the marvel is that he can be so just, so discriminating.

But about "Tuxter." I know he is full of "split infinitives," crudities, errors of form, of taste, perilously near to bathos when he makes his own coffin, and takes a sad pleasure in the way it fits him. I know he is impossible; that he "wouldn't work" in real life; but, for all that, I met him coming down Fiction Hill as I went up. With his strong right arm he helped me along, and then respectfully went his way.

Enough about "Tuxter." This is more what Mr. Weller calls "a referee" than an exposition. The writing craft is a good craft. In the days to come:

Only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame;
And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame;
But each for the joy of the working, and each, in his separate star,
Shall draw the Thing as he sees it for the God of Things as they are.

G. B. BURGIN.

BY JOHN BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.

My first book, "The Silent Shore," was written at a time when I was living in Paris and writing for foreign papers, as well as working in the great French libraries with a view to obtaining facts to serve for historical works on France and romances dealing with the history of that country. They came later, but meanwhile a case that occurred in French society gave me the idea of "The Silent Shore," and, in an English setting, formed the nucleus of that story.

After some difficulty a publisher was found for it (John and Robert Maxwell) and it appeared as a "shilling shocker"—that being the day for such things—and also in an eighteenpenny cloth edition, and received many remarkably good criticisms, especially for an unknown author. A good many thousand copies of the book were sold, and it was published in the United States, and also—as I long afterwards discovered—translated into Spanish and run as a serial in a South American paper. It was also dramatised

Digitized by Google

MR. JOHN BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.
Author of "In the Day of Adversity," etc.
Photo by J. Russell & Sons, Baker Street, W.

and produced at the Olympic Theatre in 1888, Mr. Arthur Playfair making his appearance in a leading part (the hero) and the late Laurence Cautley in the second part. No particular profit accrued to me from the production of this book; the most substantial, perhaps, arising from the offer of the proprietor of a well known Continental hotel to pay £10 for the cover of the "shocker" for advertisements. The publishers and I divided this sum between us. Nevertheless, the book launched me, and, although I have since produced fifteen others, I have always regarded the first novel from my pen with a considerable amount of affection.

JOHN BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.

BY "RITA."
(MRS. W. D. HUMPHREYS).

My first book was written for two reasons. One, because from a child I had desired to write—something; and the desire strengthened with every year. The other, because I had devoured so many novels, and some of them were so trashy and poor that I came to the conclusion I could do much better if I tried.

So I tried.

The first publisher to whom I sent the book refused it. The second (Messrs. Sampson, Low and Co.) accepted it—conditionally. It was published, and to my great surprise, rather well received and reviewed, except by the Athenæum, which from that day forward has been more than true to its first antagonism. However, if adverse criticism could check an author's ambition, few would succeed.

From the first book to the fiftieth is no mean output, and though I am now by no means proud of that first, I may venture to look back upon it as a very useful pioneer to the popularity achieved by its successors.

"RITA."

BY ROBERT BARR.

I plunged into the sea of letters because a pirate made me walk the plank. I was a guileless journalist in London with no wicked leanings towards authorship or any other vice, when it came to my knowledge, by one of those curious coincidences that happen in real life and are useless in fiction, that a pirate publisher was causing to be printed a shilling book containing

"RITA."
Author of "Dame Durden," etc.

Digitized by Google

certain stories of mine which had appeared in a weekly paper, and on which the pirate seemed to know I had no copyright. Copyrighting a contribution costs five shillings, and a writer must have at least half a sovereign's worth of conceit in his own work before he makes that expenditure. He must also have five shillings to spare. Few journalists have either the shillings or the conceit. I determined to get out a book that would forestall the pirate's contribution to literature. I consulted with my friend, Mr. Horace Hart, now Controller of the University Press in Oxford, but at that time head of one of the largest printing houses in London. Although I was just over from America, I had come to look on Mr. Hart as a man who could accomplish the impossible in less time than any one else I knew. He gave me the address of a lightning-sketch artist; told me where to find a block maker who would do the processing while I waited; asked for the copy and went ahead. Five thousand copies of this book, with forty illustrations, were printed, folded, cut and bound in boards in a time so incredibly short that I dare not mention it, fearing to make New York rage with envy and unbelief. We had the book on the market while the pirate press was placidly thrashing away at the middle pages. The pirate's production never saw the light. The moral of this is that dishonesty is its own punishment. If the British publisher had been pure and innocent, the British public would never have been called upon to bear the infliction of my immortal works.

ROBERT BARR.

BY ADELINE SERGEANT.

"My first essay in authorship" was when I was only thirteen. My first book —one of verse—was published when I was between fifteen and sixteen years of age. But my first novel? Ah, that was a different matter. I wrote a good many short stories and small serials which were printed in various papers. I also wrote two long novels for which I could find no publisher at all; and it was not until I was about thirty years of age that I had a novel accepted. In the year 1880, a friend sent me an advertisement, setting forth that a prize of £100 was to be offered by the publishers of The People's Friend, Dundee (Messrs. John Leng and Co.) for the best serial story submitted to them. I had a long summer holiday at my disposal and set to work at once. I racked my brain for exciting scenes and episodes, as I understood that the novel required ought to be as interesting as possible; and I thoroughly enjoyed writing it. I spent the winter in Egypt, and great was my delight to receive a letter intimating that my story had gained the prize! It was published first as a serial and then as a volume under the title of "Jacobi's Wife." But it was preceded in book form by a novel which was accepted by Messrs. Richard Bentley and Son shortly after my return from Egypt. This story—"Beyond Recall"—dealt with life in Egypt, and the beginning of Arabi's rebellion, and Messrs. Bentley and Son published it a month after acceptance. The book was well received—partly, no doubt, because it was of topical interest.

"Jacobi's Wife," however, though not published in book form until after the appearance of "Beyond Recall," was really my first novel accepted by a publisher; and never shall I forget the exquisite satisfaction with which I read the letter announced that I had gained the £100 prize. I am pleased to be able to add that the winning of this prize was the origin of my long connection with The People's Friend and with the firm of which Sir John Leng, M.P., is the head; and I consider it a very fortunate day for myself when that connection was first established.

ADELINE SERGEANT.

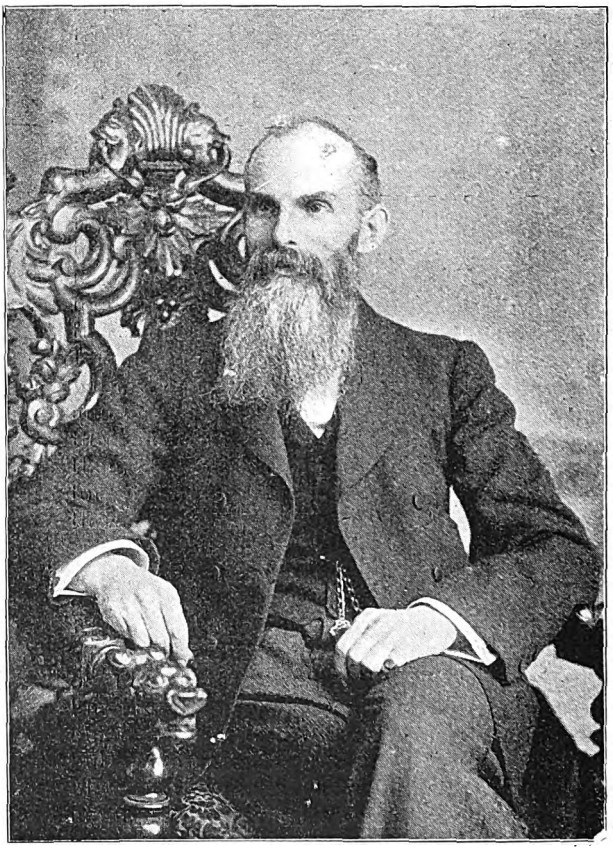
BY SILAS K. HOCKING.

I took to the pen as the beaver takes to building. I simply couldn't help it. No sooner had I begun to read stories and to understand them than I was seized with the desire to write. I was somewhere in my teens when I made my first attempt, and I am bound to make the confession that the motive was sordid enough.

A prize had been offered by some temperance society of £100 for the best story dealing with the evils of drink.

In those days £100 seemed an unlimited fortune, and I thought, if I could only win it, what good I could do with so much gold. So I set to work prompted by a desire for gain. Perhaps on that account my efforts were unavailing. The story never got completed. Before I had reached the tenth chapter my characters got inextricably mixed up and refused to do what I wanted them to do. The elaborate plan that I had drawn out at the start wouldn't work. My principal characters possessed tempers that I was unaware of at the beginning, and by their headstrong ways produced some frightful complications. Indeed by the time I had reached the eighth or ninth chapter everything had got so completely mixed up that I gave up the whole business as a bad job and resigned myself, as well as I could, to the loss of £100.

Digitized by Google



REV. SILAS HOCKING.
Author of "Her Benny," etc.

I made no further attempts to write for a good many years. I started on a course of theological study, became a local preacher, and finally entered the ministry. Consequently my time and thought were turned into other channels. Still the desire never left me. Indeed it grew stronger as the years passed on, but the demands of my other work left me no time for its gratification.

One afternoon, however, being shut up in the house in consequence of a tremendous downpour of rain, and having nothing very particular to do, I commenced to write in sheer self-defence. I began without plan and without purpose. I had no plot in my mind. It was a case of the beaver building by instinct. The plot grew or evolved, the situations shaped themselves. My characters developed their own personalities, and so the thing went steadily forward. I became intensely interested in my work, lived with the creations of my imagination constantly, and never lost sight of them. They were with me night and day. I conversed with them, entered into all their joys and sorrows.

When the story was finished, a local editor ran it as a serial through his newspaper. Then my present publishers issued it as a little shilling volume. The reviewers naturally enough took no notice of it, which was very kind of them. I sold the copyright for practically an old song, and I believe the book has been selling ever since.

I have never dared to read it again. I expect it is full of the most glaring errors and improbabilities from cover to cover. However, it was a beginning. Having whetted my appetite for the kind of work, I have kept at it ever since.

You will see, Mr. Editor, that the story of My First Book is prosaic enough. It was simply a case of letting nature caper. I knew nothing of the art of composition or of story-writing. I just put down on paper what was in me, and I am inclined to think that it was the very artlessness of my stories that gave them their vogue—that and the other fact that I tried never to get out of my depth. I made a point of writing about things I understood.

Many writers have received more praise from the critics than I have, but I fancy very few have received more kindness from the crowd.

SILAS K. HOCKING.

Digitized by Google

By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID.

In reply to your kind note, I cannot truthfully say that my first book, "A Bad Beginning," was my first essay at authorship; because, about a year previously, I had written several little stories and verses which all appeared, though not under my name, in magazines.

My husband then (1861) asked me to try to write a novel. When at last I had thought out a story, I began to write it by setting down, on scraps of paper, incidents of the tale here and there, as they came to me, not at all in sequence. I remember, for instance, that I began with Chapter V., and next wrote a bit almost at the end of the book, because the incidents there related presented themselves vividly, and I feared I might forget the way in which they had shown themselves.

At last, at the end of a year, the story was written and pieced together. I copied it and offered it to Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., with very faint hope of success; though even then, I had heard of Mr. George Murray Smith's great kindness to writers. Only three weeks of suspense, and the M.S. came back; but accompanied by a kind letter from Mr. Smith; he praised the story more highly than I could have hoped, but suggested an alteration near the end.

If this could be made, he said, Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. were prepared to make an offer for the book.

I at once set to work on the wished for alteration, and my husband and I called in Waterloo Place, saw Mr. Smith, and gave him the M.S. We were much impressed by Mr. Smith's genial kindness and encouragement. He soon after wrote and offered £50 for the book, and when I accepted the offer, he at once sent me a cheque for that sum.

This happened in the spring of 1862; in the following October, Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. published "A Bad Beginning" in 2 vols. The book pleased the public, and the edition sold out in three weeks. It was not reprinted till some time after, when it appeared in one volume.

KATHERINE S. MACQOID.

By CLIVE HOLLAND.

You ask me about "My First Book," and how I came to write it, and incidentally other succeeding ones. Let me confess then that it was an adventure story which, strange to relate, did not—as most first books do—fall entirely flat. It sold to the extent of some 450 copies, and, I presume, paid expenses. I did not make a fortune out of it however. I fear it was somewhat closely modelled on the lines of "Treasure Island," the author of which I knew and admired. But at all events, told originally night by night in a school dormitory, it was so much appreciated by the hearers that when some years later the editor of a minor publication asked me for a serial, I straightway set about to write down what I had told. Then, like many other more, and perhaps less, worthy serials, it came out in volume form—"bound attractively in red cloth and splendidly illustrated" as the publishers stated.

I can scarcely remember when I did not imagine stories, nor when I did not enjoy stories by other people. Intended for the Law, eventually for the Bar, I wandered off into the primrose and more often thorn-strewed path of journalism and novel-writing much as a duckling prefers swimming to climbing trees. I fear I wasted five or six valuable years of life trying to master the intricacies of equity, and the pitfalls which are strewn so thickly in the common law of this much lawyered realm. Perhaps it was fate which made me prefer Blackmore to "Blackstone," and a French dictionary to a Law Lexicon. Anyway, working before the shops of a country town are open, and often enough after most people are in that land of dreams which so seldom is obliging enough to provide us story-tellers with plots, I have no desire to turn back.

My experiences! They have probably been much the same as those of many other writers, and have gone far to prove that the profession of letters is not, even if one avoid the coulisses of literature, an easy one to follow—though perhaps more pleasant than many.

As to reviewers, I have (unlike more famous authors) naturally nothing to say against a class which, with so few exceptions that they are almost unremembered, has been singularly generous of praise. Amongst many hundreds of notices on this and the other side of the Atlantic, I have had perhaps half-a-dozen ill-natured ones. Bad ones have, of course, outnumbered these, but I cannot honestly dissent from the verdict. I know personally not more than three reviewers as likely to have the handling of any book of mine, although doubtless other friends of mine have done so.

Digitized by Google

A word of advice to those who are commencing to write or have only just done so. It ought to be Punch's "Don't," but they will if they have it in them. Here it is! Never ask for reviews, and never enquire who does any particular notice, more especially an unfavourable one. If the latter, it may have been written by a friend under (of course, the mistaken) idea that he is doing you a real service. This may look cryptic, but it's true.

CLIVE HOLLAND.

BY GEO. MANVILLE FENN.

The simplest reply to your request is printed in the concluding lines of my first story, "Featherland; or, How the Birds Lived at Greenlawn." (London: Griffith and Farran, 1866.) They run:—

"A story thought of to please two little girls who were very fond of leaning up against somebody's knee in the evenings before the candles were lighted, and asking somebody to tell them a story."

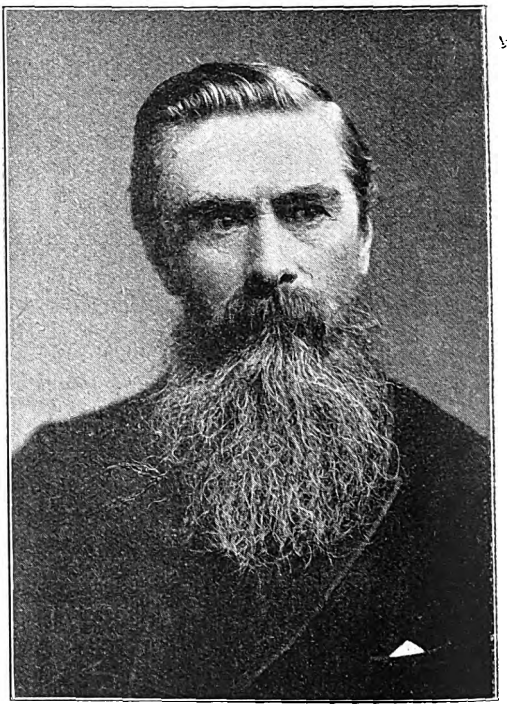
The experiences connected therewith proved to be as simple as the little work, which was sent to the publishers and followed by a letter from Mr. Farran, who liked it "very much," printed it, and I believe it is selling now, for I received one of the new editions, dated a few years back, intimating that it had become one of the reading text-books for children in connection with the School Board. It was all very easy work; the hard came later on.

GEO. MANVILLE FENN.

BY W. CLARK RUSSELL.

The first novel I ever wrote was published by Thomas Cautley Newby, of Welbeck-street, W. I was fresh from the sea, knew nothing of society, and therefore wrote fluently a quantity of drivel, which was published in three volumes. The work was minutely analysed by the Spectator, which enriched its columns by some 200 quotations from it as illustrations of all sorts of style, base, absurd, ungrammatical, hysterical, monstrous, and the like. This book must have been extremely bad to win the recognition it obtained. Newby used to publish for Captain Chamier, G. P. R. James, and other writers of that day. He would talk about them, and was entertaining in his way. He valued himself upon being the only gentleman in the publishing line. He did business in a back room, with an old lady who read MSS. for him and generally advised. I have some recollection of a pair of galoshes and a stout umbrella near the chair she occupied.

W. CLARK RUSSELL.



MR. GEO. MANVILLE FENN.
Author of "Parson o' Dumford," etc.
Photo by Russell & Sons, Baker Street, W.

Digitized by Google

A FORGOTTEN CITY.

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER.

IF you look at a map of the Mediterranean you may see in the north-east corner, on the edge of the Gulf of Iskandroon, the little seaport of Mersina, but you are certainly not likely to see, marked by its side, Mezetlu, as the place is now called by the Cicilians, or Pompeiopolis, as it was called by the Romans, or Soli, as it was called by the Greeks. And no wonder! For this city, with its marble-fronted houses, its colonnaded streets, its magnificent harbour and fine theatre, is now forgotten by the world. Though as interesting as many a much-vaunted Greek town, it is quite out of the tourist-track; no volumes have been written about it, the guide-books hardly mention it. So the stately pillars left standing are given up to solitude and herds of wild goats. Not one person in five hundred who read this article ever heard of Soli. And yet when anyone uses an absurdity or impropriety in language, and you call it a solecism, you are unconsciously alluding to this out-of-the-way dead city. It was a Greek colony, but the colonists, by contact with the natives of Cicilia, came to speak their own language so badly that the Athenians used the word solikos in much the same way as we refer to malapropisms. And thus the ancient and the modern world rub shoulders, as it were, all through a very ordinary word in our speech.

It was quite by accident I came to explore Soli. I confess I had never even heard of it till, one morning, crawling vagabond-like round the eastern Mediterranean, I casually inspected the coast map belonging to the vessel in which I was travelling, and there saw mentioned the remains of an ancient town. The first day I landed at Mersina, with its ramshackle and vile-smelling bazaars, its crowds of idling, stupid-visaged Turks, and the streets thronged with slouching, badly clad soldiers, I set off to visit this forgotten place. The delight of that morning's ride comes back to me as I write, for the air was cool and fresh, and invigorating; on one side lay limpid the blue bosom of the great middle sea, and on the other rose the Taurus mountains, scarred and rugged, with a soft vermilion haze cresting their summits, while in the valleys the sun was playing in various harmonies of colour. The roadway was rough, and riding was hard, but as there were no hedges it was easy to turn upon softer ground when a particularly inconvenient piece of the path was encountered. The bright clad men, tilling with their oxen, hesitated in their work and gazed at us as we hurried by. The country was beautifully verdant. I had been previously spending some weeks in a part of the world where nothing but long stretches of blistering sand met the eye, and it was delightful to get once more in the neighbourhood of some trees, to find the birds chirruping and even hear a crow cawing overhead.

When I first caught a glimpse of the sentinel-like pillars of Soli, rearing above the sylvan land, I naturally enough, on that calm, sweet-breathed morning, sent my fancy dancing back to the time when the town had a foremost place in the ancient world, when its marbles were chiselled, its floors delicately mosaiced, when troops of Greeks lounged in the porticoed street, when the holiday-makers crowded the theatre, the legions filled the towers, and the ships, laden with rich merchandise, came gliding into the magnificent harbour. But that was over two thousand years ago, when the poet Aratus, who lived here, sang, and when my ancestors, I suppose, were wild denizens of the dark glens of Caledonia.

Roaming the ruins of Soli I had something of the ecstacy of a china crank who has found a Sevres vase amongst a lot of base kitchen crockery. Many were the traces of Soli's ancient grandeur. Take the street of columns that ran the entire length of the town. Though many pillars had tumbled, lying like fallen giants, a number yet stood. The style of architecture is Corinthian, but debased. The carving of the capitals is admirable, and as many were upon the ground, time eaten, there was no difficulty in inspecting them. In some cases the corners of the abascus rest upon eagles. Also there are lions rampant, busts, and even full length figures. The columns, over three feet in diameter, have in several instances projecting brackets, on which, no doubt, statues stood, and beneath are much obliterated inscriptions.

Digitized by Google

Soli is now largely covered with debris, but as it is not tourist run, and there is no demand for antiquities, I had not long been within the range of the battered walls before I began finding pieces of glazed crockery and old glass. In a case near the table at which I am writing is an exquisite bit of mosaic floor my foot kicked against, and on my bookcase stands a delicately-fluted piece of marble pillar. The shape of the town I found to be oblong, though the wall with the ruined towers is by no means regular in line. From the old gateway down to the beach I should say is about a mile; and climbing the remains of the towers, searching for the foundations of buildings, tracing the aqueduct, and standing in the impressive silence marvelling on the departed grandeur, while crowds of fancies chased through the mind, made the day one of captivating interest.

The walls of the city, built with pebbles set in strong mortar, and faced with hewn stone, must have been very strong. There are passages within the walls leading to subterranean caverns, the dark recesses of which I penetrated with a flickering candle. There was absolutely nothing to be found; only one was impressed with the vault-like stillness and the earthy, damp odours. The entrances were guarded by grooved pillars, and all around, half buried beneath the brush-growth, were masses of old jars. I could not help feeling confident that if systematic excavations were made the "finds" would be most valuable and interesting. But few traces remain of the theatre, horse-shoe shaped, which contained probably some thirty rows of seats. There is nothing of that now, and, as I sat down within the circle, I seemed to see through the hazy ages the magnificent spectacles that once graced this place and heard the shouts of the thousands of enraptured spectators. But they have all vanished like a dream, and big, frightened lizards run where beautiful Grecian ladies once reclined. The distant view, however, is still what it was then; the azure-tinted Mediterranean, the rich plain, and the range of mountains in the background with Bulghar Dagh, tipped with snow, further away still.

The ancient port must have been the scene of lively doings. But now it is nearly filled with sand. Yet the solid stone piers remain unmoved, held together with iron clamps. The port is gracefully shaped, but no boat now ever crunches upon its pebbled beach. The three of us rested on the wave-worn steps and mused over the loveliness of the scene. And then as the day was warm and balmy we stripped and plunged into the refreshing water. We had not thought of bathing; we had not a single towel or a pocket comb between us, but we enjoyed the swim—keeping a sharp look out, however, for the approach of sharks—and then we sat down, like urchins, on the stonework and waited till the sun had dried us. Had an ancient Greek suddenly risen from one of the tombs and seen three naked barbarians from an unknown land, talking an unknown tongue, he would probably have been quite as surprised to see us as we would have been startled to see him.

Strolling along the shrub-covered street of pillars was a source of great delight. An earthquake must have thrown down many of the columns, and others are in a tottering condition. Frequently I came across great black caverns into which it was impossible to descend as we had no ropes. But they seemed to indicate a passage which once ran under the town. Some day there may be an exploration of this famous Greek colony. When the Greeks deserted the town the Romans took possession. It was repeopled by Pompeius Magnus, and, according to the custom of those days, it was called Pompeiopolis. But neither Greeks nor Romans tread its ways in these times. They have forgotten it. So has the general world, and it was this knowledge, perhaps, that enhanced the pleasure I experienced in making even a cursory inspection. It is so refreshing to climb into a corner of the world that is practically unknown.

JOHN FOSTER FRASER.

Digitized by Google

FIRE-FIGHTING AND LIFE-SAVING AT HOME.

By ALEX. HENDERSON.

IT is by no means generally known to what a large extent steam and hand fire engines are now used in private mansions, not to mention a host of ingenious contrivances in the way of fire-escapes. Moreover, when such appliances are provided for private houses, large West End shops, prisons, asylums, and similar institutions, the apparatus undergo periodical inspection monthly, quarterly, or half-yearly, so that everything may be found in good order at the critical moment of great emergency. But it is no use having appliances for the saving of life and property from fire unless persons are instructed in their use. Many hundreds of lives are lost through not knowing how to escape from a burning building, or how to put out a fire. Then, again, millions of pounds have been lost through not knowing how to work a hydrant and hose or even use a few buckets of water advantageously. For example, there was the magnificent palace in Wiltshire, known as Clouds House, the residence of a gentleman well known in the political world. Here a hydrant system had been installed, with hoses and other apparatus, but when a fire suddenly broke out the hydrants were found frozen and the appliances mislaid, the result being a hopeless confusion. No one knew what to do, and the fine house, with its superb furniture and works of art, was destroyed.

On the other hand, at Blenheim Palace, the magnificent residence of the Duke of Marlborough, a steam fire-engine of full power is always kept ready for use, and a private fire-brigade maintained. Quite apart from practice and false alarms, what appeared to be a serious fire broke out not long ago, and the alarm was given by the Duke's own fire-brigade. The steamer got to work with such good effect that the fire was put out, although it had got a good hold. The damage done was covered by a few pounds, while the property involved had been valued at over a million sterling.

The well-known expert, Mr. J. Compton Merryweather, advises that in order to maintain the efficiency of a private fire brigade, periodical drills are necessary, and the servants should be exercised at least once a month by the steward, butler, or other important functionary.

It is by no means generally known that even our great cathedrals have private fire brigades of their own; and the priceless fabric of Canterbury has been saved from destruction several times during the past twenty years by the powerful Merryweather steam engine and private fire-brigade maintained by the Dean and Chapter.

Buckets of water should be hung conveniently in every house. A fire-bucket, however, only holds two gallons, and this is far more effective when thrown in a powerful jet than when simply cast direct from the bucket, and, therefore, a portable hand fire-pump should be provided. The home drill for buckets and hand-pumps is worked something after the following manner:—The alarm being given, the house brigade assemble at an agreed point, each bringing a bucket of water. The position of the "fire" being indicated by the head of the household, and the water supply known (it ought to be in the bath-room, where the bath can be kept filled), the order "attention" is given, and all the servants line up and "prove distance," by extending an arm to touch the shoulder of the next person. Then comes the passing of the bucket, and a constant series of these keeps the hand-pump well supplied.

Digitized by Google

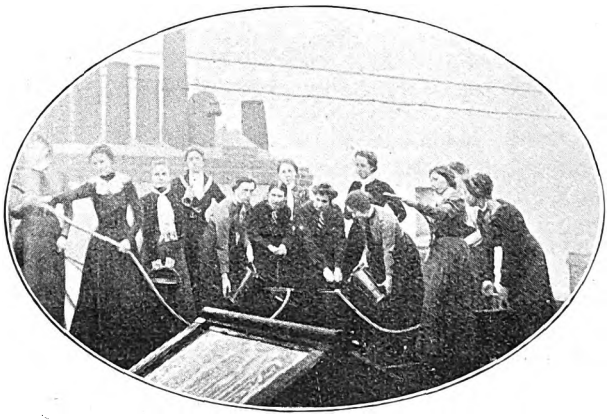
The Eastern Fever Hospital at Homerton accommodates nearly 450 patients, and the Medical Superintendent (Doctor Goodall), together with the matron, housekeeper, and night superintendent, have taken great interest in the training of the staff, both male and female, in the work of fire protection. The staff here are drilled by a regular fire inspector from Merryweather's, and the single drill, consisting of fixing standpipe to hydrant, and connecting 100 feet of hose and branch pipe, is done by the female nurses in one minute nineteen seconds. The "Professor" who attends to give instructions has had 139 pupils at this establishment.



THE FAIR FIRE-FIGHTERS OF BEDFORD COLLEGE AT WORK ON THE ROOF.

The late Mr. Holloway, founder of the great College bearing his name at Egham, omitted nothing when designing his great scheme; he even included fire-extinguishing apparatus of great elaborateness. Captain Shaw was consulted, and appliances of the highest quality fitted throughout. There are high pressure hydrants both inside and outside the building, in addition to "corridor" engines, and hand fire-pumps with buckets. Miss Bishop, the lady principal of the College, organises a periodical drill, and some time ago formed a ladies' fire-brigade, herself taking the position of Captain. There were ten students to each of the three sections, with a lieutenant to each. The drill supposed that there was a fire in the sitting-room, and the engine was run out, and a chain of buckets formed to keep it in play. The pump was handled by two ladies, while another trailed the little hose. Such was the celerity with which these manœuvres were executed that the engine was in full work in less than a minute.

Another interesting private fire-brigade "manned" by ladies is that at Sir John Blundell Maple's laundry on his Childwickbury estate. Here a smart little fire-engine, weighing less than 20 lbs., throws water at the rate of fifteen gallons a minute, under the supervision of the head laundrymaid. This is a wise precaution, because a fire might occur at any time, through an overheated flue or linen carelessly hung on the stove.

These drills are not only of vital importance in life-saving, but they also provide amusement for hundreds of young men and ladies in shops. A Luton drapery firm testify that twelve of their young ladies were got out of the supposed "burning" building in less than one minute and a half.

THE KIT BAG FIRE-ESCAPE WITH ROPE AND BRAKE, AS PORTABLE AS AN ORDINARY BAG.

According to the Factory and Workshops Act every owner of a business house employing more than forty persons is compelled to provide proper means of escape in case of fire.

The most simple domestic fire escape is the canvas chute, which consists of a long canvas

Digitized by Google

tube with an iron framework at the upper or window end, forming the aperture into which those escaping from the fire might jump. This interesting tube is quite safe for invalids, women, and children, and can be used at a moment's notice, requiring no special knowledge to work it. One ought to have occasional drills with the chutes, however, so that everyone in the house may know where they are kept, and how to fix and use them. The drill consists in giving the alarm of an imaginary fire, whereupon everyone in the building makes for the window from which it is desired to escape. The chute is then rapidly taken from its place, the iron frame placed on the window sill, and the canvas allowed to drop out of the window. If no one is below to help, the first person to descend does so slowly, by pressing his or her elbows and knees outwards towards the sides of the chute, to act as a brake. On alighting on the ground the first person down then holds the end of the tube away from the building, and the others slide down at greater speed, until all are rescued.

ESCAPING IN THE KIT BAG ESCAPE.

An interesting instance of a fire-brigade at a private house is that at Waddesdon Manor, the famous residence of Baron Rothschild. There was a fire there on April 8th, 1890, the skirting board in the Baron's own rooms blazing up, followed by the panelling and the silk on the walls. Unfortunately a valuable Gainsborough was also destroyed. The servants and workpeople set to work in a businesslike way as trained firemen, using the powerful jet, and small pump, and the fire was out in fifteen minutes.

Similarly, a very serious fire broke out at Lord Wimborne's mansion, Canford Manor, which is thoroughly fitted with fire-extinguishing appliances, which on this occasion resulted in a hundred thousand pounds' worth of property being saved, including family paintings and tapestries, Worcester china, ancient Dutch clocks, panellings, antique furniture, etc.

An extraordinary number of eminent people now have fire-brigades on their own, including the Marquis of Bredalbane, the Marquis Camden, Lord Derby, Lord Brownlow, Lord Rosebery, Lord Craven, Lord Wolverton, Lord Leconfield, Lord

LADIES' CHUTE ESCAPE PRACTICE—THE DESCENT COMPLETED.

Digitized by Google

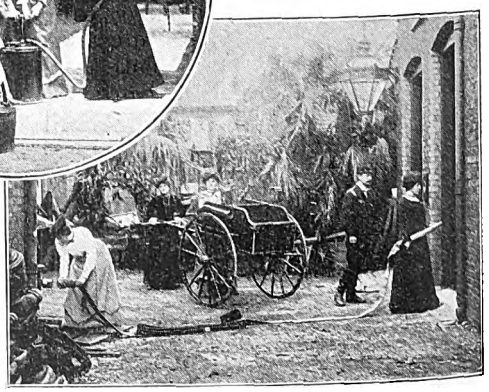
Brassey, Sir Matthew White Ridley, etc., etc.

The fire-engine usually kept in private houses is the powerful "Greenwich" steamer, throwing 750 gallons a minute. Regular uniforms and helmets are issued to the servants.

The well-known fire-engine builders, Messrs. Merryweather, have a regular "school" or academy for the training of male and female servants in private houses

THE LADY AMAZON FIRE-"MEN" LEARNING HOW TO WORK A FIRE-ENGINE.

LADIES BEING COACHED FOR HOME PROTECTION IN DIRECTING HOSE AND PUMPING.



ATTACHING BRANCH AND DIRECTING JET.

in the use of fire-extinguishing appliances. They keep no less than fifteen skilled fire-brigade artisans, who go round and inspect these appliances in private houses, and they also give gratuitous lessons, the drills including the use of the steam and manual fire-engines, the ladder fire-escape, the canvas chute, outside hydrant, hose-cart and reel, indoor hydrant, hand fire-pump, fire-bucket, and many other drills. The Church Mission House, in Salisbury Square, is well provided in this respect, and so are many other important philanthropic and public institutions, not to mention theatres, clubs, hotels, breweries, mills, factories, business houses, etc.

Great piles of flats, like Whitehall Court and Queen Anne's Mansions, are thoroughly provided with canvas chute escapes, and as these cost only £9 for a 36 ft. length, and about £16 if the window is 76 ft. from the ground, it will be seen that they constitute life assurance of a very valuable kind.

The dreadful fire at the Hotel Windsor in New York on May 17th, 1899, will be remembered, for no less than forty-three persons perished in the flames, as there were no means available for rapid descent. This terrible death roll might have been entirely averted had there been a few canvas tubes provided on each floor.

When fire breaks out, the women and children, if upstairs, should be sent down at once, and the hand pump used. So long as the water supply is kept up a powerful jet can be thrown forty or fifty feet with force enough in it to knock out any small fire. Talking of fire-escapes, one of the most ingenious is the kit bag, whereby one carries one's life in one's hands in a very literal sense.

The price of this kit bag is not very much greater than that of an ordinary first class piece of luggage or portmanteau — about 12 guineas; and you can pack things in it as you would in a kit bag of the ordinary kind. This is the traveller's fire escape pure and simple, being carried in his luggage. When you consider what danger of fire there is in country houses and hotels at home and abroad (many of these latter being entirely of wood) the necessity for some easily portable fire-escape will be realised. The kit bag fire-escape consists of an ordinary first-class leather kit bag, containing in a small pocket, which does not in the least interfere with the holding capacity of the bag; a coil of a special kind of rope, provided with an automatic metal brake and steel snap hooks. The rope is long enough to reach to the ground from a three-storey window, and is strong enough to bear the weight of two men. All you have to do when fire breaks out is to attach the bag to the rope, and the rope to a bedstead, fire grate, or any other heavy or fixed article in the room. Then you put the bag out of the window, get into it, and automatically regulate your descent by the brake. If a number are to be saved, the bag is hauled up again after the first man reaches the ground. This most ingenious of fire-escapes is absolutely safe for any weight up to and even beyond twenty stone, and it may be relied upon not to get out of order. It can even be used by invalids or insensible persons.

Digitized by Google

SERVANTS DRILLING IN ORDER TO LEARN HOW TO DEAL WITH CURTAINS ON FIRE AND FIRES IN ROOMS.

Another form of fire-escape adapted for persons of any size and weight consists of a kind of canvas sling, such as can be used in the most boisterous weather, entirely independent of outside assistance. When out of use the escape can be detached from the hook and stored in a suitable box just beneath the window from which it is to be used when occasion arises. The rope can be immediately detached from the brake, and women and children quickly and safely lowered, besides chests and articles of value. The speed of descent may be controlled by the slightest finger pressure.

These escapes ought to be used at least once a quarter, by way of practice, to inspire confidence, and prevent the apparatus being forgotten. If you are a very shy person, however, afraid of the ridicule of the neighbours, you can lower a box out of the window, or any other heavy article.

There is yet another fire-escape, consisting of a collapsible canvas bag, and this is perhaps preferable to any other form, although the plain belt and rope has its advantages.

At that well-known ladies' school, Westfield College, Hampstead, there is an admirable Girls' Fire Brigade, provided with all appliances, including the canvas chute. And, indeed, if we teach our girls to swim in order to save them from drowning, then to be consistent we ought to educate them as fire fighters, in order to save them from a still more dreadful death.

At Bedford College a loud horn is blown for the alarm of fire drill, and it is astonishing what the young ladies can do in the space of a minute and a half.

At the Cheltenham Ladies' College there is a first-rate fire-fighting corps of 39 members, divided into companies of seven or eight "privates" commanded by a "lieutenant." There is a hand-pump on each floor, which can be easily wheeled or carried to any part of the house. No excuse is taken in case of a fire alarm, and even hair washing or early bed must be sacrificed. If a flag is seen waving on one of the staircases it indicates that an "all house" practice is called, and every inmate of the building (sixty or seventy of them altogether) must take part. On such occasions the fire is supposed to be so serious that it is desirable to leave at once. When the grand staircase is "on fire" the whole house can be emptied in four minutes from the sounding of the alarm. Practice with the regular brigade at the Cheltenham Ladies' College sometimes takes place as early as 7 o'clock in the morning on the lawn.

Digitized by Google

At Girton there are no less than 80 members of the Lady Fire Brigade, and a special crew is allotted to each length of hose.

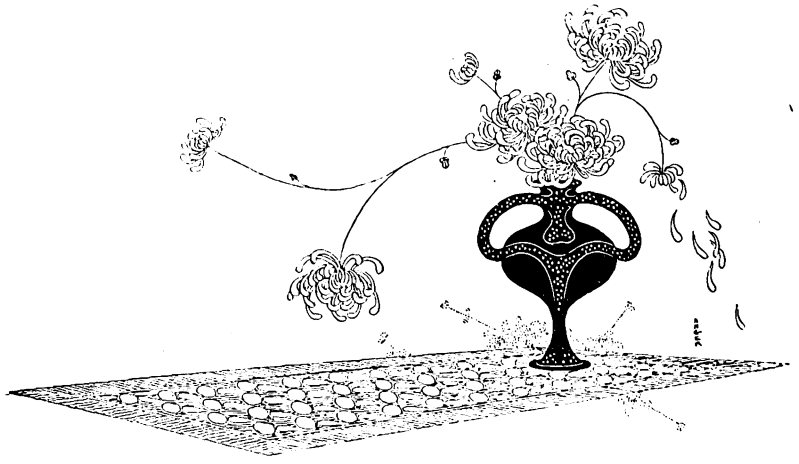
At Newnham College there are also well arranged Lady Fire Brigades, and others at Clough Hall, Sidgwick Hall, and Old Hall; the last, perhaps, the best of all of them. Besides hoses, hand-pumps, and buckets, there are pails full of sand provided at Old Hall for such troublesome fires as burning oil.

It is well known with regard to private houses that fires often break out in the day time when there are no men available, and it is therefore eminently desirable that ladies should be instructed in the use of fire-extinguishing appliances. Not long ago a serious fire at a country mansion crammed with valuable property was kept at a minimum by the prompt action of the daughter of a well-known peer, who raised the alarm herself, and then ran to the engine house, and actually carried out the preliminaries of getting the steam fire-engine to work, lighting and stoking the boiler fire with a skill worthy of a trained fireman.

At Marazion, in Cornwall, will be found one of the most enterprising lady fire brigades in this country. Some years ago, for practice purposes, they erected a wooden tower, 30 or 40 feet high, and surrounded the base with shavings steeped in petroleum. They next ignited the entire tower at a given signal, and then came up at the "double" with their own steam fire engine. When the signal was formally given that "danger" was over, the ladies gave an exhilarating exhibition with the scaling ladder and the jumping sheet, bringing down endangered persons, etc.

Then, again, at Lord Northbrook's splendid house at Stratton, quarterly drill takes place among the servants, so that it is pretty safe to assume that, were a serious outbreak of fire to occur, there would be no confusion and no loss of precious human life.

ALEX. HENDERSON.



Digitized by Google

From the City of Darkest Night.

THE STORY OF A WORK OF MERCY.

By A. WELLESLEY IRETON.

IT is a remarkable fact that the origin of some of England's noblest charities is positively unknown, while others are found to have arisen from the most insignificant circumstances.

Nearly fifty years ago a Christian gentleman, returning home late one night, saw what appeared to be a bundle of rags huddled up in a dark corner of a back street near Trafalgar Square. Curiosity prompted him to prod the mass with his walking stick, when a human face appeared, and, to his astonishment, he found that what he mistook for a bundle of rags was really the crouching figure of a woman, huddled up to keep herself warm. A few kindly words sufficed to ascertain from the poor creature that she was homeless and destitute. Late though it was, he felt he could not leave her in such a perilous condition, and she was very soon following him to the nearest casual ward.

There were no "homes" or refuges in those days, for the spiritual deadness which was at that time almost universal had produced even in Christian people an appalling apathy and indifference to the sins and sorrows of the Great City. The incident, however, was not lost upon the good man. He sought out a Christian woman, a widow, whose heart responded in motherly sympathy to his appeal, and an arrangement was soon made by which she agreed to take into her own home two or three of these poor homeless creatures. In this way was begun the modern missionary effort for the reclamation of degraded and unhappy young women and girls in London. The work, once fairly started, grew apace, and success attended the efforts then made for the moral and spiritual restitution of the despised and neglected wanderers of the streets.

But it was not till 1857 that it became thoroughly organised, and in that year the London Female Preventive and Reformatory Institution was founded, and a Home for sixteen inmates opened off Euston Road, near St. Pancras Church. The house was in a back street, and the surroundings were not particularly cheerful, but doubtless it represented all that the founders at that time were able to see their way to accomplish.

A canary in a cage lent an air of homeliness to one of the rooms. One day a visitor called—having heard of the new philanthropic effort—and gravely remarked, as he looked at the bird, that it would need a great many canaries to make the place as bright as it ought to be, and further enquired if it was not possible to find a more suitable house. Ascertaining that money was the chief obstacle in the way, he soon showed his practical interest in the effort then being made to seek and save the lost. This was the beginning of the first forward movement of the new Society, for the assistance given by this timely visitor enabled them to move into more commodious premises, viz., No. 200, Euston Road, which has since become well known as the head-quarters of the Institution.

Not long afterwards it became necessary to extend the operations of the young society, and it was resolved to open another Home. Money was at that time the only obstacle in the way of extension—for applications for the benefits of the Institution were very numerous. One day a gentleman, whose identity has never been ascertained, walked into the bankers of the Institution and enquired if the Society banked there. On being answered in the affirmative, he handed the chief cashier a £1,000 Bank of England note, and requesting the amount to be placed to the credit of the Institution, he walked out. On four subsequent occasions the same act was repeated within a few years. This unexampled generosity was the means of placing the struggling Institution in a more prosperous condition, and Home after Home was opened until there are now five distinct and separate asylums, in addition to an Open-all-Night Refuge, in which 180 young women and girls are housed and trained for useful and respectable positions in life. Before leaving this part of our narrative it will be interesting to give a brief account of the establishment of this Open-all-Night Refuge.

Digitized by Google

The awakening on the part of the religious public to the claims of the oppressed poor was undoubtedly aided by public writers and poets. Most readers will call to mind the pathetic ballad by the late Thomas Hood entitled "The Bridge of Sighs," and the terribly sad and touching picture presented was only too true forty or fifty years ago. Waterloo Bridge, which was but little frequented in those days, became notorious for the number of suicides who leapt from its parapet into the silent river flowing in darkness below. Very many were young women who had been allured to London under various pretences, and had been speedily borne down to ruin and even to utter despair.

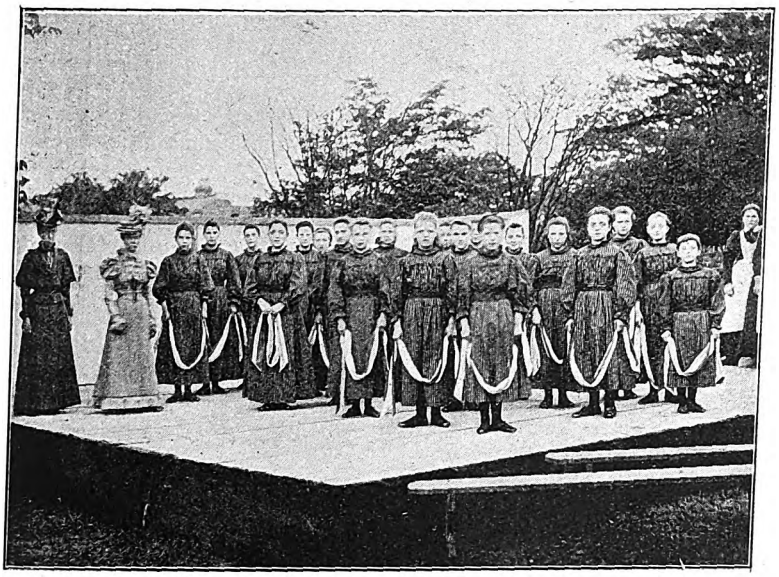
Efforts were made by the Founder of this Institution, and the Committee, to obtain leave to place a board at the entrance to the bridge directing young women to the office at 200, Euston Road for help, but the authorities could not sanction such a step. In the year 1867, however, at one of the annual meetings of the Society, a speaker said he thought it would be an admirable thing if the Committee of the Institution could keep a place open all night, in which any poor creature could find shelter and help. The late Mr. E. W. Thomas, who must ever occupy the place of honour as the developer of the Mission in those early days, then said that if any lady or gentleman would send £100 for the experiment to be tried for a year he had no doubt the Committee would undertake it. In due course his speech appeared in print, and was seen by a benevolent merchant, who sent a cheque for the sum named with a brief request to try the experiment, and from that day until now this "Ever-open Door" has been ready to welcome and help young women and girls who seek its shelter, day or night, Sunday or weekday. The extent of the work carried on at this Refuge may be better realised, perhaps, by recording the fact that nearly 29,000 otherwise homeless and destitute poor creatures were, up to the end of last year, aided by it, a very large number of whom have been permanently assisted.

While on the subject of figures it may be as well to remark that they totally fail to convey any true or adequate idea to the mind of the real nature and value of the work that is done. But this is an age of statistics, and those who have a liking for big figures will not be disappointed by a glance at the records of the Society. No less than 37,308 poor creatures have been admitted since the year 1857, and, in addition, 13,813 former inmates have for various reasons been re-assisted, making a total of 51,121. Of this large number 12,168 were young women of respectable moral character, or young girls taken out of dangerous surroundings; and it is to-day one of the most hopeful phases of the work that is being done that applications for assistance for this class have greatly increased of late years, and the helping hand so promptly given at the opportune moment to many thousands of poor creatures in distress and imminent moral peril has been the means of saving them from utter ruin.

It is sometimes thought that the attempt to reclaim these moral wastes is hopeless; but this view is held only by those who know little or nothing of the work. True, at times it may be wearisome and disappointing—and it requires much patience—but it is never hopeless. Many years ago an effort was made to save a young woman, which for the moment unfortunately failed, and she rushed headlong into all kinds of excesses. Years passed away and the late Mr. E. W. Thomas was informed that a poor creature who was dying in the workhouse wanted to see him. He went, and on being shown into the ward, an old woman to whom his attention was directed said "Shure now, and are ye a Praaste?" and when she found that he was not she said, "Shure thin it's not the likes of ye that I'm wanting," and so he left her.

A little later on in the day the conviction became so strong that there was a mistake somewhere that a second visit was paid to the infirmary. It then transpired that two women of the same name were lying there dangerously ill. A visit was paid at once to the second woman. She saw Mr. Thomas enter the door, and stretched out her long bony arm to beckon him, and as he approached she slightly raised her worn, emaciated form and in a weak, almost inaudible voice uttered the solemn but consoling words, "The blood of Jesus Christ, His son, cleanseth us from all sin." "Is that your hope, Kate?" was asked, and she answered that it was. She was the same poor creature who years before had unheeded the warning voice, and, though now reaping, literally, the wages of sin, the smoking flax once kindled had at length burst into a flame of Hope and Faith! True, her poor degraded body was within a few days buried in a pauper's grave, with her name indistinctly scrawled in chalk on the rough "shell" to mark her identity, yet there can be little doubt that the prodigal had returned in repentance to the loving forgiveness of the Heavenly Father, "and the lost was found."

Digitized by Google



A VISIT TO THE COUNTRY—THE GIRLS ABOUT TO GIVE A DRILLING DISPLAY.

Another former inmate now fills the honorable position of Missioner, and, were it not for the fact that published particulars of her former condition may meet her eye, and be productive of renewed mental anguish by recalling the fearful past, the reader would be amazed to learn from what hidden depths she had, by God's grace, been raised. But to multiply these instances is not necessary. They abound.

This Society believes that the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ is the only lever to lift up fallen humanity, and a living

THE MORNING DRILL.

Digitized by Google

ALL THE ARTS OF HOUSEWIFERY ARE CAREFULLY TAUGHT.

personal Christ the one great need ot the human heart. Its evangelistic efforts have been eminently successful, and the 2,000 services, Bible, Temperance and other classes held in the Homes every year have produced a harvest of good results. But it is the godly lives of the Matrons, and their loving sympathy, together with their earnest labours for the salvation of those committed to their care, which follow these young women even after they have left the Homes, that are productive of permanent good.

Many hundreds who were once inmates are known to have joined various churches, while not a few have developed into Christian workers, and become engaged in various parts of the world in seeking to save their fellow-creatures. One is now occupied with her husband in a large seaport town doing good work among sailors. Another who was raised from the very depths became the matron of a Home in a distant colony. Another was, until her marriage a few years ago, the superintendent of an institution for young women, and so instance after instance might be quoted.

Mr. William J. Taylor, the present Secretary of this Institution, first entered its office when it had only been opened for a short time. He was for twenty-five years the trusted assistant and confidant of the late Mr. E. W. Thomas, at whose death, in the early part of 1893, Mr. Taylor was appointed to the secretariat. He has been thirty-four years engaged in this work of rescuing the fallen, and he is one of the best known men in London labouring on behalf of destitute young women and girls.

Mr. Taylor has never allowed the work to depress or overwhelm him, and he has some amusing, as well as some pathetic, stories to relate. Very recently a good man wrote to say he was desirous of helping the Society, and added that if Mr. Taylor could get the sum of 10s., which had long been owing to the writer, from a certain "bad payer" he might have it for the Society!

On another occasion when a successful effort was made to obtain a commutation of the sentence passed upon a young woman for a crime committed under exceptionally distressing circumstances, one good man in the country sent to the Institution a letter intended for her late Majesty's Secretary for the Home Department, in which he said that as he (the writer) had himself been on juries, he could recommend the head of the Home Office to grant the commutation sought.

It is perhaps impossible to say what were the circumstances which led the prophet Jeremiah to exclaim, "Oh, that my head were waters, and my eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people," but the words are so applicable to the work carried on by this Institution that the late Dr. Guthrie, in a most eloquent passage in the first of his sermons on "The City, its sins and its sorrows," used them in an impassioned appeal for the rescue of the Fallen. The sermons were published in 1857—the year in which this Institution was founded—and we give a brief extract from the one referred to :—

Digitized by Google

Some of us are about to make a new effort for the reclamation of fallen women, and the protection of such as are willing, Magdalene-like, to bathe Christ's feet with tears, and wash away their deep sins in His blood. As a preliminary step to this Christian enterprise, we have procured accurate statistics of the extent of this great sin and sorrow of our large cities. Of them I will say nothing more than this, that, while they were read, men held down their heads with shame, or held up their hands in horror, or burst out into expressions of deep indignation. By that ravening wolf that wastes our folds, I had seen one, and another, and another, and another lamb plucked out of this very flock. I had seen fair and promising flowers that I had cultivated in this very garden plucked by the hand of the spoiler, and cast forth as vilest weeds—trodden in the mire of the public streets. I have seen the fall of a daughter—that bitterest of household sorrows—blanch a mother's head, and, still more terrible to look on, turn a father's heart into stone. I had known how a mother, when we all were sleeping in peace, with weary foot and weeping eyes, had wandered, Christ-like, up and down these streets, searching many a foul den of sin to seek and save her lost one. . . . It is not of property, but of virtue that families are p undered. It is not life, but souls that are murdered among us.

The startling truth of these burning words can only be properly realised by those whose mission it is to work for the salvation of these social outcasts. Often and often have misguided young women who have been inveigled to London been admitted to the Open-all-Night Refuge when destitute in the streets at night. Some of these have, alas ! fallen a snare to the deceiver, but others have been mercifully saved before ruin overtook them. It is not an uncommon incident for parents to come to London to the Institution and take their erring children home, or to forward means for them to be sent back. Not long ago a Scotch girl arrived in London only to find herself friendless and homeless in the streets of the great city, and was directed to this Institution. She had been brought up in a highly respectable manner and was of superior education.

At first she would not divulge the address of her relatives, and, in order not to frighten her away, she was not pressed on the subject. At length her confidence was obtained, and her father was written to. A telegram came in response, "Cheer up, Bessie; letter coming." In due course a letter containing sufficient money to pay her fare home was received, and she was soon restored to the bosom of her family.

MR TAYLOR LEADING THE SUNDAY EVENING SERVICE.

Digitized by Google

Still more recently a German young woman came to London through the representations of a man whom she met on the Continent. For two years she maintained a respectable character, in spite of his efforts to lead her astray, but she fell at last, and it was only when in an almost starving condition that she was mercifully directed to 200, Euston-road, and safely lodged in a Home. In another instance two girls came to London. After admission it was found that they were so ashamed for their friends to know anything about them that, unknown to the girls, their people were communicated with. A letter came by return of post to say that one of the parents was coming up to London forthwith to take them home, and the poor girls, when they found that all was known and forgiven were but too thankful to return again.

And so, year in and year out, the good work goes on. Rescues are effected, and some of the rescued, after training and discipline in the Homes specially adapted for them, are restored again to society, while others are more speedily assisted by reconciliations with their kith and kin. It will be seen that this is not work that can be carried on upon "a cut and dried system." Each application varies, sometimes in most essential characteristics, from others, and has to be dealt with individually; and, for this, great experience, tact and perseverance are requisite. It is not everyone who is qualified to engage in such work—work which is carried on in the name of the whole Church. But everyone can assist by providing the means requisite to enable those who are grappling with the difficulties day by day to labour on.

A. Wellesley Ireton.

HEAVENLY MUSIC.

Softer than south winds blow
  Heavy with balm,
Airs of the Spirit flew,
  Bringing us calm;
Melodies sweet and low,
Stilling the spirit's woe,
Making life here below
  One holy psalm.

List, then, O heart of mine.
  List and rejoice!
Each note of joy divine
  Utters His voice.
Each bird on swaying limb,
Chanting a morning hymn,
Sings like the seraphim
  Songs of His choice.

Sweeter than honey-dew
  In sun-kissed flower
The love He pours for you
  Each day and hour.
If thou, from out thy store,
For others love shalt pour,
Soul, thou shall have the more,
  This be thy dower.

Digitized by Google

THE STRANGE DISAPPEARANCE OF LANCE MARTIN.

By CLARA MULHOLLAND,

Author of "A False Step," "John Lawson's Ward," "The Mystery of Abbeylands," "Kathleen Mavourneen," "Two Against One," etc.

"'SOME are great; some achieve greatness; and some have greatness thrust upon them.' Alas! poor me! I come not under any of these heads—so humble and insignificant I must remain."

And the speaker, a dark-eyed girl in black, lay back in her chair with a heavy sigh.

"None of us are exactly great," replied her companion, a pretty golden-haired maiden, daintily dressed and wearing several rings upon her slender fingers.

"Well, you are not far from it. You are talked of as a beauty—made much of as an heiress——"

"'Tis kind to remind me of that."

"My dear Elaine!" looking up into the lovely pouting face. "Why unkind?"

"Because it is not pleasant. No one likes to think that one is made much of—only on account of one's money."

Barbara laughed and arranged a curl upon her forehead.

"I did not say only because of your money, dear. But if you knew the world as I do. If—— But there, I will not open your dear simple eyes. Remain innocent and believing till—well, till you find things out for yourself. But what a pity we could not change places! If I were rich, I'd glory in it, and care little why people made much of me. As it is, I know the reverse. Papa"—sighing—"died almost a pauper. My inheritance is nil."

"Excuse me, your inheritance is a valuable one."

Barbara shrugged her shoulders.

"Nil, I say," gazing at herself in the glass. "Not even a good complexion."

"No; that I grant you. But you have a cool head, plenty of talent, a heart that will never inconvenience you, and a way of making people give in to you, and do exactly as you please; a pair of eyes that flash out dangerously and attract——"

"Spare me." Barbara stuck her fingers in her ears. "Spare me."

"I'll say no more." Elaine's cheeks were hot and flushed, and her eyes had an angry light as she fixed them upon the girl's face. "But you deserve all I have said. You are continually reminding me of my money. Some day I expect you to tell me that Lance cares nothing for me, and is marrying me merely because I am rich."

"Had he not been rich one might have been a little suspicious, I confess. But since he is rich——"

"Lance is not rich. His aunt left him something very small. But"—blushing deeply—"I am sure—quite sure—he loves me, as I love him, for myself only. If I were poor he'd love me just the same."

"Of course. It's a way men have. But there, don't look so fierce. My experience is not yours, and it's not likely that it should be."

"Because you won't let it be. Because you are hard and——"

"My dear, I am what the world has made me. I was poor, and he tired—and he left me. To better himself, of course, for he's now about to marry an heiress."

"Poor Barbara!" Elaine's blue eyes filled with tears. "You have certainly been badly treated. But all men are not the same. When you know Lance you will see that he is very different—from —from——"

Digitized by Google

"Anyone I ever knew? I daresay. But time will tell. Meanwhile, I'm afraid my opinion remains as before. Men are not to be trusted."

"You are incorrigible. There is no arguing with you," said Elaine, impatiently. "So now I'll leave you. It is time to dress for dinner." And she hurried out of the room.

"Little fool!" Barbara set her teeth and clenched her fists. "She fancies she's his first love—sought out and loved for herself alone. But I know better. Had she been without fortune, he'd never have looked the way she walked. For Lance loved me, I'll swear he did. And I am resolved to win him back. Had I only been patient all would have been well. His aunt's money would have set us up. But Lance was so poor in those days. Of good family—cousin or nephew to a lord —but poor as a church mouse, and I thought it better to send him away. That I now see was a mistake—the greatest I have ever made. Very soon—indecently soon—he got engaged to her, and then just afterwards his aunt died. Too late then to withdraw, and Elaine the heiress flatters herself that he loves her. Bosh! I'd delight in making her change her mind. And she's only a soft little goose. She'd soon console herself. Whilst I—— To settle myself is imperative. And Lance! Well, in the days gone by he loved me, and he might be won. His money would be enough for me, and I have few opportunities. With her wealth she'd have many. So I have no remorse. She drew a pretty picture of my inheritance, and a fairly true one, I think. Well, we shall see; at present a cool head and not too much heart is just what I want. And I am sure I shall not be troubled by the latter. So take care, sweet Elaine; your pleasant dreams may soon vanish. I have, as you say, a way of making people give in to me. So beware."

Three years before this story begins, Lance Martin had been engaged to be married to Barbara Lyon. But the fates had been against them. He, work as he would, made no way in his profession, and Barbara was without fortune. So, seeing that marriage was impossible for many years, if ever, the worldly-minded, ambitious girl broke with her lover and dismissed him.

Broken-hearted, and bitterly disappointed, Lance went to London, and, entering a solicitor's office, as a salaried clerk, began life afresh.

Some eighteen months later he made the acquaintance of Elaine Ward, an extremely pretty little maiden, and a considerable heiress.

Elaine was warm-hearted and impulsive, somewhat spoilt and self-willed, but, with all her faults, most lovable and attractive, and before many weeks had elapsed Lance was passionately in love with her.

But, on account of the girl's wealth and his own poverty, Lance held back till his aunt, an elderly lady, with whom he lived since his coming to London, urged him to declare his love, assuring him that he would be warmly received by Elaine and her friends.

To his surprise she proved a true prophet. Elaine loved him; and after a very small amount of persuasion her mother consented to their marriage. A few weeks after their engagement was announced his aunt died, and quite unexpectedly Lance found himself enriched by several thousand pounds.

Anxious to improve his position, for Elaine's sake as much as his own, he sought and obtained a partnership in a first-rate firm of solicitors, and was soon on the high road to fortune.

Down in her lonely country home Barbara heard the great news, and, furious at the thought of her own short-sighted folly, vowed she would win Lance back again. But he did not come near her. They never met. And very soon she heard of his engagement to Elaine Ward.

"Not that that would matter," she told herself, "if I could but meet him. A word from me, a smile, a sigh, would soon bring him to my feet once more, and separate him from this girl. But where shall I see him? How meet him? That is the question."

Her faith in herself and her own attractions was certainly great, but she might never have had an opportunity of proving her power or disturbing even for a moment the peace of the happy lovers had not an unfortunate and unforseen accident led to her being the guest of Elaine's aunt, Mrs. Fleming, at the very time when the girl was arriving to pay her a long visit.

Digitized by Google

This unexpected occurence was brought about in the following manner.

Riding back late one night from visiting a patient, Barbara's father, Dr. Lyon, was thrown from his horse, close to Mrs. Fleming's gate. He was carried up to the house unconscious, put to bed, and carefully attended to. Next morning he was very ill, and his daughter was sent for. The following day he died.

Barbara was genuinely fond of her father, and her grief for him was great.

Touched by the girl's sad loneliness and sorrow, Mrs. Fleming pressed her to prolong her visit, and, extremely thankful for the invitation, Barbara gladly consented to do so.

At the time of Dr. Lyon's death, Elaine, her mother, and Lance had been staying with some relatives in Scotland. Then he had gone to France on business, and Elaine, leaving her mother in town, had journeyed down to Fen Court to stay with Mrs. Fleming.

Lance had promised to follow her there on his return from Paris; but his mission proved a more lengthy one than he had supposed, and when Elaine had been at the Court for some three weeks he was still abroad. And so it happened that at the beginning of this story Barbara had not as yet seen Lance again, and no one in the house had the faintest suspicion that she had ever known or met him.

To Barbara, Elaine had from the first taken a violent dislike, and was often tempted to ask her aunt to send her home. Then, remembering the girl's poverty and friendless condition, she upbraided herself for being selfish and unkind, and did all she could to treat her with courtesy and attention. But, wishing to avoid a disagreeable subject, she did not mention her when writing to Lance, and so he knew nothing of her presence at the Court. Having resolved to separate these two and bring Lance once more to her feet, Barbara made up her mind to begin by creating suspicions in Elaine's mind, by shaking her faith in his love, and making her curious about his past. But this was more difficult than she supposed. The young girl's nature was a trusting and generous one. She loved Lance, and believed him all that was true and noble. Other men might be base, deceitful and cruel, as Barbara said, but he was different, and nothing would ever induce her to think ill of him. Her strength of character and great spirit surprised and amused her tormentor.

"She'll be all the harder to bring round, once she begins to doubt," Barbara said, with set lips, "and that she will soon do, if I only keep rubbing in a few unpleasant suggestions."

And before very long an opportunity arose, that she saw at a glance was not to be neglected. Coming down to breakfast one morning, Elaine was much grieved at not finding a letter from Lance, and took no pains to conceal her disappointment.

"Your simplicity is charming," said Barbara, laughing. "I sometimes fancy you believe in this love of yours absolutely."

Elaine's blue eyes opened wide.

"I—of course I do," blushing brightly. "Why, Lance is truth itself."

"Indeed?" with a covert sneer. "How too sweet! And you know all about him, I daresay? All about his past? The girls he loved? The women he—— "

"Barbara! How dare you?"

"Dare I? My dear child, please don't be offended," drawled Barbara. "But you really ought to know."

"But"—Elaine's eyes flashed angrily—"there's nothing to know. I——"

"You think"—smiling—"that you are his first love? But I could a tale unfold about your Lance——"

"You! What do you know about him?"

"Much. You look astonished. But, for your sake, my friend, I have made inquiries, and a little bird has whispered many——"

"Don't say another word." Elaine was pale and resolute. "I love Lance. I have promised to be his wife. What he pleases to tell me I will know—no more."

"How dove-like! Really, quite pathetically so. But if I were in your place, I'd find out all I could. Ask him one or two questions—about the girl he loved two years ago, tired of and cast aside. But, of course, if you're afraid, if——"

"I will ask him. He comes to-morrow afternoon. I'll meet him in the meadow as he walks from the station and soon hear everything. I—I am not afraid."

"That's right. I'm glad to see you have some spirit. And I hope sincerely that your opinion of him may never change."

Digitized by Google

And she rose from the breakfast table and walked away.

"I'll not believe her. Why should I?" Elaine cried with beating heart and eyes full of tears. "I dislike the girl intensely. Yet she fascinates me—has some strange, unpleasant power over me. But I'll not believe her. She does not know Lance, and because someone behaved heartlessly to her is full of unworthy suspicions. I wonder who he was. Some cruel, unkind man, very different from my dear fellow. I'll forget her insinuations and believe nothing against him."

But in spite of her brave resolution, doubt entered the girl's soul. All night long and all through the following morning she was tortured and tormented by strange misgivings. She began to dread the answers she might receive to her questions, and bitterly repented ever having promised to ask them.

"For if I find that he once loved someone else, and left her, I'd—I'd be miserable. I'd rather not know," she sobbed. "But now—I must! I must!"

At lunch, Elaine was sad and silent, and when the time for her lover's arrival drew nigh it was a pale-faced, heart-sick little maiden who set out across the meadows to meet him.

But as she went along her drooping spirits revived, her faith in Lance grew stronger.

"When I see him all will be well," she told herself. One look into his honest, truthful eyes——"

She started suddenly, and the colour faded from her cheeks. A little way off amongst the trees she saw Lance Martin walking slowly towards her, and beside him, one hand resting upon his arm, her face raised to his, her dark eyes full of sadness, was Barbara Lyon.

Absorbed in thought, Lance did not see Elaine's slim figure, half hidden behind a massive oak. But his companion saw it distinctly, and knowing well that her words would reach the girl where she stood, she said, in a voice broken with emotion:

"Till she came—till you thought it useful to marry money—Lance, you loved me—loved me well."

"That I do not deny. I once loved you, Barbara, but——" And, as they passed on, Elaine heard no more.

"O Heavens! How terrible!" cried the unhappy girl, her faith in her lover completely shattered. "He loved—perhaps loves her. It was he, then, who treated her so badly. How miserable—how wretched I am!" and she sank weeping at the foot of the tree.

An hour later Elaine stole up the back-stairs to her room, and drawing down the blinds, rang her bell for her maid.

"Tell Mr. Martin that I am suffering from a headache," she said from the sofa, where she had thrown herself, "but that I hope to see him in the drawing-room before dinner."

But not till the last moment did Elaine appear, and as Mrs. Fleming and Barbara were present her meeting with Lance was merely calmly polite.

During dinner, and all through the evening, an unusual gloom hung over the little party. Elaine was pale and depressed, with heavy rings under her eyes, which Mrs. Fleming tried to persuade herself were only caused by her headache that afternoon.

Vexed by Elaine's coldness and Barbara's unexpected presence at the Court, Lance maintained a sullen silence, and looked worried and annoyed. Even Barbara was less talkative than usual, and contented herself with stealing surreptitious glances at Lance, managing to meet his eyes in a way that embarrassed him, and filled Elaine with anguish.

"They understand each other. Oh! why was I ever born?" cried Elaine at last, and springing from her chair she left the drawing-room.

As the door closed behind her, Lance flung aside his book, and strode into the conservatory. Here Barbara quickly followed him.

"You see how sad she is," she whispered. "She longs, yet fears, to tell you, for I know she has changed. Her heart is no longer yours. You never told her you had loved, been engaged to another, and she cannot bear deception."

"There was no deception. I——"

"You only concealed—kept it back."

"Don't torture me. I will explain all."

"Torture!" She laid her hand upon his arm. "Oh, Lance, such words from you to me!"

He shook her off roughly.

"For goodness sake, leave me in peace. You were not so careful of my feelings two years ago. Why need you trouble about me now?"

Digitized by Google

"Because"—she sighed, and put her handkerchief to her eyes—"oh, can't you see—understand?"

"I see—understand nothing about you. You are too deep for me. But I can see that you have made mischief; that, having trumped up some story to Elaine, you have made her unhappy, and placed me in an extremely awkward and disagreeable position."

"Oh! you are unkind, cruel, and heartless," sobbed Barbara. Then, seeing Elaine coming across the drawing-room, she fled past her and hurried upstairs.

Elaine's face was white and set, and she uttered a little cry of dismay as Barbara disappeared.

"Elaine, my darling, at last!" exclaimed Lance, coming in and finding her alone. "I thought," trying to speak playfully, "that you were about to cut my acquaintance. It is quite a relief to see you come willingly to speak to me," and he took her hand and drew her gently towards him.

With a little gasp and a slight quiver of her lips, Elaine pulled her hand away, and steadying herself against the writing-table, said in a low but firm voice:

"Were you once—two or three years ago—in love with Barbara Lyon?"

"Yes." He flushed hotly. "But"—and he took a step nearer—"I——"

She waved him back. "You were engaged to be married to her?"

"Yes. But, Elaine, I—let me explain——"

"No explanation is possible or can make any difference." She drew herself up haughtily, her lips pressed firmly together.

"But I assure you I——"

"Can you deny that the engagement was broken because you—she—both were poor."

"No. But she——"

"Then she was right when she said you loved me—for my money?"

"Elaine, sweetheart, no. I do love you. I——"

"I cannot believe you." She pressed her hands tightly together. "Were I poor—— But I'll say nothing of that. You had loved, been engaged, and yet told me nothing."

"I was wrong. But I thought you would not care, and——"

"Would not care! Would not care that I was deceived!"

"Elaine!"

"Yes. I say deceived, led to believe. But there, all is over between us. My faith in you is gone. Were I poor you would treat me as you treated her."

"You are cruel and heartless," he cried bitterly. "And since your love is dead, I'll trouble you no more. Good-bye," and, white with passion, he strode away from her.

At the door he paused, looked at her for an instant, then opened it and went out, shutting it swiftly behind him.

Next morning Mrs. Fleming came hurrying to Elaine's room.

"My dear child," she cried, "I am terribly distressed. Lance has gone. He tells me you and he have quarrelled and have broken off your engagement."

"Yes. That is true. And please, auntie, ask me no questions," implored Elaine. "I—I could not bear them," and she burst into tears.

"My dear, I won't," putting her arms round her and kissing her tenderly. "But I am very sorry. Lance is a noble fellow. I am afraid you will live to repent your rash decision. You're a little spoilt, Elaine, and expect too much. But there, I won't scold. You look miserable enough." And she went away to order up the girl's breakfast.

"Miserable, wretched, indeed I am," sobbed Elaine. "Oh, Lance, Lance, bitterly do I repent, madly do I regret, my words to you last night. But it is too late now, and you are lost to me for ever. And yet—who knows?" She sprang out of bed and began to dress in frantic haste. "If I go home he may come to me; ask my pardon; explain more"—her face shone radiantly—"tell me, assure me, he——Mary," to her maid, "pack up at once. I must go by the ten train. Quick! Go and tell my aunt, and order the carriage to take me to the station. Quick! there is no time to be lost."

"Yes, miss, yes," answered Mary, and she flew to do her bidding.

An hour later, Elaine drove away from the Court, and in due course reached home, where her mother welcomed her with eager delight.

"What you tell me surprises me, I confess," she said, when informed of the breaking-off of her daughter's engagement. "But I can hardly say I am sorry. I liked Lance. But with your money and your beauty, you should have done better.

Digitized by Google

I had always hoped you would make a brilliant marriage."

"I hate money, and beauty, and—and everything," cried Elaine, pettishly. "And I shall never marry anyone but Lance."

"Yet you have quarrelled with him?"

"Yes, and our engagement is at an end. And yet," to herself as she went upstairs, "I still hope and pray he may forgive and come back."

But although Elaine waited and watched day after day, and night after night, Lance neither came nor wrote.

"He is gone for ever" she cried, as the months passed, and he made no sign. "I have nothing to live for—and yet—and yet I cannot die, but must live on to bewail my folly, to weep bitter tears of repentance for the harsh and haughty way in which I treated him. I deserve my fate. But oh! it is hard."

This constant repining and wearing remorse soon told upon Elaine's health, and fearing that if it continued the girl would fall into a decline, the doctor ordered complete change of air and scene. So at the beginning of the following winter Mrs. Ward took her daughter abroad.

Time is said to heal all wounds, and thus, at the end of two years, when Elaine had been practically round the world, and seen much to interest and amuse her, her health was so much better, her spirits so much brighter, that her mother thought she might venture to take her back to England once more.

Elaine was delighted at the idea.

"I'm tired of roaming," she declared, "and I should enjoy a real bright, frosty English Christmas again. Let's write to auntie and say we'll spend it with her at Fen Court."

"But that would be dull, dear, for you. Kate has nobody there now, not even that Miss Lyon."

Elaine raised her eyebrows, and drew a deep breath.

"Indeed? Where is she?"

"Gone to Australia, and Kate hopes she'll marry and settle there. She's not as fond of her as I fancied. Did you like her, dear?"

"Not much, mother dear, and I too" —smiling—"hope she'll stay in Australia."

"Mrs. Carson, who told me about her, said she was pretty sure to marry out there. When shall we start, dear?"

"When you please." Elaine spoke more cheerfully than usual. "It will be nice to see auntie and Fen Court again."

"Yes, for indeed, Elaine, there's no place like home."

"Poor dear mother! How cruel I have been to keep you away from it so long!"

Mrs. Fleming was overjoyed to hear of the great improvement of Elaine's health and spirits, and the news that she and her mother were to spend Christmas with her gave her immense pleasure.

"It will be like old times," she cried, in delight. "And if only the weather is kind to us it will be charming. I'll kill the fatted calf in earnest, and ask the very nicest people I know, to give the child the happiest Christmas she ever knew. That is, if—— I never knew the ins and outs of the quarrel, but if only they could meet I somehow fancy things would come right. But, satisfied as she was with Lance Martin, I somehow imagine Lord Lucas would be more likely to please my dear sister as a son-in-law. I must break it very gently to them that he is living so near me."

A few days before Christmas Mrs. Ward and Elaine were driven up to the Court in the midst of a snowstorm.

"You dear things, how cold and tired you must be!" cried Mrs. Fleming, embracing them affectionately. "I do hope this snow won't last, as it will spoil all our fun."

"Oh! It is lovely," cried Elaine —"like the Christmas of one's dreams and stories. I don't want it to stop snowing."

"Well, I do. I want a hard frost and a clear sky," said her aunt, "for on Christmas Eve Lord Lucas has invited us to Lynwood Park, and he hopes to be able to skate on the splendid lake there."

"Lord Lucas? Is he a new neighbour?" asked Mrs. Ward.

"Yes. His first winter amongst us," said Mrs. Fleming, stealing a glance at Elaine. "He has just succeeded to the title, through the death of an uncle."

"How interesting," said Mrs. Ward. "But I suppose he's old and gouty?"

"You suppose wrong. He's young and extremely charming," and she looked after Elaine, who had wandered on into the drawing-room.

"She'll never forget," said Mrs. Ward, following her glance. "So it's no use thinking about it. She fancies she treated Lance badly, and bitterly repents. I suggested writing to him. But she nearly went mad at the idea. It's a sad business and has ruined her life."

Digitized by Google

"She's very young—and—well, they may meet again."

"I'm afraid not. He's left the firm he was in—gone away, he didn't know where, said the boy I saw at the office the other day."

Mrs. Fleming started. "My dear Lydia, was that wise? To go to the office! I never heard of such a thing."

"Well, I wanted to hear something, for the child's sake, but pray don't tell her."

"Trust me. Why, she'd never forgive you. So you heard nothing?"

"No. The boy knew nothing—merely that he had gone away."

"Lucky for me he didn't," thought Mrs. Fleming, "as my little surprise scheme would have been knocked on the head."

"It is all very strange and mysterious," continued Mrs. Ward, slowly.

"What is?"

"The whole thing. That quarrel—and—and his disappearance. I always fancied that Barbara Lyon was at the bottom of it. Did she go alone to Australia?"

"Alone? What do you mean?"

"He did not go with her?"

"My dear Lydia, are you dreaming?" Mrs. Fleming laughed heartily. "Lance and Barbara? Oh, it's too funny! Why, she hated him, and never had a good word for him. Lance marry her? I should just think not."

"I thought you liked her."

"I did till I found her out. She's a regular little adventuress. And I'm happy to think I'll never see again. She met a man on board ship; what he is I don't know; but she married him, and is done for, as far as I am concerned."

"Then the disappearance of Lance Martin is more mysterious than ever."

"So it would seem. But deeper mysteries are cleared up every day. Perhaps soon you will know all about him."

"Kate, you know more than you pretend."

"Perhaps, but don't try to find out what I know. For I don't intend to tell you."

That night Mrs. Ward broke the news of Lance Martin's mysterious disappearance to Elaine.

"Your aunt told me all about it," she said, carefully suppressing the fact that she had introduced the subject by telling her of her visit to the young man's office in London.

"It's no affair of ours," said Elaine, shortly. "He is surely free to go where he likes," then, rushing away to her room, she flung herself weeping on the bed.

"Oh, Lance!" she moaned, "had I but listened to your explanation, had I not allowed my silly pride and ill-temper to master me, things might have been different to-day! I have repented sorely and have suffered bitterly for my conduct towards you. Barbara went alone to Australia, thank God for that. But all hope for me is over. I shall never see you again."

During the next few days the snowstorm raged, and the three ladies did not dare to leave the house, but sat reading and working together in the comfortable morning-room.

"If this goes on the fun will be spoilt," grumbled Mrs. Fleming. "And I was looking forward so to that day at Lynwood Park."

"I declare you grow frivolous in your old age, auntie," said Elaine, laughing. "I never heard you long for a day on the ice before."

"Nor do you hear me longing for one now for myself, dear. But you are dull, Elaine, and I want to see you merry and bright amongst a lot of young people."

Elaine sighed.

"I don't care for young people, auntie. I'm old and staid now. And I really believe I have forgotten how to skate."

"It will soon come back to you; and Lord Lucas will teach or help you. He is splendid, I hear."

"Indeed! He seems quite a paragon, this gentleman. You're always telling me of things he can do. I believe you have lost your heart to him, Mrs. Fleming."

"Perhaps. But that's my secret, Miss Pry. You might respect my feelings and my blushes. A man, I believe, may not marry his grandmother. And as I am verging on sixty, and he is not quite thirty, I'm afraid I must love in vain. Have you a pretty dress suitable for skating in, Elaine?"

"Yes, an exquisite dark green velvet, trimmed with sable, and the sweetest of toques to match. My vain and foolish mother insisted I should get it in Paris."

Digitized by Google

"I applaud her vanity and folly for once. And now I am more anxious than ever that Christmas Eve should be fine. I see you already skimming round in that dress."

"And if I refuse to skim? If I sit at home, grumpy and alone, whilst you play about on the ice, what then?"

"You'd vex me more than I can say," cried Mrs. Fleming, quickly. "But you won't do that, Elaine? Promise me you won't."

Elaine kissed her softly.

"No, dear. I'll do nothing to vex you. So, if Christmas Eve is fine, I'll don my pretty gown and follow you where you please."

"That's right"—with a sigh of relief—"for if you didn't come to Lynwood I'd—never forgive you."

"That sounds a little harsh," said Elaine, smiling, "and I really think you have Lord Lucas and Lynwood on the brain, auntie dear."

"Perhaps so," said Mrs. Fleming. Then, laughing softly, she whispered to herself: "And you will soon suffer from the same complaint, my pretty Elaine, or I'm much mistaken."

That night the snow ceased to fall; but the frost continued, and the cold was intense. "The ice will be splendid," said Mrs. Fleming, and her spirits rose visibly.

And at last, to her great joy, Christmas Eve broke bright and clear. The trees and lawns were white with snow; the sky was an exquisite blue, the sun warm and brilliant; whilst, on every pond and pool, the ice was several inches thick.

"An ideal day!" she cried, rubbing her hands together in delight. "And I fancy," as Elaine, in her pretty velvet and furs, stepped after her and her mother into the carriage, "that you, my dear niece, will create something of a sensation amongst the company to-day. I wonder if Lord Lucas——"

"I'll turn back, auntie," cried Elaine, with crimson cheeks, "if you mention that man's name again. I'm beginning to positively hate him."

"You'll change your mind when you see him, dear child," answered Mrs. Fleming calmly. "Since the strange disappearance of Lance Martin I've seen no one who pleases me so well—and I am sure you will soon agree with me."

"Oh, aunt!" gasped Elaine. Then, with a deep sigh, she turned to examine the landscape.

When the party from Fen Court entered the beautiful demesne of Lynwood Park skating on the wide lake was already in full swing.

It was a very charming and animated scene, and Elaine stood still upon the bank, lost in admiration, as she watched the graceful skaters flit swiftly past her across the ice.

Not noticing that the girl remained behind, Mrs. Fleming and her sister pushed on through a crowd of spectators, pausing occasionally to greet an acquaintance or speak to a friend.

"If you see Lord Lucas, please tell him I'm here, close to this old oak," said Mrs. Fleming, to a young man in a fur coat. "Say that I am anxious to speak to him."

"Certainly"—bowing. "But I don't think he has come out yet." And he skimmed lightly away.

"I'd better follow my chaperons," thought Elaine, after a time, "or they'll think I'm lost. This is the quietest place, but——"

"Can I persuade you to put on your skates, Miss Ward?" said a voice that sent the blood surging to the girl's brain, and made her heart beat tumultuously.

"Lance!" She turned and faced him, white as marble, trembling in every limb.

"Elaine, I am not a ghost. Don't look so terrified—or do you hate me so much that——"

"Hate you? O Heaven! If that were possible." She covered her face with her hands. "But how are you here? They said you had disappeared—mysteriously."

"Disappeared? I? Oh no! I have lived here, openly, for a considerable time."

"That is strange, for auntie said——"

"Elaine"—he drew her arm within his own, and as she offered him no resistance, he led her away from the crowd, down a secluded path—"two years ago you refused to listen to my explanation. Will you hear it now? Will you believe me when I say that I loved you for yourself alone; that I did not treat Barbara Lyon badly, but that she herself dismissed me, and that I rejoiced at my freedom when I met you, my only love? Can you believe this?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes, Lance—and I deeply regret——"

"And you love me, and will be my wife? Speak, Elaine, may I hope?"

"Yes. I love you, Lance. I have alway loved you."

"My darling!" He drew her towards him. "My love! God bless you!"

As they stood together, absorbed in happiness too deep for words, Mrs. Fleming came suddenly down the path.

"Well," she cried, beaming with delight, "so you have found each other at last?"

"Oh, auntie — yes." Elaine blushed divinely. "But Lance declares he never disappeared."

"Lance Martin did. He is now Lance, Lord Lucas."

"Lord Lucas?"

"You don't mind, Elaine?" cried Lance, growing scarlet.

"Mind? Oh, no. But why such mystery?"

"That was my joke, dear," laughed Mrs. Fleming, "made by the merest accident. But come, let us go and explain to your mother the strange mystery of Lance Martin's disappearance. She rather liked the young man, and will be much relieved."

[THE END.]

GRIEF AND JOY.

Sorrow and pity had clutched my heart,
Lashed its chords to their infinite chain;
They watched dull-eyed, as I sat apart,
A pallid fate at the gates of pain.

Torturing thoughts from an empty past
Surged within, like a hurrying pack
Of hungry wolves which before the blast
Fretted the snows in the beaten track.

Colder than where they jibber and glide
My future beckoned across life's way;
I turned and shivered and crept to hide
Where ruined hope on my hearthstone lay.

When lo, a presence! I saw him stand
Rosy and smiling, a dimpled child
Draw near and eye me, with outstretched hand
"Catch me who will! I am free and wild!"

He took my fingers the damp had chilled,
To his little red mouth's wooing breath.
He touched my hair that the nights had filled
With wan wet dews of despair and death.

Round my heart he threw warm red roses,
Bound and pulled me with artful grace,
Subtly sweet with imperious poses
He clasped me close in his soft embrace.

Trembling, frightened, with feet that stumbled,
"Tell me thy name, oh, thou pretty boy!"
He laughed at my voice that fear had humbled,
"Ho, foolish coward, my name is Joy!"

Julien Gordon.

Digitized by Google

In the Public Eye

Men and Women who are Helping to Make the World Brighter and Better.

TO take up the study of an Art and to attain well nigh perfection with no outside instruction other than that which can be obtained from books, could only come to one who has an inborn love and taste for the subject, and this Miss Craigie Halkett possesses in an altogether wonderful degree, as is evidenced by the beautiful and artistic photographs she has produced. Six years ago, the present of a camera was made to her, and she took her first photograph with no other idea than to take it up as a pastime; but her success in this single instance was so great that she determined to give both time and trouble to the subject, and the result has fully justified her decision.

Born at Cramond, a beautiful ancestral home in Scotland, her life up to the last few years was devoted to country pursuits, riding and driving being her favourite outdoor recreations; and it was, perhaps, a desire for something further to do that first prompted her to take up photography with such zest. She is one of the seven charming daughters of Colonel Craigie Halkett, her mother being the daughter of Mr. Davidson, the laird of Tulloch, who was considered one of the handsomest men in Scotland, while her grandmother was a daughter of Lord Macdonald of the Isles. Mr. Davidson was an extraordinary man in many ways, one remarkable fact being that he married five times. On the occasion of the late Queen's first visit to Scotland, he was one of those singled out in company with Lord Breadalbane, the late Duke of Athol, and the late Duke of Hamilton to dance a reel before Her Majesty; and afterwards, the Queen sent for him more than once, on his death requesting that his photograph should be sent to her.

MISS CRAIGIE HALKETT.
One of the most artistic exponents of the Photographic art.
Photo by H. Montague Cooper, Taunton.

Digitized by Google

Miss Craigie Halkett is an ardent photographer, and she is well known for her charmingly illustrated articles published in various papers. Her first introduction to this kind of work arose from a request from the Editor of the Sketch to be allowed to reproduce some of her photos taken at her cousins', the Ladies Hope's, Shetland pony farm, at Hildenborough, Kent. The publication of these artistic pictures created quite a boom in Shetland pony photography. Since then, she has written and illustrated many delightful articles—one, showing cider making in the West country in its various phases, being specially interesting. She is present with her camera at most great functions—on the occasion of the C.I.V.'s home-coming service at St. Paul's Cathedral, taking them from the lofty altitude of one of the outside balustrades, where she had been placed by special permission. She took General Mackinnon the next day at the Photographic Association in Brook-street, of which she is a member.

In proof of her ability, Miss Halkett has taken seven silver and bronze medals at various photographic exhibitions and competitions, besides editing the photographic column of more than one paper; while she is also a member of the Royal Photographic Society and the Edinburgh Photographic Society.

THE REV. J. E. HARGREAVES.

One of the most enterprising of Methodist Ministers, who is his own architect in the erection of new chapels.

Photograph by T. C. Turner, 10, Barnsbury Park, N.

THE genial features and massive form of the Rev. James E. Hargreaves will be recognised by most Methodists and by many beside, for his work has brought him into contact with all classes, and his ministry has been exercised over a widespread area. Very few ministers have been engaged in a greater variety of work, as the following account will show.

James E. Hargreaves was born at Huntly, Aberdeenshire, and was the son of the late Matthew Hargreaves, of His Majesty's Inland Revenue. Entering the ministry in the year 1864, he was sent at once to Carlisle, where he began the Caldewgate Mission, building a new chapel for the work. At the same time he was interested in the welfare of the city, and formed the Carlisle Volunteer Fire Brigade, an organisation much needed at the time. This is to-day the recognised force in the city, and whenever Mr. Hargreaves preaches in Carlisle the members of the C.V.F.B. make a church parade and march in full uniform to hear him.

At East London he had a share in the erection of buildings for the Mission which he helped to found on Bow Common. In his next circuit at Charlestown, Shipley, his building capabilities were tested in the erection of a new chapel and schools; and at Derby the successful development at Rose Hill was pioneered by him. The school built at Freshwater, Isle of Wight, was a triumph over inadequate means. By means of working bees the concrete foundations were put in, and the walls were erected at a bare cost for materials, the mechanics in the parish giving labour free during the long summer evenings, Mr. Hargreaves working with his own hands.

While in the Portsmouth district he was for five years the District Secretary. This position he also held under the Cornwall Synod on removing from Freshwater to that county, where he remained eight years. No respite from building could be obtained, for the beautiful chapel at Helston, one of the finest in the district, was erected through him; thus ending years of division and difficulty among the members.

Digitized by Google

At St. Ives Mr. Hargreaves' boldness and freedom from red-tape was shown. The evangelist, Rev. T. Cook, came to hold a series of meetings in the chapel, but expressed his regret at the inadequacy of rooms to which inquirers might retire from the chapel. He asked Mr. Hargreaves if better provision could not be made, and Mr. Hargreaves suggested that the difficulty might be overcome by knocking a hole through the wall at the side of the pulpit, thus affording access to more convenient and commodious vestries. This change could not legally be made without consent of the Trustees, but a fortnight's notice was necessary to summon them, so the difficulty was surmounted by Mr. Hargreaves taking matters into his own hands; making the alterations and obtaining consent afterwards.

His next change put him in the chair of the Zetland District, and while residing at Lerwick the property of the church was put into good order; manses being renovated and enlarged, and several chapels built, Mr. Hargreaves drawing his own plans to lay before the Chapel Committee at Manchester, and superintending all work. After three years he was removed to the Chair of the Isle of Man District, and while here drafted a Bill for resettling all Methodist property on a common Trust deed. This model deed incorporated the benefits of the Fowler's Act, and has been a great boon to Methodists of the Island. After drawing up the Bill he consulted the Attorney-General (now Clerk of the Roll) who was surprised at a Methodist minister undertaking such legal work, and shortly after, meeting a prominent Methodist layman, a member of the House of Keys, said, "I do not know what sort of a preacher Mr. Hargreaves is, but in making him a minister you spoiled a good lawyer."

While at Douglas Mr. Hargreaves' health failed, and he has been for a few years seeking strength at the well known health resort, Bishop's Teignton, but continues to aid as far as possible the churches in the vicinity.

This summer a long cherished scheme of his saw its completion. Some years ago he instituted a movement to place on our coast a lifeboat to bear the name of John Wesley. The fund has been some time closed, and Barry, on the Welsh coast, chosen as a station for the boat, but delay in launching occurred owing to the authorities refusing to place the boat on her station till certain dock alterations were effected. These changes completed, the launch was performed, amid great enthusiasm and much congratulation, this summer, and it is hoped the coast between Penarth and Porthcawl will be benefited through this effort of one of the practical followers of that "practical" clergyman, John Wesley.

IMBUED by nature with a keen love for animals, with a rapid perception to note their various tastes and idiosyncrasies, and with great skill with the brush, it is little wonder that Miss Frances C. Fairman, the well known animal painter, has achieved great success. The daughter of the late Mr. Samuel Creed Fairman, Miss Fairman's earliest recollections are associated with country life, where, being a keen huntress and rider, many of her happiest hours were spent in the saddle. After her father's death, she and her mother came to London, where she took lessons from Mr. Felix Moscheles. Here she stayed until her mother's death, when she went to live at Sunninghill, there giving up painting for a time and devoting herself to another favourite occupation, gardening. Visits to Florida, Brazil, the Argentine State and La Plata followed, from which places she brought back several folios of beautiful paintings of birds and landscapes, this being a form of art in which she excels equally with her favourite dogs.

Soon after this, monetary losses compelled her to turn her great talents to account, and having studied for some time under M. Deschamps in Paris, she started work with Mr. Krehl's toy bulldogs and Mr. Sprague's bulldog, "Don Pedro." After this, commissions began to flow in until one day she received an invitation from Lady Probyn to stay at Park House, Sandringham, and paint her celebrated Jap "Hisa." Sir Dighton Probyn had already shown some of her pictures to the King, then Prince of Wales, who was so pleased with them that he asked her to paint the late Duke of Clarence's favourite dog "Venus" for him, afterwards giving her other commissions. She also painted dogs for the Duke and Duchess of York, and the six delightful weeks of her visit to Lady Probyn found her constantly at work at Sandringham. This was followed by a command from the late Queen for her to go to Windsor to paint a head of the late Prince Henry of Battenberg's Irish terrier; and later the Queen's pets "Marco," "Turi"—a Florentine Spitz—a pug, and an oil of the beautiful collie "Roy." She painted in the room known as the artists' room, and it was on one occasion when Her Majesty had come into the room to examine Miss Fairman's work, that she personally gave her the order to draw the heads of "Marco" and "Turi." Later on she had the order to paint a pug and a favourite dachshund belonging to Prince Christian, and permission from the Queen to paint "Fern" for the Dogs' Brigade Fund.

Digitized by Google

LADY DIMSDALE.
Lady Mayoress of London.
By kind permission of the "Ladies' Gazette."

Since then Miss Fairman has painted many celebrated dogs and exhibited in the Academy, New Gallery, and elsewhere, all her pictures bearing the stamp of love and knowledge of all that appertains to dog life.

Women's progress has been very remarkable in art, which fifty years ago was considered an impregnable masculine stronghold.

THE rôle of Lady Mayoress to the great city of London is not an altogether easy one to play, and especially heavy will be the duties during the forthcoming Coronation festivities, but there is no doubt that Lady Dimsdale, with her bright geniality, will carry them through with every success. It seems impossible that the new Lady Mayoress should be the grandmother of a small two-year-old maiden. The only son of Sir Joseph and Lady Dimsdale is in India, but they have two daughters, the one being married and the other still only a child. In order to help her mother in the onerous duties of hostess, Mrs. Lancelot Dent has taken up her residence at the Mansion House for the year her father is in office, so that a somewhat unusual element will be introduced into the stately building—the prattle of a child's voice.

Comparatively seldom has the Lord Mayor had the pleasure of saying that one of his ancestors held the same great Civic position, but so it is in Sir Joseph Dimsdale's case. He is justly proud of his long lineage, not a few of his family having distinguished themselves laudably.

THE name of Stormont Murphy is inalienably associated in the minds of London cabmen with a man who devoted his life to their welfare, who was the first to organise the erection of cab shelters twenty-six years ago, and whose influence brought about a great reform in the class of men employed as cabdrivers. His last act was to have a water-post erected in Soho-square for the horses, and the respect in which he was held was shown by the fact that at his funeral in 1893, a line of cabs a mile long followed his body to the grave. He is still remembered among them as the "Cabmen's Friend," a memory which his sister, Miss Helena A. Stormont Murphy, has kept green for the last nine years by giving both summer and winter treats to the pensioners of the Cabdrivers' Benevolent Association and London sheltermen, these being immensely appreciated.

Digitized by Google

Miss Stormont Murphy, who has a remarkable talent for invention, comes of a clever family, being the seventh child of the late Dr. Edward W. Murphy, Professor of Midwifery for twenty years at University College, London, and the author of many well-known books on chloroform and midwifery, the former of which, in connection with the late Sir James Simpson, of Edinburgh, he was the first to introduce into England. She is also the niece of the late Ven. William Lea, Archdeacon of Dublin. Her treats for the cabmen have largely increased in size during the last few years, the number being now three times as great as formerly, and though there is sometimes a difficulty in the matter of funds, still Miss Murphy keeps them up bravely, and always succeeds in giving her guests a delightful time. There are many other charitable works in which she is interested. She is a strong Evangelical and religious writer, her tract, "What is Salvation?" written at the time of the Church Mission, having a large sale; while she has contributed special articles to many papers.

MISS STORMONT MURPHY.
The Cabmen's Friend.
Photograph by Thos. Fall, 9, Baker Street, W.

Her favourite relaxation would seem to be invention, and many are the clever things which have emanated from her prolific brain. Before she was 20 she had thought out a special hair restorer made from seaweed, which she had discovered to have peculiar properties for strengthening the fluid of the hair, and, four years ago, she invented some wonderfully useful and pretty Fire Tea Trays for keeping tea and cakes hot, which have had the honour of being patronised by Queen Alexandra. Later, an Antarctic Cooker was used with great success by Sir George Newnes in his Antarctic Expedition, and has now been taken out in the Discovery by Captain Scott. Many are the other clever inventions which bear her name, among them being a war shield which has been used to a certain extent during the present war, and an undressed sheepskin Curative Chest-preserver, such as is largely used by the natives of Iceland and the Faroe Islands for all chest diseases.

Miss Murphy is an adept in Palmistry—and, in fact, she herself introduced it into England just twelve years ago. She considers that it is closely allied to Phrenology, and could be used with great effect in the detection of crime. She has given many lectures on its origin, its use and abuse, and has always been generously ready to give her assistance at bazaars or other charitable functions.

AN organisation, widespread in its influence and capable of unlimited good results, is the "Children of the Empire" League, founded by Mrs. Roland Trimen a few months ago. This lady, who has spent many years in South Africa, is the wife of Mr. Roland Trimen, F.R.S., Director for many years of the Cape Town Natural History Museum, and long before the war broke out she felt how necessary it was that the ties between the Colonies and the Mother Country should be strengthened in every possible way; while the bad effects caused by the perhaps almost unconscious superiority evinced by visitors from the old country over the colonists caused her to realise how little true Imperialism was really understood by those of her own generation.

Digitized by Google

During a two years' stay on an ostrich farm, and, later, on a sheep farm in a Boer district, she personally experienced the discomfort caused by the lack of domestic knowledge when, during a period of Kaffir discontent and unrest, the servants, as usual, ran away; and she emphasises the fact that all intending colonists, whether men or women, should bear in mind that it is no use depending upon intellectual achievements, but that it is absolutely necessary that they should learn some useful handicraft, such as carpentering, farriery, etc., while the girls should have a knowledge of needlework, typewriting, housework, etc., as then they would find no lack of employment.

The League, which was formed to fit young men and women for colonial life, is under the presidency of the Countess of Jersey, and was only started last May, and already it has met with enthusiastic approval. There are now fourteen branches, including one in New Zealand, whilst Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the larger colonies are each to have a separate executive. The great desire is to work without friction with any existing organisation, and it is in harmonious alliance with the Guild of Loyal Women in Africa, the Daughters of the Empire in Canada, and the Victoria League. Already classes have been arranged for young men and boys to learn riding and all things connected with horses at some of the best riding schools at greatly reduced terms; while, though in no way a military association, efforts are made to provide suitable shooting ranges, for which there is a great need.

Furthermore, to still increase the usefulness of the League, a system of correspondence has been organised, by means of which any member of the League who desires may be given a "Correspondence Comrade" in some other part of the Empire, the idea being that the comrades shall write to each other describing the ordinary life, pursuits, and natural history of the place in which they live. This has already worked wonderfully well, many schoolmasters being highly in favour of it, while the Minister of Education in Western Australia has even suggested the advisability of incorporating this system of comradeship in the school's curriculum. In one girls' school in Natal seventy of the pupils are already enrolled in the ranks of "Comrades"; in the Orange River Colony and the Transvaal, Mr. Sargant, Director of Education, has given his support; branches are going to be started in Natal, in Cape Colony there are already many correspondents, and thus the whole of South Africa has practically been secured, and the meaning of the "Hands all round" motto of the League has been carried out to its fullest extent.

MRS. R. TRIMEN.

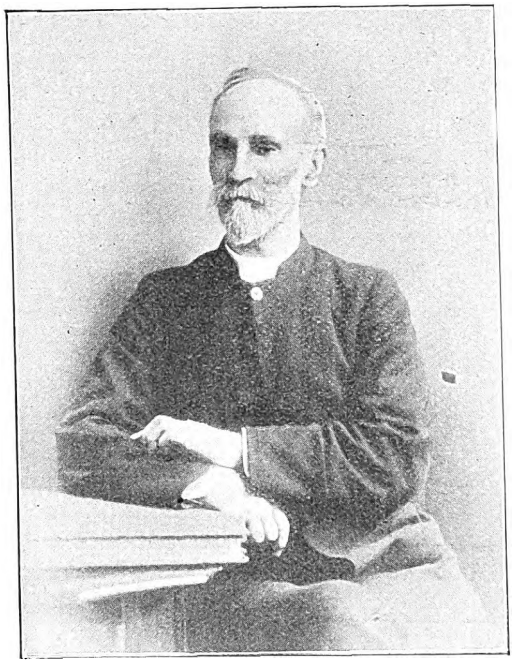
Founder of the Children of the Empire League, whose purpose is to fit young men and women for Colonial life.

Photo by Lambert Weston & Son, 27, Sandgate Road, Folkestone.

IT is no mere statement of partiality or inexperience, but sober, historic truth, to say that no man is more beloved and trusted throughout the Presbyterian Church of England than the Rev. John More, of Woolwich. What he prizes most, however, are the proofs of affection and confidence which he receives almost daily from some "Tommy" or other, kilted or "breeked," in Africa, India, or such-like "furrin parts abroad."

As chaplain to the forces in Woolwich, and as minister of the Presbyterian

Digitized by Google



REV. JOHN MORE.
Presbyterian Chaplain to the Troops at Woolwich.
Photograph by Tasma, Woolwich.

Church in that ilk, the Scottish Tommies gravitate to Mr. More, as rills seek out the stream, and once they have got him, or he has got them, their hearts have no more parting. This on the spiritual side. On the other, and more temporal one, Mr. More is often in awkward predicaments, for no sooner has one of the Scottish fighting lions succumbed to some weakness in the piping times of peace than he hastens to Mr. More as to an advocate who shall speak a good word for him to the commanding officer. All of which the commanding officer knows right well, with the result that he often hails the good-hearted chaplain with a query as to the other "lamb" that has strayed—with a kindly twinkle in his eye all the time. For all of which, and other mercies, Tommy loves the chaplain, and the officers have a sneaking fondness for him too.

A Borderer by birth, and a Jew to look at, he has the characteristics of both clans—brave and Christ-honouring as his namesake the Baptist, yet deep in the lore of the Scriptures as any scribe. His converts are many, both in his present church and in Dudley and Cheltenham, where he was before, his power lying chiefly where so many fail—in dealing with the individual at close quarters. Three at least of his converts are themselves now in the ministry; these in their turn have led at least seven others into the same calling, and these again have had their "seals." From such seeds what harvests there must be in the end!

A genial, kindly man, full of fun, fond of children and adored by them, yet of a clean, pure, noble spirit, little wonder that children and soldiers, and all others of the like child-like spirit, should love and honour the man. His duties are most exacting and incessant, shepherding both civilians and military; only a passion for souls could sustain him in it. While such men can be found in pulpit and hospital the flag of the Crimson Stain will never be struck.

THE ONLOOKER.

Digitized by Google

The Revolution in Arcady.

By REV. AUGUSTUS JESSOPP, D.D.

THAT word Revolution is an ambiguous word. It ought to mean no more than the moving round of a body on its own axis. When a body has made a revolution it has got itself round to the exact position in which it was when it began to turn. But nowadays, when we talk about a revolution, we mean something very different from that. In common parlance we understand by a revolution such change in the body politic, or in the condition of a class, as has resulted in a readjustment of the constituent elements of that body, or in the physical, moral, and social improvement of the members of that class. At any rate, that is what I mean when I talk of a "Revolution in Arcady."

Also, when I talk of Arcady, I mean that favoured land which, in common parlance, is called Norfolk, and if there is any other land which presumes to call itself Arcady, I know not where to look for it, or where to find it.

"When I use a word," said Humpty Dumpty, " . . . it means just what I choose it to mean, neither more nor less!" Humpty Dumpty was a profound philosopher, and I am one of his disciples.

. . . . .

Far the larger number of dwellers in Arcady earn their bread by their manual labour, in the tillage of the soil, and as such they belong to the class of agricultural labourers. We have among us no great manufactures, no mines, no potteries, no coal, no commerce, no important seaports, no great capitalists, employing industrial armies. The great bulk of our people are pretty much in the same condition as those happy islanders who are said to make a livelihood by taking in one another's washing. Our people live upon one another, and how they do it is known only to themselves. Nevertheless, they do live, and, somehow or other, during the last fifty years there has come about so steady an amelioration in the physical, mental and moral condition of the great mass of our people in Arcady, as compared with their condition at the beginning of the reign of the late Queen Victoria, as to amount to what I call a Revolution. My first business is to try and show how this has come about, and my second business will be to point out how far it has extended.

During the latter half of the reign of Queen Elizabeth—and if you don't know when that was, more shame to you!—England had many more moneyed men than she had ever had before. That is, there were numbers of men who were faring sumptuously every day, not on the produce of the land, but on the profits of foreign trade and commerce. These men were far richer than the mere landlords. They did not look to make an income out of broad acres, and they had little sympathy to offer, and little thought to spend, upon the country labourers or their concerns. They lived in big new houses, in or near London and the rising towns; insomuch that the Queen tried to stop this desertion of the old country houses, and tried to send the rich men to spend their money in the rural districts. But they would not go.

So the villages were slowly neglected, the landlords became more and more non-resident, and the increase of poverty among the labouring peasantry more than kept pace with the increase of wealth among the upper classes. It was pretty plain that something must be done. So the first measure for the relief of the poor was passed, in 1601, and, under the circumstances, it was a wise one. The framers of this law looked facts in the face, and tried to make the best of them. The first fact was that England was then, as now, divided into about 14,000 geographical divisions, called parishes, varying very greatly in size and extent, and in the number of inhabitants which those parishes severally contained. Each of these parishes managed its own affairs, pretty much in the same way as a chartered borough or corporate town does now, and every man was a parishioner of some parish; and, as such, he belonged to his parish pretty much as a black slave in Virginia or Georgia belonged to some plantation or other. If the parish wanted him and his service, in the parish he had to stay, and do the labour he was bound to do. If he wanted the parish he might claim to be kept from starvation—that's all. If he ran away from the parish he was flogged for being a vagrant.

Digitized by Google

For ages there was work on the land for the men that were born on the land—the demand and the supply of labour pretty nearly balanced one another. But now things had changed. There had been a good deal of running away from the villages, and when a man could not find work at home he went in search of it elsewhere. The object of the first poor law was to provide that the parishes should find work for those who could work, and find food and shelter for those who could not work—the halt, the blind, the idiots—and they were to do so by building poor-houses for these helpless and destitute creatures; and as to the men who were congenitally lazy, they were to be whipped and put in the stocks, and sent to a House of Correction to be cured of their laziness. They were very rarely corrected, because, for the most part, they were incorrigible, and as soon as their term of punishment was over they ran away again as tramps and sturdy beggars.

Forty or fifty years after this Act was passed the great Civil War broke out, and there was confusion worse confounded. Up and down the land the old order changed, and the baser sort did much as they pleased, and wandered about at their own sweet will; and I suspect country life wasn't all cakes and ale for the agricultural labourers by any means.

But the war came to an end, and the Restoration came; and, when things were beginning to settle down again, the townsmen opened their eyes to the fact that they were in danger of being eaten up by the countrymen and were supporting great hosts of tramps and scamps and runaways, who did not belong to them, but who did belong to the parishes where they had been born and bred or apprenticed, or had, in some way or another, acquired a settlement. So another Act was passed, in 1662, the object of which was not only to help the townsmen by getting rid of the sturdy beggars, but to help them to get rid of the industrious countrymen from their midst, who were entering into competition with the townsmen in the labour market. And this Act aimed at sending back every man who was not wanted, say, in London, or Bristol, or Norwich, to his own parish, where, in many cases, he was even less wanted; and there was a general game of "Puss in the corner," and the labourers were sent to their parishes, the best of them, you may be sure, being kept by the townsmen, and the worst of them hurried off to their villages, to come upon the rates and to fill the poor-houses, or to drift away no one knew where and no one cared.

If it had not been for the great increase in our iron and woollen manufactures, and the expansion of our commerce generally, during the next hundred years or so, it is difficult to believe that the great crisis would not have come much sooner than it did. But it came at last. The burdens upon the ratepayers for the support of the poor, little more than one hundred years ago, had grown to be well-nigh crushing and unbearable.

Happily, there had been one clause in the Act of Queen Elizabeth whereby a small and poor parish, which could not possibly support all its own labourers, was enabled to tack itself on to another and richer parish; and sometimes half-a-dozen parishes were associated to bear the common burdens. If it had not been so, many a little parish where the land was poor and the landlords needy would have been actually bankrupt, the rent being more than swallowed up by the poor-rate. The union of parishes provided against this danger. Let me take an instance near at hand.

The parish of Scarning, in Norfolk, was united, after a fashion, with the prosperous little town of Dereham, to which it is contiguous. At Dereham there was a very considerable poor-house, in which, if I am rightly informed, at least a couple of hundred paupers were housed, clothed, and fed (after a fashion), marched to church twice on Sundays, and guarded like so many West Indian negroes. These paupers were drawn from two or three surrounding villages and hamlets, which could not all have kept up each its own poor-house.

Digitized by Google

But, in each of them, there was always a residuum of able-bodied labourers who were also partially on the rates of the small parishes, and these labourers earned, at odd jobs, only just enough money to keep body and soul together. Poor wretches! They must have had, and they had, a very, very, very hard life of it. Housed, were they? Yes; if such wretched hovels could be called houses. But in the year 1790 or so there were in this parish where I am writing fifty-five inhabited houses, including at least five substantial farmhouses, and those fifty-five houses were occupied by seventy-five families. Think of that, my masters! Fed, were they? Aye! the bread they ate was the colour of Thames mud, and the taste of a wheaten loaf was known only to the favoured few who shared in the distribution of a shilling's worth of "white bread" provided by some benefactor who died a long while ago, and left a small rent-charge for giving out this bread every Sunday after Divine service to the poor and needy, who were not likely to forget the gracious miracle of the feeding the five thousand! Oh, ye very dreadfully wise ones! Do ye want the proceeds of such picturesque bequests to be diverted for the endowment of scholarships in a school for technical education, where smart boys shall be taught how to shoe a horse or mend a bicycle?

But the end was coming; it was near at hand when Thomas Gilbert, M.P. for Lichfield, brought in his famous Act, known as the Gilbert Act. Mr. Gilbert, like the Elizabethan legislators, looked facts in the face, but he did not know how to deal with them. The fact which struck him with dismay was that there were hundreds of labouring men in Arcady who were living on starvation wages because they could not get employment for more than two or three days a week—strong men and willing men, gaunt and famished men, and men who were a menace to the well-to-do when hunger made them reckless and fierce. But Gilbert, though a benevolent enthusiast, was a benevolent bungler; his enthusiasm won him the support of a majority in the House of Commons, and his bungling dealt the heaviest blow to the well-being of the agricultural labourers that they had ever known.

His theory was that every man who was out of employment on the land should be paid as if he were at work. Giles could not get more than two days' work a week, and Roger could only get three. Poor fellows, they ought to be found in work—the will must be taken for the deed. So Giles should get his wages for the four unemployed days and Roger for the unemployed three days out of the rates. And if Giles had six children and Roger ten, an allowance was to be made to them for each child, to encourage the growth of the agricultural population. In little more than ten years' time the vast majority of the agricultural labourers in England were receiving allowances from the poor-rates. These rates had amounted in 1795 to the very respectable figure of two millions and a half. In 1832 they had risen to the enormous aggregate of eight millions; and as the population of England and Wales in this year did not much exceed fourteen millions, the poor-rates alone cost every man, woman, and child in the country rather more than twenty-five shillings a head! But observe what this meant. It meant that the ratepayers in town and country alike were being charged with the payment of the agricultural labourers, while the actual employers of those labourers were relieved from a huge share of their labour bill. The less the farmer paid his men the higher the poor-rate rose, and the tradesmen and the professional classes were becoming loaded even to the crushing point.

But there was something even worse than that which Gilbert's Act brought about. The labourers themselves felt the disgrace of the system under which they were losing all self-respect, independence, and every spark of honourable ambition. It may safely be affirmed that never since England was a nation—certainly not during the feudal times that people talk about so glibly—never did the peasantry of England pass through such a period of humiliation and degradation, body and soul, as they did during those forty years that elapsed between the passing of Gilbert's Act in 1782 and the passing of Lord Grey's Act for the Reform of the Poor-law in 1834. That same year, too, negro slavery was abolished in all the colonies of the British Empire; and three years later Queen Victoria ascended the throne of her ancestors.

The agricultural labourer was a free man again now. The law of settlement still continued to operate, but languidly.

Digitized by Google

It was not long before the countryman began to follow the labour market, and where there was the demand there came the supply. The enormous development in the construction of our railways during the period between 1830 and 1850 brought with it such a call for the kind of labour which only the rural districts could supply that the surplus population of our villages was soon absorbed. The agricultural labourers joined the great armies of "navvies" who got good wages and regular work, and they who stayed in their native villages soon began to find that they were wanted at home, and that the weekly pay they could earn by the sweat of their brow brought in more grist to the mill than the odious "parish allowance" which was doled out to them as supplementary to the payment for their honest toil, which heretofore had been infamously less than was the peasant's due.

Nevertheless, the weekly wages of the countrymen during the 'thirties—that is, seventy years ago—were miserably inadequate for the support of a man and his family. Every article of consumption imported into the country was taxed—butter, cheese, cured fish, cotton and woollen manufactures, leather—where am I to stop?—all groceries, the corn that supplemented what the farmers grew, and the very food for cattle which they could not grow. During the five years ending 1846, Sir Robert Peel had absolutely abolished all import duties on six hundred and five articles—some of them the very necessaries of life. The crowning point of the great Minister's triumph came when his Bill for the abolition of the Corn Laws was passed in May, 1846. That was the beginning of a new era for the labourers in Arcady.

Yes! it was the beginning of the new era. I don't mean to say that all of a sudden, all at a bound, the farm labourer rose up a new man, body and soul. When the tide turns it does not come in with a rush and a scream like a ball from a cannon. Great changes come gradually, "with kingly pauses of reluctant pride and semblance of return." And so it was in this case. The farmers never had a much more prosperous time than during the thirty years that succeeded the Repeal of the Corn Laws. And yet during those same years the agricultural labourers were, to put it mildly, having a great deal less than their share of this general prosperity. Yet they were even then beginning to assert themselves, in a grumbling, bungling way. They were already beginning to clamour for equal rights with the tradesmen. In 1870 elementary education in England was made compulsory. In 1872 voting by ballot at Parliamentary elections was introduced. In 1884 the labourers were given the franchise, and since then the influence of the landlords as a political power in Arcady has practically been reduced to a shadow, with no substance behind it.

Where are we now?

Sixty years ago the peasantry were in a condition which differed only in name from slavery. The peasant belonged to his parish; he was actually put up to auction, and the farmers bid for him. In harvest the wife and children earned as much as the father and husband did. He dressed in a smock frock—yclept a slop—which in many cases covered little more than nakedness. Except in cases where the parsons set on foot here and there an elementary school, there was practically no education. A man might walk twenty miles and more from one village school to another. The personal dirt of the children in the villages was astounding, incredible. "Soap!" said an old woman to me some twenty years ago, "soap! lor! when we was children we didn't know much about soap. Who was going to buy soap for the eight of us? Why, I've heerd say the soap was that taxed it got into your eyes if you used it." Skin diseases among the villagers were disgustingly prevalent. The itch and the ringworm were always to be found in the country hovels. I verily believe that a shilling in 1836 would not have bought as much as sixpence does now. If I put fourpence for the sixpence I should not be very far wrong.

Coal was hardly known except in the great houses of Arcady when Queen Victoria came to the throne. One of my informants distinctly remembers the first time that she saw coal sold retail in Dereham market; and then she carried home some lumps of it on her head, tied up in a piece of sacking. Hereabouts the chief fuel in use was turf, which was brought to us from the Cambridgeshire fens for the most part. The turfmen made a good living by selling their loads, and delivering them at the doors of the villagers. They have only ceased paying their visits to us within the last twenty-five or thirty years. In the old days the trimmings of the hedges were a serviceable adjunct to the turf, and the thrifty ones would stack it. Now the labourer cares so little for it that in October you may see huge fires of the hedge-toppings blazing all round the horizon. It seems to some of us a sad waste, but we are told that it is not worth carting off the land.

Digitized by Google

Sixty years ago the ordinary public-house was kept open as long as anyone could be found to call for anything. In the back yard of the Chequers, or the Brown Cow, or the Red Lion, wrestling and fighting were always going on. "I've see ten fights in a week at the Green Dragon!" said one old woman to me. "Why, we used to like it somehow!" And as she spoke her old face rippled over with a joyous laughter, as if the remembrance of those days made her gay and light-hearted again. "My first husband, he was a big, strong man he was, and he'd fight anyone. I've knowed him fight a man for a quart of beer many a time when he'd got a score on the door and he couldn't get no more. There was always lots o' folks as would stand the beer, whoever won."

. . . . .

Nothing has produced a more beneficial effect upon the habits and morals of Arcady than the closing of the public-houses at ten o'clock. The mere money saving for the peasants is incalculable. So far from their not being able to live on their weekly wages—as the wiseacres of the towns, and especially the wiseacres of the drawing-room meetings, are never tired of affirming — the agricultural labourers nowadays seem to have money for everything. They won't tell you how much they have deposited in the savings bank. But some years ago a dreadful case occurred, not two miles from where I am writing, of a man of little more than fifty who had hoarded up as much as £83, and was robbed of it all. He was an old bachelor, indeed, and a bit of a miser. But there it was! I married a couple a year or two ago — they were, on both sides, of the labourer class, but the bride wore white satin or white kid shoes (I'm not sure which), and abundance of rice was showered upon the pair.

It is considered a bit disgraceful for a labourer's father and mother not to have a tombstone. It is a very pretty sight indeed to see the way in which the baby is dressed at a baptism in church. As for the children in the schools, they are quite enchanting! They dress sometimes with exquisite taste, and they do their hair like little fairies. Even their very speech is getting almost too refined. "Lor', sir! one don't never hear bad words, same as one used to. My neighbour Rossin, he says they aint a bit better than they'd used to be. They've only forgot to swear, he says, and he says as he shouldn't wonder if they took to it again—he says." But they don't yet.

But the facts of the case come crowding up upon me too thickly for me to put them down in due order.

This, however, is the conclusion of the whole matter. The farm labourers of Arcady, as compared with those who were tillers of the soil at the beginning of this century, are living in a new world, and a world of freedom and enlightenment, of prosperity, luxury, and hope. This, and not that, is the golden age. The much and glib talkers of the towns, the soft-voiced theorists of the drawing-room meetings, still continue to talk frothy gabble about the low estate of the peasantry here, there, and everywhere in England. I'm not at all sure that they have not drawn the long bow too tight; and I should not wonder if the recoil is near at hand.

Already we are finding instances of our labourers who have tried a spell of town life sneaking back to their native villages, "and glad to get there." Such repentant sinners have had a glimpse of the world of streets and the docks and the seamy side of "urbanity," and they have come to the conclusion that Arcady and its old life is not so bad as they thought. Old life, did I say? No, it's not the old life which men passed when King George wore the crown. It's the new life which has been the outcome of such a Revolution as this fatherland of ours has never known before—a Revolution which has been all for the better, and the betterment is still going on. The millennium has not yet come. There is something still before us. Who is it, or what generation was there ever, that does not, and always will, need reforming?

AUGUSTUS JESSOPP.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by
THE REV. J. REID HOWATT.

PRIZE COMPETITION.

"MY FAIRY TALE."

The flow of fancy still goes on, fresh as at the first. If we elder ones possess it not, it is another proof of the fact that we are all journeying away from the gates of Eden, and the further we go the more we lose sight of the gleaming and beautiful presences that are there, and we try to console ourselves by saying we are growing wiser. Perhaps yea! perhaps nay! Anyway, many of us would give much—very, very much—to be able to see again what once we saw when our stature was smaller but our eyes were brighter and keener. Tom Hood endorses this.

I remember, I remember,
The fir trees dark and high;
I used to think their slender tops
Were close against the sky;

It was a childish ignorance,
But now 'tis little joy
To know I'm further off from heaven
Than when I was a boy.

I can but hope and trust that these young authors, bursting into print with their fairy tales, may long retain the far-seeing eye, and the heart that always is the wisest—the heart of a child.

As to the stories themselves, I again put them simply in the order of the writers' ages, and dare not trust myself to make comments beyond this—(1) That Fairies seem very much in the matrimonial line; (2) That Darwin didn't know everything, as the "Fowl" tale tells; and (3) That the Magic Nut seemed able to stand more cracking than common or shop ones do.

THE MAGIC LANTERN.

There were once two sisters who lived in a wood—one was very pretty, and the other was cross and ugly. The ugly sister's name was Prilicka and the pretty one's Merna. Prilicka was jealous of Merna because she was so beautiful, so she always tried to keep her from being seen by anyone. One day an old woman came to the door and asked for some food, but Prilicka told her to go away; then the old woman raised her stick, and Prilicka vanished. The old woman spoke to Merna, and said she was a fairy and had sent Prilicka away. Then she gave Merna a lantern, saying that, if she put it in her window on Christmas-eve, "good luck" would come of it The fairy then disappeared. On Christmas-eve Merna put the lantern in her window. By-and-by a Prince riding past saw the light, and thought perhaps he could get a rest there, so he went to the house, and Merna was so kind to him, and so beautiful to look upon, that he fell in love with her, and took her away to his castle, where they were married and lived happily.

MARY DOROTHY DEAN.
Delamere, East Bank Road, (Age 9.)
St. Anne's-on-Sea.

This letter will interest, as will also the tale which follows, from the same writer. He seems to have a fine fancy:—

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—Thank you so much for the beautiful book. I received it last night, and shall enjoy reading it immensely. I have always wished to have "Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales," as a friend of mine told me what delightful stories they were.—With very many thanks,

Always yours sincerely,
EDWARD P. SMITH.

Hetherset,
Leigham Court Road,
Streatham, S.W.

THE WHITE WOLF.

Maud had a tobogan given her, and being very anxious to try it, she went to a hill called "the Wolf's Slope," and began sliding down. Suddenly, as she rounded a bend, a lot of beautiful white wolves, with ugly little women on their backs, darted out of the undergrowth. In the middle of them was one all forlorn and sad; the saddle on his back was empty, and the silver of the harness of the others was bright, while his was rusty and besmeared. Maud, who was a tender-hearted child, went to comfort the poor beast. No sooner had her hand touched its fur than all the women were turned into beautiful ladies, and the wolves into handsome men. "Oh, Madam," said one, "our prince and we were turned into these forms because he stole a golden raspberry from a witch's garden, to right a wrong the hag had wrought upon us, and she, in revenge, turned us into these forms till a lady should consent to marry him." So Maud, who had fallen in love with the prince at first sight, was married and lived happily till she died.

Digitized by Google

EDWARD P. SMITH.
(Age 10.)

THE FAIRY AND THE LION.

"Once upon a time when pigs were swine, and turkeys cured tobacco, and birds built their nests in old men's beards," there was a very cruel old woman who had seven sons and one daughter. One day the old woman sent the girl away and said she was never to come back, and she walked on and on till she came to a place, and she was so sorrowful, so the King sent her away and she saw eight coats hanging up on a tree, and she thought, "why these must be my brothers," and a fairy stood close by and touched the girl three times with her wand and turned her into a lion, and by-and-bye her brother came out and ran away when he saw the lion. But the lion called out, "Brother! brother!" and he came up to the lion. The lion begged the boy to cut off her tail; so the boy did, and she turned him into a prince and she said a magic word, "ompom," and a palace came, and she called her mother and brothers and she became Queen and lived happy ever after.

KATHLEEN SIMPSON.
(Age 10 years.)

(Address not given: letter with Plymouth post-mark.)

THE FAIRY AND THE STAR.

There was once a little boy whose name was Ronald. He ought to have been very happy, but he was not. He longed to be a star, to shine at night and give light to all around him. He thought of this till he could think of nothing else. "Oh, if I could be a star, how happy I should be to be seen and loved by everybody!" Ronald went to bed that night as usual. Suddenly there appeared to him an old woman with such a sweet face. "Who are you?" he asked. "I am Fairy Helpful," she answered. "If you are a fairy and a helpful one, you can help me," said Ronald. The fairy looked at him. "Ronald," she said, "you want to be a star." He did not answer. "Why not try to shine here in people's hearts and help them, instead of thinking of yourself?" What shall I do?" he asked. "Go and see poor little lame Tom in the village. Help old Mrs. Blake to gather her sticks." Ronald woke, thinking of his dream. That morning he went to help Mrs. Blake and Tom, and forgot all about wanting to be a star.

ENID D. MERCER-ADAM.
(Age 11¼ years.)

16, Lansdown Place East,
Bath.

THE MAGIC NUT.

There once lived a wood-cutter who had three sons, named Grumblum, Grendel and Jolly. When he died he left his house to Grumblum, and an axe to Grendel. He had nothing to give Jolly, his favourite son, but a nut. This was a magic nut which had been given to the wood-cutter by a fairy. Attached to the nut was a note which said that he was to crack the nut when in danger. One day, when Jolly was in the wood, he was attacked by a large bear, and he had no weapons. When he had given up all hope, he thought of his nut, and cracked it, and out came a sword, with which the bear was killed. Another time, when the brothers were in bed, the house got on fire, and they did not know what to do. So Jolly took out his nut and a fountain of water came out and the fire was quenched, and they were all saved. You see the nut saved three lives and they all agreed that Jolly's share was the best.

ETHEL HEWITT.
(Age 12.)

Burleigh Villa,
68, Rose Hill Street,
Derby.

THE MAGIC FLOWER.

Far away there once lived a just king. He had no queen, but had two ungrateful sons, and one beautiful daughter named Snowdrop. Once he offended a fairy, and as a punishment she said that he should live in an iron cage for the rest of his life. Then suddenly regretting her stern verdict, she exclaimed, "But Prince Eric, who is under an enchantment, can release you. He must be released first, and only by a flower in the possession of the Gorgon, a terrible creature who lives far away." She then disappeared. Everybody thought the sons would free their father. But they said, "No, while our father is captive we can do as we like." At last Snowdrop offered to go. Her father was loth at first, for she was the sunshine of his captivity, but he soon consented, and she departed. Snowdrop braved many dangers, and reached the Gorgon's home safely. He was terrible to look upon, but, nothing daunted, she asked him for the flower, which he willingly gave her. Snowdrop then proceeded, and ere long released Prince Eric, who also quickly released her father. Snowdrop and Eric were married soon after, and lived happily together with beautiful Snowdrop's father.

PHŒBE HALL.
(Age 13 years.)

35, Shaw Road, South Shore,
Blackpool, Lancs.

PRINCESS SNOWFLAKE AND THE SNAKE.

Once there lived a king who was greatly troubled about a band of robbers that lived near the castle. Their time was taken up by drinking, swearing, and gambling. The king's daughter, Snowflake, was so distressed that she promised to marry the prince who could help her to stop them. Many princes came, for they all wished to marry her, for she was good and beautiful. But Snowflake listened to none. One prince brought a witch who promised to turn the robbers into snakes until they repented. Just then, up the steps came a great snake, and the prince fled, leaving the princess alone! But it did not sting, it hissed "I will help you." So she lifted him up, wished her parents good-bye, and set out. Soon they saw the robbers round a fire. The snake slipping out of her arms wriggled near. The robbers, startled to see a snake, jumped up. One took a stick and hit him, and immediately he changed into a handsome prince. Then Snowflake stepped forward and asked the robbers to become the king's servants, and give up their former life. Then they gave in, and went back with her. The king received them gladly, and Braveheart and Snowflake were married.

Digitized by Google

DAISY TRELEASE.
Castle Bailey House, (Age 14 years.)
North Gate,
Bridgwater, Somerset.

WHY FOWLS CANNOT SWIM.

Long, long ago, when fowls used to swim with the ducks and swans, a great disagreement sprang up because the fowls, with their sharp beaks used to peck the young ducklings and cygnets and take away their food. Well, the old mother birds said they would tell their queen, "the Fairy of the River," all about this. One day they all set out to the queen's palace and told her all about it. The queen was very sorry that the fowls had behaved so badly, and said she would punish them. The next day she (the queen) came. She called all the fowls together and told them she was going to punish them. She parted their feet so that they couldn't swim, and caused a comb to grow on their heads in remembrance of the blood they had shed. From that day to this, no fowl ever swims, and they still wear their combs. So you see whatever evil deed is done, it is sure to be found out. Even a fowl's.

ELSIE S. JONES.
"Darmstadt," (Aged 14 years.)
Newport Road,
West Cowes,
Isle of Wight.

MARIE ANTOINETTE.

Marie Antoinette was reclining on a couch in her boudoir one evening, just after a day of gaiety. Suddenly a gust of wind filled the room, and a tiny fairy alighted in front of her and began speaking rapidly. "Marie Antoinette, I am Fate. I have come to warn thee to treat thy peasants better, or I must give thee a tyrant's death. I love thee, oh, I love thee, yet I must be fair." Haughtily Marie Antoinette rose from her couch, and said "Who are you to speak to me thus? Begone!" Instantly the fairy disappeared in another gust of wind.

. . . . . .

After the death of Marie Antoinette, unseen by the jeering fanatic crowd, a light, fairy-like form descended on the scaffold, and kneeling, began to weep piteously, her long hair streaming on the ground. "My Marie, oh, my Marie, proud, haughty and beautiful. I have loved thee as I never loved another. Why did'st thou rebel against me when I would have made thee a queen of queens? Must I give haughty Napoleon the laurel that should have crowned thine and thy husband's heads? If thou had'st lived thine would have had the glory. But nay, I shall curse his dying day, for I have loved too long."

EWRA AITKEN.
Teviotside House, (Age 15 years.)
Hawick.

THE LEGEND OF THE EDELWEISS.

In Switzerland there once lived a shepherdess named Edelweiss. Hers was a hard life, and when, in the rosy Alpine glow, she saw the rainbow-robed snow nymphs, she would stretch out her arms to them and cry, "Oh, let me dwell with you, even if it be but as a flower, for I am aweary of my life!" One day, when she was bemoaning her lot, an eagle swooped down, and, seizing her, flew up towards the blue sky. He hovered over the mountain tops, then suddenly released his hold, and down dropped the poor girl. The sun set; the mountains put on their snowy caps; around the motionless form of Edelweiss collected the beautiful nymphs. "Her desire to be a flower shall be gratified," said one sprite. "Let the flower be woolly and white like the sheep she tended, and let it be called Edelweiss," said another. Slowly they danced round the child's body chanting a sad air; as they sang the form vanished, and in its place grew a small, starlike flower. Still on the mountains blooms this pure blossom, and once a year at midnight a white maiden roams through the fields, sighing like the south wind, and the villagers whisper, "It is Edelweiss mourning for her past life."

GWLADYS E. WYNNE.
13, Linthorpe Road, (Age 15 years, 1 month.)
Stamford Hill,
London.

HOW HANS CAUGHT JENNY.

There once lived in a beautiful palace a beautiful lady named Jenny, and near her a handsome Prince named Hans. Now these two loved each other, but a witch lived near by, whose delight it was to make people unhappy. So one night she turned Jenny into a horse which nobody was (supposed) able to catch, and took her to live at a castle near by. Now Hans determined to catch her, so he at once tried but found it impossible. So he sat by the roadside, sorrowful. Presently something touched him, and looking up, he saw a little fairy, who said, "You are in trouble, tell it me; perhaps I can help you." It was soon told, and she replied, "Answer this question sensibly, and you shall be helped. How soon could anyone visit every village in the land?" A moment's thought, and Hans replied, "That depends on the rate of travel." "Well done," replied she—

"Take this key,
Climb yonder tree,
And you will see
What appears to be—a small cupboard. Unlock it, and you will find shoes of swiftness." Off set Hans, found the shoes, and soon caught Jenny. As soon as he touched her she turned to her original form, and they married and lived happily ever after.

Digitized by Google

ALICE E. MANNING.

(Age 15 years.)

The Mills,
Great Barton,
Bury St. Edmunds.

This last tale has been judged the best, and the Prize Volume has accordingly been sent to the writer.

The next competition will be on :—

"CURIOUS MISTAKES ON THE LESSONS."

You cannot have been long at school without having made or heard some droll mistakes. One of my Sunday School teachers, for instance, was explaining to her class the other day about how Moses had to put off his shoes when standing before the burning bush, and she naturally asked when the lesson was ending, "And what did Moses do next?" The answer came promptly: "Put on his boots again and went down to Egypt!" This was pretty good, and you must have heard many a similar answer to some questions on scripture, or geography, or history—answers such as schoolboys call "regular howlers." Send me the oddest of these you have known, and for the best paper I shall give a handsome volume. Write on one side of the paper only, with name, address and age (under 16), and send, not later than the 14th of this month, to Rev. J. Reid Howatt, the Crescent, Camberwell-grove, Denmark-hill, London, S.E.

THE CRUTCH-AND-KINDNESS LEAGUE.

The following letter speaks for itself :—

DEAR MR. HOWATT,—I trust I am not troubling a busy man like you, but I cannot refrain from writing to thank you most gratefully for your Crutch-and-Kindness League. I was getting into a very bad state, and cultivating a very bad disposition, all because of some troubles that I had, and, having time on my hands, and being much alone, the bitterness and the badness were growing rapidly. The fact was, I was becoming thoroughly enclosed with myself, and if there is anything that can make all things black, and rob the soul of every bit of sunshine, it is that. In one of my worst moods, however, THE TEMPLE came into my hands, and my eye fell on your page. A touching little item arrested my attention, and I read on. Before I had finished, the sight of the poor suffering cripples, and the sight, as it were, of the many good-hearted people who, simply for pity's sake, were doing what they could to soften the hard lot of these children, broke me down, and quite broke down all the hard and bitter crust that had been gathering round my heart. I saw how selfish I had been growing, and how my misery was my merciful punishment. I joined your League at once, got a dear little cripple put under my care, and whatever I may have been able to do for her, she, with God's blessing, has been able to do far, far more for me. It is three years since I first corresponded with her. and, one thing leading to another, they have been three of the happiest years I have had, and I put it down simply to this, that though I live so far away and in such a lonely place, yet you have shown me the way of being able to do a little part, at least, in helping on the world's great need—that the strong should help the weak, and those that are blessed should pass on the blessing. Again thanking you most gratefully, and wishing you all blessing and success in your noble work,

I am, yours, most sincerely,

After such a letter I would say little this month beyond stating the case of the League in a few words. It is this: there are six thousand poor crippled children in London alone, and when I say poor, I am not using the word in the sense of pity, but in the sense of poverty. The father is, perhaps, only a labourer, the mother taking what odd jobs she can do while keeping as close in attendance on her suffering child as she can; or one or other of the parents is dead, and the little invalid's lot is all the harder. These are the extreme cases; there are others a degree better, but however it may be for food and shelter, in all the six thousand cases I have mentioned one thing is common—the pitiful loneliness of these children. Their trouble shuts them off from playmates, for however good-hearted a healthy child may be, it is not natural for him to shut himself up more than he can help with a little weak neighbour, and the stern struggle for bread makes it necessary for father and mother often to leave the patient little sufferer alone for long and weary hours.

To break these awfully lonesome times, and bring a little brightness into the lot that is already all too sad, the Crutch-and-Kindness League was started. All that it asks of its members is, that each should take one cripple under his care or hers, for the purpose of sending a letter, or old illustrated magazine, or a toy, or such other pleasant "cheer up" once a month, to his or her charge, but a monthly letter by preference. All particulars concerning the child put into the member's care for this purpose, are given. The kindness done in this way, it will be seen, can be done anywhere, by anyone, young or old, weak or strong, and, as much as it proves a blessing to the lonely cripple, as much or more is it a blessing to the one who does the kindness by "breaking up the hard and bitter crust" which is apt to gather round the heart of all who take the good of life without thinking of doing some good again to others who are worse off. The names of new members are printed here from month to month, and from the list below it will be seen that this merciful work is being carried on from all parts of the world.

Digitized by Google

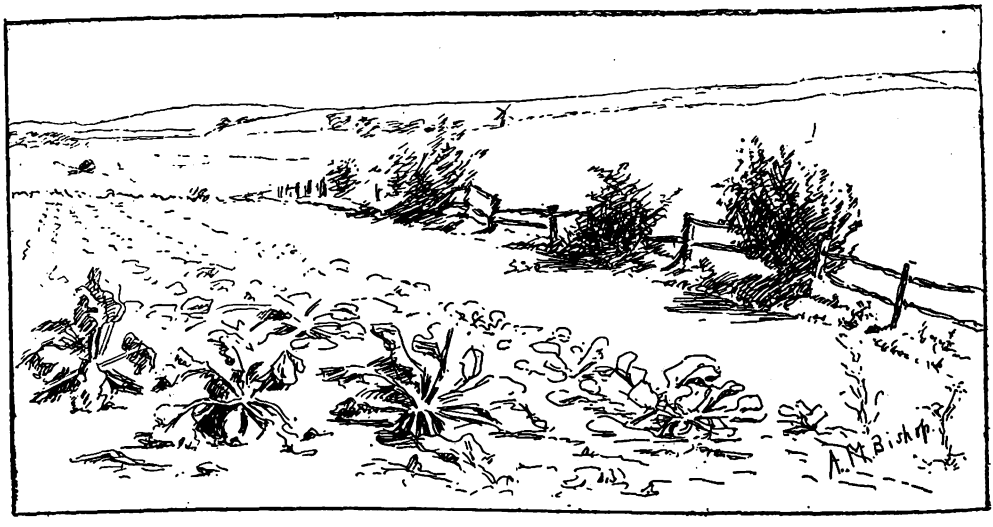
Space forbids my saying more now, but I trust enough has been said to induce many to join the League. All particulars concerning the League may be had for a stamp from Mr. John Kirk, Secretary, Ragged School Union, 32, John Street, Theobalds Road, W.C.

NEW MEMBERS FOR THE MONTH.

Mr. R. Fowler, Weymouth; Miss Nicholson, Scotland; Miss F. A. Waterall, Croydon; Miss Vaughan, Guildford; Miss Gertie Ashton, c/o Miss Underwood, Luton; Miss Bishop, Balham; Miss Grace Bardwell, Miss Lily Winters, Miss Olive Bardwell, Miss Hammond, Miss L. Brinchley, c/o Mr. Dawson, Waltham Cross; Miss H. Baker, Eastbourne; Master E. H. Allard, Margate; Miss E. F. Griggs, St. John's; Miss Grace H. Deykin, Birmingham; Miss E. M. Yerbury, Doncaster; Miss A. Peat, London; Mrs. C. Scott, Miss Norah Scott, Miss Mabel Scott, Miss Queenie Scott, Butler's Cross, Bucks; Miss Mary Gavin, Miss Evelyn Gavin, Grangemouth; Mrs. Windle, Upper Edmonton; Mrs. Cotterell, Miss Jennie Hill, Miss Annie Beard, Miss Gertie Slinger, Miss Nellie Dixon, Miss Nellie Jones, Liverpool; Miss London, Cirencester; Miss Lizzie Rennie, Surrey; Miss D. Adamson, Edinburgh; Mr. H. Cracknell, London; Mrs. K. Scovell, Sandown, Isle of Wight; Miss Daisy Roberts, Miss Nellie Stowe, Miss Alice Atkinson, Miss Ethel Carr, Miss Erica Dickenson, Miss Millie Smith, c/o Miss Priestley, New Zealand; Mr. A. W. Wills, Weymouth; Miss M. Heaton-Ellis, Buntingford; Miss Ethel de Jersey, Guernsey; Miss A. Beaumont, Huddersfield; Miss Elsie Warneford, Miss Olive Warneford, Southsea; Miss Mary Clark, Miss Winnie Shand, South Africa; Miss Elsie Atlee, Eastbourne; Mrs. H. F. A. Roche, East Molesey; Miss Wilson, Suffolk; Miss James, Leamington; Master Richard Edmonds, Africa; Miss B. Williams, Weymouth Junior C.E.; Mrs. Blackmore Fletcher, Southsea; Miss E. M. Bye, Lincoln; Miss Ethel Allkins, Verulam.



Digitized by Google

THE

SALVATION ARMY SOCIAL OPERATIONS

(The "Darkest England" Scheme),

Comprising no less than 620 Homes and Centres for the assistance of the Poor, the Outcast, the Criminal, and "Submerged,"

ARE IN URGENT NEED OF FINANCIAL HELP

Some 25,000 people are assisted daily by the alleviation of their immediate distress and the opportunity of labour to permanently raise and help themselves. The percentage of satisfactory cases is most gratifying.

£30,000 is annually needed for the support of the Social work at home alone.

£5 will rescue two girls from a life of shame.
£5 will maintain two slum sisters for six weeks.

Help Gratefully Received, However Small.

Please Address to:

MRS. BRAMWELL BOOTH,
101, QUEEN VICTORIA ST., LONDON, E.C.

The Bishop of Durham writes: "The Evangelical Alliance is a grand means for the promotion of the spiritual sympathy and co-operation of Christians of many lands and Churches, scattered locally as to organisation, yet one in the Lord. It is also a powerful agency for the practical aid of the weak and oppressed, which God has largely used."

Rev. B. F. Meyer writes: "In my opinion the Evangelical Alliance was never more needed than in the present day, as the common meeting ground of those who are one in their loyalty and love to the one Divine Head."

Rev. G. C. Morgan recently wrote: "I look upon the Evangelical Alliance as a splendid organisation for the accomplishment of just the work our age needs."

Principal J. Oswald Dykes says: "The Alliance seems to me to render a service to Evangelical Religion which hardly any other Association can accomplish. I hope therefore it will continue to rally fresh supporters and receive a large measure of encouragement in its good work."

In sending financial help, or the names and addresses of new members, please direct to

The SEC., 7, ADAM ST., STRAND, W.C.

URGENT.

To complete the Good Samaritan Work of the

'Liberator' Relief Fund.

A further £10,000, or 200,000 shillings, still urgently needed to give relief to hundreds of aged, destitute, and afflicted victims of the great "Liberator" fraud, who were taught and trained in habits of temperance and thrift by their trusted leaders, only to find themselves suddenly robbed of their life-savings, and driven to face the dreaded workhouse, in spite of their endeavours to make some provision for their old age.

Ninety per cent. of these sufferers are members of some section of the Christian Church.

"Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

There are 3,014 cases on the Books of the Fund, of whom—

1,548 are Widows or Spinsters. 1,486 are over 60 years of age. 824 are over 70 years of age. 223 are over 80 years of age. Over 400 deaths through the disaster.

The Bitter Cry For Help

Is still coming to the Committee from sufferers who have bravely borne with their difficulties, till sickness or great destitution has compelled them to apply.

Cheques and P.O.'s should be made payable to the "Liberator" Relief Fund, crossed "The London City and Midland Bank," and sent to the Secretary—

REV. J. STOCKWELL WATTS,
16, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

Royal Hospital for Incurables,

PUTNEY HEATH.

Patron:

HIS MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII.

President:

The Most Honorable the Marquess of Northampton.

Treasurer:

Herbert John Ellcroft, Esq., F.R.G.S.

This Institution maintains 220 Inmates and 663 Pensioners for Life at a cost of £32,000 yearly, of which only £3,500 are guaranteed. Funds are urgently required to meet present liabilities, and New Subscriptions and Donations will be thankfully received.

W. DAVID NEWTON, Secretary.

Office: 106, Queen Victoria-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

When buying a bicycle, look at the tyres. If they are not the machine is not cheap at any price.

DUNLOP TYRES

Wired or beaded edges optional; 55s. per pair. Guaranteed for thirteen months. Of all cycle agents. But be sure you see the Company's trade mark on the inner tube as well as the outer cover.

Trade Mark.

The Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. Ltd.

PARA MILLS, ASTON CROSS, BIRMINGHAM; and branches.

THE OLDEST AND BEST—and BRITISH.

UNEQUALLED FOR ITS BRILLIANCE AND CLEANLINESS.

ADAMS'S FURNITURE POLISH

FOR FURNITURE, BROWN BOOTS, PATENT LEATHER, OILCLOTHS,
AND ALL VARNISHED AND ENAMELLED GOODS.

THE QUEEN says: "Having made a fresh trial of its virtues after considerable experience with other compounds of the same nature, we feel no hesitation in recommending its use to all housewives."

VICTORIA PARK WORKS, SHEFFIELD.

METROPOLITAN CREAM

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS FOR BOOTS AND SHOES

W. CLARK, 528, Oxford St., London, W.
(Near the Marble Arch.)

GOLD MEDAL AWARDED, WOMAN'S EXHIBITION, LONDON, 1900.

NEAVE'S FOOD

For Infants, Invalids, and the Aged.

"An excellent food, admirably adapted to the wants of infants and young persons."

Sir CHAS. A. CAMERON, C.B., M.D.,
Professor of Chemistry, R.C.S.I., Medical Officer of Health for Dublin, City and County Analyst.

USED IN THE RUSSIAN IMPERIAL NURSERY.

Agents for Australasia and the Colonies: R. A. THOMPSON & Co., Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, Adelaide, Cape Town, etc.

LONDON: PRINTED FOR THE PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE

FOR HOME AND SUNDAY READING.

VOL. 6. MARCH, 1902. No. 6.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

A BEAUTIFUL PATRICIAN WORKER FOR WOMEN.

LONDON: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Cadbury's Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.

"The Standard of Highest Purity." —The Lancet.

Digitized by Google

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

INVALUABLE FOR NURSING MOTHERS.

A Delicious and Wholesome Tonic—Refreshing, Invigorating, and Sustaining.

EASILY DIGESTED BY THE MOST DELICATE.

Brewed by Messrs. BEAMISH & CRAWFORD, Ltd., Cork, from the Finest Malt and Hops, and Guaranteed by them to be ABSOLUTELY PURE.

An EMINENT DOCTOR says:—

"I can strongly recommend BEAMISH'S STOUT. I have prescribed it for many of my patients with excellent results."

LABORATORY, 24, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.
March 4th, 1901.

A careful analysis has been made of this sample of Beamish's Stout, as a result of which I am able to state that it is an excellent one. It is good in flavour, high in extractive matters, rich in albuminoids, yet contains only a very moderate amount of alcohol, and is very low in acidity. Although I understand the sample which I have received has been in bottle for two years, no active fermentation is taking place.

LAWRENCE BRIANT, F.C.S., F.R.M.S.

Agents Wanted Everywhere.

BEAMISH'S STOUT.

This is the only Stout which will not introduce into the system unfermented yeast cells, and consequently it can be taken by the most delicate without fear of indigestion.

Delivered carriage free to any address in the United Kingdom in Cases containing 3 dozen reputed pints, Price 18/- per case.

Wholesale Agents to whom all communications should be addressed—

GENDALL & CO., 34, Norfolk St., Strand, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN 9 4 1902 Digitized by Google

BORD'S PIANOS

25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (second-hand, 10s. 6d. per month) on the Three Years' System. — Lists free of C. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C. PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

These magnificent Pianos for Hire on the Three Years' System, at advantageous prices and terms.—List and particulars free of CHAS. STILES & CO., 40 and 42, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

Needham's METAL POLISHING Paste

If you have any difficulty in obtaining NEEDHAM'S METAL POLISHING PASTE, write us, giving name of dealer, and we will see you are supplied.

Sole Manufacturers: JOSEPH PICKERING & SONS, Ltd., SHEFFIELD.

METROPOLITAN CREAM

W. CLARK, 528, Oxford St., London, W.
(Near the Marble Arch.)

MACKENZIE'S SWEETS

Ask for SOUTOUMA
(The Famous Sweet).
Rich Creamy Flavour.
1d., 3d. and 6d.
Sold Everywhere.

MUST BE MACKENZIE'S

See Full Name and Address on every packet :—
S. J. MACKENZIE & CO., Limited, LONDON,

Digitized by Google

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

MATRON'S MANTLE.

At last the matrons have found a fashionable coat, or cloak, which is very becoming. The three-quarter-length cloak, which has been adopted by young and old alike, lends itself most happily for making up the rich brocades and heavily stamped velvets which matrons love. One of the newest materials for such long mantles is a rich black Lyons silk, heavily worked in scrollings of chenille. The effect is most pleasing, while in amongst these most elaborate scrollings we see single dots of velvet almost as large as a sixpenny piece. Such a mantle can be trimmed in various ways, sometimes with heavily-crimped frills of thin silk, hemmed at the extreme edge with chenille to match the scrolling, as shown in the sketch; or, again, fur can be added right the way round, but this has by no means so dressy an effect. If extreme warmth is wanted in the mantle itself a wadded lining can always be added. The sleeves of this mantle are of the bell shape, provided with deep falling frills of chenille-edged silk, to match the trimmings used down the front. Some women—those of the tall and graceful order—can carry a further frill of the same, coming from under the bottom edge of the mantle, and, where this is becoming, it is very becoming indeed.

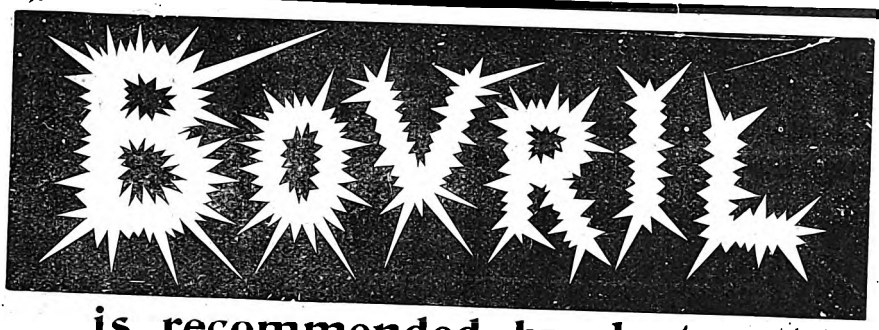
ABOUT BOOTS.

Ten or twelve years ago it was thought a slovenly thing to wear shoes for outdoor exercise, and no one dreamt of doing so in winter. Now boots are the exception, and the British ankle feminine has taken the opportunity to spread. Give the ankle an inch and it will take an ell. The toes do not abuse freedom in the same way. They do not grow thick and clumsy as the ankle does when unsupported by a boot, and bearing the entire weight of the body. Boot-makers should help us in reforming our foot-gear by making the soles at least as wide as those of the foot itself, and by studying the anatomy of the foot with a view to adapting the boot to it, instead of suiting the foot to the boot, as is the usual plan. The result is frequently a busy manufacture of corns and bunions, to say nothing of deformed toes. Our feet are among our most useful servants, and they are often very vilely treated. They never, however, fail to protest in telling fashion.

Digitized by Google



is recommended by doctors.

Have you tried Osman Turkish Towels?

HIGHEST AWARD: "Grand Prix," Paris Exhibition, 1900, Two other Medals, and 15 Awards.

HIGHEST QUALITY!
PRICE MODERATE!!
WEAR GUARANTEED!!!

The "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWELS are made in small sizes for Face Towels and in larger sizes for the Bath-room, with knotted fringe or hem-stitched ends. Once you have used "OSMAN" Towels you will buy no others. The wear is guaranteed by the manufacturers.

BARLOW AND JONES, LIMITED,
MANCHESTER.

SOLD BY ALL THE PRINCIPAL DRAPERS AND HOUSE FURNISHERS THROUGHOUT THE EMPIRE.

HALL'S WINE THE MARVELLOUS RESTORATIVE.

Cures Neuralgia, Sleeplessness, Anæmia, Nervous Debility, and Physical Breakdown, and Tones and Fortifies the System generally against Disease. Convalescents after Influenza, Typhoid, Lung and Throat Affection, Smallpox and other serious illnesses are restored to perfect health by taking Hall's Wine.

It is no exaggeration to say its restorative powers are exceptional.
It acts like magic on people in low health.
Sold by most Licensed Grocers, Chemists, and Wine Merchants, 3/- and 1/9 per bottle.
Name and address of nearest Agent sent by return of post.

STEPHEN SMITH & Co., Ltd., Bow, London, E.

Digitized by Google

EVENING BLOUSES.

The two evening bodices here sketched are respectively very simple and rather elaborate. The first is made of tucked white gauze frilled round the shoulders and provided with long sleeves, also tucked and frilled. The second is made of soft white silk, spotted with any color and trimmed round the shoulders with a berthe of embroidered velvet. The velvet should match the spot on the silk. Turquoise blue embroidered with steel would be beautiful, or old rose velvet embroidered with mother-o'-pearl sequins of dull silver.

It is chiefly through books that we enjoy intercourse with superior minds. In the best books great men talk to us, give us their most precious thoughts, and pour their soul into ours. God be thanked for books; they are the voices of the distant and the dead, and make us heirs of the spiritual life of past ages. Books are the true levellers; they give to all who will faithfully use them the society, the spiritual presence, of the best and greatest of our race.—W. E. CHANNING.

A SERVANT'S LIFE IN BERLIN.

English maid-servants who complain of their lot, and pant for ever to go out walking with their young man, should know what has just been elicited by statistics about the condition of their class in Berlin. Wages in Germany were always low, and, though they have risen, even now they only reach about two-thirds of English wages. Then these women have no rights; their employers may do pretty well what they please. If a girl leaves her place before the time specified she risks a fine; if she refuses a place after having accepted it, she is liable to be fined, and, perhaps, get five days' imprisonment. Few of the servants have a room to themselves; many of them sleep anywhere—in the bath-room, the passage, or in the kitchen. Others inhabit garrets where the roofs slope so that they cannot stand upright. Sometimes the window only opens on to the staircase or into another room. In some places the sleeping apartments can only be reached by a ladder. Occasionally two or more sleep in the same room, which is also used for the storing of old things, lumber, dirty linen, etc. Certainly, the condition of our servants contrasts very favourably with those of Germany; in addition, the hours of work are less long.

FENCING FOR WOMEN.

There are growing signs that fencing is more and more becoming a pastime for women, and assuredly of all sports it is one which none can decry as unsuitable to the sex. For promoting grace of carriage, quickness of eye and movement, and working all the muscles of the body, fencing is about the best exercise a woman can take. It is because it affords such good exercise that it is so much to be commended to girls and women who live in towns and have few means of getting the necessary amount of muscular work which all need if health is to be taken into consideration. Fencing, like ping-pong, can be indulged in at home, and produces excellent results in a very brief time, whilst it has this great advantage over most sports which are good from an exercising point of view, that it is an eminently graceful pastime.

One of the surest signs of immortality is the fact that we attain nothing here for which we have longed and striven, but that it presently crumbles and loses its substance. So all desire is simply a passing on and on from symbol to symbol, until we shall at length be satisfied by grasping the reality.

Digitized by Google

Why is "Globe" Metal Polish to be found in use all over the United Kingdom, the Colonies, America—in fact, the World?

Because it works its way. Merit is its travelling ticket.

"Globe" Metal Polish contains nothing injurious to the skin, nor will it scratch or otherwise injure the finest metal-work.

"Globe" Furniture Polish is equally effective in its own sphere of usefulness; applied in accordance with the directions which accompany each box, there is nothing so effective for cleaning and renovating furniture.

"Globe" Polishes are sold everywhere; but should any difficulty be experienced in obtaining them, please write to Raimes & Co., Ltd., Tredegar Works, Bow, London, E., or Stockton-on-Tees.

Digitized by Google

EVENING DRESS.

The sketch illustrates a picturesque evening dress made of Pompadour English silk strapped with panne in such a way as to simulate a shaped flounce. The bodice is coat-shaped, and is composed of velvet in a bright tone of old rose, matching the tint of the principal flowers on the silk. The coat is also strapped with panne, like the skirt, and has rather a full basque. The collar and sleeves are turned back with Irish lace, and the silk muslin vest is headed with a vandyke of similar lace. The belt and neck velvet are both black. The skirt would be lovely in painted chiffon and lace.

HIGH LEVEL BUSINESS.

The business man who regards his pursuit as a school of virtue rather than a sphere of selfish interests, who is daily studying its lessons of fidelity, integrity, and honour, will ever win its loftiest moral prizes. He may acquire a fortune or he may lose one; but in either case he will gain that which no wealth can bestow and no poverty take away—an unblemished name, an unsullied character, a fidelity to truth, and a conscious rectitude of purpose. These are the real treasures, pure and incorruptible, which the conscientious pursuit of business can bestow.

FLUSHED FACES.

Nothing is more unbecoming than a flushed face, and the consciousness of having to go through a whole evening with scarlet cheeks makes many a girl nervous and ill at ease. Washing the face in water as hot as it can be borne is a fair, but not infallible remedy. A refreshing preparation, chiefly made of cucumber, and widely removed from anything in the nature of a cosmetic, is admirable for keeping the cheeks cool and smooth during exercise of any kind. A great many girls really suffer by their unfortunate propensity to flush with excitement or exertion, and to remain obdurately crimson for hours. In the evening especially this is to be dreaded, for the whiteness of the uncovered neck shows up by contrast the hot cheeks.

ORIGINALITY NOT THE CHIEF THING.

Originality is not the greatest thing in the world. It is not the best thing for us to have, nor the thing for us to strive after. It is better for us to repeat a loving expression that we have said over again and again ever since we were children, than for us to use an utterly original expression that has not so much love in it. "Good-morning," "Good-night," "God bless you," "I love you," are not novel or original expressions, but they are all the better for that. They even gain in precious associations by their often repetition. Love is a thousand times more valuable than novelty or originality.

The people who help us most are those who make light of our achievements and have faith in our possibilities.

It is in the vexatious and humdrum duties of the home that our patience is developed. The way a man behaves when breakfast is late is a better test of his religion than is the way he behaves in church. It is comparatively easy to be sweet tempered when we have nothing to vex us, but to keep our hearts light and our faces bright 'mid the uninspiring labours of the home life, we must have the spirit of God dwelling in our hearts. Such living is possible. Not only is it possible, but necessary, if we would receive the greatest benefit from our religion, and live up to the fullest possible measure of our responsibilities. The Lord expects us to be true to Him in our homes during the week, as well as at church on the Sabbath, and we are not fulfilling His commands when we fail to live every hour of every day in accord with the high standard He has set before us.

Digitized by Google

Malloween

is a scientific combination of the best-known Antiseptics and Emollients for the Skin in conjunction with an extract of the Marsh Mallow, prepared by experienced Chemists on the advice of an eminent Specialist.

MALLOWEEN is consequently the best and safest preparation for improving and beautifying the complexion, as by virtue of its Antiseptic properties it promotes a healthy action of the Skin follicles, thereby rendering the Skin clear and smooth, whilst the action of the Marsh Mallow is extremely soothing and healing.

MALLOWEEN induces a most cooling and refreshing effect immediately following its application. It may be used alike in the Nursery as well as for ordinary Toilet purposes, with equally beneficial results.

The following are a few of the points wherein Malloween will be found to excel:—

It promotes a PERFECTLY HEALTHY SKIN.
It WHITENS THE HANDS, and effectively REMOVES REDNESS and IRRITATION OF THE SKIN.
It checks EXCESSIVE PERSPIRATION in any part of the body.
It removes PIMPLES and other SKIN BLEMISHES, such as FRECKLES, [BLACKHEADS, &c.
It defaces WRINKLES.
It quickly RESTORES COMPLEXIONS which have been destroyed by common Cosmetiques.

Price 1/6, or (twice the quantity) 2/6 per bottle, post free.

Malloween Toilet Powder.

The difficulty of obtaining a really good Nursery and Toilet Powder led the proprietors of MALLOWEEN to secure the services of the Physician from whose formula MALLOWEEN is prepared to give them his advice in the preparation of a Powder which would be truly beneficial to the Skin, and not injurious.

Unlike other Toilet Powders, MALLOWEEN TOILET POWDER can be applied to the most delicate Skin without fear of injury. It will not clog the pores, and thereby produce that patchy appearance which is so disfiguring, nor will it, in young children, especially young babies, set up an irritation which causes so much discomfort to parent and child.

Price (Pink, Cream, or White), 1/6 per Box, post free.

TESTIMONIAL AND REPORT ON MALLOWEEN

From DR. ARCHER FARR, Late Medical Officer of Health, Lambeth.

THIS IS TO CERTIFY that I have carefully tested samples of MALLOWEEN submitted to me for analysis, and find that it is prepared from the Marsh Mallow as its basis, in conjunction with the best known Antiseptics and Emollients for the Skin. It is a scientific production, and in my opinion most efficient for the purposes for which it is recommended, viz., for Improving the Complexion, for Defacing Wrinkles, and for promoting generally a healthy action of the Skin.

(Signed) ARCHER FARR.

Of all Chemists, Druggists, &c., or will be sent Post Free on receipt of stamps direct from the HOLME PREPARATIONS CO., 34 & 35, Norfolk St., London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A TRAVELLING CLOAK.

Long travelling cloaks are just now very fashionable, while they can be made of fur or of cloth. The former, however, is far too expensive for most folks' purchase; therefore let us content ourselves with a really good cloth of black, chocolate brown, or biscuit colour. This may be lined throughout with some dainty shot silk, or, better still, some inexpensive fur. A good idea is to have the whole coat lined throughout with silk. Then a small jacket piece of fur, reaching to the hips only, should be loosely tacked into position, so that it may be quickly removed when the weather gets warmer and brighter, and so in no way interfere with the ordinary cloak lining provided. Collar and revers, as shown in the sketch, or even a cape-like piece of fur, add not a little to the dainty appearance of such a mantle, while, for such purposes, astrakhan or mink will be found the most serviceable trimming.

THE CROWNING OF THE QUEEN.

It is an interesting fact that in the Anglo-Saxon period of our history the wife of the reigning Sovereign could not legally wear a crown of state. But we have a record of the first Queen Consort who was crowned Queen, namely, Judith, the wife of Ethelwulf, King of Wessex. Ethelwulf, being apparently a man of some force of character, called together his Parliament to legally sanction the Coronation of his Queen. Parliament proved agreeable, and the ceremony was duly carried out, the young Queen being anointed and crowned. The greater part of the service in this early ceremony is preserved, and there is little doubt that some of it will be incorporated in the coming Coronation Service of the Queen Consort. Matilda, the wife of William the Conqueror, was crowned at Winchester, and on this occasion William, who had been previously crowned at Westminster Abbey amid bloodshed and tumult, was recrowned. She went to the Cathedral Duchess of Normandy, surrounded by Norman followers. She returned to the Coronation banquet Queen of England, and was henceforth served by the English. Of Henry VIII.'s Queens only two, Katherine of Arragon and Anne Boleyn, were crowned. The third, Jane Seymour, would have received this honour only the plague was raging round the Abbey.

THE QUEEN AS POULTRY-KEEPER.

The Queen is the first poultry-keeper in the kingdom, and a regular exhibitor and prize-winner at all the great shows. One of her favourite varieties is the Silkie, a quaint little fowl with wonderful white plumage of silky texture. They are said to be excellent mothers for rearing pheasants, and are much in request at Sandringham. The Queen also has some of the tiniest and smartest bantams in the country, and their excellence from a show point of view is proved by the number of prizes they win.

There is nothing a man of good sense dreads in a wife so much as having more sense than himself.

It is seldom that a man loses his temper, even under the greatest provocation, without having cause, sooner or later, to regret his want of self-command. There are few of our fellow-creatures so unimportant that it is not worth while to conciliate them, none that may not some time have it in their power to inflict on us an injury.

Digitized by Google

FED ON "FRAME-FOOD" FROM BIRTH.

"FRAME-FOOD"

is especially suitable for INFANTS, however young, who are

DEPRIVED OF MOTHERS' MILK,

and for Invalids.

It is the MOST EASILY DIGESTED and MOST NOURISHING FOOD on the Market.

Sold in 16-oz. Tins, 1s.

FREE TEST. ¼-lb. Sample Tin of "FRAME-FOOD," or 5-oz. Sample Jar "FRAME-FOOD JELLY," sent free on receipt of 3d. to pay postage; both samples sent for 4d. postage.

Please mention "Temple Magazine."

FRAME-FOOD CO. LTD., Battersea, London, S.W.

27 YEARS' SUCCESS.

THE

UNIVERSAL REMEDY FOR

Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, Influenza, Whooping-Cough, Hoarseness, &c.

Owbridge's Lung Tonic

IMPORTANT NOTICE:

SUBSTITUTION. — There are so many imitations of this successful, and therefore popular, remedy that it is of the utmost importance you should use the word "OWBRIDGE" when buying Lung Tonic, and TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

Sold everywhere in bottles at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s 6d, & 11s.

COPYRIGHT.

Myra's Journal

MARCH No. Now Ready.

PRICE THREEPENCE.

AN ALBUM . . . . OF FASHION.

48 pages, over 100 designs.

INCH TAPE MEASURE.

Cut out Pattern of

The Latest Cycling Skirt.

THE CHEAPEST AND BEST FASHION PAPER

MYRA'S JOURNAL,

The Leader of Fashion.

THREEPENCE MONTHLY, OF ALL BOOKSTALLS AND NEWSAGENTS.

BEETON & Co., LTD., 10 & 11, Fetter Lane. London.

TO ASTHMA SUFFERERS

INSTANT RELIEF is gained in all cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, CROUP, and WHOOPING COUGH by the use of

POTTER'S DATURA ASTHMA CURE

Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists, in Tins at 1s. each Free Sample sent on receipt of Post Card to POTTER AND CLARKE, Artillery Lane, London, E.

TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications respecting Advertisements for this Magazine must be addressed to

Messrs. H. DAWSON & Co.,

34, NORFOLK ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

By Royal Appointment.

THOMAS TURNER & CO. MAKE THEIR OWN STEEL.

ENCORE RAZOR

SEND FOR FREE LIST OF CASES

Hand Forged. Extra Hollow Ground. Carefully Set. Guaranteed Perfect. See "Encore" on Shank.

IVORY ... 6s. 6d. | BLACK ... 4. 6d.

Send for Free List of Cases. From all Dealers, or write direct to Makers, T. TURNER & CO., Suffolk Works, Sheffield, who will supply through nearest Agent. Ask for "Encore" Pocket and Table Cutlery.

Digitized by Google

CHILD'S FROCK.

The sketch shows a child's frock in the ever useful blue serge. The skirt, which hangs from a yoke, is arranged in box-pleats. The girdle is kept in place by passing underneath these pleats as in a Norfolk jacket. The collar and turn-back cuffs are of cream or blue silk, trimmed with straps of satin ribbon.

GIVING BETTER THAN GETTING.

No true love, no right service for another, is ever lost. Even if the one for whom it was intended fails to appreciate it, or to receive its full benefit, the one who gives the love or renders the service is uplifted and ennobled by its outgiving. What right-minded person can regret that he gave love, even though it was not returned, or that he did a service which was not acknowledged? After all, there is even greater gain in loving than in being loved, in serving than in being served, and it is ever more blessed to give than to receive.

A man should not place happiness as the sole aim of his existence; he should strive to win honour and distinction, to benefit his fellow-men, and, above all, to fulfil his duty, with no higher reward here below than his own approval.

TIARAS AT THE CORONATION.

That tiaras are to be worn by the peeresses at the Coronation is the cause of undoubted satisfaction. The days when these were trying and unbecoming ornaments are past, and one has only mentally to recall a gala night at the Opera to know how imposing and stately they are. That the order for them to be worn will do much good to jewelers is doubtful. Most of our peeresses possess tiaras, some of them no doubt old-fashioned, but these very few. There may be some re-setting, and there will be much cleaning of family jewels, but the greatest cause for pleasure in the definite order is the gain to the display on the historic occasion. Peeresses, it is reported, are troubled in mind as to the becoming disposal on one head of a tiara and a coronet. Indeed, it seems somewhat difficult, especially as modern tiaras are crown-shaped, and a coronet poised on the top of a crown of jewels seems rather odd to the mind's eye. Women are very clever, however, and a way out will be found. Of course it will be but for a moment that coronets will be donned. Perhaps if peeresses poise them over their heads just for that moment it will do.

SCIENCE AND THE SUPERNATURAL.

Science, so far from annihilating the supernatural, has demonstrated it; every great scientific work confesses it. And if it were true, which I cannot admit, and some day hope to disprove, that science to-day has discredited the supernatural in the Bible, it has only been by showing that the Bible itself is supernatural. That a creature sprung from a piece of protoplasm, like man, should have lived to write this Book, and have thought such thoughts, and seen such visions and cherished such inspirations, or that should have grasped God and have communed with Him, as they do commune, should have lived in Him and died in Him, unblenched by the shadow of death, and their heart unshaken by the wrath of the world—this is all unexplained by any natural laws, and is literary supernatural and cannot be explained by any science, so-called, except by the supreme ancient and modern science—theology.—R. F. HORTON, M.A.

The performance of small duties, yes even of the smallest, will do no more to give temporary repose, will act more as healthful anodynes, than the greatest joys that come to us from any other quarter.

Digitized by Google

HOVIS

TRADE MARK.

Most Family Bakers make and deliver HOVIS daily. Should your Baker not make it we shall be pleased to send you the addresses of our local agents.
HOVIS, LTD., Macclesfield.

NOTE.—No loaf is genuine unless stamped "HOVIS."

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE GRAND BABYLON HOTEL. By Arnold Bennett. Second Edition.

JUDAH PYECROFT, PURITAN. By Harry Lindsay, Author of "Methodist Idylls."

A BLOW OVER THE HEART. By Robert Machray.

THE CAT'S-PAW. By B. M Croker. With 12 Illustrations by Fred. Pegram. Second Edition.

FAN FITZGERALD. By H. A. Hinkson, Author of "O'Grady of Trinity."

THE OLD BANK. By William Westall, Author of "With the Red Eagle."

THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.

POCKET VOLUMES, printed upon fine thin paper. Pott 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net each.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. By Charles Reade.

"IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND." By Charles Reade.

THE DEEMSTER. By Hall Caine.

UNDER THE GREENWOOD TREE. By Thomas Hardy.

FAMILIAR STUDIES OF MEN AND BOOKS. By Robert Louis Stevenson.

NEW ARABIAN NIGHTS. By Robert Louis Stevenson.

THE LIFE OF THE FIELDS. By Richard Jefferies.

NEW SERIES OF TWO-SHILLING NOVELS.

Bound in PICTURE CLOTH BOARDS, Flat Backs.

HIS OWN GHOST. By D. Christie Murray.

SPORT AND SPANGLES. By Byron Webber.

ST. KATHERINE'S BY THE TOWER. By Sir Walter Besant.

PLOTTERS OF PARIS. By Edmund Mitchell.

TOWARDS THE ETERNAL SNOWS. By Edmund Mitchell.

THE TEMPLE OF DEATH. By Edmund Mitchell.

THE WATERS OF EDERA. By Ouida.

THE LUCK OF GERARD RIDGELEY. By Bertram Mitford.

A CRIMSON CRIME. By Geo. Manville Fenn.

IN A HOLLOW OF THE HILLS. By Bret Harte.

A SAPPHO OF GREEN SPRINGS. By Bret Harte.

DORA MYRL, THE LADY DETECTIVE. By McD. Bodkin, K.C.

THE RECORDS OF VINCENT TRILL, OF THE DETECTIVE SERVICE. By Dick Donovan.

DARK DEEDS. By Dick Donovan.

THE LADY FROM NOWHERE. By Fergus Hume.

IN LONDON'S HEART. By George R. Sims.

THE RED SHIRTS. By Paul Gaulot.

JOAN, THE CURATE. By Florence Warden.

CITOYENNE JACQUELINE. By Sarah Tytler.

A MODERN DICK WHITTINGTON. By James Payn.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Keystone Burgundy

Is the Perfection of Wine

Being FREE from ACIDITY and ROUGHNESS, and not EXCESSIVELY ALCOHOLIC,
It makes an Ideal Dinner Beverage.

Keystone Burgundy

Is an Absolutely Pure and Natural Wine, made from rich grapes grown on soil largely composed of Iron and Limestone.

Keystone Burgundy

IS DELICIOUS AND APPETISING.

Sold by Licensed Grocers, Chemists, and Wine Merchants everywhere.

Flagons, 2/-; bottles, 1/6; half-bottles, 10d.
Please write for name of nearest Agent.

STEPHEN SMITH & CO., Bow, London, E.

Digitized by Google

AN EVENING CAPE.

One of the newest evening capes is arranged with a pointed front, and the back also falling in a rounded droop. Such a garment must be by no means short, otherwise the style will be entirely lost. The best length is for the front points to reach within two or three inches of the knees, sloping up to some five or six inches shorter at the elbows, and drooping again rather longer at the back than it is at the front. Such a cape may be perfectly plain, of a good fine cloth, finished with handsome sable or mink collar. Again, a good glacé silk may be arranged in this fashion, a new and dainty notion being to cover the groundwork of the silk with rosettes of very narrow ribbon.

TAILOR-MADES.

As yet no very decided fashion has asserted itself among the tailors who cater for our sex. Broad stitched strappings, with medallions of velvet of a contrasting colour, make a smart gown. Panne is now being treated to resemble broadtail, and very beautiful dresses are the result, especially when trimmed with ermine. Blouses of sable are trimmed with Venetian point, and have handsome belts studded with jewels. Broad lace ties in the front are being worn with simple cloth skirts accompanied with the evermodish flannel shirt. Cloths are embroidered with leaves in satin appliqué, and trimmed with fur; and sometimes tufts of fur figure in the embroidery.

Buyers and Sellers.

Our business is to introduce buyers to sellers.

We have been engaged in doing this successfully for many years. Our friends admit that the results of our efforts on their behalf have been a large accession of buyers for their goods. They say, in short, that they are better off to-day than they were when first they made our acquaintance.

We should like you to be in their position. If you have an article of merit that people want, we should be glad to discuss with you our system of creating a demand for it by means of advertising, &c. It saves our clients' time, worry, and money.

The advertiser has a greater opportunity of selling his goods than a non-advertiser.

H. DAWSON & CO.,

34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Best Articles. Best Stories.

Best Pictures.

That is what . . .
EVERYONE IS SAYING OF

Volume V. OF THE Temple Magazine

NOW READY.

(HANDSOMELY BOUND IN RED AND GREEN CLOTH.)

TWELVE MONTHS' READING for 7s. 6d.

The most interesting and varied Magazine published.

Over Eleven Hundred Pages and not a dull one.

The Volume Contains—

TWO SPLENDID SERIAL STORIES

By DORA LANGLOIS and Mrs. BAGOT HARTE.

Scores of Short Stories and Special Articles.

Illustrated by some 700 Beautiful Pictures.

OUR CONTRIBUTORS INCLUDE Dr. Joseph Parker, Ian Maclaren, Rev. Silas K. Hocking, George Manville Fenn, Joseph Hatton, Adeline Sergeant, Mary E. Wilkins, Clive Holland, J. A. Hammerton, Leonard Graham, Lady Violet Greville, late Rev. H. R. Haweis, Lady Henry Somerset, Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, Rev. E. J. Hardy, Thekla Bowser, Rev. Joseph Hocking, Mrs. Hirst Alexander, Mary Angela Dickens, Hugh W. Strong, and many other well-known writers.

Of all booksellers or the Publishers, Messrs. HORACE MARSHALL & SONS, Temple House, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

Price 7/6. ✻ Price 7/6.

Digitized by Google

From Cradle to Crown:

KING EDWARD VII.

Is being Published in about 20 SIXPENNY PARTS. PART ONE NOW READY.

The Most Beautifully Printed and Illustrated

LIFE OF HIS MAJESTY

PRODUCED BY

MESSRS. GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.,

the Publishers of "Tit-Bits," "The Strand Magazine," "The Wide World Magazine," and many others of the most popular periodicals of the day.

The resources of their great establishment are being used to produce the best Life of the King that has yet been published.

HUNDREDS of ANECDOTES, HUNDREDS of INTERESTING INCIDENTS, and HUNDREDS of ILLUSTRATIONS.

WORLD - TRAVEL

Organised by

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D., F.R.G.S.,
W. HOLDSWORTH LUNN,
AND CONNOP F. S. PEROWNE.

CRUISE

on the Magnificent Ocean Yacht "ARGONAUT."

Tonnage 3,273, H.P. 4,000. Electric Light. First-class Cuisine.

Sailing as follows to* THE ADRIATIC:—

April 3rd to April 24th.—From Marseilles to Naples, Ancona (for Loreto), Venice, Trieste (for Miramar), Pola, Zara, Spalato, Klek (for Metkovic, visiting Mostar), Ragusa (for Lacroma) Cattaro (for Cettinje), Corfu and back to Marseilles. A Twenty-one days' Cruise for £26 5s. and upwards. Return Ticket London, Calais, Paris, Marseilles included.

This Cruise is under the auspices of the Co-operative Cruising Co., Ltd.

£10 10s., £11 11s., £13 13s. and £14 14s. TOURS to ROME, vid the Mont Cenis and St. Gothard Routes With Optional Extensions to Naples, Assisi, Perugia, Siena, Florence, Venice, and the Riviera.

£12 12s. 6d. TOURS to FLORENCE and VENICE.

Details of Seats for the Coronation and for the Coronation Naval Review.

Full Particulars from the Secretary—5, ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, EUSTON, LONDON, N.W.

Digitized by Google

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR MARCH, 1902.

			PAGE
I.	The Countess of Warwick	Frontispiece
II.	Lady Warwick and Her Work for Women. Illustrated.	Wilfred Mark Webb	471
III.	A Charming Fellow. Story	Mrs. J. H. Riddell	476
IV.	What Led Me to Become a Minister: Eminent Divines on Their Call to Preach the Gospel. Illustrated.		485
V.	The Mystery of the Watch Chain. Story	Grace Latham	491
VI.	A Worthy Successor to a Great Inheritance: A Sketch of Rev. Thomas Spurgeon. Illustrated.	Rev. Maurice Snelgrove	498
VII.	The Tenant of Grove Cottage. Serial Story. Chapters XXIV.-XXVII. (Concluded.) Illustrated by Chas. D. Ward.	Adam Lilburn	503
VIII.	Some Famous Sunday-Schools	Geo. A. Wade	514
IX.	In the Public Eye. Illustrated.	The Onlooker	518
X.	Curious Offices Held by Women in the Past	Charlotte Carmichael Stopes	528
XI.	A Tradition of the Simplon. Story	Max Pemberton	533
XII.	The Women Students of Oxford. Illustrated.	Kent Carr	537
XIII.	A Man of Moods. Story	K. Murray Eliot	542
XIV.	The Salvation Army Officer. Illustrated.	W. Bramwell Booth	549
XV.	Literary Jottings	J. Cuthbert Hadden	558
XVI.	Why Life is Worth Living	Rev. J. Hirst Hollowell	560
XVII.	For the Bairns	Rev. J. Reid Howatt	562

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All manuscripts and drawings must be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes, or the Editor cannot promise their return. They must be addressed, THE EDITOR, "TEMPLE MAGAZINE," WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, CARMELITE STREET, E.C.

Contributions accepted for "In the Public Eye," are paid for at the uniform rate of 5/- per paragraph including portrait. All photographs, which must be non-copyright, are returned.

Business Communications and Orders must be sent to MESSRS. HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, TEMPLE HOUSE, TEMPLE AVENUE, E.C.

Letters relating to Advertisements must be addressed to MESSRS. H. DAWSON AND CO., 34, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE TEMPLE MAGAZINE will be sent by post each month, to any address, for an Annual Subscription of 8s. Binding Cases can be purchased from the Publishers for 1s. 6d.

Sold everywhere in 1d., 2d., 3d., 6d. and 1s. Tablets, 6d. and 1s. Croquettes.
Sole Agents (trade only): S. J. MACKENZIE & CO., LTD., LONDON.

No More Chapped or Rough Skin!

"BEETHAM'S Regd Larola"

will very soon remove all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, CHAPS, IRRITATION, &c., and render THE SKIN delicately SOFT, SMOOTH, and WHITE. Try a 6d. bottle. Its effect will delight you! Bottles, 6d., 1/-, 2/6, of all chemists.

Makers—M. BEETHAM & SON, Cheltenham.

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT MAGAZINE FOR SUNDAY AND GENERAL READING.

AMONG the Illustrated Articles in THE QUIVER for March is one entitled "AND YE CLOTHED ME," which describes the work of various organisations in the Metropolis which have in hand the special task of clothing the ragged. The VICAR OF BURTON-ON-TRENT gives a number of instances of "PREACHERS' DILEMMAS," and MR. E. BRUCE LOW tells the story of the Covenanters of Scotland, one of his series of papers on "HEROES OF GOD." MRS. W. K. CLIFFORD writes an interesting and chatty paper on journeyings "IN THE AUSTRIAN TYROL." There are instalments of the two Serials by S. BARING-GOULD and DAVID LYALL. The DEAN OF GLOUCESTER writes in his usual able manner on "WHAT I SAW IN THE CATACOMBS," and the REV. A. J. HARRISON, the well-known missioner, contributes an article on "CHRISTIAN FAITH." The number also contains four complete stories, one of which is specially suited for young readers, and a new hymn tune is given.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD., LONDON; and all Booksellers.

THE MARCH QUIVER

NOW READY,

Price 6d.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THE COUNTESS OF WARWICK.

Who advocates Practical Instruction in Technical Education for Women.

Photo by [W. Grove, Brompton Road.

Digitized by Google

LADY WARWICK AND HER WORK FOR WOMEN.

By WILFRED MARK WEBB.

IT has rightly been said that while many educationalists were content to talk about their subject, Lady Warwick set to work and did something to fill the gaps in our system of teaching. Lady Warwick's labours have in a great measure been directed towards the educating of those who wish to get their living in the country on the land, and her undertakings—at least those which have the largest scope—seek to provide useful employment for women. In pursuance of the last mentioned idea Lady Warwick was, a short time ago, the proprietor of a shop in London in which the output of her school of needlework was systematically disposed of. The school in question was carried on at Bigods Hall, near Dunmow, and was attended by the country girls who lived on the Easton Lodge estate. This property was inherited by Lady Warwick from her father, Viscount Maynard, upon whose death the title became extinct.

The writer well remembers a pleasant visit to Bigods Hall when, under the guidance of the founder of the school, he was enabled to watch the many lasses as they sat round a great table and busily plied their needles. He also saw the buildings erected for Lady Warwick's Rural Secondary School, which was almost, if not quite the first of these institutions to be established in England and still remains one of the few, which it has been pointed out may well serve as object lessons to the country at large. Bigods Hall is now the boarding-house in connection with this establishment, which is carried on as a "School of Science," as defined in the regulations of the Board of Education. It follows, therefore, that there are good laboratories in the school buildings, where such subjects as chemistry, physics, and the study of plants and animals can be carried on practically. Furthermore, there are workshops for wood and workshops for metal, together with a kitchen used for teaching purposes, while one of the attractions for the guests at the prize-giving last summer was the recently opened model dairy with its fittings complete.

A WINNER OF FIVE PRIZES.

The pupils are boys and girls between the ages of twelve and seventeen years, and their ranks are not recruited to any appreciable extent, as might be supposed, from elementary schools. For the first two years the education imparted is intentionally of a general character, but it is one in which a training in science forms (as it should do in all schools) an important branch. In most educational establishments, sad to say, science is still treated as if it were a subject like geography or history and the time allotted to it in the time-table is in proportion with this antiquated idea. To obtain the valuable training which a knowledge of scientific methods alone can give, a pupil must practise them for himself and this necessitates a comparatively large expenditure of time.

Digitized by Google

A CORNER OF THE OLD WALLED KITCHEN GARDEN—THE GIRLS ARE STORING TENDER PLANTS IN THE COLD PITS.

After the second year at Bigods a more agricultural bias is given to the work, and half the time-table is occupied with agriculture and horticulture, dairying as well as the keeping of poultry and bees. There is no farm attached to the school, and many of those who are in a position to form an opinion upon the subject are not inclined to recommend the addition of one, but frequent visits are paid to those in the neighbourhood and a great deal is made of the experimental garden —an acre or more in extent. Here, the chief plants and their varieties used for crops are grown and new sorts are tested. Besides this, experiments in the use of artificial manures are carried out and others demonstrating the theory of crop rotation similarly arranged.

There is already a staff of five teachers under the direction of the Principal, Mr. E. E. Hennessey, B.A., B.Sc., whose subjects are agriculture with dairying, mathematics and English, drawing, wood work and metal work, domestic training, and gardening. To science pure and simple, among other things, the Principal gives his attention. This high state of efficiency has been reached in the short time which has elapsed since Lady Warwick planned out the main idea in 1897. In elaborating the scheme she has had the benefit of the advice of Professor Meldola and the sympathy of the officials of the old Science and Art Department, now merged into the new Board of Education. The Essex County Council Technical Instruction Committee has also contributed a modest grant of money, and several neighbouring landowners have offered annual scholarships, while important fittings such as the fire engine on the workshops are the gifts of those interested in the success of the undertaking.

The Lady Warwick Hostel at Reading is but a part of its originator's agricultural scheme for women with its registry and information bureau and the Woman's Agricultural Times for an official organ. The latter is issued every month under the editorship of the Countess of Warwick. This scheme was first mooted by Lady Warwick in the Christmas number of the Land Magazine for 1897, in an article entitled "Women and the Future of Agriculture," which opened with the following words:—

The increasing pressure of our female population into every channel of employment is, perhaps, of all our nineteenth century problems that which confronts us with the greatest difficulties. And only second to the problem in its national urgency is the continuous catastrophe of agricultural depression. If, therefore, it were by any means possible to discover profitable employment, and employment upon the land for very large numbers of women, such a project as this might, indeed, take rank among the supreme triumphs of social science.

Digitized by Google

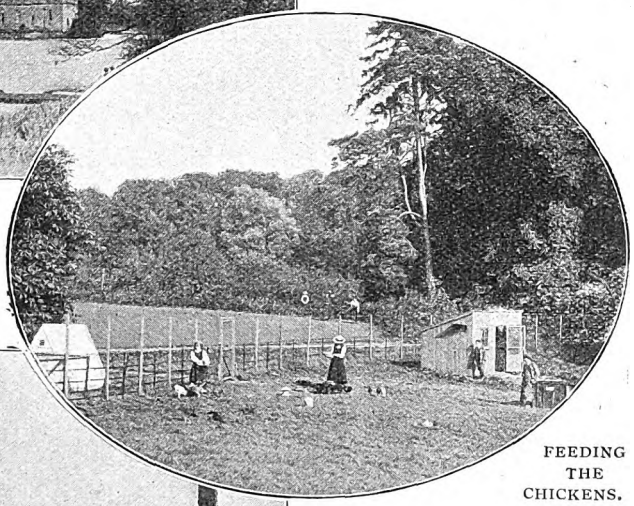
In furtherance of this brilliant idea, Lady Warwick proposed to open an Agricultural Training College for Women, and to establish Women's Agricultural Settlements in different parts of the country.

WARWICK CASTLE.
The Beautiful Home of Lady Warwick.

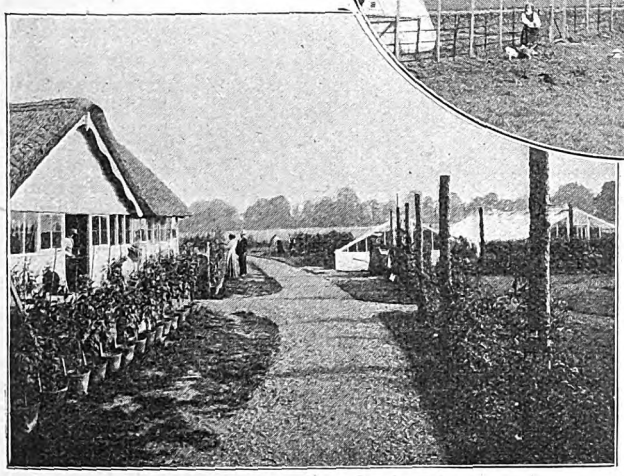
With regard to the first project—in August, 1898, the Lady Warwick Hostel was started at Reading to accommodate twenty-four women students. The great expense of maintaining a full college staff was obviated by an arrangement whereby part of the work was done at Reading University Extension College. Shortly afterwards Brooke House was taken as a residence for fourteen additional students, while within the year Maynard Hostel was acquired to provide for sixteen more. In May, 1900, two large greenhouses were erected, and a pair of six-roomed cottages were added in September of the same year.

The Women's Settlements have of necessity had to wait until there was a supply of trained students available for carrying them on. This is now becoming the case, and several have already made application to start work during the present year.

Returning once more to the Hostels at Reading,



FEEDING THE CHICKENS.



IN THE ROSE GARDENS AT READING

we find that the students, who are the daughters of professional men, and over the age of sixteen, get most of their theoretical instruction at Reading College during the morning, though the consummation of Lady Warwick's ideas will see the whole of the work done at a Women's Agricultural

Digitized by Google

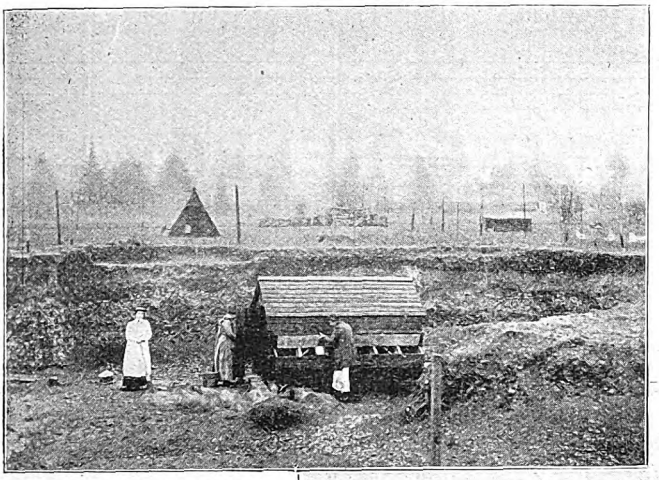
College. Similarly practical butter and cheese making are learned at the British Dairy Institute. As, however, there are sixteen acres of land and some three or four hundred feet of glass houses available in connection with the Hostel, it is possible to carry on practical work there in horticulture, as well as poultry and bee-keeping. There is also a marketing department, in which the special training required for this important branch of the work can be obtained, and another dealing with preparation for colonial life has recently been added. It is very interesting to spend an afternoon in the grounds of the Hostel. Here the girls may be seen looking after the chickens and working in the open air at the general operations of gardening, or occupied in the houses with flower or fruit culture. The growing of mushrooms is also carried on with much success, and at the time of writing a most satisfactory crop is to be found in the dark house specially set apart for this branch of horticulture. This house, it may be said in passing, was most useful as a temporary dark room in which to change one's photographic plates on the occasion when the pictures illustrating this part of the article were taken.

BOYS AND GIRLS AT WORK IN THE DAIRY—CHURNING AND BUTTER-MAKING.

A two years' course is the minimum, and little difficulty has been experienced in obtaining posts for those students who have been through the curriculum. Three or four have been chosen to fill appointments at the Hostel itself, others have become instructresses in dairying or horticulture, dairy or poultry managers or gardeners, while others, again, have started in business for themselves. Not the least interesting are the cases of students who have agricultural property of their own, and take back with them a practical experience which must be of great value. There seems, however, to be considerable likelihood that, unless the whole scope of the undertaking be enlarged, students will soon have to be turned away. At present there are about fifty, or nearly the maximum that can be accommodated.

Lady Warwick says that her scheme is not philanthropic, and that it is why it has not appealed as it ought to do to the women of this country, who are ever nobly generous in the cause of charity. She thinks, however, that it is quite as noble and certainly as practical to help women to help themselves; to educate and advise and launch efficient skilled workers who will, independent of others, earn the right to their place in the community. There is no likelihood of the property now in use at Reading being purchased, as it is valuable for building upon; but there is no doubt that when the funds for the completion of the scheme are forthcoming, a neighbouring landowner will part with some of his property upon special and most generous terms. It is to be hoped that the experimental stages of the work will soon be past, and that all the teaching will take place in one institution, a condition of affairs which must remove many difficulties and objections quite as obvious to the promoters of the scheme as to those who critically regard its actualities rather than its possibilities.

Digitized by Google



ATTENDING TO POULTRY HOUSE.

We must pass over with but brief mention the Agricultural Association for Women, which first saw light in February, 1899. Its members are all those, both men and women, who are interested directly or indirectly in agriculture, horticulture, or rural industries. Its useful registry is however confined to women who are dairy teachers, gardeners, florists, or otherwise occupied with agricultural work in its widest sense. It must be borne in mind, however, that the suggestion throughout the whole scheme is that women should be trained in order to fit themselves to take up the lighter branches of agriculture. In the pages of the Women's Agricultural Times many telling and useful articles have appeared. In some of the early numbers there was a tendency to depreciate the value of the scientific side of horticulture which, in these days of technical education, was rather a pity. A practical training in any industry by itself is all right, so long as things go smoothly and no originality is required, but once let difficulties arise the need for the training if not the facts gained from science work is at once apparent. One of the criticisms passed upon the present education system for the army is that it does not encourage that initiative which is such a necessity for an officer.

Another and important work into which Lady Warwick is throwing herself with her usual energy and enthusiasm is the organisation of an exhibition of all branches of nature-study work, which it is intended shall be held in London during the coming summer. We will not attempt to discuss what nature study is or is not, but simply say that for the present purpose it means eveything connected with the teaching of country lore or rural industries, and the result of practical work and experiment. The efforts of any educational establishment may be represented, and doubtless prizes will be offered for collective exhibits and for the work of a single pupil, for competition among elementary and continuation schools, those coming under the heading of secondary as well as Home Office and Poor Law Schools.

THE GIRLS ARE ADEPTS IN THE USE OF THE SPADE.

At the present time, when the Board of Education has followed the suggestion of the Agricultural Education Committee, and is doing all it can to give country children, more especially, some interest in the knowledge of the animal and plant life around them, an exhibition of this kind must have a special value and importance. Moreover, County Councils are striving to train existing teachers for the work and the Government is providing for those who will become teachers opportunities to gain the proper qualifications.

WILFRED MARK WEBB.

Digitized by Google

A CHARMING FELLOW.

By Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.

"ALL I hope is the poor dear won't go into a decline." These words might have been addressed to the chandelier which signally failed to light a large drawing-room in Leinster-terrace, to a huge mirror over the white marble mantelpiece, to a grand piano—"Erard's very best," as Mrs. Broxdaile often assured all and sundry—to a group of palms and ferns, which lent some grace to a rather dreary apartment; to any one, or anything, in fact, save the quiet-looking gentleman who, with "self-made" writ large all over him, sat beside a shaded lamp reading the Engineer.

Nevertheless, it was he who, laying down that most admirable, though not amusing, journal, "in which," Mrs. Broxdaile said, "his life was wrapped up," asked:

"Why should she do anything of the kind?"

"If you remember, her Aunt Sophy went off that way."

"I thought she died of measles?"

"So the doctor said; but measles wouldn't have hurt her if she hadn't got into a low state of health fretting about a young man across the sea before she took them."

"Eva has had measles; therefore you need not be uneasy concerning her," replied matter-of-fact Mr. Broxdaile, which common-sense answer elicited the startling rejoinder:

"Ben—Ben—I always knew you could be stubborn as a mule, but I never thought to find you hard as the nether millstone."

"How have I been hard?"

"How? Why, just look at that sweet child pining and dwindling away under your very eyes; fretting ever and always; her silvery laughter silent; scarcely a smile to be seen; hardly a word to be got out of her—and all because you won't let her marry the man of her choice."

"My dear wife, I don't prevent her marrying the man of her choice. This is a free country. In a very few months she will be of age, and then she can marry any man she pleases; that is, supposing he pleases to marry her."

"But how are they to marry without money?"

"That is a question Mr. Sidney ought to have asked himself before he proposed."

"How was he to know you would refuse to give her any fortune?"

"Why should I give her a fortune?"

"Why?" replied Mrs. Broxdaile, dropping her knitting as she spoke. "Isn't she your only child? the only one left out of seven? Have you ever denied her anything till now? Has she not been dearer to you than aught else in the world? When a baby, if she had cried for the moon, would you not have striven to bring it down to her? And now—and now——"

"She is crying for a husband instead of the moon, which I could not have got for her had she cried for a year."

"And you won't give her the husband she has set her heart on."

"Most certainly I will not. As I said just now, she can marry Mr. Sidney in a few months without any consent of mine if he likes to take her, but I utterly decline to give her a dowry, which is all the man wants. If he had not known I was fairly well off, we should never have heard a word of this nonsense."

"Mr. Sidney has lots of rich relations."

"Then let them find the sinews of war. I never will."

"And he such a perfect gentleman—Mrs. Vennett's own words—and you know she kept a school for the first in the land."

Digitized by Google

"I do not care what she kept. I say the man's an imposter and a cad."

"Dear, dear, when he won't even let me open a door for myself. He's up like a shot the minute he sees me stir from my chair."

"Oh!" said Mr. Broxdaile, who could not be accused of erring in the way of excess as regarded such delicate attentions.

"And he is the best of good company. He can keep the room in a roar. As Mrs. Stark said no later than last week, nobody need hire professionals when privates can sing and act like him."

"I have no doubt he can act a part very well. I only wish he had refrained from giving proof of his powers in this house,"

"Ben, what has come over you? I have often heard you talk nasty; but I never did hear you speak so spiteful as about Mr. Sidney, who, as everybody, except yourself, declares, has not a fault—unless being too nice is one."

"I was not born in the purple, Susan, but I think I know a gentleman when I meet one."

"That is just what gets over me. Why is it you can't, or won't, see Mr. Sidney comes of the best in the land?"

"Unless I am greatly mistaken, Mr. Sidney cannot lay claim to any high origin."

"And his father in the 'Commons and Waste Lands' Office for six-and-twenty years."

"If he had been in it for six hundred and twenty, it would make no difference to me."

"Not when your only child's life is in danger?"

"I would rather see her in her coffin than married to Mr. Sidney—she'd be safe if she were dead; but I don't know what she might have to go through as his wife."

"Is that your last word, Benjamin?"

"Yes; if the girl wanted to take poison, I would not give it to her—and I am not going to help her to the man she has gone crazy about. As I said just now, I can't prevent the marriage, supposing they choose to marry; but I can refuse to throw hard earned money after a foolish daughter; and I do refuse, most distinctly, to let your friend have the handling of a shilling of mine. That is my last word, Susan, and I shall stick to it."

Whereupon Mrs. Broxdaile retired from the room in tears, and sought her pretty daughter, who wept freely when she heard—not for the first time—Mr. Broxdaile's stern decision.

"And when he sets down his foot," finished the foolish wife and mother, "wild horses could not make him take it up again," which was true; though it is only fair to add the "self-made" one rarely set it down without good reason.

"What Clement will say I'm sure I can't imagine," sobbed pretty Eva. "It really is too dreadful. I wish there was not such a thing as money in the world."

All very well in theory, but when the innocent child's soul longed for a "sweet bonnet," and a "just too lovely dress," she did not disdain the humble cheque, which speedily made unto itself wings.

What Clement said later on in the "snatched" interview, which was all the happiness Mr. Broxdaile's "peculiarities" permitted, may be summed up as follows:—

"Never mind, darling; I must only work the harder. The seven years seemed but a day to Jacob while serving for his Rachel, and love will make toil sweet for me. Of course, my father will do all he can. He is not a millionaire, however, alas! If he were—but there ——" He lapsed into a silence which pointed, more eloquently than words could have done, the mental and moral difference that existed between Mr. Stephen Sidney, late her Majesty's servant in the dead and buried "Commons and Waste Lands," and Mr. Benjamin Broxdaile, unjustly singled out by Fickle Fortune as a fit and proper person to receive many good things.

"You are a hero," said Mrs. Broxdaile. Pretty Eva said nothing, only held out her hand and looked at him with swimming eyes.

Then he kissed Eva, and Mrs. Broxdaile kissed him, an attention with which, under the melancholy circumstances, he could, perhaps, have dispensed. So the affecting interview ended. Mr. Sidney passed out into the night, thinking thoughts unnecessary to chronicle. Eva went to bed, and, spite of her grief, fell asleep, which young folks have a happy facility for doing. Mrs. Broxdaile returned to the dreary drawing-room, where she reproachfully regarded her husband, who, buried behind his paper, seemed unconscious of his wife's displeasure.

Digitized by Google

But his stolidity was assumed, for he loved Eva, and it vexed him to deny her anything—even so poor a thing as he considered Mr. Clement Sidney.

II.

In the early spring of that year business had called Mr. Broxdaile to America, and compelled him to remain there for eight months, during most of which period the house in Leinster Terrace was let—and Mrs. and Miss Broxdaile luxuriated in "foreign parts." They had, indeed, a delightful time, for Miss Broxdaile could converse in many languages; and although Mrs. Broxdaile understood only her own, and that imperfectly, she met with plenty of people able to understand and talk to her.

Money abounded, for Mr. Broxdaile was not mean, and the only unfortunate part of that long holiday proved its end. Agreeable things always do end, whereas there is a quiet persistence about the stay of unpleasant matters, which needs reform. Mother and daughter journeyed back leisurely to Flushing, where they took boat for Queensborough, at which port, being unaccustomed to travel, they experienced some difficulty with a large quantity of luggage.

The hour was early and they were late. They became confused and flurried, and would have lost their train or been separated from their effects had not "a total stranger taken all the trouble on his own shoulders," according to Mrs. Broxdaile, travelled up with them to Victoria, where he saw their possessions taken out of one van and safely put into another warranted to convey trunks, boxes, hold-alls, and various mysterious packages to the destination desired.

More than this, when they arrived at —— Street, "Lo, and behold!" to quote Mrs. Broxdaile's artless phrase, the same gentleman assisted them to alight, hailed a cab, saw everything was correct, told the driver where to go, refused the elder lady's invitation to accompany them to Leinster Terrace and partake of breakfast; but asked if he might call in the course of a few days and inquire if she and her daughter had recovered from the fatigue of their disagreeable journey.

This was the beginning; the end can be imagined by anyone familiar with the foolishly trustful way in which some individuals make, not merely acquaintances, but intimates of utter strangers.

Mr. Sidney in due time called and was received by Mrs. Broxdaile as though she had known him from his infancy. Every circumstance he omitted to tell her on their journey through pleasant Kent concerning his family, his position, his antecedents, his hopes, he managed to recount on the afternoon when he availed himself "of the lady's kindness." Other visitors dropped in. "Fortunate always," he thought, for from them also he won golden opinions.

"He is perfectly charming," said Mrs. Wellman to her daughter, as they wended their homeward way to Finchley Road, a statement repeated by so many persons during the next few weeks that the song of praise swelled into a chorus which, proclaiming Mr. Sidney to be "handsome, distinguished, delightful, attractive, amusing, well-informed, courteous, highly-bred," and many other things of a like sort, sunk into pretty Eva's heart and caused it to throb with joy and anguish—joy that "he should be considered such a paragon," anguish when she remembered how unlikely it was he should ever, ever, ever deign to think of her who ever, ever, etc., would think unceasingly of him.

Which only proved how foolish a little maiden her father's darling was; in fact, the most foolish, romantic, unselfish, loveable little maiden who could have been found in the length and breadth of London. She had no more worldly sense than a baby in arms, which was only natural, remembering her bringing up.

Through her brief life she knew few save weak women and sentimental girls, heard little except stupid uninteresting gossip and silly love talk; read nothing more elevating than the sensational and unreal tales which beguiled her mother's far too abundant leisure, and did not think much of anything beyond the prince destined to come, the castle to which he would take her, and the fairyland wherein they would dwell for ever after!

Which was the fault as much of clever Mr. Broxdaile as of his certainly not clever wife. Unknown, perhaps, to himself, the former held the Oriental faith that women should be kept in seclusion, at all events as long as possible, and this faith had its root deep down in all that was most tender and most chivalrous in the self-made man's nature. His daughter was the last and best dream left to him out of the many delusive visions that had cheered him on to worldly success.

Digitized by Google

His wife he loved as well as, perhaps more than ever, but that dream was now a prosaic reality. His wealth was real enough, it is true, but, though he once believed wealth alone capable of conferring happiness he believed in that delusion no longer. He had dreamt dreams concerning sons, who were to help him in his business and carry his name to greater heights than he had ever aspired to climb, and behold, one after another, six sons were born only to go in their tender infancy where earthly titles are of no avail, and money is as naught.

Then she, the little Eva, came and did not die, but stayed to fill the home with happiness and sing her childish songs and play with her doll and kitten, at "Merrie Islington"; to run out and greet "da, da," to grow into girlhood and go to school and practise scales and play her little tunes to "father," and be sent abroad to learn languages, and return to lighten the Leinster Terrace house, and be altogether the sweetest and most irresponsible creature who ever committed the great mistake of falling in love with the wrong person; while her male parent still persisted in wandering through the Egyptian wilderness of regarding her as a child who, one day, might be asked in marriage by some good young man of his own type, not above his station, yet ambitious—some good young man who might be made first a knight and then a baronet, and then——?

Such is the stuff, not altogether unsubstantial, modern commercial dreams are made of, but which, judging from results, often does not prove more satisfying than the gossamer threads of those romances that have come down to us through the ages.

Let, however, the material be worth what it might, Mr. Broxdaile was in America shaping a serviceable garment, "warranted to please" everybody, out of it the while his daughter was pledging her troth to a total stranger.

From the moment Mr. Sidney courteously offered his services, her poor little heart had fluttered out to "the charming fellow," as Mrs. Broxdaile's connection soon called him.

Tremblingly, at the end of five weeks, she confessed his love was returned. Without any trembling at all Mrs. Broxdaile accepted him jubilantly as a future son-in-law.

"But it's only fair to tell you," said that worthy lady, in a burst of frankness, "I'm nobody; it's my husband you'll have to do with. I have no authority to speak one way or the other."

Mr. Sidney said he was not at all daunted; he knew he could satisfy Mr. Broxdaile. Though he had not the income he could desire he should soon have it. Very shortly he would be able to place his darling in the position that was her right. Now that he had Mrs. Broxdaile's approval he would write to Lord Barnfield and Sir Theodore Megwell, two of his father's kind old chiefs, and tell them of the happiness looming before him. Either could answer any questions Mr. Broxdaile might think needful to ask, as also Dean Alperton, and, he might add, the Bishop of Rutland, who had known him nearly all his life.

"As I always told you, dear Mrs. Broxdaile," finished Mr. Sidney, who was "nothing if not straightforward," "though I have little money, I have heaps of friends."

"Indeed you have," answered the good lady, "and they are better than money."

"It is very kind of you to say so," he laughed. "Still, if Heaven had been pleased to give me the choice I fancy I should have preferred money."

"There you go," said Mrs. Broxdaile merrily. "You are just like all the men."

"I assure you I am not," returned Mr. Sidney, with more truth than his mother-in-law-to-be supposed. "Nevertheless, I hope you will write soon and inform Mr. Broxdaile there is for me but one woman in the world, and that is—his sweet daughter."

"He'd best see you first, and then he'll be as much pleased as I am."

To which opinion the speaker adhered with such persistence that Mr. Sidney's heart often misgave him as to what the result might prove to be. He grew so uneasy, in fact, that at last his fears found expression in such sentences as:

"I cannot tell what I dread, but I do wish that interview were over, as I never wished anything before in my life." Or: "O darling, if we could only walk quietly to church one morning and return man and wife!" Or: "Supposing your father should not like me, and refuse his consent?" "Dearest, if we were but married and the matter beyond recall."

Digitized by Google

To which, and many similar remarks Mrs. Broxdaile would reply:

"There is no need to be uneasy; Mr. Broxdaile will like you, never fear." And Eva: "Father is the best father in all the world. He has never refused me anything."

Which was quite true; but then she had never asked before for a husband, and this was probably the reason that, as the time of Mr. Broxdaile's return drew near, mother and daughter became so palpably nervous. Mr. Sidney shook in his shoes, and referred more than once to the "good old days, when valiant knights were wont to carry off their lady-loves and so set cruel parents at defiance."

All unconscious of the surprise awaiting him, Mr. Broxdaile, eager to see his family as soon as possible, left the Cunard boat at Queenstown and travelled viâ Dublin to London, where he arrived tired, but happy, one evening when Mr. Sidney was "basking" in that bliss he had never enjoyed till made free of the Leinster Terrace drawing-room.

When Mr. Broxdaile departed for America he sailed from Liverpool; therefore, Mrs. Broxdaile made sure he would return by the same route. Had she not felt so positive about this matter Mr. Sidney might not have been "sunning himself" in the eyes of his beloved when the self-made man suddenly appeared before his astonished family.

Talk of "a skeleton at a feast," of Banquo's ghost, of apparitions! Why, any number of spectres could not have produced greater consternation than the sight of poor Mr. Broxdaile, who, entering his own drawing-room, sure of a cordial welcome, was greeted by a shriek from his wife and the sight of an almost fainting daughter, supported by a total stranger.

It is often said "matters arrange themselves," and, as if to prove the truth of this axiom, matters did arrange the dreaded explanation that night with a vengeance.

Mrs. Broxdaile was the first to speak.

"Lor! how you did frighten me, Ben," she exclaimed.

"So it seems!" Ben answered grimly.

"Why could you not have sent a line or a telegram?"

This time Mr. Broxdaile made no reply—perhaps he was thinking, "quite as well I did not."

"Terrifying the poor child too!"

"Evans wanted to announce me, but I thought I would give you a pleasant surprise! It was inconsiderate, perhaps."

There was such a dry irony about this remark that Mr. Sidney felt as though iced water were running down his spine. He had placed Eva in an easy chair, and, feeling his presence might, under the circumstances, be considered de trop, would have modestly retired had not Mrs. Broxdaile interposed with: "Pray don't go, Mr. Sidney. Ben, this is a gentleman we have become acquainted with since you went away."

Mr. Broxdaile bowed, Mr. Sidney bowed and timidly put out his hand, which the former did not seem to see; at all events, he did not take it.

"I am sorry to have intruded on a family meeting," said the charming fellow nervously.

"Thank you; but my return was, as you see, quite unexpected."

"I really must be going," declared Mr. Sidney, as Mr. Broxdaile moved across the room to speak to his daughter.

Mrs. Broxdaile raised a warning finger, and intimated by a grimace that her lord and master "had a very bad pain in his temper," but she only said aloud:

"Well, if you must be off—good-night. I hope it won't be long before we see you again"—a speech meant more for the benefit of Mr. Broxdaile than her departing guest.

The conversation which ensued that night after Eva, with a nervous headache, had sought her room, need not be set down. It can quite as well be imagined as described. Suffice it to say that, after a series of equivocations, Mr. Broxdaile eventually managed to extract the naked truth from his wife.

"He'd question the dead out of their graves," she subsequently declared to Mr. Sidney. "He ought to have been a lawyer, that's what he ought to have been." A statement which did not greatly comfort the disheartened lover, who knew he would soon be under the harrow himself.

Mr. Broxdaile did not say much to his wife, but what he did say was to the point. He would see Mr. Sidney.

"And I could not get another word out of him. I know no more than that piano," referring to Erard's chef d'œuvre, "what he has in his mind," commented Mrs. Broxdaile.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Sidney thought he knew, but imitated the "self-made" one's reticence.

The momentous interview, however, passed over quietly. Mr. Broxdaile did not storm, or reproach, or express astonishment—the aspirant for Miss Eva's hand would have felt more satisfied had he done any of the three.

With one leg crossed over the other, his elbows resting on the arms of an easy chair and the finger-tips of his right hand lightly touching the tips of his left—his favourite attitude when "at attention"—he listened to all Mr. Sidney had to tell, and reserved his decision.

In London it is tolerably easy to get to know most things without calling in the aid of a detective, and Mr. Broxdaile ere long learnt everything which concerned his daughter's suitor.

When he had done so, he wrote declining the honour of the proposed connection.

Immediately there ensued a very bad time in Leinster Terrace. Mrs. Broxdaile might have been Xantippe herself, so admirably did she act the part of that celebrated matron. Many, many vials of wrath did she pour on her devoted husband's head, but he took no notice of her angry words—only tried to forget them.

It was harder to deal with Eva, who clung to his knees, weeping, and piteously asked why she might not marry Clement.

"I thought my daughter loved and trusted me," he said, taking her in his arms and kissing her tear-stained cheeks.

"I do, I do," she said, "but I love Clement too; I shall die if I am parted from him."

"And yet six months ago, you did not know such a person was in existence?"

"I never really lived until I met him," sobbed the girl.

It was on the evening before the eventful day Mr. Broxdaile "topped" a long course of "disagreeableness" with his "cruel letter of final rejection," that the conversation duly recorded in Chapter One took place. Then Mrs. Broxdaile was in an excited, irritable state of mind; but when Mr. Sidney, after being forbidden the house, ceased to call or make any sign, she became like one insane.

"How you must have insulted the nice creature!" she fumed. "He wrote to me he could not, with any respect to himself, ever enter your doors again."

"He had better not."

"But what did he do to be forbidden the house?"

"He wanted my daughter, or rather the fortune he thought I would give her."

"And he'll marry her yet, fortune or no fortune, or I am much mistaken."

"I think not."

"Then your only living child's death will lie at your door."

Mr. Broxdaile turned away. It was a sore trial. He did not wish to tell his wife the causes which influenced his decision—moreover, he was well aware even had he done, they would not have convinced her reason, because she possessed none!

He talked kindly and rationally to Eva, but without producing the slightest impression. The girl's heart was gone, and her body seemed as if it were going too.

"Plenty of people, as good as you, and better, too, are glad enough to have Mr. Sidney at their houses, though you did turn up your nose at him," Mrs. Broxdaile broke out one evening. "Mrs. Wellman met him at General Holmwood's, where he was the life and soul of the party."

"Then he is consoled. There is an heiress among the Holmwoods I believe?"

"Really, I wonder to hear you talk in such a way—and that poor dear girl broken-hearted upstairs!" retorted Mrs. Broxdaile, beginning to cry as if her heart were breaking also.

"What can I do—what ought I to do?" thought the much tried gentleman. "If Holmwood's ward goes crazy also about the fellow, there will be a nice kettle of fish; but didn't old Lancewell tie up the money in some extraordinary way?—yes, he did, I feel almost positive. To make sure, however, I'll go to Somerset House to-morrow and take a look at the will."

He need not have given himself the trouble, for old Lancewell's granddaughter had not the slightest intention of throwing herself away.

She thought Mr. Sidney pleasant and amusing; she liked his singing and comic recitations, also hearing him "make believe," as she said, "to have fallen in love with her all the while he was inconsolable for the loss of that Miss Broxdaile she heard was so pretty."

Meanwhile, Mr. Sidney's circle of desirable acquaintances was steadily widening. People do not, as a rule, in London, inquire too curiously into the antecedents of a man who is good-looking, well dressed, agreeable, apparently destitute of non-desirable relatives—possessed of sufficient money to hire cabs, tip servants, and, in a word, ape the ways, manners, and doings of those in receipt of goodly incomes, and, really—as many people said later on—Mr. Sidney was such a charming fellow, they never thought of asking where he came from.

Digitized by Google

And if they had the result would have been just the same. Most men, as a rule, take other men at their own valuation, till the valuation is proved false. So men—and especially women — took Mr. Sidney, till, from the humble foundation of Mrs. Broxdaile's favour, he grew as big as the fabled frog—then, unhappily, he burst!

It all came about in this way. Of course everyone knew, even his latest acquaintances, that he had been very badly used. "Invited, urged to visit Leinster Terrace, asked, in fact, to fall in love with the daughter, and then in a moment, cast adrift because, forsooth, he could not count down guinea for guinea with Mr. Broxdaile, who had risen from nothing—a fact of which Mr. Broxdaile seemed rather proud than otherwise. Mr. Sidney, from the beginning, had been perfectly straightforward"—thus Society chattered—"and taken a rational view of the whole matter. He loved the girl to distraction. He had family, she money—what could any sensible man want more?" But, in effect, Mr. Broxdaile was absurd enough to want more, that the affair was at an end. "He wished to see his daughter a countess—a most ridiculous idea!" gossip went on, simply because someone had said, Mrs. Broxdaile said, Mr. Broxdaile would not hear of the match because his daughter's delighted suitor was only the son of a younger son."

"Mr. Sidney behaved admirably," thus the talk ran; "though he had been dreadfully insulted he spoke in the nicest manner of the 'nouveau riche' who would not welcome him as a son-in-law. Anyone could see how the blow had told. He was too brave and proud to show what he felt, but his high spirits were all put on. Watch him for a moment when off guard and notice the sadly anxious expression of his face." With much more to the same effect, for, though society does not approve of love matches that involve the appearance of poverty on the doorstep, it dearly loves a love-tale, which is the reason, perhaps, for the axiom, that all stories should end with the joyous clamour of wedding bells.

Poor Mr. Broxdaile! What he suffered during the months which followed his dismissal of Eva's charming young man, no words could tell.

His wife regarded him as a "cruel tyrant." His daughter grew pale, thin, and spiritless. She remained in Leinster Terrace for her lover to marry if he liked, but apparently he did not like, and that, also, was imputed as sin to the unfeeling father. "He had been too sorely insulted," Mrs. Broxdaile declared again and again, and still Mr. Broxdaile held his peace.

He did not want to ruin anyone. No word of his should hasten the inevitable end; therefore he possessed his soul in silence and patiently waited to see what Time would do for him.

Perhaps it was this patience that induced Time to hurry a little, or it may be that the old enemy considered Mr. Sidney had gone far and fast long enough, and ought to be stopped.

Succeeding socially beyond his wildest expectations, mounting rung after rung of society's ladder he found himself one evening singing his very best at a party where statesmen, wits, beauties, millionaires, and a fair sprinkling of lesser human lights were gathered together. His song was a great triumph, the last he ever had! As he rose from the piano and moved towards the inner drawing-room, he accidentally jostled a gentleman who had just arrived and was standing beside the folding doors.

Always courteous: "I beg your pardon," said Mr. Sidney, but before the words were well out of his mouth the other had turned and exclaimed:

"Hil-lo!" not in a friendly or pleased manner, but in a tone of utter amazement.

It was Mr. Sidney's employer, Mr. Cawaller, the head of that great City house in which Mrs. Broxdaile believed her future son-in-law would shortly be a partner.

Even had time or warning been vouchsafed to him the Charming Fellow could scarcely have brazened the matter out, and as things were he avoided all questions and the slightest explanation by getting out of the room and the house as quickly as possible.

Digitized by Google

Without showing his hand Mr. Cawaller made some few inquiries about the "gentleman who sang," and—drew his own conclusions, which took him to the City next morning somewhat earlier than usual.

Mr. Sidney did not appear, and when sought for at his lodgings the information given was that he had been suddenly called to Ireland.

He must have changed his mind, however, for he was arrested at Brindisi.

Mr. Broxdaile knew nothing of this till he chanced to see in the Times that Clement Sidney had been charged at the Mansion House with embezzling various sums, altogether amounting, so far as was known, to nearly four hundred pounds from his employers, Messrs. Cawaller and Co., Billiter Square, E.C.

As there had not been time to go thoroughly through his accounts, he was remanded, bail being refused.

That evening, Mrs. Broxdaile, who had latterly said little concerning the lover question, chanced to recur to the vexed theme.

"Would Eva still like to marry him?" asked Mr. Broxdaile.

"Of course she would," answered his wife briskly, for she thought there was a tone of relenting in his voice.

"And you?"

"Just speak a word of consent and you'll see the proudest and happiest woman in England."

"I am not going to speak any word of consent. And if I were, I should like you to read this first," and he handed her the Times.

Whatever her faults might be, Mrs. Broxdaile was staunch to those she "took up," and honest exceedingly; therefore pitched so suddenly on the horns of such a dilemma she declared it could not be the same man.

"It is precisely the same man. There can't be two Clement Sidneys, aged thirty, clerk in the office of Messrs. Cawaller and Co., Billiter Square; two Clement Sidneys with good voices and pleasant manners, getting into decent society on the strength of their father having been for twenty-six years in the defunct Commons and Waste Lands."

Mrs. Broxdaile sat as if spell-bound for a minute, then she burst out reproachfully:

"And you knew him for a thief and would not tell——"

"I knew him to be a liar, not a thief. Indeed, if this report"—and he touched the Times—"may be trusted, he did not begin his mal-practices till he became intimate here."

"The wretch! But I can't believe it true; and he so nice and always spoke so beautifully."

"I gave him a chance," said Mr. Broxdaile, as if thinking aloud. "I told him I understood his reputed father, who I believed was worthy of all respect, had been for twenty-six years in the Commons and Waste Lands—but only as a messenger; that of the four gentlemen he had referred me to, Lord Barnfield and Sir Theodore Megwell, formerly in the Commons and Waste Lands, the former was dead and the latter a lunatic, that the Bishop of Rutland was paralysed, and Dean Appleton senile. After that I ventured to point out that, after all, truth was more likely to win the day than falsehood, and earnestly entreated him not to pursue the path of deceit any longer."

"And yet you would have let him pursue it as long as he pleased." She was thankful to find a hole in her husband's armour.

"I did not think, and do not think it was my business to unmask the man; and I pitied his father so-called—a good and loyal husband to a bad, faithless woman, who was singing at a low Music Hall, when he unfortunately fell across and married her. It is sure to come out in the course of his trial, so I don't mind telling you now."

"If you had told me at first it would have saved a lot of trouble."

"You would not have believed me" was the calm reply.

"And I can't now," she said, "He was such a charming fellow. Everybody thought him so."

"I did not," ventured Mr. Broxdaile—but then he was nobody.

"If he came from nothing," began the lady after a pause, which showed how the phrase had rankled and how good her memory was, "I'd like to know how he got his education."

"His father was an officer," replied Mr. Broxdaile, "who, till his death made the wretched mother an allowance which a maiden aunt continued by paying for this boy's schooling and clothing. When she died that stopped, but Lord Barnfield, who, before he succeeded to the title had been in the Commons and Waste Lands, got the lad a situation from which he worked his way to Cawaller's. There you have the whole matter in a nutshell, which, of my own good will, I should never have cracked."

Digitized by Google

A few nights later Eva was on her knees before her father praying and beseeching him to save Clement. Think of him—think of him in gaol!" she cried.

"Why, you do not mean to say you care for him still," exclaimed the amazed parent.

"No, but I did care for him. Father dear, do buy him out of wherever he is, and I'll try to get well and strong and never vex you about anything again."

"Are you sure, darling?"

"Quite—quite sure," and the dear arms clasped his neck, and the sweet lips touched his with a tenderness they had not done since he started for America, while a trembling voice said:

"Forgive me, father, for I am sorry."

Straight away next morning went the happy man to Mr. Cawaller, who proved hard as flint.

He had many clerks; he could not and would not withdraw the charge or say a word in mitigation of sentence. There was such a thing left in the world, he still hoped, as a sense of right and wrong, and he did not intend to weaken it.

The young man had sinned, he must take the consequences. His trial was to come on at the Old Bailey where, Mr. Cawaller trusted, he would be awarded a punishment likely to deter other young men from committing such offence.

In his heart Mr. Broxdaile believed the merchant prince had reason; nevertheless he returned home sorely grieved because he was unable to take any good news to his foolish, soft-hearted daughter. All he could say was:

"When he comes out, dear, I will help him to go abroad." Which he did.

. . . . . .

Eva is now a happy wife. She tells most things to her husband, but concerning the episode that so nearly spoilt her life she maintains a strict silence. Her husband knows all about it, but he keeps silence, and both heartily concur in Mr. Broxdaile's sententious remark:

"There should be sense in love and love in sense."

On the rare occasions when Mrs. Broxdaile refers to Mr. Clement Sidney she styles him "That Wretch!" instead of "A Charming Fellow."

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

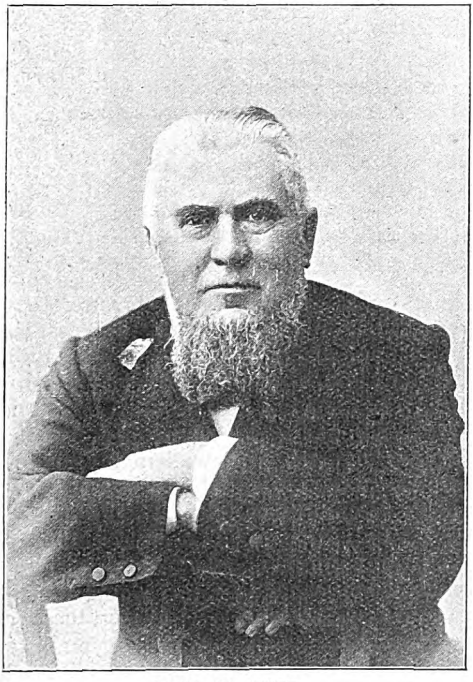
WHAT LED ME TO BECOME A MINISTER.

Eminent Divines on Their Call to Preach the Gospel.

By Rev. W. CUFF.

A SYMPOSIUM on such a subject ought to be both instructive and interesting to all who may read it. There are so many misconceptions, and wrong judgments on the matter. Not a few think and say that most of us who are ministers entered the ministry because we could not succeed at anything else. The old saying is still flaunted about, "Oh, he'll do for the Church, for he is the dolt or cripple of the family." If that was ever true it is false now, for I venture to think that there is scarcely a business or profession in which a man finds his level and his worth more quickly or more surely than he does in our Free Church ministry.

But however that may be, I say very frankly that I became a minister because I could not help it. I was converted to God when I was just twenty years of age. The change in my life was radical and complete, and altered my whole thinking and action. Plenty of my relatives and friends are living now who knew me well before and after the change came. There was no mistake about it. It was a clean cut from the old life to the new. I was in business, and doing very well, and was very happy and comfortable. The only books I possessed were the Bible and Bogatsky's "Golden Treasury." These I began to read with closest attention and regularity. Then a dear godly soul gave me Matthew Henry's Commentary. I began to read that and a new world opened up before my mind. The influence it had upon me was overwhelming. I soon lost all interest in the business, and yearned for books, and study, and someone to teach me. Everything else lost its charm.



REV. W. CUFF.
Pastor of Shoreditch Tabernacle, and ex-President of the Baptist Union.
Photograph by E. Debenham, Gloucester.

It was an accident that I began to preach. A business man in Cheltenham who was also a very acceptable village preacher asked me to accompany him one Sunday to a village called Uckington, where he was going to preach in an old thatched cottage. About six o'clock that Sunday evening we reached the place. There were about a dozen farm labourers and their wives in the cottage. At 6.30 the little service began. I gave out the hymns, and that was the first part I ever took in a public service. My friend gave a short address, and then said, "My young friend Mr. Cuff will now say a word to us." I declined, saying I could not do so as I had never tried to do such a thing. But he persisted, and I tried. The die was cast. From that night I heard and felt the call of God in my soul. Nothing could shake it off, and day and night it haunted me. The one thought was, "You must preach, and give up everything else, and devote your life to the service of Christ."

Digitized by Google

I was at once sent into the villages to preach in small chapels and cottages, and in the open air. The gift of speech seemed to come to me at once without an effort on my part, and I was soon preaching every Sunday, and every place I went to was crowded. But there came upon me a great mental darkness, that lasted on and off for nearly three years. I did not know what to do. Great searchings of heart mingled with the darkness of mind, and increased the perplexity as to what I should do. There was a good business; I was in it, and perfectly understood it, and could make money. Should I give it up for what might be only a dream, a disappointment, and a failure? On the other hand, there was the call of God in my soul, vivid, distinct, and unmistakable. About this I did not dream, neither was fanatical. I took time to brood over it, and think, and pray. I felt the deep solemnity of the step to be taken, and waited.

REV. NEWMAN HALL.
For many years Pastor of the old Surrey Chapel and Christ Church, Westminster.

Just at the time when I was at the most critical period, that I must decide what I would do, Mr. Spurgeon came to Cheltenham to preach at the chapel where I was a member. I heard him, and then all doubt and perplexity left me. A great burden was rolled off my soul, and all was calm, resolve, and peace. For good or for ill, failure or success, I would give my whole life to the ministry of the Gospel. All difficulties seemed to vanish one by one.

Then came more clearly and distinctly the thought of going to college for education and training. This had been on my mind for three years; but every door seemed shut. Now they soon opened, and the way seemed clear. In the church of which I was a member the old plan was rigidly adhered to of a young man preaching before the pastor and church before he could be recommended for the ministry. This I did, and I was put back for one year. At the end of that year I preached again, and was then set apart, though in no formal way. At the end of that second service, in the school-room, a good man patted me on the back, and said: "Well, William, so you will give up your business and go to college." "Yes, sir, if I can," was my reply. "Yes," said he, "and starve on forty pounds a year." That did not trouble me then; and up till now I have not starved on forty pounds a year.

Application was made to Mr. Spurgeon for me to enter his College. The papers were filled up and all questions answered, and a letter soon came, saying "Mr. Spurgeon will be glad to receive you into the College on such a date." I waited for the happy day to come, and was in my business up to the day before I left and came to London. All the rest has been hard but most blessed work. To-day I can say from the depths of my heart:

I would not change my blest estate
For all the world calls good or great.

Every man's call to the ministry may not be so loud or distinct as was mine; but surely one ought to be able to give a good reason for undertaking such an august and wonderful work as the ministry of the Gospel. When I was young I heard a good deal about "man-made and God-made ministers." The old-fashioned saints demanded the latter; and I now think they were right. The need of to-day surely is God-made ministers—prophets and teachers for the pulpit—lofty, mighty, meditative souls, with tongues of fire and hearts of love, to preach the everlasting gospel of the one unchanging Saviour. The saintly Dr. Doddridge wrote the following lines in 1736, and they are to the life:

Digitized by Google

'Tis not a cause of small import
The pastor's care demands;
But what might fill an angel's heart,
And filled a Saviour's hands.

The great and good Dr. Guthrie, refering to the ministry, says, "Of the man who has adopted the ministry as a profession as other men adopt the law, the army, or the navy, and goes through the routine of his duties with the coldness of a mere official; filled by him, the pulpit seems filled with the ghostly form of a skeleton that in his cold and bony fingers holds a burning lamp."

I can but breathe the prayer, May the Lord deliver our great Empire from such a pulpit official as that!

W. CUFF.

BY REV. NEWMAN HALL, D.D.

The chief impulse in prompting me to enter the ministry was a deepening sense of the supreme importance of proclaiming the Gospel and seeking to win souls to Christ. This supremely, and no ambition for worldly gain or applause. I felt that the humblest position in the work of preaching the Gospel would be a stronger attraction than any which the office of "minister" could hold out. I feel so still, and that there is no "Divine Call" apart from it.

NEWMAN HALL.

BY REV. F. B. MEYER.

I cannot remember the time when the bent of my mind was not towards the ministry of the Gospel. As a little boy my father used to take me to hear Dr. Brock preach at Bloomsbury Chapel, and I used to be deeply stirred by seeing the crowds of people and by his impressive utterance. It seems to me, however, that this was only the spark that ignited my spirit, which had from my birth been prepared by God for His holy ministry. This desire lay hid in my heart for many years. I do not think that even my parents realised how strong it was until the age of sixteen, when I first told my father. I shall never forget how, when I was quite a lad, and being very anxious to know whether the bent of my mind was in the direction of God's choice for me, I took a large piece of cotton wool and laid it out on a patch of the little plot which my father had given me in the large garden belonging to our house at Clapham, eagerly hoping that during the night it would be dry or wet, I forget which, to indicate, as in Gideon's case, what God's purpose was. This experiment was carried out entirely in my own way, and the secret of it was told to none. What finally led me to tell my father that my mind was made up was the falling open of my Bible, after protracted prayer for guidance, at Jeremiah I., where to my unutterable astonishment I found that Jeremiah also had been called from his birth to be a prophet of the Lord. Ever since then Jeremiah's career has been exceedingly interesting to me.

REV. F. B. MEYER.
Pastor of Christ Church, Westminster.
Photo by F. Gutekunst.

Digitized by Google

When men ask me to help them to diagnose their call to the ministry it always seems to me necessary to ascertain whether in their case also there may not have been a distinct summons as I had, and which positively refused to give me leave to take up any other line of life. This one thing I have done, and do.

F. B. MEYER.

BY REV. J. MONRO GIBSON, D.D.

When I was a boy at school I had no other thought than to follow the footsteps of my father, who was a minister of the United Presbyterian Church. This vague idea received very definite encouragement from my father's friend Dr. McCosh, then Free Church Minister in Brechin. But when I became old enough to make definite plans, it came across me with great force that neither father nor mother had said a single word in support of Dr. McCosh's suggestion. From this I concluded that for some reason they were against it. About the same time I began to realise what a struggle they must have to keep their family of seven children on a very small stipend; and I had the impression that if I were to devote myself to study it would mean an additional burden. This decided me to accept a kind offer from my uncle in Glasgow to take me into his office at a small salary, which enabled myself and my elder brother, who by this time was in receipt of what seemed the large sum of £30, to keep ourselves in Glasgow without any help from home. I was two years in my uncle's office; and though I was only the boy I did learn a little which has been of use to me since. But my heart was not in the work, and though I think I discharged all my duties faithfully, the hours I enjoyed were those I spent in study in the early morning and late at night. I had the Spartan idea, which was not uncommon at that time, that severity of discipline was good in every way, for health of body as well as of mind, and as we had to sail very close to the wind, instead of kindling a fire at five o'clock in the morning, I would put on my great coat, wrap a plaid about my knees, and sit till I shivered with cold. Moreover, I know now that I did not take enough nourishment. The result was that my health completely broke down. The change had been so gradual that those who saw me every day had not realised it. I can remember to this day my father's blanched face when he came to see me. I was taken home at once, and what a joy it was! Recovery was gradual but quite satisfactory, and during the time of convalescence I had long walks with my father and talks with my mother, in the course of which I made the discovery that they had both been very desirous that I should study for the ministry, but thought it was wisest not to say so. With the utmost eagerness, I dropped the idea of business and addressed myself with new vigour to my studies. From that day my health rapidly improved, and though I have had some very severe spells of work, it has never seriously failed me since. And so kind were the ways of Providence to me that I was able to earn enough to carry me through my whole course of seven years, four at the university and three at the Divinity Hall, not only without help from home or from anywhere else, but with ease and comfort.

I have confined myself to the circumstances which as it were hedged my way in. There were, of course, deeper things; but I have great difficulty in speaking about them. I am afraid that in these years the love of study was much stronger than the love of souls, and yet the latter was not wanting. I believe that all through there was the dominant desire not only to make the best of my life, but to render some service to the Master who had been so faithfully and lovingly commended to me at home, and whom I definitely, and I believe sincerely, confessed at fifteen years of age. But as I look back and see how mixed my motives were, and how much of selfishness was in my life, and when I follow the course of my ministry and think how much of the "wood, hay, and stubble" there have been in it, and so very little comparatively of the "gold and silver and precious stones," I feel thankful to recall the circumstances which do seem to have been an expression of the will of God that I should have been entrusted with a work of which I was and am altogether unworthy.

REV. DR. MACKENNAL.

Digitized by Google

J. MONRO GIBSON.

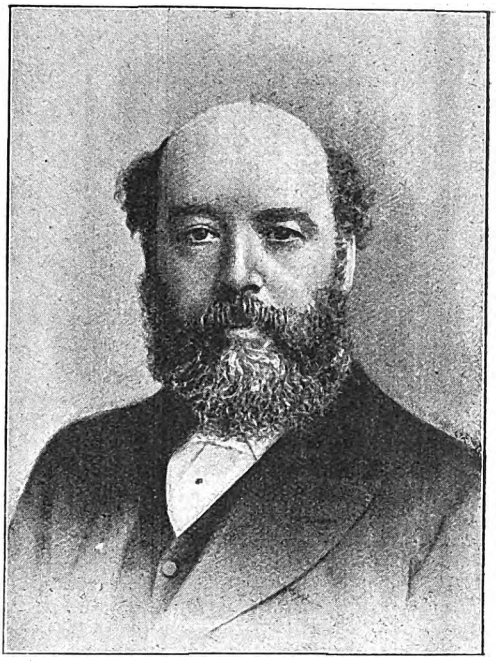
BY REV. DR. MACKENNAL.

My answer to your question, "What led me to become a minister?" is not according to the Evangelical tradition. I deliberately chose the ministry as a profession. I knew it to be the noblest service a man could render. I knew that it would overtax all my faculties and endeavours, and that only the grace of God could enable me to discharge its obligations; but I also believed that such powers as I possessed would be more usefully employed in it than in any other way of life. Nor were my motives either mercenary or ambitious—"let me live and let me work," that was all I asked. Often when I have been sitting on College committees and seen how applicants were tested as to their "call," I have felt that such a test would have excluded me at the beginning of my course, and would exclude me to-day. But I have had many an opportunity of reconsidering my position. I have had searchings of heart, and depression, and failure of resolve. And I have always come back to the conviction that I am where I ought to be; that every reason I have for being a Christian is also a reason why I should be a minister.

A. MACKENNAL.

REV. ALFRED ROWLAND, LL.B.

I was only in my sixteenth year when I left school, and like most boys of that



THE REV. ALFRED ROWLAND, LL.B.
Pastor of Park Chapel, Crouch End, and ex-President of the Congregational Union.

age, I had no definite preference for one calling over another. One thing, however, I had settled in my own mind, namely, that I would not be a minister. My father, wise man that he was, earnestly sought to discover any special gifts or tastes in me, but I did not appear to have any. After a long and memorable conversation on the subject of my future, he finally said, "Well, I will see if my old friend, Mr. Samuel Morley, will take you into his warehouse. A few years there will give you business habits, and they will be useful whatever you become." His friendship with the Morleys dated from an earlier generation, for he was a welcome visitor to old Mr. John Morley during his last illness. Happily for me I was accepted and approved by "Mr. Samuel," whose gracious friendship it was my privilege to enjoy to the year of his death. At that time it was customary for lads to enter the warehouse direct from school, and many of them, at the close of their apprenticeship, left for some other business or profession. Among them were lads of good education and considerable culture, so that the "Youths' Debating Society," with other similar institutions in the house, was well maintained. It was in connection with it that I first ventured to speak in public, and I soon connected myself also with the "Surrey Mutual Improvement Society," at Surrey Chapel, where Rev. Newman Hall was then at the zenith of his popularity. As often as possible my chum, Morell Blackie, and I took part in the meetings held in the old Surrey schoolroom, and thus we acquired a certain amount of facility in speech. Meanwhile I attached myself to the church in the Poultry, and was greatly helped in my religious life by its pastor, the Rev. James Spence, D.D. He was a tall gaunt Scotchman, dignified and courteous, a little difficult to approach, but very easy to love after one personal interview; and from the first he was kind to me on the few opportunities he could afford in his busy life. I became a teacher in his Sunday-school, then superintended by the brother of the Rev. Joshua Harrison, who continued to hold office when the school and church were transferred to the City Temple, nor did he leave it till he had served in that office for over half a century. In his last years he became a member of my congregation at Crouch End.

Digitized by Google

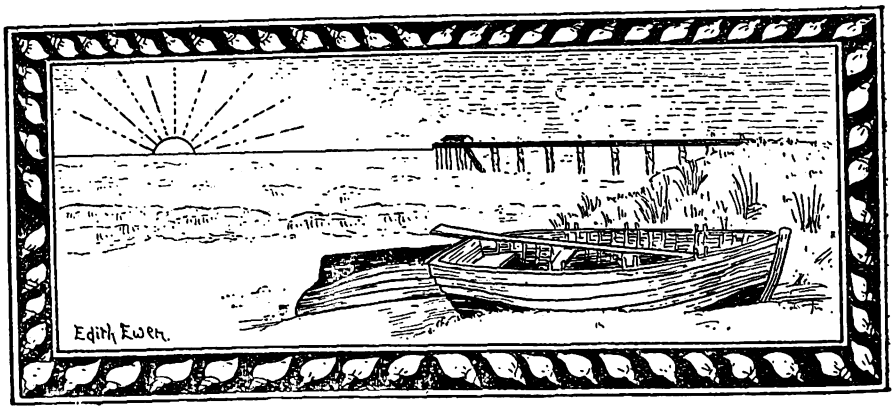
On one well-remembered Sunday afternoon I had to address the school, and did so with fear and trembling, for Dr. Spence himself was present, although he considerately hid his tall form, as far as possible, from the nervous speaker. It was to his encouraging words after the ordeal was over more than to anything else, humanly speaking, that I attribute my definite resolve to become a minister if the way opened up before me. I was introduced to Dr. Richard Alliott, then the Principal of Cheshunt College, who was good enough to interest himself in me. At his request I made analyses of Butler's sermons, which pleased him, and he urged me to enter Cheshunt as a student. But after my four years' residence in a large business house I had a strong preference for the non-resident system prevailing at New College, and accordingly applied for admission there. My father's friends — Revs. Thomas Binney, Joshua Harrison, and John Graham—gave me special welcome, and on their recommendation, together with that of my pastor, Dr. Spence, I was received by the Council, and shall always thank God for the fashioning of capacity and character by the professors and fellow students of my Alma Mater.

ALFRED ROWLAND.



Digitized by Google

The Mystery of the Watch Chain.

By GRACE LATHAM.
"Author of "O, Poor Ophelia."

TO many the great charm of London is the freedom to be enjoyed in it; other people are too busy to notice or interfere with you. But there is no place so utterly lonely if you drop out of the running through trouble, age, or weakness. There is no general society; your next door neighbours' name and appearance are scarcely known to you—indeed you might be buried before they found out you were dead.

The great exceptions to this are the children and the servants. Scraps of news spread from one area to another, get carried up to nurse, and curly heads whisper it all over again as they see the neighbours pass below.

Now, near Cavendish Square there is a street of irregular old brown houses, where there lives an American dentist, married to an English lady, and the happy father of four small children, who live in the airy third-floor nurseries, and keep a bright look-out upon the street below. At the time of our story they were most interested in a small gloomy house, which seemed to have squeezed its way in among the bigger ones by mistake.

It had a front door and one large window, two long ones in the drawing-room, two shorter in the bed-room, and two quite little ones in the attics; everything in it was scrupulously clean and intensely respectable. Here a Miss Jenkins led one of those monotonous lives which often fall to the lot of a lonely woman.

Slight and frail, she probably looked older than she was, being dressed, like most of her generation, very poorly and plainly, and having a hurried, tripping walk, giving the impression of feebleness and timidity. Every fine day she went out for about an hour attended by her maid; sometimes, rarely, she drove out, always with the same cabman. She kept two servants—one, whom nurse called Sarah, had been there as long as the children could remember, a tidy, rather good-looking woman, with a pale face and thin lips; the other was a girl who lived in the kitchen, and never stayed more than two or three months. There seemed to be nothing to call for remark, but, Margie, the dentist's eldest child, had woven quite a romance about the dull, little house. It was the entrance to fairy-land, Miss Jenkins was the fairy godmother, Sarah the bad fairy Kabbalistica, the little servants were naughty princesses brought there to be reformed, and Miss Jenkins was always trying to protect them from the severe Kabbalistica.

It was a great event when the children met Miss Jenkins and Sarah going into papa's operating room.

The little lady stopped, asked names and ages, and said they must come to tea some day; but Sarah snapped out:

"You'll miss your appointment, m'm, if you dawdle so." And Miss Jenkins hurried away with Sarah walking close behind her.

The invitation never came, but many stories were founded on the encounter, and on her curious watch guard—short lengths of thick gold chain, joined by large beads of carved coral—which she continually twisted round her fingers. It was enchanted, Margie declared, and so long as it was not broken that wicked Sarah could not hurt the fairy godmother.

It was the 14th of February, and Margie had been so naughty that when the others went down to father and mother, before the late dinner, she was left upstairs. Injured and unhappy she took refuge at the nursery window. The gas lamps were reflected on the streaming pavement, the postman was coming down the street; the dining-room blind in the fairy house was up, showing the table laid for tea. He stopped, giving the knock which means an answer. Instantly the fairy godmother opened the door—no one could mistake the slight, tremulous figure—took in the letter, wrote on a paper, gave it back to the man, who touched his hat and went on. Hardly had he done so when Sarah appeared, snatched the letter out of Miss Jenkins's hand, and banged the door. You could hear the clap in the nursery. What a disappointment to lose such an exciting scene.

Digitized by Google

But they reappeared in the dining-room! A violent quarrel was going on! Miss Jenkins tried to seize the letter; it fell to the ground. She ran towards it. Sarah caught her, threw her into a chair, kicked the letter away, and then rushed to the window and pulled down the blind.

The moment the next day broke, Margie crept barefooted to the window. The area gate was padlocked—Fairy Godmother had gone away. About two months later the street was thrown into a state of excitement by the news that the police had found a couple of drunken tramps leaving Miss Jenkins's dining-room window at four o'clock in the morning.

Where was the lady?

Nobody knew.

Who were her belongings?

No one could tell.

The story got into the papers.

In a day or two this produced Mr. Jenkins, the old lady's nephew, but he could throw no light on her movements; of late years, for no apparent cause, she had withdrawn from her family, not even answering letters. He was, however, able to give the addresses of her banker and solicitor, and then a curious state of things was revealed. For the last half year Miss Jenkins had been selling her securities, and drawing out her balance; the remainder, fifty pounds, had been sent her in ten pound notes on February 14th.

On leaving town she usually sent her plate and ornaments, which were of some value, to the bank, but this time she had not done so, or given notice of her departure to the police.

Two of the notes were traced to her butcher and baker, who told the same story, that late on February 14th Sarah Martin had come in, had paid what was owing with a ten-pound note, saying her mistress was leaving town, and wanted change.

"Did Sarah Martin usually pay the bills?"

Yes, always, and mostly with a note. "Oh, yes, she paid regularly, but her orders had been much smaller of late."

Matters began to look very queer indeed; three other tradespeople came forward to say they had cashed the notes making up the fifty pounds that same evening. Still no trace could be found of Miss Jenkins or Sarah.

To Mr. Jenkins and the police the state of the house was significant. The kitchen and dining-room had been left in disorder by the tramps, but the drawing-room and bedrooms were in perfect order, as though the family might come home at any hour. The plate-chest was found hidden in a lumber room and quite empty; the wardrobes were locked, but everything of value, like lace and fur—and Miss Jenkins had had a fair share of both—was gone. So were her ornaments; while a black mark on the wall was the only trace left of Gainsborough's portrait of her grandmother. It looked as if Miss Jenkins had quietly stripped the house and fled. But how could so respectable an old lady have so urgently needed money? What was the meaning of her flight?

It was at this juncture that the American dentist was laid up with a violent chill.

"Margie," said her mother, "go and sit with father and amuse him, don't let him fret over his work."

Now father was Margie's dearly beloved playmate and confidant, so that before she quite knew how or why, she was telling him all about Fairy Godmother and Kabbalistica's cruelty to her.

"What made you invent this?" he asked lazily, more to please her than from any interest in the story.

"I didn't invent it, it's true. Nurse always says that Sarah has a vile temper, and keeps Miss Jenkins in such order that she can't call her soul her own. The charwoman's daughter was cook there, and she told nurse. Besides, I saw Sarah beat Miss Jenkins."

"Beat her! When?" said the dentist quickly.

"On Valentine's Day. Mother would not let me go downstairs, and I saw Sarah

Digitized by Google

slap Miss Jenkins in the dining-room, and shake her."

"The day they went away?" said her father quietly.

"The day Miss Jenkins went away," corrected Margie, delighted by his interest. "I got up and looked out next morning when it was just getting light; the blinds were down and the gate locked, but I saw Sarah peep out of the front door, and when she saw me she went in again."

The American dentist was not too cautious a man to help a neighbour; he sent at once to Mr. Jenkins.

The charwoman's daughter proved to be an untidy, blue-eyed mortal, very willing to tell all she knew, but she had only been with Miss Jenkins a month, three years ago.

"Sarah was that aggravating that I wouldn't have stayed, no, not for three times my wages. Missus was a poor frightened creature. I've heard Sarah scold her till she cried for ringing the bell for the lamp."

"Did she ever beat her?"

"Not that I saw, but I heard her threaten to give her up to someone, and missus wouldn't never stir out of doors without Sarah."

"Did this sort of thing go on constantly?" asked the family solicitor, who was examining the girl.

"No, sir. Missus was mighty perlite to Sarah, and Sarah was mostly as sweet as 'oney to 'er. It was me as cotched it. Things was always gettin' lost, and I'd be blamed. It's my thinkin' Sarah could have told you more about 'em than me. They never kept a servant. Sarah didn't want anyone to know too much. That's my idea."

"Why do you say that?"

"Didn't I go to Sarah's workbasket for a pin, and didn't I find missus's gold thimble, that there'd been such a row about, and a pair of black silk stockings with missus's 'nitials 'arf took out? 'Where did you get 'em from?' says I. 'She give 'em me,' says she, 'and you cut back to your work, or I'll give you somethin' too.' If she ain't took 'em, they was 'ush money, they was."

This, however, was only a theory, and Mr. Jenkins steadily refused to entertain it; but the police clung to it as the only one which would fit the facts of the case.

The charwoman's daughter had heard of the place at a well-known registry office; its books were examined by the police, and furnished a long list of girls who had lived with Miss Jenkins. The proprietors said she had the character of being a kind mistress, but that Sarah Martin could do anything she liked with her, and was said to be a violent-tempered woman, very unpleasant to those under her. The last girl, Alice Groves, had, however, stayed for the unusually long time of four months. She had not been seen at the office since she paid her fee, but the milkman said she had taken in the milk on the 14th of February, and had told him she was leaving that night to go out to Canada to her brothers.

"Every clue we seem to get breaks off short in our hands," said poor Mr. Jenkins, "but my wife is coming up to-morrow, and she may help us."

Mrs. Jenkins was a bright-eyed, bustling little woman, with a surprisingly accurate memory for trifles. She was taken over the house in which Miss Jenkins had lived, and at once missed a quantity of little ornaments.

"Why the Battersea enamel candlesticks are gone, Fred," she said, "and where is grandmama's watch?"

"What watch?"

"Why the one with the enamelled case, and the shepherdess on the back. Oh, yes, I see the Gainsborough is gone, but where is the painted fan that used to hang under it? I wonder if Sarah left a box behind her."

"My dear, we have looked through it," returned Mr. Jenkins, who was somewhat overpowered by his wife's energy.

"Yes, but perhaps I might recognise things a gentleman would forget," said Mrs. Jenkins diplomatically, and the police-officer in attendance instantly led the way upstairs.

In the little front attic, under the hard, grey light of a sunless London spring, the two boxes and chest of drawers which had belonged to Sarah Martin were opened.

First came a layer of the usual servants' prints, then some plain dark clothes, then——

"That's auntie's black silk damask mantle with the Mechlin lace; I remember the pattern. Oh, yes, Fred! roses—wild roses with a spray connecting the sprigs. I always thought it so ugly and so handsome; and the white lace, so old maidy!"

"She might have given it away."

Digitized by Google

"She might, but it's not the sort of thing one gives a servant; though dear aunt would give the gown off her back if she thought anyone else fancied it. Oh, yes, Mr. Constable, but a woman knows a woman, and I tell you it is quite impossible dear auntie would ever have had a secret in her life. Why, she could not keep one for five minutes."

The officer turned away silently, as one who has a conviction but will not express it, and lifted a little square parcel out of the box!

"Why, there's her turtle-shell box she was so fond of. Fred, you remember nothing! Smell it! She kept a bottle of attar of roses in it, and her thread for mending lace."

The little lady chattered on, recognising one thing after another, while the heap of Miss Jenkins's things grew higher, and the policeman's note-book fuller.

"There's not much doubt where the plate went," he said, with a grim smile.

"Isn't it strange, if Sarah stole these things, we have not found the plate too?" said Mr. Jenkins, one of those amiable people who refuse to believe in the guilt of a fellow-creature.

"That went to the melting pot, it was too risky to keep; she'd say this was given her."

While his wife added with supreme scorn

"My dear, can't you see that everything here is what a woman would like to keep for her own use? Though I can't think how she could be so stupid as to leave it where it was sure to be found."

"Had to make a bolt all on a sudden," said the constable.

"Sarah had, perhaps," cried Mrs. Jenkins, "not my aunt. If you had seen her you would know it was impossible, and we who knew her gentleness, her unselfishness, her——," for the man's tone had betrayed more than he meant.

"Excuse me, m'm; it will be explained, no doubt, but what's become of Miss Jenkins? Ladies like her don't go away and leave no address; not as a general thing. Then there are no marks of a struggle downstairs, no stains, nothing!"

"Stains!" echoed the lady, and then she stopped short.

With the denseness of those who have little imagination, and live very much in the present, she had taken in the fact of her relative's disappearance without realising that there were only two possible explanations of it—flight or murder—but with characteristic courage she faced the situation.

"You think," she said slowly, "that my aunt has some secret which Sarah knew, and had to be paid for keeping, and that the letter which the little girl over the way saw delivered was connected with it."

"Yes, m'm."

"And that the money she drew out was re-invested somehow, so that she and Sarah could live elsewhere."

"Yes, m'm."

"Well, I don't believe it. I had rather think my poor auntie was murdered than that she ran away like that."

"I am afraid whatever you like to think, my dear, won't alter matters," remarked Mr. Jenkins; he was annoyed and pained by the discussion, and, though of his wife's opinion, wished to stop her tongue.

Returning to her work she laboured steadily on, and when the last drawer was empty, she raised herself, drawing a long breath as though to shake off fatigue. The sun had come out, and was pouring into the attic—a yellow, glaring sun, shining through fog, dust, and dirty windows. She was thinking what she would not give to bring the murderer of the kind old lady to justice. Unlike most attics, this one was fitted with shutters, lifting out of a casing below the windows. These casings had been covered with paper which matched that of the room, while the flaps closing them had been painted, so that they only looked like deep window sills; but as Mrs. Jenkins stood there, her eye was caught by a tiny bit of sewing cotton sticking out from the flap, and touched by the rays of the sun so as to become visible. Then she remembered the old shutters. With a quick impulsive movement she opened the casing, and tried to pull one up, but it would not move; only after much knocking and coaxing was it taken out; then the policeman thrust down his arm, and brought up three reels of cotton and a pincushion.

"That's auntie's; it used to be in her travelling work-box," whispered Mrs. Jenkins. "What else?"

The next thing was the tiny inlaid box itself, which had been carefully fitted into a corner to allow room for the shutters; it still contained a carved ivory thimble.

Digitized by Google

"If she didn't take her work-box, she certainly never went away!" cried the lady.

"Sarah might have taken a fancy to it," said the officer, but his tone was eager, as though he expected some fresh development; and the next find, of no less than thirty-five empty purses, he seemed to be much interested in.

"Where did Sarah Martin come from?" he asked.

"I don't know; I fancy my aunt got her through an advertisement."

"Do you know if, when she went out, she went by omnibus?"

"Yes; at least her friends lived a long way off. Why?"

The man seemed not to hear, he went to the other window, and pulled at the shutter; here again was resistance, and when it came, a little ivory-backed brush came with it, marked with a monogram "M. J."

"Auntie's brush, and put away all in a hurry, for here's her poor hair still in it; no, it's not Sarah's, hers was black, Auntie's was grey, and fine like this. Oh!" she went on with a sharp sob. "There's no doubt now, the brush was hidden to make it look as if she had run away." Then suddenly recovering herself, she added,

"Isn't it odd, that there is not a letter or photograph to tell us anything about Sarah?"

"No, m'm. I should be very glad to find a photograph of her," remarked the officer, grimly.

Nothing more was found, except unopened letters, which the Jenkins's recognised as some they had written at different times; the policeman had grown silent, and nothing could be got out of him, but "If you could find a photograph of Sarah, m'm, I should be glad."

The next morning Mrs. Jenkins declared she must go home for the day, and she departed, vouchsafing no explanation. In the afternoon Mr. Jenkins returned to the house to meet the police inspector, and at the door stood a young woman.

"I'm Alice Groves, sir," she said, "I've been in Canada, and I only heard of missus's disappearance three weeks ago. I'm very sorry I left without telling all I knew."

She sat down by the dining-room table, waiting till the inspector had got out his note book, and began.

"I'm a north-country woman; I was born in York; when father died, I went into service. I've lived in very good families, but in my last place but one the lady quarrelled with me over the butter. I was six months out of a situation, and had to draw all my savings. Oh! I can give you the lady's address, sir, and you'll find what I say is quite true; she has nothing against me but that. I don't go to registry offices as a rule, but this time I had to, and when Sarah Martin came, I was thankful to get a roof over my head. She made a great favour of taking me, but Miss Jenkins said she'd give me a chance. The first evening Sarah says to me: 'Miss Jenkins has got you in here, but you're not her servant, you're mine, and if you can't hold your tongue, off you go. Miss Jenkins is a bit silly, and the family pays me to look after her, that it mayn't come out. You've got to be very civil to her, but if she gives you a letter to post, bring it to me.'"

"Was she a little weak?" inquired the Inspector.

"Never to my knowledge," returned Mr. Jenkins, "and I certainly never paid anyone to look after her."

"Well, next morning," Alice continued, "I took Miss Jenkins her hot water, and she says, 'Where's Sarah?' 'Dusting the drawing-room, m'm.' And then she brought out two letters. 'Alice,' says she, 'you take these to the post without saying anything to anyone!' One was to you, sir; but when I got out of the room, there was Sarah. 'So she's at it again,' said she, and whipped them out of my hand.

"Did you ever get your letter, sir?" asked the inspector.

"No," said Mr. Jenkins, "She had not written for three years."

"Miss Jenkins was a very kind lady," Alice went on. "If I met her on the stairs, she'd say, 'Good morning, Alice, I hope you are getting on, and doing as Sarah tells you; we must all do as we are told in this life,' and then she'd look round in a frightened sort of way, and once Sarah heard her, and said, 'It would be a good thing if you remembered that, m'm.' and missus looked as if she'd struck her, and went into the sitting-room and shut the door."

"Did Sarah beat Miss Jenkins?"

"No, sir; as a rule she was most respectful, but she kept her tight. She never let her see anyone. If the visitors' bell rang, up Sarah would go. 'No, m'm,

Digitized by Google

Miss Jenkins isn't well enough to see anybody.' Then out missus would come from the drawing-room. 'Who was that?' 'Only a man, begging,' and then she'd say to me, 'She can't see visitors, they'd find out.'"

"Did you ever see any signs of her being, well—not all there?"

"No, sir, never. She wasn't strong; Sarah never let her go out alone; she said if she got her palpitations, she might drop dead in the street."

"Did she ever have an attack while you were there?"

"Yes, sir. Nothing would get it out of her head that one of the pictures was missing, and one day she began about it before me. 'I can't imagine, Sarah, what can have happened to my grandmother's picture, the Gainsborough; it always hung over the piano; there's the mark now.'"

"'You're dreaming, m'm,' says Sarah, looking like thunder. 'It's not been there in my time.

"'Oh yes, Sarah! It disappeared last spring.'

"And then Sarah went up, and said quite low and determined, 'No picture has ever been there; didn't I see you, myself, making that mark?'"

"'I was rubbing it out, Sarah,' says missus, all of a tremble.

"'You was making it, to get me into trouble, and if you talk like that about pictures that never existed, they'll shut you up with all them lunies.'

"'Oh no! no!' cries poor missus, and fell back in a palpitation. Sarah ran for her drops, and missus catches hold of me. 'Don't let them take me, I'm not mad, I'm not mad.'"

"What did you think of it all?"

"Well, I almost believed it. Sarah has such a convincing way, but she was a bit afraid of me, too, so when she found out I was saving to go to my brother in Canada, she made Miss Jenkins raise my wages and helped me with my needlework, so that I hadn't to spend a penny.

"'Early in January,' she said, 'you'd better take your passage for the middle of February; we shall be going away.'

"'I haven't the money,' says I.

"'How much will you want when your wages are paid?'

"'Six pounds; there'll be the journey on.'

"Well, on the 14th of January, missus give me notice and steerage ticket to Canada for the 14th of next month; at first I didn't like it—I don't choose to be indebted to anyone, but Sarah laughed me out of it. A day or two after that missus had toothache fearful and was begging and praying Sarah to let her go over the way to the dentist.

"'You sold out your shares,' says Sarah, 'and you're drawing your balance, and yet you want to go spending money on your teeth.'

"'You know you have the money safe, Sarah,' says Missus.

"'Yes, m'm; to keep it from them Jenkins's for you,' begging your pardon, sir; 'but if I take the risk, I've got to be paid.' And then missus began to cry, and Sarah came out and found me in the hall.

"'What are you doing?' says she.

"'Cleaning the brasses,' says I.

"She looked at me, but I went on with my work. Another day I heard her rating Missus into sending for more money, and she was crying and saying she would be a beggar. At last, on the 13th of February, they had a frighful row, and in the evening Sarah came down with a letter.

"'I've written to Mr. Jenkins,' says she, 'I can't stand it, he must take her away.'"

"That she never did," broke in Mr. Jenkins.

"I offered to stop on and help, but she said, No, she could manage all right.

"Well, next day we had an awful time. missus went out of one palpitation into another, but yet she wouldn't go to bed, but sat at the window watching; after dark came a postman's knock, and she ran out and got the letter. Sarah came rushing upstairs, twisted it out of her hand, pushed her into the dining room, and slammed the door. I heard them going on inside. Presently Sarah came out, looking very white.

"'Missus has fainted,' says she; 'she has read the letter, and she knows who is coming. You get your box and be off.'

"I wanted to go to her, but Sarah said, 'No, she's quiet now.' She helped me down with my box, but she was shaking so she nearly dropped it."

"'You are upset,' says I.

"'So would you be,' says she. 'Don't make a noise, I hope she's asleep.'

Digitized by Google

"So she took one handle of my box, and I took the other, and we carried it between us to Baker Street Station; she gave me my ticket to Liverpool, and that was the last I saw of her, but I often wished I had left my box, and gone right off to the police. I'm sure there was something queer about Sarah. One day I asked her to come and be photographed with me, and she turned on me like a tiger; she never had been photographed, and never would."

"Yes, but she was," said a voice.

There stood Mrs Jenkins holding a faded old family group, in which, looking out of a window behind, was a square cut face with a thin hard mouth.

"That's she!" almost screamed Alice in her excitement.

Mrs. Jenkins explained. "It was the last time poor auntie stayed with us; Ernest had just got his camera; you never saw such a temper as Sarah was in about it. 'She wouldn't be caricatured by an amateur.' But one day, when we were all grouped, she looked out of the window and was caught; what a state she was in! She tried to steal the negative."

"No wonder," said the inspector. "That's Elizabeth Bourne; we've 'wanted' her for seven years for housebreaking."

It was all explained. The suspicions of the police had been turned into the right channel the day before by the discovery of the purses, one of which had clearly been cut from the side of its owner.

"It was not uncommon," said the inspector, "for a clever female criminal, finding herself 'wanted,' to take a quiet situation, and to carry on her profession on her evenings out; Bourne was a very old hand, who managed dangerous jobs with the greatest dexterity. To secure a clear field for her operations, she had boldly invented the story that Miss Jenkins was deficient, and that her family were only waiting to seize her money and shut her up; dinning this into the ears of the poor, nervous lady till she more than half believed it, and parted with her capital to her fancied protector, Sarah. But she evidently had a grasping nature; her covetousness had made her keep the purses and delay her retreat till she had got every possible scrap of plunder."

Miss Jenkins's fate remained a mystery; the only theory that could be formed was that Sarah intended to murder her after completing her own arrangements, but that she had had to fly without delay, as the poor lady's heart had given way during the last stormy scene, and she had been lying dead when Alice and Sarah crept through the hall on their way to the station.

Her niece and nephew dined that night with the American dentist

"Miss Jenkins came to me in November," said their kind host. "Her teeth were in a dreadful state. I told her the only thing was to have them all extracted, and have a nice comfortable set made. I even took a model of her upper jaw, but her maid, who seemed to order her about pretty well, set her face against it; she persuaded the poor old lady that it would end in a dangerous heart attack.

"I've got the cast," he continued with professional enthusiasm, "the front teeth are the only ones left, and they have a queer twist, especially the right eye-tooth."

The Jenkins's went home, and the street fell back into its usual calm state, when some months later the American dentist was visited by his old friend the inspector.

"If you have the time, sir, to come round into the next street, I should feel obliged. We've had a queer find."

The next patient was overdue; the dentist left a message for him, and followed his visitor to the road behind his own. Here the areas are deep and narrow, with excavations running under the road leading out of them. These are usually divided into two or more compartments, and from one of these, belonging to a house which had been unlet for the best part of a year, there had issued so horrible a smell that the neighbours had complained to the sanitary inspector, and an examination had been made. It came from a locked door, which had shut in a quantity of lumber, behind which, in a dark corner, was a big tub, of the kind formerly used for water butts, and here had been found the body of a woman, of middle age, spare and well nourished. No possibility remained of identifying the features; the back teeth were gone; the front were curiously twisted, especially the right eye-tooth, and were firmly clenched in death on a fragment of gold chain, to which hung a single carved coral bead. Margie's unconscious prophecy had come true.

Elizabeth Bourne is still wanted.

THE END.

Digitized by Google

A Worthy Successor to a Great Inheritance.

A SKETCH OF REV. THOMAS SPURGEON.

By REV. MAURICE SNELGROVE.

TO dissociate the name of Spurgeon from the world of Religion would be as impossible as to disengage the name of Huxley or Darwin from the world of Science, Tennyson or Longfellow from the world of Poetry, Raphael or Michael Angelo from the world of Art, Matthew Arnold or John Ruskin from the world of Letters. When we think of these different departments, names of great leaders instinctively arise; and surely the Church has produced throughout the ages men as great as those found in the fields of Science, Art or Literature. The world will not readily forget Whitfield and Wesley, Luther and Melancthon, F. W. Robertson and C. H. Spurgeon—and the last is by no means the least.

Mr. Augustine Birrell has told us in his charming essay on Cardinal Newman that there are some men whose names are inseparably and exclusively associated with movements; there are others who are for ever united in human memories with places! To apply Mr. Birrell's words concerning the leader of the Oxford movement to Mr. Spurgeon, "he made good both titles to an estate in our minds and hearts." The Baptist Denomination particularly is not likely to forget him as the leader of a significant, though by no means great or historic, movement; and few inside or outside the Churches will be likely to forget him in his long association with a place—world famed and hallowed—the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

REV. THOS. SPURGEON.
Pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle.
Photograph by Russell & Sons, Baker Street, W

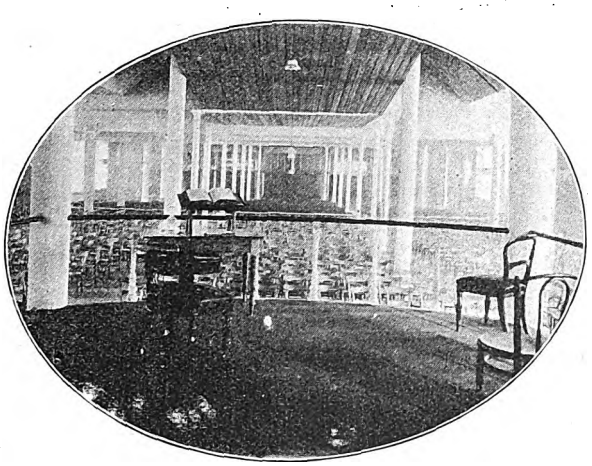
It will take some time for the Christian world to recover from the blow it received when on the 31st of January, 1892, news was received that the great preacher, who had sought renewed strength at Mentone, had succumbed to a long-standing and painful disease.

Digitized by Google

The Metropolitan Tabernacle was by far the largest Free Church building, for exclusively religious purposes, in England, and Mr. Spurgeon had gathered together a great congregation. Elijah's mantle invariably falls on an Elisha, but the Elisha is seldom easily discovered. Mr. Spurgeon's position was unique, his powers were most singular, most rare, and only an exceptional man could gracefully and successfully wear the prophet's robe.

It is not surprising that the very name of Spurgeon has become musical to the ears of the Metropolitan Tabernacle Church, and it was natural, seeing two grown up preacher sons had been left behind, that the eyes of the people should have turned toward the one or the other.

Mr. Thomas Spurgeon had been compelled, through ill-health, to leave England in the year 1877, and though he had from time to time—four times altogether — returned, he had finally settled in 1881 at Auckland Tabernacle, New Zealand, the largest church but one in Australasia. There he met with great success, and was constantly in touch, through letters and poems, with his father's church in London. Not only so; his disposition was so like his father's, his gifts so similar, that the hopes of the members of the London church were toward him, and it is not surprising that they invited him to "supply" for three months. The engagement was fulfilled to mutual satisfaction and Mr. Spurgeon returned to New Zealand.

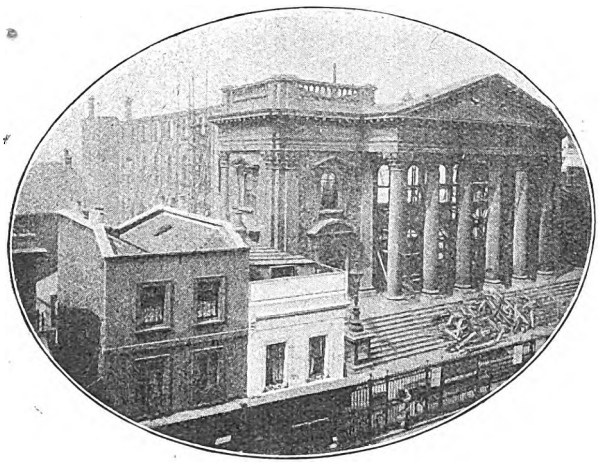


LECTURE HALL IN THE NEW TABERNACLE.
Photograph by E. Johnson.

Another invitation was subsequently sent asking if he would preach for twelve months. This he consented to do, but long before the probationary period had expired, the hopes of the people materialised; he was elected Pastor of the Church, and in the month of February, 1894, he stood upon his father's rostrum as the minister of his father's people. A new appointment in any sphere may determine either the perpetuation of success or the incipiency of failure. It was an anxious time for pastor and people, both hoping that no mistake had been made in the appointment. Mr. Spurgeon, sen., has, by almost universal opinion, been accorded premier position as preacher, pastor and organiser, and only Mr. Thomas Spurgeon can say what it meant to take up the work which his father had laid down. In the shadow of great objects lesser objects grow dim, as smaller peaks crouch at the foot of the Matterhorn; and a man of average ability following so noble a lead would have been overawed and subdued into real or apparent ineffectiveness. It speaks volumes for Mr. Thomas Spurgeon's ability that, after ten years' ministry at Newington—in spite of the fact that the neighbourhood is constantly changing, becoming less residential every day—nothing started by the first pastor has been given up, and the college, the orphanage, the Church, the colportage—to say nothing of the multifarious agencies—are maintained at a high standard of efficiency.

"Like father, like son" is by no means always true; very often father and son are as opposite as the poles, but the gifts and graces of the world-renowned Charles Haddon Spurgeon have, in measure and degree, been handed down to the son. The father was one of the wittiest of men; his sermons sparkled with natural humour, and this gift was no small factor in holding the immense audiences invariably attending his ministry. He did not allow his humour to interfere with the plan or impression of his discourse. He would probably have agreed with Mr. Barry Pain that "you must not dwell on humour for a second; it's like a soufflé, the more

Digitized by Google



THE OLD BUILDING AFTER THE FIRE OF 1898.
Photograph by E. Johnson.

lightly you handle it the better it is." Mr. Spurgeon gave expression to his productions by its guarded use.

"Son Tom," as he is lovingly and familiarly designated, has this faculty in no small measure. He puts windows, to use one of his father's metaphors, into his sermons by its introduction. Quick in repartee, he can always hold his own. It is reported that one of his truculent critics—who thought that Mr. Spurgeon's position and popularity were altogether dependent upon his relationship to the "prince of preachers"—said to him on one occasion, "Mr. Spurgeon, where would you have been without your father?" to which Mr. Spurgeon gave the caustic reply, "I don't know; where would you?" In pulpit style Mr. Spurgeon can be said to have no style except that which is purely natural. Gesticulations are conspicuous by their absence. He moves but little on his rostrum; he speaks slowly. There is a marked absence of Latinised words in his language; he excels, as did his father, in Anglo-Saxon. Apt similes and metaphors, thoughtfully conceived, delicately expressed, are made contributory to the impression and interest of the subject under consideration; intense earnestness characterises every movement, every sentence.

Mr. Spurgeon's humour has been mentioned; it is well to notice humour's near neighbour—pathos. Those who have heard the present pastor of the Tabernacle preach must have been impressed by the manly pathos breathing in his discourses. He evidently preaches what he feels, and the consequence is that the people feel what he preaches.

Moreover, the impressiveness of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons is partly produced by the fact that he is an extempore preacher. Very different definitions of preaching obtain to-day from those held in days gone by. Like Drs. Parker and Clifford and the late Henry Ward Beecher—like his own father—Mr. Spurgeon believes that the whole man preaches, and he realises the value of the "kindling glance of the eye," the eloquence of the whole bearing. Mr. Spurgeon is gathering, for sermonic purposes, all the week; he reads widely, and is a student of human nature—a prolific study for pulpit uses.

Mr. Thomas Spurgeon, like his great father, is pre-eminently and conspicuously a preacher. He has no time for larger literary work than the production of sermons. In the preface to a small volume published in 1867, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon remarked that writing was to him the work of a slave; and after making this candid admission he adds, "Well may a man's books be called his 'works,' for if every mind were constituted as mine, it would be work indeed to produce a quarto volume." Yet though specifically a preacher, Mr. Thomas Spurgeon has published a small volume of devotional and Temperance sonnets under the title, "Scarlet Threads and Bits of Blue." Coventry Patmore, comparing the scientist and poet, has told us that, whereas the scientist is all thought and no vision, the poet is all vision and no thought. In these poems we find thought and vision in happy association.

INTERIOR OF THE NEW TABERNACLE.
Photograph by E. Johnson.

Digitized by Google

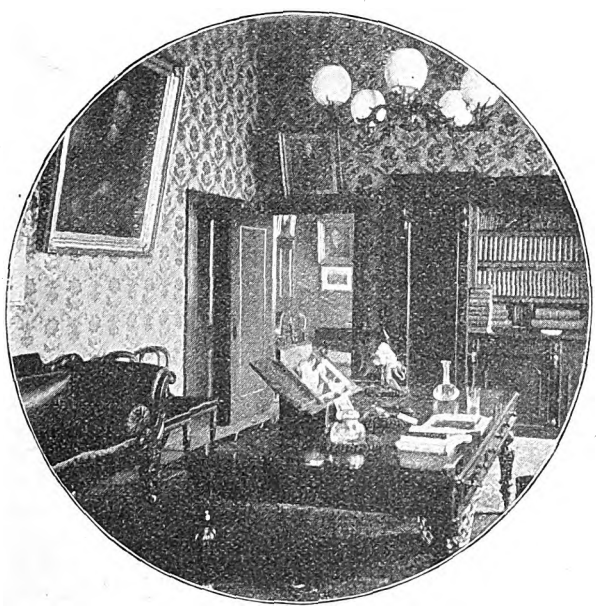
The late Mr. Spurgeon "was impatient of poets and their pottery," writes Mrs. Spurgeon, senior, "but," she adds, "whenever I read to him one of Son Tom's pieces the result was sure to be smiles or tears . . . . and the verdict always satisfied me." Probably paternal regard lent tone and colour to his verdict. However, the book has found a snug, and by no means forgotten, place in many a bookcase, and the contents a warm corner in many a mind and heart.

The spirit of the poems displays the disposition of the man. It has been said of C. W. Von Gluck, the celebrated musician, that, like Milton and Bacon, who put on record their knowledge that they had written for all time, "he was magnificently conscious of himself." This is just what Thomas Spurgeon is not; he is magnificently unconscious of himself, and this, to a large extent, accounts for his wide influence and popularity.



THE LATE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S PRIVATE VESTRY.
Photograph by E. Johnson.

The Duke of Wellington ruled his soldiers by force and ability; Napoleon Bonaparte governed his men by ability and thoughtfulness. Mr. Thomas Spurgeon is not lacking in ability, but his gentleness has made him great. Aut Cæsar aut nullus certainly does not apply to him. One of the most genial of men, brotherly, thoughtful, intensely spiritual—considerate of men's failings, helping them in trouble, guiding them in perplexity, rejoicing with them in their successes—he rules men by love; and the Church, the college, the orphanage, are the better and stronger for his gracious presence and counsel.

Mr. Spurgeon has for many years felt compelled to refuse to submit to be interviewed; yet in his own well appointed vestry, with a waiting-room full of people anxious to speak with him, he readily verified the main facts of his life. The majority of people looking at Mr. Spurgeon, either close to or from a distance, would judge him to be older than he is, seeing he is still on the "up-hill side" of middle life. Forty-five years ago Mr. C. H. Spurgeon received the intelligence that two boys had been born into the world to him, which news called from him the witty exclamation, "Not more than others I deserved, yet God has given me more." Thomas and Charles, the twin brothers, attended school in the neighbourhood of Clapham, and after a good grounding, Thomas was entered as a wood engraver, at the same time attending art classes at South Kensington, being most anxious to become an artist. But the desire to preach was in his heart. The histories of Thomas Coles and many others have taught us that if a man be an artist born an artist he must be. On similar lines, if a man be a preacher born a preacher he must be. We are not surprised, therefore, to find that, at an early age, he, with his brother, started preaching at a mission-hall in Wandsworth. Unfortunately Thomas's health gave way and he went to Australia, returning the next year on hearing that his mother was ill. He entered the Pastor's College the same year, but after a brief stay in that institution returned to the Colonies and started preaching in earnest. His subsequent career has been outlined in previous paragraphs. It is often found that good men have come from a godly ancestry. Mr. Spurgeon has been thus privileged. His father, grandfather (who is still living, the venerable Rev. John Spurgeon), and great-grandfather were preachers; and he was doubly advantaged, for, to use John Ruskin's words concerning his own mother, his "mother's influence was conspicuous." To these sources may be traced a good deal that has been formative as to character and influential as to service.

Digitized by Google

Photo by INTERIOR OF OLD TABERNACLE. E. Johnson.

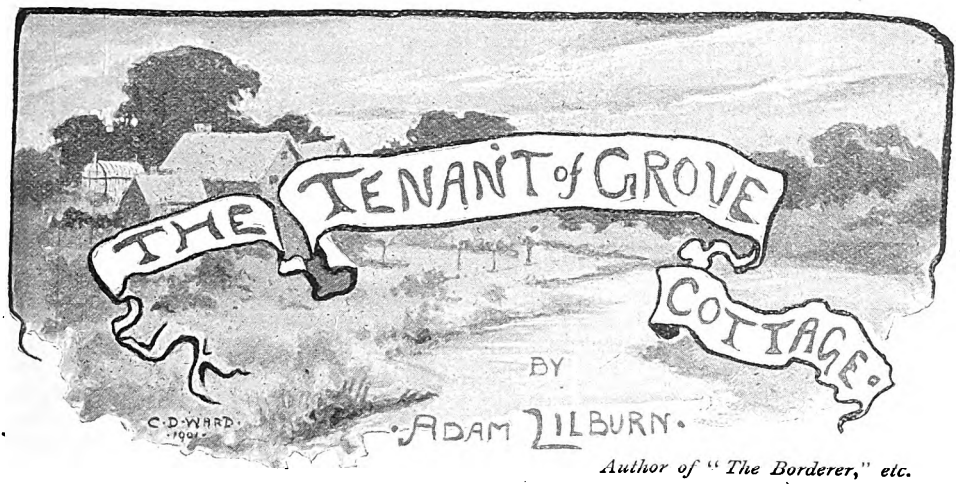
If Mr. Spurgeon be weak in body he must store what strength he has well, and use it wisely, for the calls upon him are many, the demands are great.

A cursory glance at the more important services Mr. Spurgeon has to render will show how little time he can have for indulgence in predilections and pleasures. He has the presidential care of the great undenominational Orphanage at Stockwell, requiring £20,000 a year from voluntary contributions for its maintenance; the direction of hundreds of colporteurs in all parts of the country; the oversight of sixty students constantly in the College; and the pastoral care of the great Church meeting in the Tabernacle. The responsibility of the Tabernacle alone and ordinarily, must have been a heavy burden to bear—but an inconceivably great load was Mr. Spurgeon's, when in April, 1898, the building erected in 1861 for his father, was burned to the ground. However, he had learned the secret of success in knowing how to use, not what he had chosen, but what was forced upon him, and after two years' migration, he returned with his people, to the occupancy of a new building which had cost £40,000—a monument of gratitude for the father, a token of confidence in the son. Some idea of the importance of the work can be gathered from statistics. The new Tabernacle seats comfortably 3,000 people and has a church membership of 3,553; 21 mission stations, with sitting accommodation for 6,740 people are supported; there are 598 teachers and 8,000 scholars in the Sunday schools; and it may be taken for granted that the societies in connection with the Church are multifarious and onerous. Yet all are vigorous and prosperous.

It is impossible to pass through Newington Butts without noticing the great building—with its Corinthian pillars and aspect of solidarity—true indications of importance and strength within; and thousands of people all over the world earnestly hope that the Church and its Pastor (who is ably assisted by the Rev. C. B. Sawday) may long abide as centres of permanent usefulness in this, the greatest City of the World.

MAURICE SNELGROVE.

Digitized by Google



Author of "The Borderer," etc.

Illustrated by CHAS. D. WARD.

CHAPTER XXIV.

AN EVENTFUL NIGHT.

THE adventurers took with them such necessaries for comfort as they could gather together on a short notice, and, accompanied by Jack Ditton, who had been promoted to the post of doctor's boy, they proceeded to render the dismal old bungalow as habitable as possible. Jack lit a fire, spread some rugs on the floor, unpacked a hamper, and fled forthwith, preferring rather to brave the dangers of the dark lane than any that might await him in the haunted bungalow.

Jack was, in a small way, a hero both in his own estimation and in that of the villagers; but there are limits even to the courage of heroes. The importance the youth had derived from having been the first to discover the murder in Dredman's-lane was growing dim as the interest in the affair subsided; so he was not altogether averse to being associated—in a safe degree—with the dangerous enterprise of these three misguided young men.

Dr. Hawthorn laughed at Jack's rueful face as the latter ran off shaking his head.

"The young monkey doesn't expect to find any of us alive in the morning," he said, shrugging his shoulders. "And, after all, there's method in his madness! If the ghosts don't destroy us we'll certainly contract fevers and ague, for the place smells like a vault."

Jim appeared to grow irritable and depressed after Jack's departure. Certainly the prospect was not cheerful. The walls reeked with moisture which the warmth of the fire seemed to increase. The chimney, being as damp as the walls, smoked incessantly; an odour of decomposing vegetable matter pervaded the atmosphere. Jim Hawthorn detected another odour which he declared to emanate from defective drains. Curious creaking sounds from unexpected quarters were trying to the nerves; and altogether the adventurers had not a pleasant prospect before them, even though the ghosts should leave them alone.

Despite the smoke, Bertie crouched close to the fire, for his residence in a hot climate rendered him susceptible to cold. Jim smoked in sullen silence, nursing a grievance. He was annoyed with himself for adventuring upon this wild-goose chase; but, being intensely human, preferred to throw the blame of his folly upon others. It is always pleasanter to consider oneself a good-natured person who yields to the persuasions of others, than one who does foolish things of his own accord. Hargreaves was the only one who seemed really interested in the affair. He leant against the window-sill and gazed into the tenebrous depths of the shrubbery as though eager to miss nothing which might happen there.

Digitized by Google

"Cheerful company you two chaps are," grumbled the doctor. "Carlton doesn't seem to have a word to throw at a dog, and Hargreaves is too busy acting pointer to spooks to care about making himself agreeable to mere mortals!"

Bertie laughed, but Hargreaves did not take any notice. Annoyed by this absence of mind Jim went over to the window and slapped him on the shoulder.

"Come, old man, wake up, or tell us what you're watching so intently out there! I can't see anything but trees myself."

"What do I see?" repeated the Astrologer, in a soft, even voice that seemed to come from a long distance. "I see something big, and soft, and stealthy, lying low amongst the bushes, and waiting its time to leap upon its prey! Isn't that interesting enough to rivet one's attention? I, too, am waiting and watching for the consummation of some great tragedy."

"Great Scott! You make me feel creepy! Where is the beast you speak of? I can see nothing!"

"Look over yonder beside that clump of elder bushes. Don't you see something close to the ground—something like two green lamps? Well those are the eyes of the great beast I speak of!"

After one glance in the direction indicated Dr. Hawthorn fell back, trembling in every limb.

Was it merely the effect of his own wild imaginings, or had the other man hypnotised him into seeing what had no existence? At least it is certain that he ever after averred that not only did he distinguish the eyes, but likewise the dim outline of some huge beast that crouched behind the bushes.

"This is too awful!" he gasped, wiping his forehead, which grew wet with clammy moisture. "Why are such things permitted? I wouldn't have believed it unless I'd seen it myself."

"Did I not warn you that we would have to deal with foes terrible and unknown? You're not the first who came to mock and remained to pray."

Curiosity drew Bertie to the window also, but he could distinguish nothing.

"Where is it?" he cried, impatiently. "Let us go across and try to rout it out. In all probability it's only some wild cat or other that's hiding there."

His hand was on the clasp of the window as he spoke, but Hawthorn would not permit him to open it.

"No, no, Carlton! I won't have it, I tell you! It's bad enough as it is. It's bad enough for you two hare-brained chaps to drag me into such a wild-goose chase without—without you exposing yourself and—and us to more dangers than are absolutely necessary. If the—the powers of evil, as Hargreaves calls them, are outside the house, for Heaven's sake let us keep them there!"

His voice quavered into all sorts of keys. Bertie was hard-hearted enough to laugh.

"All right, Jim! I won't let them in, but, all the same, I'm afraid this shaky old window isn't much of a barrier if they're disposed to besiege us. Besides, after all, what are bolts and bars to immaterial beings?"

Hawthorn mixed himself a stiff glass of whisky, heaped some coals on the fire, rolled himself in a rug, and laid his long length on the floor.

"If I don't have a few hours' sleep I'll be no good for my work to-morrow," he said. "I sleep lightly, so I'm sure to awake if anything happens.

He had the doctor's gift of commanding sleep, and before long, in spite of his fears, his regular breathing indicated a blissful oblivion of his uncomfortable surroundings.

The other men sat in silence, waiting for what they knew not. Once Bertie fancied he heard a stealthy footfall on the stair, and rushed to the door; but the candle he carried merely threw a faint circle of light around himself, leaving all that lay beyond in greater obscurity, so he discerned nothing but countless legions of crawling things which scurried off at his approach. He returned to the fire and his quiet companion, and presently began to dose and nod. Thereupon he followed Jim's example, rolled himself in a rug, and fell into a sleep—a sleep of strange dreams.

He was by turns pursued by a huge tiger, stalked by a black man, who wore smoked spectacles like Mr. Pattinson, then found himself flying from a bush fire, as he had once done in reality when in Australia. Long miles of road kept getting hotter and hotter, and the flames raced him in leaps and bounds. At length one great tongue of fire licked his face, and with a shriek he awoke to find the dream a reality. The room was full of smoke, a red glow shone in at the windows, and overhead he could hear the fire crackling and roaring.

Digitized by Google

Dreadman's Bungalow was devoted to destruction.

CHAPTER XXV.

A RESCUE.

Bertie's first thought was for the safety of his friends. Groping about in the dense smoke, he discovered that they were both of them in a state of insensibility. They had succumbed to the influence of the smoke, and had not Bertie been aroused in time it is probable that all the three would have perished in their sleep.

Fortunately the room they occupied was on the ground-floor, and had a French window that opened upon the verandah; so, without much trouble, the young fellow contrived to drag them singly across the room, and, as he could not undo the fastening quickly enough, he wrapped his hand in a rug, and, breaking the glass, contrived so to get the window open. Then the smoke rushing at once to the opening and leaving the room comparatively free, he discovered a jug of water on the table, which he instantly dashed over Jim's face.

The latter sat up and rubbed his eyes, for he had not been long insensible.

"What in the name of wonder's the matter, Carlton?" he exclaimed. "Anything exploded? Fancy I smell chemicals!"

"Get up and help me to carry Hargreaves out of this," cried Bertie, sharply. "The rotten old place is on fire, and burns like tinder."

Dr. Hawthorn pulled himself together and obeyed. But even a keen sense of danger failed to subdue his inclination to grumble.

"Well, I'm not a bit surprised," he muttered, "my prophetic soul told me we were in for a nasty night of it! Great Scott! If I get safe out of this, you won't persuade me into spook-hunting again."

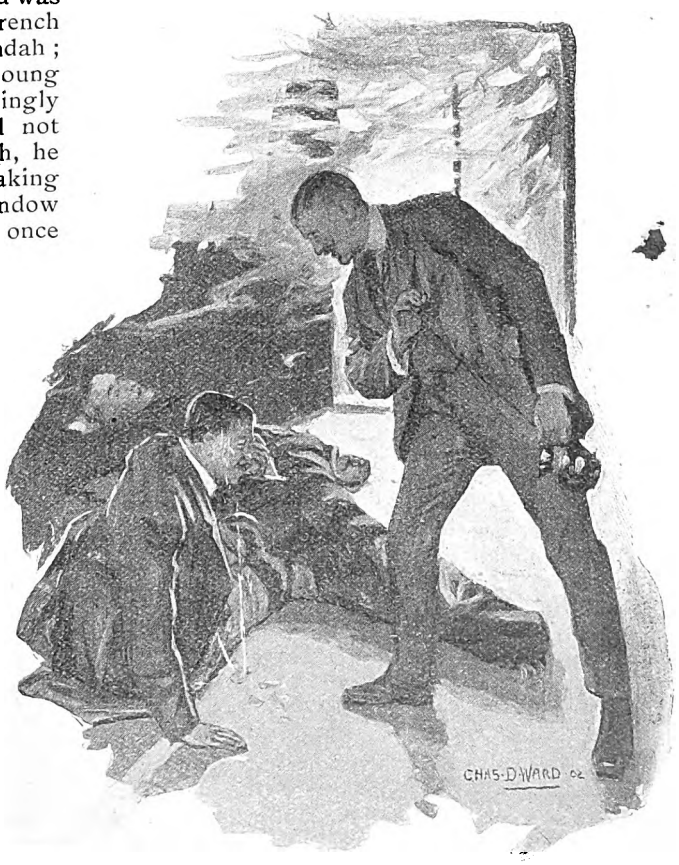
They carried Hargreaves down the garden, and then turned back to look at the fire. The bungalow presented a strange and lurid spectacle. Flames leaped from every window on one side of the house, and the enveloping greenery fell in blackened ropes as the flames scorched it.

"I wonder how it originated?" said Bertie, in astonishment. "Our fire was burning quietly enough, and we did no exploring, so it couldn't have arisen from any carelessness on our part."

Jim felt in his pocket, and, discovering no pipe there, bemoaned his loss in no measured phrase.

"It was the cleanest and sweetest pipe I ever possessed," he murmured; "and such a good one to draw. I'll never look upon its like again!"

"Oh, confound your pipe!" returned



JIM SAT UP AND RUBBED HIS EYES, FOR HE HAD NOT BEEN LONG INSENSIBLE.

Digitized by Google

Bertie, irritably. It's a mercy you didn't lose your life instead of merely your pipe!"

"Only for you, I'd be a charred stick!" returned the other at once; then spoilt his concession to gratitude by a return to his former mood. "But I was a fool to come with you, all the same! And as for my pipe—it's wife, and bairns, and home to me! If it wasn't for the loss of it, the old place might burn, and welcome!"

He turned to attend to Hargreaves, who now showed signs of returning consciousness. "Come, old man, wake up and see the last of your ghosts! I'll venture to say that we'll get no help from the village!"

Bertie was looking intently at the burning house.

"How was it that the fire broke out in the upper part of the building, when we were on the ground-floor, and were, so far as we know, the sole occupants of the bungalow?"

"There must have been someone there besides ourselves," returned the doctor, "and, by Jove! if he isn't there still!"

He pointed to a window where someone undoubtedly stood waving arms and gesticulating in order to attract their attention. Bertie looked about, and found a dilapidated ladder leaning against a wall. Without further ado he proceeded to drag it towards the house.

"I say, Carlton, you're not going to trust yourself on that rotten thing?" exclaimed Jim. "Why, it'll give way with you before you're half-way up; and it's much too short any way."

"Never mind; I'm going to venture. One can't stand here and see a fellow-creature burnt to death without making same attempt to save him."

The ruddy glow of the fire made the night as light as day; and as the young fellow neared the Bungalow, he could see quite plainly the figure at the window. A ragged, miserable scarecrow of a figure it was, as it kept waving its arms about in frantic appeal. Fear had evidently driven the poor wretch mad for the time being.

One side of the burning house was now almost a wreck and quite impossible of approach; but, fortunately, the wind had blown the portion where the man still was almost free from smoke and flames. Bertie cast a quick glance over it, and decided he would try to clamber from the roof of the verandah to the window.

He placed the ladder in position, and it was—as Jim said—too short by many feet. But Bertie had been on board a sailing ship to good purpose, and proceeded to clamber hand over hand up the creeper, which hung in great ropes about the pillars of the verandah and had not yet caught fire. By this means he contrived to reach the window where the figure still stood waving its arms. As he approached, however, it drew back, as though it deemed even fire preferable to any contact with man.

"Come, quick!" gasped Bertie, clinging to the slippery roof. "Don't you see I'm here to help you down?"

But the poor demented wretch still held off. "Is Pawson there?" he cried, in a hoarse voice. "I'm not a-goin' to be copped this time! 'E's always had a spite at me, 'ad Pawson. 'E tried to get me scragged once! If 'e's yonder, I'd rather stop where I am!"

It was evident the poor creature had lost his wits through fear. There was no time to lose, so without further ado Bertie scrambled over the window-ledge and got hold of him. There was a struggle, but the half-starved creature had no chance with the young athlete, whose muscles had been toughened by hard work under hot suns, although the latter was half strangled by the thin, clinging arms. By this time, too, the fire had invaded the room they were in, and was licking the roof of the verandah; so the position of both would-be rescuer and rescued grew perilous in the extreme.

Now, however, the doctor came to the assistance of his friend. Securing the rug which had been wrapped round Hargreaves, he saturated it with water from a pond in the garden. With this rug he followed Bertie up the ladder, and laid it on the roof, so as to afford a safer and firmer footing.

"Make haste, Carlton," he cried, through the smoke. "Throttle the beggar, if he won't come without! The fire has spread below, and there's not a moment to lose!"

Bertie dragged the now quiescent form of the man to the window, and proceeded to hoist it over the sill; then with it held tightly in his arms, he slid down the roof of the verandah until he reached the edge, where Jim awaited him on the ladder. Between them they managed to get the poor wretch safely down; though not without sustaining some damage, for the ladder caught fire in two places, and there were great flaming gaps through which they were forced to pass as best they could.

Digitized by Google

By this time Jack Ditton had arrived on the spot with the dog-cart; and, leaving the burning Bungalow to its fate, they were all driven to the doctor's house to have their injuries attended to.

With the exception of the man who had been rescued from the burning Bungalow—who proved to be the unlucky Jerry Gobey—these same injuries proved to be of a slight character. Bertie's heavy cloth coat had saved his arm, though the sleeve of it crumbled into dust at a touch. But Jerry's unfortunate predilection for Dredman's Bungalow was like to cost him dear; for his burns were serious and would, in all probability, prove fatal.

Bertie contrived to snatch an hour's sleep on the couch in the surgery before the arrival of the train which brought the inscrutable Salter and one of his myrmidons. This latter was the same colourless individual who had watched the spiders in Thumb Court while waiting so patiently for Solomon Bembridge's clerk.

Sitting on the edge of his chair, and acutely conscious of the presence of his superior, this man narrated—in a voice as colourless as his face—the methods he had employed to gain or force the confidence of Mr. Morton. He had found out that the clerk had never liked his employer, still less his employment, and of late there had been considerable friction betwixt the men owing partly to a—well, an affair of sentiment. Strange that such trivialities should be allowed to influence business relations; but so it was in this case. It was his business to seize every chance presented by temper or weakness. The young man had still some foolish scruples about betraying secrets—scruples which required strong arguments to abolish; but after a warm scene in the office Morton proved at length amenable, especially when threatened with the terrors of the law. The colourless man finished his narration by telling how he had lured the clerk into a cab, and so on to the presence of his chief.

Then the said chief took up the tale. His communication proved to be of so startling and unexpected a nature that long before it was finished Bertie grew pale and unnerved.

Good Heavens! It was simply incredible! Was it possible that such horrors could exist beneath the calm surface of ordinary life? All the wild surmises that had ever arisen in the young man's mind paled before the sheer horror of this discovery!

Salter spoke in a quiet and unemotional manner, as though there were nothing extraordinary about his statements. Bertie wondered dully and irrelevantly whether anything had ever surprised Salter or his myrmidon?

But Salter's was not the only revelation in store for Bertie that morning. Scarcely had the former concluded his amazing story than Jim entered in haste.

"I want you for just a minute, Carlton," he cried. "That poor fellow upstairs is conscious, and is crying out for you! I can't quiet him myself; so you must come with me."

"Oh, I am awfully upset, Jim! Salter has just told me something almost too awful for belief! I really don't think I can stand any more just now."

"Oh, come now! You needn't stay," urged the doctor; "but I may contrive to pull him through if I can keep his mind easy. He declares that it is most important he should see you without delay."

"All right; I suppose I shall have to come. Wait here for me, Mr. Salter, and we will talk things over when I return."

The inscrutable Salter agreed. Dr. Hawthorn invited him into another room, but he declined to move. He rather liked surgeries. There were so many interesting things—anatomical plates and books, and what not. If he had not been a detective, he thought he would have been a doctor for choice.

"We're not so very different, after all," returned Jim, politely, offering him a cigar. "We dissect different parts of one organism, that's all—mine the body, yours the mind."

Bertie went up to the side of a bed whereon lay Jerry Gobey, swathed in cotton wool, his great eyes full of a pathetic appeal and the terror of a frightened child.

"I don't want—to die yet—although it's orful the pain is, sometimes! I'm a bad lot—I know—but I never had no chance. Pawson always had a down on me, yer know. But we did 'im that time, me and Bill did. He'd have given his ears for wot Bill found—at the entrance of the lane that night—the night wen the pore old gent was murdered. It was all crumpled up like, and thrown in a hedge, as though someone had done it in a wax—a bloomin' temper, yer know. Bill he never passes anything now, cos once a pal and him see a bit of piper lyin' in the road, an' it turned out to be a flimsy—a fiver! An' though we couldn't make much of this 'un, Bill thought it might be worth money some day, and so I've kep' it ever since. Accordin' to wot the doctor says, you are the party most concerned—and you saved my life—not 'as 'ow that's worth much—so if you look in the breast-pocket of that coat over there, an' if it isn't burnt, you will find that there piper in a pocket-book wot I found. No, if I'm to die, I'd better make a clean breast! I sneaked it from the gent! Bill, he's a holy terror, and 'twas him put me up to it."

Digitized by Google

Bertie's hands trembled with excitement when he discovered the paper uninjured in the stolen pocket-book. Crumpled and dirty, and torn, it was yet quite legible, and read as follows:—

Thumb Court, October 2nd.

"SIR,—I am surprised to find that a man of your experience should make the mistake of imagining that one of mine could be intimidated by threats. It will undoubtedly be unpleasant if you carry out your intention, invade the privacy of my quiet home to-morrow night, and endeavour to blacken my character in the eyes of those I love. But I warn you once again that Daniel Pattinson knows well how to guard the secrets of Solomon Bembridge. I will keep watch in the lane until after the arrival of the last express from town, after which I shall feel safe from intrusion; but I sincerely hope that both for your own sake and for mine you will reconsider your determination.—Yours,

"BOTH THE MEN YOU KNOW."

THE PAPER DROPPED FROM BERTIE'S NERVELESS HANDS—THE MYSTERY WAS SOLVED AT LAST.

The chain of evidence was complete. Daniel Pattinson, the philanthropist, the model son and village potentate, was no other than Solomon Bembridge, the shady money-lender of Thumb Court. His own handwriting convicted him; and "Both the Men You Know" were concerned in quieting for ever the tongue that threatened to expose them.

The paper dropped from Bertie's nerveless hands. The mystery of Dredman's Lane was solved at last. Daniel Pattinson—the good, the genial, the pleasant—was the murderer of Bertie Carlton's father.

CHAPTER XXVI.

HOW THE MURDERER ESCAPED.

Bertie's brain reeled with the effort to grasp the revelation which had just been made to him.

Digitized by Google

The thing was monstrous, incredible, shocking beyond words. Could it be possible that this man, whose salt he had eaten, and who had welcomed him with such apparent cordiality, was the murderer of his father? This seemingly sweet-natured person, who was always spoken of as a lover of all things good and innocent, this model son, this general benefactor, was at heart a creature of blood and secret crime, an oppressor of the poor, a being without ruth or scruple in the pursuance of his objects! Why, it seemed rather like some mediæval legend than a modern instance.

But all the details fitted together with the accuracy of a child's picture puzzle, and doubt was no longer possible.

He suddenly recalled his own feelings when they first met. Why, it was nature giving him some hint of the truth. As he shook hands with the tenant of Grove Cottage his flesh had shuddered and recoiled, as at some unnatural and monstrous contact. That cold, limp clasp warred against all his pre-dispositions in Mr. Pattinson's favour.

And yet it was beneath the roof of this human monster that Nora, the girl Bertie loved, had resided for a couple of years. Good heavens! What a risk she had run! Bertie's blood ran cold to think of it.

But then again, she was fond of him. He must have acted his part well to have deceived her so completely. If the revelation of his infamy had been terrible to the young fellow who was but an acquaintance, what would it be to poor little Nora, who had always looked up to and admired him? He had ever been her kind friend, almost her playfellow—the winsome Uncle Dan of her gayest hours.

Bertie felt the pressure of the situation strongly. What ought he to do? The revenge for which he had waited and schemed was in his grasp, and he hesitated about seizing it. Ought he to abandon it and leave it to God to punish the guilty?

He groaned, but knitted his brows. Not that, not that! Man would require to be a Christ to forgive such injuries. And Bertie was human, not divine; so his lips took a firm curve and his fist clenched itself involuntarily.

Then all at once he remembered, with a sigh of relief, that the matter had gone out of his hands. Salter had set the wheels of the law in motion already, and he was powerless to stop them. Salter had taken things for granted, and, leaving word that he would return before acting further, had gone off to the nearest magistrate to procure a warrant for Pattinson's arrest.

Meanwhile it was impossible for Bertie to remain inactive. He decided to walk to Grove Cottage, and Hargreaves, panting with haste, joined him just at the entrance of the lane.

"May I go with you, Carlton?" he asked. "The interest of the tragedy culminates, and I would fain see the last act."

Bertie winced. "The tragedy affects me so closely that I cannot quite appreciate your attitude of spectator," he replied; "but come, by all means. Though with your curious powers I daresay you can tell how it will be when the curtain falls."

"Perhaps that's the reason why I wish to accompany you! Don't be angry with me, old man. It isn't that I don't sympathise with you."

They proceeded in silence until they reached the gate of Grove Cottage. After a moment's hesitation Bertie opened this, and they entered the garden. The whole place had a strangely deserted appearance. It was evident that the servants were absent, for Bertie tugged at the door-bell for several minutes without eliciting any response. He scarce knew why he had come; but whatever motive actuated him his visit seemed fated to be futile. The men looked at each other blankly.

"Has he heard something and escaped?' asked Bertie.

Hargreave's eyes quickened with sudden intelligence.

"Escaped?" he repeated. "Perhaps, but not in the way you mean. Escaped? Yes, but through the only door that was open to him."

He hurried down the path in the direction of the greenhouse as he spoke. The door was bolted on the inside, but Bertie set his shoulder against it and the bolt flew.

Hargreaves had guessed correctly. The man they sought was there. He was sitting propped up against the frame of the stand containing his auriculas, and on the ground beside him lay the tin whistle upon which he had evidently been playing up to the last. One of his pet toads still squatted on his shoulder, and the lizard slid across the path and disappeared as the men entered the place of death.

Digitized by Google

The man of two lives had escaped from the just vengeance of his pursuer, and, as Hargreaves said, through the only door left open to him.

* * * *

Dr. Hawthorn, who came on a hasty summons, decided that the murderer had died from a dose of some powerful vegetable poison, in all probability one he had distilled himself, for he was skilled in botany, and the properties of all plants. Hemlock, opium, or digitalis would have sufficed, but Jim declared that it would require more than a cursory glance to decide upon the particular poison.

A post-mortem was imperative. The chief fact, however, was that the man had escaped from the consequences of his crime. His death saved a good deal of trouble and perplexity.

It was ascertained that he had given the servants a week's holiday the day before, spent the night alone, and at the very time when the fire broke out in the Bungalow, had shut himself up in the greenhouse and swallowed the fatal dose. A sealed packet directed to Bertie was found among his papers. It contained a full confession of the crime in Dredman's-lane. From sundry hints he had received lately (notably one from his discharged clerk, Joseph Morton, who through some curious freak of conscience had warned him to fly before the bloodhounds ran him down) he recognised that the game was up, and that there was but one way of escape open for him.

"Yes," continued the written confession, "I killed your father. It is useless to deny it longer. He was obstinate, and drove me to desperation, and in a sudden access of fury I stabbed him. He had written me a threatening letter, and I knew him to be resolute in carrying out his plans. It was not that I cared for threats or abuse myself, but I wished to spare my mother the knowledge of my real character and occupation.

"I did not tell the truth about the knife. It never lay upon the garden seat, for I did not use it until late in the afternoon, and kept it in the pocket of my gardening coat, which I put on again when I went to meet your father. So it was that, unfortunately, the weapon was there when the impulse came, and I remembered that it was in my pocket by feeling the sharp point prick my hand a moment before. Until then no such thought was in my head. But I grew desperate, a blind fury seized me, and the world around me was red with flame and blood.

"It was in a sudden fit of disgust with myself that I left the knife where it was, and fled homeward. But long before I reached the garden gate my common sense returned. I reasoned that the deed was done, and was irretrievable. Nothing I could do would avail to restore the life I had taken. I was sufficiently conversant with the laws of anatomy (to which I had devoted considerable time) to be quite sure that the blow I dealt was a fatal one. This being the case, what was the best thing for me to do? Must I abide the consequences of my hasty act and consent to be branded as a murderer? Must I allow myself to be held up to public execration, and, what was worse, bring shame on those I loved? No, this was more than I could endure. For one thing, it would certainly break my mother's heart, and at all risks this must be prevented. Therefore I stole back, moved by an instinct of self-preservation. My arms are long and muscular, and I did not experience much difficulty in dragging the body of my victim into the field, where I fancied it might lie unobserved by the few persons who were likely to pass that place that night. I took the precaution of searching his pockets in case there might be in them any document of an incriminating character. I had written to him on the previous day, and not, perhaps, with my usual caution. But, whether he had destroyed this letter of mine or left it at home, at least it was not about his person. I removed his purse, in order to provide some possible motive for the crime, and I intended to take his watch as well; but as I stooped to do so, some wayfarer drew near, whistling to keep up his courage, and I fled before him, keeping close to the hedge.

"Afterwards I attempted to return and withdraw the knife from the wound; but discovered, to my astonishment, that I had reached the limits of my endurance. For the first time in my life, I developed nerves, a perfect frenzy of fear fell upon me; and, throwing the purse into a sullen pool beneath the bridge, where I fancied it would lie safe until morning, I rushed indoors and locked myself into my room. There I swallowed a certain narcotic I had before found useful, and which I knew to possess no harmful after-effects.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

I was conscious of no more until morning, when I awoke early and with my mental balance completely restored. I would fain have spared my dear little comrade the gruesome spectacle presented by the body of the murdered man; but could not insist upon her remaining within doors without exciting her wonder. The rest you know already. I will say no more, for time hastens, and I must perform the last dread task which I have set myself."

Thus abruptly the strange document ended, as if time pressed upon the writer and warned him that the fatal act must be accomplished now or never.

"I wonder how Nora will feel when she hears of it?" muttered Bertie, as his eye travelled over the last lines, and he thought sorrowfully of all that that confession would mean to her. "I must go and see her at once. Even that dreadful woman will not deny my right to be with the girl I love after what has happened. But, oh, my poor little love, what a blow it will be to you! For he was your ideal of all that was good, and kind, and thoughtful, and you never seemed to have any suspicion of the cloven foot."

For the young fellow did not know of that last scene in the garden, when the girl had fled in haste from the suggestions of the evil music. Poor Nora could not bring herself to speak of this to anyone. She had hidden it away in the depths of her inner consciousness, where it lay, a shuddering horror, ever ready to creep forth and terrorise her afresh when she was alone at night.

She was a loyal little woman, and it seemed hateful to harbour such doubts and fears of her aforetime friend; but they were there, nevertheless, and refused to be routed.

They grew, indeed, darker and more formidable as time went on, for she remembered many a strange speech and action which had passed almost unnoticed before.

So when Bertie's revelation came it was not altogether so astonishing as it might otherwise have been.

But when Nora cried herself to sleep that night, it was her dead friend, Sarah Pattinson, she thought of. Fate had been kind in removing the dear blind mother before she sustained the shock of knowing what a monster she had given birth to. But, oh, the pity of it! How he had been loved, and looked up to, and prayed for by that same good mother!

CHAPTER XXVII.

AGAIN ON THE HEIGHTS.

Fully two months had elapsed since the self-inflicted death of his father's murderer had saved Bertie from the painful duty of delivering him into the hands of justice.

Again, as upon that day in spring, the young fellow had climbed the heights, and sat gazing over the wide extent of Wensley Common, seated beside the girl he loved.

"What a long time it seems since we met here first!" remarked Nora, whose look of brightness sorrow had dimmed a little. "Ages have passed—and suffering makes the time seem so very long. Then, it was all fresh and green and young, while now——" and she waved her hand around significantly.

All was, indeed, changed since that spring sunset glorified the world. Then the birds sang, the flowers bloomed, and the earth was glad because of the renewal of her youth. Now the saddening touch of autumn was over all. Yet was the scene beautiful in its mellow sadness, with its mantle of golden bracken, its reddening trees, its dreamy mists.

"Now, at least, we are together," returned the lover, with a tender look; "now, at least, there is no one to forbid our love! We are both alone in the world, both well-nigh friendless; but what of that, since we have each other."

Nora's eyes filled with tears. "Doesn't it seem a little heartless in us to be happy after the tragedy of both our lives?" she said, sadly. "O Bertie, how I wish I could forget it all! I dream of it every night, and awaken trembling and afraid."

He looked at her with some anxiety, recognising that even love was as yet powerless to dispel the fears that clouded her young life, and that only time, the consoler, could effect this.

"My darling, what can I do to help you? A man feels so powerless in such a case. And I know so little of the intricacies of a girl's mind. I can only love you."

"Oh, but indeed, that's a great deal," returned the girl. "If I hadn't your love, I think I'd go mad! But you know how it is—one felt so sure—and I liked him, and trusted him even more than I liked! If you had lived with him—his devotion to his old mother—his gentleness to us all! My world has crumbled around me. Who am I to believe in?"

Digitized by Google

"Try, at least, to believe in the reality of my love for you, dearest," returned the lover. "Nora, I don't profess to be anything but a very ordinary sort of fellow; but I do love you with all my heart and soul."

She yielded her waist to his arm, and her lips to his kiss.

"Ah, yes, you love me, and I'm glad of it," she said, with a half sob; "for, O Bertie, I'm so very, very lonely! I ought to be strong enough to stand alone, but I'm not—I'm not. In the old Chelsea days, I didn't mind. I was younger then; and I had the courage of ignorance besides. Now—oh, you can't tell what a little coward I've grown!"

She hid her face on his shoulder. He was very pitiful, for her weakness appealed to his strength. It made her adorable, for she clung to him for protection against the unknown dangers she dreaded.

Soon she rallied, however, and commenced to question him concerning several persons who had been associated with the tragedy. He did his best to satisfy her curiosity.

Jerry Gobey was recovering, although slowly. His enfeebled constitution was against him; but Jim had taken a fancy to the poor fellow, and was doing his best to pull him through. They must all do what they could for Jerry, who had undoubtedly suffered sufficient at the hands of his fellow-creatures to establish a claim upon their sympathies. Even Pawson admitted this, and was eager to do his share to make amends for his unjust suspicions.

Morton, the clerk, had found a situation that suited him. Well, yes, it was in the firm of Carlton and Co. Bertie believed that the young fellow was engaged to be married. The lady was a schoolmistress, whom he had met while with the—the other firm in Thumb Court.

Hargreaves was busily engaged in writing an account of the night they had passed in the haunted Bungalow, and it was to be published by a well-known occult society. Jim Hawthorn still continued to grumble at the fate which tied him down to the life of a general practitioner in a country place, and to bemoan the loss of his favourite pipe.

"And now for our own affairs, Nora," said Bertie, taking her hand. "How long do you intend to keep me waiting for you? I'm becoming very impatient, I can assure you."

The girl gave him one of her old mischievous glances. "Well, really I don't know what to say. There's that uncomfortable pedestal upon which you would persist in sticking me. No man's a hero to his valet—no woman a saint to her husband. Perhaps we'd better not—— It's a prosaic relationship, anyway. Don't scowl so horribly—I'm only quoting Mrs. Courtland. Hadn't we better defer it indefinitely?"

He was so delighted to see that pretty dimple again that he quite forgot to be angry with her waywardness. He immediately kissed it to keep it in its place.

"Indefinitely, indeed! Not a minute longer will I wait than the Church demands. We'll be married as soon as possible."

She affected to sigh. "And poor little me'll have to climb down, after all. I haven't had much of the worship yet, either!"

"Would you rather keep on that cold height than be enshrined in a warm niche in my heart?"

The dimple was in full play as she threw him one of her quick glances.

"Well, it depends on your heart, you know. But you were always rather a masterful young man; so I suppose you'll have to have your own way. Come, now, there's no need to hug me because I prove myself no saint! And we must be getting back, too, for the lights are beginning to twinkle out down in the village. Mrs. Courtland will be very angry with me, as it is, for staying out so late!"

"Oh, confound Mrs. Courtland! What do I care for her, or anyone else in the world, now that you've promised to be my wife?"

[THE END.]

Digitized by Google

Some Famous Sunday-Schools.

By GEORGE A. WADE.

THE biggest Sunday-school in the British Isles is at Stockport, in Cheshire. Many people believe it to be the biggest Sunday-school in the world, too, but America has claimed to have larger Sunday-schools in one or two places. Whether this claim is true or not cannot be settled by the writer, since the statistics of the American schools are not full enough and clear enough to satisfy him on the point. But of Stockport's pre-eminence amongst British Sunday-schools there is not the shadow of a doubt.

